and an engagement followed, which could hardly fail to be satisfactory to the father. The Judge, in fact, consented to the marriage; but hearing some slanderous reports of the captain, he afterwards withdrew his consent. The lovers were in nowise daunted. They resolved to proceed with their engagement. November 29, 1795, the day appointed for the wedding, arrived. Judge Symmes, thinking the affair off or declining to be present, rode to Cincinnati, leaving the coast clear.

In the presence of the young lady's stepmother and many guests the ceremony was performed by Dr. Stephen Wood, a Justice of the Peace. The company assembled to witness the marriage of Captain Harrison and Miss Anna Symmes would astonish polite circles of to-day. They arrived on horseback, each man carrying a rifle, a powder-horn, and a pouch lined with patching and bullets. Travelling through narrow paths cut through thickets of blackberry and alder bushes and undergrowth of every variety, every step taken might be into an ambush of Indians. They moved in the mood, and ready for instant combat. A wife, coming with her husband, rode behind him. When they dismounted at the door, as it was winter, ten to one he wore buckskin for coat and breeches, and a coonskin cap, while she was gay with plaided linsey-woolsey of her own weaving, cutting, and sewing; her head was protected from the wind by a cotton handkerchief. The wedding-cake was of New England doughnuts. Such was in all probability the general ensemble of the wedding.

The bride may have had an outfit of better material. So recently from the East, she may have had a veil, a silk frock, and French slippers. The bridegroom, of course, wore his captain's uniform, glittering with bullet buttons of burnished brass, and high boots becoming an aide in favor with his chief, the redoubtable Anthony Wayne, whom the Indians were accustomed to describe as "the warrior who never slept." Taken altogether, the wedding celebrated at Judge Symmes's house that November day, 1795, cannot be cited as a proof of aristocratic pretension on the part of the high contracting parties.

Some time afterward Judge Symmes met his son-in-law; the occasion was a dinner-party given by General Wilkinson to General Wayne.

"Well, sir," the Judge said, in a bad humor, "I understand you have married Anna."

"Yes, sir," Harrison answered.

"How do you expect to support her?"

"By my sword and my own right arm," was the reply.

The Judge was pleased, became reconciled, and in true romantic form happily concluded the affair by giving the couple his blessing.

COUNT VON WALDERSEE.

(See Portrait.)

A CABLEGRAM from Berlin, last week, announced the retirement of General Von Moltke from the office of Chief of the General Staff of the German Army, and the appointment of General Von Waldersee as his successor. The significance of this news is fully appreciated in France, where it is regarded as a triumph of the war party, with whom the new Emperor appears to have cast his lot.

Count Von Waldersee is fifty-six years of age, having been born at Potsdam in 1832. He entered the army as second lieutenant in the artillery at the age of eighteen. He served with distinction in the Schleswig-Holstein campaigns, the Austro-German war, and commanded the Hanoverian Uhlans in the war with France. He became a brigadier-general in 1875, and in 1882 was made Quartermaster-General.

The promotion of Count Von Waldersee to the post of chief director of the most powerful military machine in the world has special interest for Americans, in the fact that his wife is a native of this country. She was born in 1838 in New York, where her father was a wholesale grocer. After his death she went with her mother and sisters on a visit to Europe, where she made the acquaintance of the Prince of Schleswig-Holstein, who, after the loss of his Duchies, took the Austrian title of Count Von Noer. He was very much her senior, but he fell in love with her and married her. Two months afterward he died, and his widow went to Vienna. There she met Count Von Waldersee, whom, in 1866, she married. One of her sisters is married to Baron Wachter, who is in the diplomatic service of the King of Wurtemberg.

THE AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE.

(See Illustration.)

A STARTLING narrative is given by M. Lavigerie, who was mainly instrumental in establishing the French Missionary Society known as the White Fathers. He is endeavoring to arouse public opinion throughout Europe to the horrors of the slave trade in Africa. He states that at the present time fully half a million human beings are yearly kidnapped in the interior, and are made to traverse the barren deserts to be sold as slaves at the coast. Nearly two-thirds of the number perish of fatigue and hardship on the way. The ivory hunters are, he states, the most inhuman of these kidnappers. They collect men, women, and children in the peaceful villages, load them with ivory, and, tying them together, as shown in the illustration, drive them, day by day, over their long journey. M. Lavigerie says, that in the last letter he had received from his missionaries, dated in March last, they stated that convoys of slaves were daily passing their station to Tangiers. M. Lavigerie believes that a small band of resolute Europeans could suppress this horrible traffic.

THE LETTER-CARRIER'S STORY.

See Illustration on page 557.)

"WHAT a cruel, heartless creature," said an old bachelor, who was one of a group of men sitting chatting on the piazza of a hotel in the Adirondacks one summer afternoon. They had just been discussing a recent scandal about a wife who had deserted her home and children, leaving a babe dangerously sick. "I tell you," he continued, "women have no hearts! They have not the nobility necessary to sacrifice their ease and comfort for the sake of any one else."

"What do you say to that, father?" said another of the group, addressing a venerable man, not far short of eighty years of age.

"Say?" replied the veteran; "why, I say I don't believe it; and what's more, I know it ain't so.

There was a general laugh at the old man's vigorous speech, and his son, who joined in it, said, by way of apology, "Father is a great believer in the fair sex. He thinks women are better than men on the whole."

"Why, of course I do, and they are, I know. Now see here, sir," turning to the bachelor, "you said women would not sacrifice themselves for others. Now I'll tell you of a thing that occurred in my own experience that proves you wrong. You must know that when I was in the old country I was a letter-carrier, what they call a postman there. Well, I knew most everybody on my route, and among them was a family named Spencer. They lived in a fine house, with a large garden around it. The mother was dead, but there were three young ladies, fine, tall, lovely girls, who kept house for their father. I used to take particular notice of the letters I took to them, because I expected such handsome girls would be having love-letters, sure."

"Didn't read them, I hope?" queried the bachelor.

"Not I, sir; I've always been an honorable man all through. What I mean by particular notice is that I reckon myself a judge of handwriting, and when I see the kind of address on a letter I can pretty well guess the kind of man that wrote it. Well, there used to come letters for Miss Mabel, the youngest of the three, addressed in a bold, dashing hand, that I made up my mind were love-letters. I formed my opinion of the man who wrote them, and I was not altogether satisfied. The flourishes about the name, and the general character of the writing, made me think he was kind of vain and weak-minded."

"You ought to have stopped the correspondence if you did not approve of him," said the bachelor.

"Don't you be in a hurry, young man," said the ex-letter-carrier; "I'm coming to the point that concerns you, right away. Well, the letters stopped coming, and I looked around; for, I said to myself, he's come to see her; and I was right. I saw him one day, and I looked him over. He was pretty much what I had thought, conceited and priggish-like, I considered. Well, to make a long story short, he used her badly. The story leaked out, and went all around the village. I felt so mad at him myself that, though he was a good thirty years younger than I, he would have felt the weight of my fist if I could have had the chance. He was a young surgeon, we heard, and a regular bad, fast man he turned out; though he'd managed to keep that a secret from Miss Mabel. It seems he thought foreign air would suit him; and just then the war between the French and Germans broke out, so he volunteered to go with the hospital service. We heard all about it afterward. He wrote just one letter, to bid Miss Mabel good-bye, and it seems she answered it.

"After that there were no letters for two or three months, but one morning we got a letter from the seat of war. The postmaster showed it me. It was addressed to him, and inside was a letter directed to 'Mabel, writer of a letter to Surgeon Fielding.' 'That's for Miss Mabel Spencer, sure,' says I; and he said, 'I think so, too; take it and see.' I did, and saw her in the garden before ever I got up to the house; and she came running to meet me, for she must have seen in my face as I had a letter. I was afraid of giving her a shock, and so I just pulled out the letter and pretended I wasn't quite sure about it. While I was squinting at it through my spectacles, she came close up and looked over my shoulder. 'That's for me; it's all right,' she said, and took it out of my hand.

"Well, sir, that letter was from another surgeon at the wars, and it was to tell her that her lover had been hurt, and needed some one to take him away and nurse him. Miss Mabel's letter had been found in his pockets, and that was how they came to write to her. Now, what did that girl do? Why, she talked her old father into letting her go right into that hurly-burly and nurse that fellow who had used her so badly. She forgot all his wickedness, and she went, and she saved his life, after everybody thought he'd die. There ain't many men would have left their home and gone out to tend a man as had served them a scurvy trick. But she did, and she not only saved his life, but she saved his soul. When she brought him back, looking more like a ghost than a living man, all his wickedness was gone out of him. They are married now, and he has quit all his bad ways, and is a changed character. Saved, sir, by a woman's love and self-sacrifice!

"That's only one case. I could tell you of others, not so striking, but just as convincing. I don't deny there's some bad women, like her you've been talking of, but if you want real goodness, go to a genuine Christian woman, and if you get her love, she'll die for you if it's necessary."

The Letter-Carrier's Momentous Missive.

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. L. S. Keyser.

(Continued from page 542.)

At Bay.

THE campaign on which Belle Havelock had entered did not languish under her management. She meditated upon it day and night, and concentrated all her woman's skill and ingenuity on the arrangement of plans for detaching young Madelling from Miss Winters and attaching him to herself. Among other manœuvres which her fertile brain devised, was one which proved successful in arousing an irritated feeling in Hadley's mind against Miss Winters. At one of the casual interviews, which none knew so well as Belle how to bring about, she rallied Duneman on his apathy as a lover, and asked him how it happened that he was so seldom Miss Winters' escort at the various social gatherings, while Mr. Madelling was so often at her side. "Why do you not ask her, for instance, to go with you to Professor Parker's lecture next Tuesday night? It is very improbable that Mr. Madelling has asked her."

"I will, I will," said Duneman enthusiastically. "It never occurred to me to forestall him in that way. Thank you, for suggesting it. How kind and thoughtful you are!"

Thus it happened that, when on Sunday evening Hadley asked permission to accompany Miss Winters to the lecture on Tuesday, he learned, to his mortification, that she was already provided with an escort. He was perfectly well aware of the customs of the college, which allowed a young lady to accept invitations of the kind, and, indeed, discouraged her from confining such favors to any one young man, unless he were her acknowledged lover; yet his egotism was hurt. He would have liked Miss Winters to refuse all such offers out of regard for him, though he had no claim upon her. Very foolishly and weakly he showed temper about it, and when on Tuesday he saw Miss Winters enter the hall with Duneman, he set her down as a flirt, and felt scarcely less bitter toward her than toward the man who had forestalled him. His irritation was increased still more by seeing his rival at church with her on Sunday evening. Duneman was evidently supplanting him, and Miss Winters, apparently, was content that he should do so. Though neither could be charged with any offence against politeness or the social customs of the college, Hadley was deeply mortified, and his indignation was stirred against them both, and still more against the religion both professed. He settled down to the preparation of his forthcoming speech in a fierce frame of mind, smarting under the sting of personal resentment. Thus Belle's stratagem was successful at all points, and the breach it had effected between Hadley and Miss Winters would probably be widened by the utterance of opinions, which consideration for her feelings might otherwise have restrained.

Saturday morning came at last, bringing a large assemblage of students and town people into Chapel Hall. As it was conceded that Hadley was the best speaker of the day, he was reserved for the last. All the other addresses were delivered, and then the name of H. C. Madelling was announced by Dr. Hartridge.

The young man made his way with firm, elastic steps to the platform, received with a courteous acknowledgment the clamorous ovation accorded him as an honored student of the college and a gifted speaker, and then, in clear, resonant tones, he announced his theme: "The False Ethics of the Hebrew Writings."

There was not a tremor in the tones of the speaker as he began his address. However much he may have hesitated beforehand to antagonize the current thinking of the college, now that he stood before his audience, looking into their expectant faces, and receiving their expressions of applause, all the misgivings which he had felt were dispelled, and his clarion tones rung with a clear, confident emphasis through the large hall.

As he uttered the first few words, which, though moderate in tone, were unmistakable in their bearing, he caught the eye of Belle Havelock, and the expression of confident expectation that played over her features acted as an exhilarant upon his mind, and lifted him, as it were, above himself. Turning to another part of the audience, he saw that Duneman's face was pale with anger and nervous dread, and this fact nerved Hadley to still bolder utterance. During his entire address, however, he avoided looking in the direction of Madeline Winters, who, as it happened, was seated at one side of the hall to his left and a little in his rear. Could he have seen her blanched, agitated face, his heart must have failed him, but as he did not see her, he was able to keep on resolutely in the course which he had mapped for himself.

Only a brief résumé of his address need be given, and that only to throw light on the questions that trouble the sceptic and on the motives that actuate him to rabid speech. His oration showed a good deal of conceit, and considerable knowledge, though of a superficial character. He maintained that the moral sense is innate in man, being written in his consciousness, and that, therefore, morality exists apart from the Bible, and is independent of it. At this point he took occasion to deal several sharp blows at men who had the presumption to say that the Hebrew Scriptures were the sole custodians of ethical truth; perhaps he did not know that there is not a Christian scholar in the land who would make such a preposterous claim, for intelligent Christians candidly admit that there are many gleamings of moral truth in pagan literature, and that "God has not left Himself without a witness in any nation." But the young sceptic, having set up his man of straw, put forth as much effort to "floor" him as if he had been an actual antagonist, instead of a phantasm of his own imagination.

In the next place he undertook to show that the Bible is not a good moral teacher, because many of its most lauded characters were guilty of heinous offences, as if the mistakes of these men were not reprobated, either explicitly or tacitly, in the Bible. In this connection he fired a return shot at Duneman, who had pointed out the "moral laxity of unbelievers." Hadley maintained that believers were often as lax in their morals as unbelievers, and, in doing so, he painted the obliquities of some of the patriarchs in such bold, irreverent colors that there was an uneasy movement among the Faculty; and some of the students thought at one time that Dr. Hartridge was on the point of interrupting the speaker; but the Doctor settled down into his chair again, and Hadley was allowed to go on.

The doctrine of eternal rewards and punishments, especially the penalty that attaches to unbelief, was made the object of the most bitter invective. "As if a man could help what he believes!" Hadley exclaimed, scornfully. And yet the poor man inconsistently continued to ridicule Christians for their belief in the tenets of religion! Growing bolder as he proceeded, he contended that the doctrine of vicarious righteousness through Christ is immoral in its tendencies, affording an excuse for sin. "No man can go to heaven on borrowed capital," vibrated through the hall. "There is no way of entrance into the holy city, except by the gate of intrinsic moral worth." His argument struck at the very root of the atonement, and to reverent minds it sounded shockingly sacrilegious.

A look of pain came to the face of Dr. Hartridge as these statements were made. It was evident that he had not suspected the presence of so ultra a type of infidelity in the college, and dreaded the influence of Hadley's speech on the students.

It is unnecessary to give further details of Hadley's argument. The main facts have been revamped in various ways by opponents of the Bible from time immemorial, and have as often been answered by Christian apologists. So long had the young sceptic repressed his sentiments, and so frequently had he been goaded to anger by Duneman's insults, that it seemed all the pent-up bitterness of his nature had at last found a valve of escape, making him almost reckless in his utterances. One or two of his closing paragraphs will show the animus of his address:

"These statements are neither defiant nor aggressive, but are simply made in self-defence, and in defence of my colleagues in this venerable institution of learning. I should not have ventured to point out the immoralities of Biblical characters and believers in the Bible, had not an unprovoked assault been made a few weeks ago from this platform, reflecting on the personal honor of those who question certain current forms of belief. It is evident that the design of the speech was to cast odium on the advocates of freedom of thought in the college, and to destroy confidence in their honesty and moral character. The speaker luxuriated in the faults and foibles of those whom he was pleased to call 'representative infidels,' and no doubt he enjoyed the banquet that he had prepared for his delectation, as he seems to have vulture-like proclivities; but there were others who did not look upon his effusion with such fond favor."

Stretching himself up to his full height, and raising his voice to its fullest compass, while his face became flushed with excitement, Hadley said: "Leaving myself out of the category altogether, I will say that there are unbelievers in this college whose characters are above reproach, and I defy any calumniator to point to a single deed in their lives that would smirch the proudest name. Their whole course has been marked by manliness and honest endeavor. If their assailants were as free from dishonesty, it would be better for the cause of Christianity. Our opponent, in making an inventory of the immoralities of infidels, forgot to mention the crimes of those who venerate the Bible. I suppose," Hadley said, putting an ictus of withering sarcasm into his tones, "that the speaker's native modesty prevented him from making an allusion of so personal a character as would have been involved in retailing the vices of those like-minded with himself."

When the speaker had finished his peroration, in which there was more florid oratory than thought, he was greeted with a volley of applause from a large number of the students, although it was obvious that sentiment was divided as to the merits and wisdom of the address. Among those who were pained by Hadley's bold utterances was Dr. Hartridge, the President of the college. It had been his custom to dismiss the audience as soon as the last speech was delivered, but to-day he thought fit to depart from the usual order, and so he rose, and asked the indulgence of the audience for a few minutes. He meant no discourtesy, he said, to the speaker who had just addressed them, for all knew that he was one of the most gifted and respected students of the college; but still the President could not help but say that he was pained beyond measure to see so talented a young man expending his God-given powers in assailing the religion that had been a blessing to the world, and had built nearly all our institutions of learning, of which the Grand Central College was an example.

As to the partial apology that had been made for the moral offences of unbelievers by setting opposite them the sins of believers, the Doctor begged his young friends to remember that the latter were in direct conflict with the plain teachings of the Scripture, while the obliquities of infidels were, as a rule, in accord with the philosophies they advocated.

"I was sorry," the President went on, "to hear our young friend indulge in raillery against the doctrine of vicarious righteousness. Pray remember that the righteousness of God, which is given us in Christ, is a perfect righteousness, while our own is at best but fragmentary, because we are sinners against the divine law. The righteousness of Christ is imparted as well as imputed to us; it is given, not loaned, and is therefore our own intrinsic possession. In regard to the doctrine of eternal retribution, which seems so repugnant to the speaker, I have only this question to ask and then I am done: Can a man ever come nearer God if he is persistently going further from Him?"

The President was about to dismiss the audience, when there was a movement in the locality of the Senior class, and George Dane rose and requested the privilege of saying a word. As there were loud calls in every part of the hall for Dane to be heard, the Doctor thought it best to grant his request. Dane's voice quavered with excitement and his breath came almost in gasps as he began:

"Doctor, I am in favor of fair play. The speech to which we have just listened was made in self-defence, as my colleague has said. It was in answer to the tirade made against unbelievers three weeks ago. The young men in the college who are in favor of freedom of thought (and there are many such) had to be exonerated from those malicious misrepresentations. Now, sir, when the enemy of free-thought made his address, in spite of its unmanly calumnies, it was allowed to go unchallenged; but no sooner is my friend's oration delivered than it is publicly put into the crucible of analysis, and an attempt is made to refute its arguments and destroy their moral force. In the name of common fairness, I ask, Doctor, whether this is right?"

Loud applause greeted this speech, but the President stood calm and composed while it lasted, and when it had subsided, he explained: "The Grand Central College is, in the best sense of the term, a Christian institution, having been founded by Christian energy and endowed with the money of Christian people, and it would be an anomaly to allow such sentiments as those just uttered to stand for an hour unrepudiated, opposed as they are to the principles by which the college has been established."

It was an unheard of piece of effrontery for a student to "talk back" to the President, but George had gone too far and was too excited to retreat, and so he retorted, sarcastically: "Are we to understand that the Grand Central College is committed, now and forever, to the advocacy of certain pet dogmas, whether true or false?"

"Christianity having been proven true so often, both by experience and historical evidence, I should say that the college is committed to the advancement of truth," replied the Doctor, a little grimly.

"My friend's address this morning has proven that it is a debatable question whether Christianity is true or not, and men of broad intelligence will allow it an untrammeled discussion," returned George, in a great, patronizing way.

His conceit was a little amusing to the President, who replied, good-naturedly: "The self-confidence of some young men is unbounded."

"The dogmatism of some older men is—unfounded!" muttered George, speaking so low, however, that he could be heard only by those who sat near him; and then he took his seat with a flushed face.

"I can readily see," continued the President, "why our young friends should think that they have been unfairly treated, and I will say that some of the strictures made against unbelievers three weeks ago seemed to me a little ungenerous; but not knowing that there was any personal feeling at the root of the address, or that there was scepticism of so positive a type in the college, I thought it unnecessary to add an explanation. But it is a little different when religion itself is attacked. You touch a man in a sensitive and vital part of his being when you assail his religious principles, for they are as dear and sacred to him as his life. A speaker might pass criticism on many things without stirring your antagonism, but if he were to speak disrespectfully of your mother or your sister, how quickly you would leap to their defence! And that is the feeling that is aroused in a man when the religion he loves has suffered an attack."

"The President forgets that our principles are 'dear and sacred' to us, too," said Hadley to George, when the young men had reached their room.

As was to be expected, sentiment in the college was greatly divided as to the course pursued by the young free-thinkers, their friends maintaining that they had done the college a service by opening the eyes of the blind and credulous, while others were shocked at the temerity of mere neophytes in learning making so violent an assault on sacred institutions.

Thus the theological warfare raged, becoming hotter and fiercer, and expanding into wider proportions, as the time passed. Never had the college been in a greater ferment of excitement, even when fraternity politics, or class-rivalry were at their height. The President and Faculty did what they could to stem the tide of unbelief, but only partially succeeded.

(To be Continued.)

THE UNBELIEF OF THE PEOPLE.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for September 9, Num. 14: 1-10, Golden Text, Heb. 3: 19.

God's Promises and Past Deliverances Forgotten—A Common Failing—Difficulties not Fully Committed to God—The Night of Weeping—Propose to Return to Bondage—An Utterance of Faith—The Enemies of Faith—A Dread of Treading Alone a New Path—The People menaced with Destruction—Successful Intercession of Moses—National Sins Punished in Time—Perversity Produced by Remorse.

"THEY could not enter in because of unbelief." (Heb. 3: 19.) Such is the apostle Paul's declaration regarding the children of Israel at the time of the spies. The whole multitude leant to the testimony of man, and set aside the promises of God and the testimony of the faithful two who stood true to Him! Would that this were an uncommon thing! But oh how few there are who endure as seeing Him who is invisible! The whole of Psalm 78 is devoted to God's complaint of His people's unbelief. "They believed not God, and trusted not in His salvation. . . believed not for all His wondrous works . . . their heart was not right with Him, neither were they steadfast in His covenant . . . They turned back, and tempted God, and limited the Holy One of Israel." (Ps. 78: 22, 32, 37, 41.) But how many of us do the same thing! How many there are who put a burden or perplexity into the hands of God, and then, instead of being filled with calm confidence, go over the difficulties again and again, as though they expected God to do nothing!

Talking over Difficulties, or thinking over them, or even continuing to pray over them when we might be trusting the promises—all this savors of unbelief.

"The congregation lifted up their voice and cried; and the people wept that night." What was the matter? Had God withdrawn His promises? Had He left His people? Was there anything fresh in the situation? No; but the people had been looking at their difficulties instead of looking at God, and they had been overcome, and in heart they did not think God was able to do as He had promised. Yet they did not directly find fault with God, but with His servants. They murmured against Moses and Aaron, and said, "Would God we had died in the land of Egypt! or would God we had died in this wilderness! And wherefore hath the Lord brought us into this land to fall by the sword, that our wives and our children should be a prey?" Poor, senseless people! No enemy was near them; they were no longer slaves, but children cared for by the most loving of Fathers; they were miraculously fed and clothed, and the very presence of God was with them; yet, because they did not see on the instant the fulfillment of God's promises, they let them go for nothing! They even contemplated returning to Egypt, and consulted one with another. "Let us make a captain, and let us return into Egypt." Is it possible that they had so soon forgotten the burdens which oppressed them there, and the plagues and wonders which God had brought upon the Egyptians for their deliverance? Were they so childish that the present moment—in which they had at all, but only an apprehension of trouble which might possibly overtake them in case God broke His word—was sufficient to wipe out of their hearts every grateful remembrance of the past? It was a sad moment for Moses and Aaron, but they knew God, and did not attempt to take things into their own hands, they "fell on their faces before all the assembly of the congregation of the children of Israel"; and this was not in token that they were crushed by them, but that they sought their God.

No Real Trouble

Then Joshua and Caleb once again bore their testimony for God. They rent their clothes, for their hearts were stirred within them, and "they spake unto all the company of the children of Israel, saying, the land which we passed through to search it is an exceeding good land. If the Lord delight in us, then He will bring us into this land, and give it us." The ten spies never mentioned the name of the Lord at all, but only the circumstances; Joshua and Caleb could not forget their God; they saw the land, they saw the people, but only in their relation to God. Where God is a living reality, there unbelief cannot exist. "Only rebel not ye against the Lord," they said, "neither fear ye the people of the land; for they are bread for us; their defence is departed from them, and the Lord is with us; fear them not." This is the utterance of faith.

What are the enemies which keep us from appropriating as our own any of the promises of God? Is there the fear that other and older Christians will not go with us? How many there are who say, "If such and such a thing were right, surely such a holy man as Mr. So and So would preach it." Perhaps no man lived a much holier life than the prophet Elijah, yet if Elisha had obeyed him rather than the direct command which he had received from God, he would have lost the blessing which he craved, "a double portion of thy spirit." (II Kings 2: 9.) Is the difficulty that your past experience contradicts the promise of God? But God can make a new thing in the earth; Peter's past experience of water was that it would bear no solid weight, but he treated the "Come" of Jesus as superior to his past experience, and, in the power of that word, he walked upon the water. Elijah had no experience of resurrection, and in all the past history of the world it had not been told, but from the deep acquaintance with God which he had formed at the brook Cherith, he knew he dared to ask it, and he found as he had trusted, that God was above death; and the widow's son lived again. (I Kings 17: 21-23.) To these men of old, difficulties, yea, impossibilities, were a very nourishment of their faith, in calling out the resources of the living God. They saw that the defence of all enemies and all difficulties was departed from them; the Lord was with them, and this answered every purpose. In His presence they knew no fear. When God's two champions spoke thus to the people, they commenced persecution, and bade stone them with stones: and just then the Lord appeared upon the scene. Nebuchadnezzar's fiery furnace, the den of lions, the stones which sped Stephen up to heaven, did not shut God out: in the furnace, in the lions' den, and standing within an opened heaven, ready to receive Stephen, there was the Son of God. Once again Moses was put to the test, and God for the second time offered to destroy the people, and to make of him a great nation. But Moses was not to be overcome, and he reasoned with God, how this would be to play into the hands of the Egyptians, and that the glorious witness of the cloudy and the fiery pillar would go for nothing. "Now if Thou shalt kill all this people as one man, then the nations which have heard the fame of Thee will speak, saying, Because the Lord was not able to bring this people into the land which He sware unto them, therefore He hath slain them in the wilderness. And now, I beseech Thee, let the power of my Lord be great... pardon, I beseech thee, the iniquity of this people, according unto the greatness of Thy mercy, and as Thou hast forgiven this people from Egypt, even until now— Let thy power be great in mercy, not in wrath." Again the Lord allowed Himself to be conquered by Moses, for Moses had appealed to His very name and character; there was no resisting him. "The Lord said, I have pardoned according to thy word; but—but as truly as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord."

Bread for Them

God must be Justified for His glory's sake. He decreed that the men who had ten times (Ex. 14: 11; 15: 24; 16: 2; 17: 2; 32: 1; Lev. 10: 1-2; Num. 11: 1-4; 12: 2; 14: 1, 2,) tempted Him, or disbelieved Him, should die in the Wilderness, and never see the Promised Land. "But My servant Caleb, because he had another spirit with him, and hath followed Me fully, him will I bring into the land whereinto he went; and his seed shall possess it." And God enlarged His judgment upon the people, and declared that the children whom the people said should be a prey, "them will I bring in, and they shall know the land which ye have despised. But as for you, your carcasses, they shall fall in this wilderness. And your children shall wander in the wilderness forty years... After the numbers of the days in which ye searched the land, even forty days, each day for a year, shall ye bear your iniquities, and ye shall know My breach of promise." It has been well said that nations have no hereafter, as such, in another world, and therefore national sins must be punished in time. The sin of the spies was adopted by the congregation, and made their own, and thus, as a people, they must suffer. The guilt of England in forcing the opium trade on China by the last war, when the authorities of that heathen land protested against it, the millions of souls and bodies ruined by it—this iniquity will have to be punished—

England Must Suffer.

The iniquity of forcing the liquor traffic on India, so that the revenue was doubled in one year, but at the cost of numbers of natives demoralized and ruined—this must be punished; and then the horrible system of licensed vice which has, thank God, been put a stop to—these things must meet with retribution. "When the land sinneth against Me, by trespassing grievously, then will I stretch out Mine hand upon it... and will cut off man and beast from it. Though these three men, Noah, Daniel, and Job, were in it, they should deliver but their own souls by their righteousness saith the Lord.

The Lord having pronounced His judgment upon the nation, next dealt with individual sinners: the ten spies died by the plague before the Lord." But Joshua and Caleb were spared. When Moses told the people God's severe message of judgment, and that the ten spies were dead, they "mourned greatly." But it was a mourning more of remorse than of repentance; they were less sorry for their sin than for its consequences. Instead of yielding themselves now fully up to the Lord, "they rose up early in the morning, and got them up into the top of the mountain, saying. Lo, we be here, and will go up unto the place which the Lord hath promised: for we have sinned." But they were as wilful in going forward now, as they had been in hanging back before. "Moses said, Wherefore now do ye transgress the commandment of the Lord? but it shall not prosper. Go not up, for the Lord is not among you; that ye be not smitten before your enemies." Let us never forget that when we have fallen into error, we cannot restore ourselves; we can confess and yield up ourselves afresh, but we can never make up for lost time, but as the Lord undertakes and leads us. Moses said, "Because ye are turned away from the Lord, therefore the Lord will not be with you." But they presumed to go up unto the hill-top; nevertheless the ark of the covenant of the Lord and Moses departed not out of the camp. What could they do without the ark of the Lord? their enemies came down 'and smote them,' and discomfited them, even unto Hormah."

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman (London), edited by the Rev. M. Baxter, may be had from the office of this journal, 63 Bible House, New York; price six cents, including postage. Annual subscription, seventy cents. The following articles, among others, are contained in the number for August:

"The Unknown Tongues." By "Octoginta."

The Nineteenth Century in the Light of Prophecy. By the Rev. E. J. Hytche.

"What the World's Coming to." By one of the Benighted.

Earthquakes in Prophecy. By W. Appleford. (Continued.)

The Holy Spirit in the Coming Age.

The Fate of the Wicked at Christ's Coming. By the Rev. Henry Varley.

The Seven Trumpets Explained in their past Year-day Historical Fulfilment. The Distress at Jerusalem.

The Final Seven Years; or, Daniel's Seventieth Week.

Passing Events Viewed from a Prophetic Standpoint.

[Bound volumes containing the monthly numbers for 1884 and 1883 may be had; price $1.]

Thoughts Between the Lines.

BY O. F. IRELAND.

"Jesus, lover of my soul."
Who on the cross such love displayed,
"Let me to Thy bosom fly,"
There I cannot be dismayed;
"While the nearer waters roll,"
Alone I cannot breast the wave;
"While the tempest still is high,"
Thy protecting arm can save.

"Hide me, O my Saviour, hide!"
Blessed thought, to hide in Thee
"Till the storm of life is past,"
And from dangers we are free,
"Safe into the haven guide," Haven of eternal rest;
"O receive my soul at last."
There to be forever blest!

"Other refuge have I none,"
And none other is complete;
"Hangs my helpless soul on Thee,"
Here it finds a safe retreat,
"Leave, O leave me not alone,"
In this wild and lonely place;
"Still support and comfort me"
With Thy rich, abounding grace.

"All my trust on Thee is stayed,"
Thy rich promises are sure;
"All my help from Thee I bring,"
All Thy gifts are rich and pure.
"Cover my defenceless head"
With Thy benedictions mild;
"With the shadow of Thy wing"
Overspread Thy trusting child!

"Plenteous grace with Thee is found;"
None may want who trust in Thee;
"Grace to cover all my sin"
Thou will not withhold from me.
"Let the healing streams abound," Flooding now my waiting soul;
"Make and keep me pure within,"
Pure and every whit made whole.

"Thou of life the fountain art,"
Coming from the Father's throne;
"Freely let me take of Thee,"
That I Thy righteousness may own,
"Spring Thou up within my heart," Blessing all my future days;
"Rise to all eternity,"
And I'll sing Thy endless praise.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike), will be sent post-paid, for 10 cts., or 100 for 20 cts. Postage stamps taken.

When the Energies Flag
Use Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

Dr. T. C. SMITH, Charlotte, N. C., says: "It is an invaluable nerve tonic, a delightful beverage, and one of the best restorers when the energies flag and the spirits droop."

"There is nothing you require of your agents but what is just and reasonable and strictly in accordance with business principles." That's the sort of testimony any house can be proud of, and it is the testimony of hundreds of men who are profitably employed by B. F. Johnson & Co., Pub's, Richmond, Va. Write for full particulars.

The latest and best imperial Photographs of Dr. Talmage and Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, with their fac-simile autograph, can be obtained from J. E. Jewett, 77 Bible House, New York. Sent postpaid for twenty-five cents each. Postage stamps taken.

No Loose Bristles! No Bleeding Gums!
Perfectly Polished Teeth.

Absorbs Deposits. Polishes Enamel. Soothes Gums. Prevents Decay.

which

Bristles Leave Behind. Bristles Destroy. Bristles Torture. Bristles Excite.

TRACTS! TRACTS! TRACTS!
Christian Workers should send for Catalogue and Sample Packet of Tracts and Booklets imported from Britain. One stamp for postage.
TRACT DEPOT, Orillia, Canada.

TEAS LADIES Send at once for our new terms. THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO., 31 and 33 Vesey St., New York, N. Y.

To Our Fellow Christians

Who Are Forwarding Contributions in Aid of Christian Work in Mexico.

Bishop Riley requests me to inform the kind friends who are generously contributing in aid of Christian work in Mexico that we have now over one hundred monthly subscribers who are forwarding contributions every month in its behalf. Bishop Riley sends to all who are contributing in aid of the work in Mexico his most sincere thanks for their timely gifts.

As there are no doubt many who would be glad to contribute something monthly in behalf of the cause of Christ in Mexico, but who feel that they cannot afford to give as much as one dollar a month, we venture the suggestion, that when possible the friends of the work should try and collect small contributions from such and forward the same with their own contributions to Bishop Riley, 43 Bible House, New York. For example, some friend of the work who is now forwarding one dollar a month, might intuce ten others, to each give ten cents a month, and collect and forward the same with his own contribution. Another who now contributes one dollar a month, might intuce four others, to each give one cent a day, or thirty-one cents a month, and collect and forward the same with his own contribution monthly. Still a third who now contributes a dollar a month might induce two friends, to each give fifty cents a month, and collect and forward the same regularly with his own contribution.

If this plan could be adopted generally among the more than one hundred regular monthly subscribers to the work, we might soon be able to report to our friends that we had over two hundred dollars a month contributed regularly in behalf of the work in Mexico.

We remind our friends that to continue the work in Mexico effectively we most pressingly need a regular monthly income, as we have to meet a regular monthly expense.

A most precious Christian work has been commenced in Mexico, and we are doing what we can to continue it, by raising an income in its behalf. We earnestly appeal to our fellow Christians to aid us in this effort. There are one hundred and thirteen millions who speak the English language, and seventy-five millions who speak the Spanish or Portuguese languages. Among those who speak the English language, there are multitudes who know and love the pure gospel, and are doing what they can for the Master. Among those who speak the Spanish or the Portuguese languages, there are a few who know and love the pure gospel, and are faithfully working for our dear Master. Our Spanish-American society is working hard to raise an income to aid in building up a strong centre of Christian work in Mexico. The influence of that work has already extended into Spain and Cuba, and we trust will yet extend into South America. Fellow Christians, think of seventy-five millions who speak the Spanish or Portuguese languages, millions and millions, and millions of whom, have never had a Bible in their hands!!! Help us! help us! to do Christian work in their midst.

Bishop Riley has been instrumental in having more than one hundred thousand copies of the Bible or New Testament circulated in Mexico. Many hundreds of children have been educated in Christian schools established by him. More than forty congregations have been gathered in the Republic of Mexico through his efforts. He has secured two magnificent stone churches in the City of Mexico where the Gospel has been preached for years. He has trained up a noble band of able preachers of the pure gospel. He has given nineteen years of his life and his fortune to aid in building up this great work, and he now appeals to his fellow Christians to contribute the monthly income needed to continue it effectively.

Dear friends, will you not only continue to contribute to this good work yourselves, but also encourage others to do the same. Some may not be able to contribute monthly but could do so occasionally. Occasional gifts are most thankfully received. Pray for the work, and that many may be moved to befriend it.

With best Christian wishes, I am, your brother in Christ,

A. D. MAINE.

Jenny June's Books for Ladies.

LADIES' FANCY WORK. New Edition. Edited by Jenny June.
A new book, giving designs and plain directions for Artistic Fancy Work in Embroidery, Lace-work, Knitting, Tatting, Crochet-work, Net-work, Kensington Painting, Wax Flowers, Painting on Silk, and all kinds of Fancy Needle-work. This book is printed on fine paper, has a handsome cover, and contains over 700 Illustrations. Price 50 Cents.

Comprising designs for Rugs, Footstools, Hat-racks, Pincushions, Ottomans, Work-baskets, Pen-wipers, Bed-quilts, Lambrequins, Work bags, Book covers, Wood-boxes, Scrap-baskets, Sofa Coverlets, Folding Screens, Sofa Cushions, Music Portfolios, Slipper Patterns, Wall Pockets, Carriage Rugs, Chair-back Covers, Towel-racks, Perfume Sachets, Lamp-shades, Needle-cases, Catch-alls, Match-safes, Chair-bolsters, Umbrella-cases, School-bags, Patch-work, Glove-cases, Air-castles, Gypsy Tables, Hair receivers, Table Mats, Night-dress Cases, Shoe-bags, Jewel-boxes, Door-mats, Knitted Jackets, Paper-racks, Pillow-shams, Hairpin Holders, and every design in fancy work a lady can desire, to the number of over 700. Jenny June, in her preface to this book, says: "The present volume aims to supply a greater variety of excellent designs—every one of which is useful for dress or household decoration—than have ever before been gathered within the leaves of one manual." Price, Post-paid, 50 Cents.

LETTERS AND MONOGRAMS, for Marking on Silk, Linen, and other Fabrics; for Household use. Edited by Jenny June. The aim of this new book is to give as great a variety of Initial Letters, Alphabets, and Monograms as possible, and to teach how and where the different sizes, forms, and models of letters can be most suitably applied, and with what materials they can be most suitably reproduced. This book is printed on fine paper, with handsome cover, and contains over

1,000 Illustrations. Price 50 Cents.

Comprising Alphabets, Monograms, and Initial Letters for marking Baby-blankets, Bed-linen, Bureau-scarfs, Banners, Handkerchiefs, Doyles, Dusterees &c. Ecclesiastical Embroidery, Underclothing, House-linen, Pillow-shams, Laundry-bags, Portfolios, Sermon-cases, Sofa-cushions, Splashers, Tea-cloths, Table-linen, Tidies, Towels, Umbrella-covers, Work-aprons, Work-bags, etc. Ladies will find this the only book of Initials, Monograms, and Alphabets published in this country. Price, Post-paid, 50 Cents.

KNITTING AND CROCHET: A Guide to the Use of the Needle and the Hook. Edited by Jenny June. The aim of the editor has been to supply work... an accurate and satisfactory guide to Knitting and Crochet work. This book is printed ... fine paper, bound with a handsome cover, and ... over 200 Illustrations. Price 50c.

All known Stitches in ... Macrame, and Crochet ... are illustrated, described, and made plain for beginners. Designs ... directions are given to Knit and Crochet Afghans, Under-vests, Shirts, Petticoats, Jackets, Shawls, Insertion, Trimming, Edgings, Comforters, Lace, Slippers, Socks, Gaiters, Drawers, Stockings, Mittens, Clouds, Counterpanes, Quilts, Rugs, Hoods, Caps, Shawls, Dresses, Bed-quilts, etc. The most complete work on Knitting and Crochet published. Price, Post-paid, 50 Cents.

NEEDLE-WORK: A Manual of Stitches and Studies in Embroidery and Drawn Work. Edited by Jenny June. In this new book the author attempts to systematize the modern methods in Embroidery and Drawn Work, and to aid women to a true and practical guide to the beautiful art of Needle-work. This book is printed on fine paper, has a handsome cover, and contains 200 Illustrations. Price 50 Cents.

All known Stitches in Needle-work are illustrated, described, and made plain for beginners. Designs in Needle-work are given to decorate my lady's chamber, my lady's robe, the dining-room, parlor, and library, and for Linen and Cotton Fabrics, including designs for Mantel-scarfs, Bed-spreads, Child's Quilt, Pillow-covers, Bureau-scarfs, Table-covers, Chair-backs, Morning Sacques, Handkerchiefs, Mufflers, Wraps, Sashes, Fans, Slippers, Bonnets, Parasols, Aprons, Work-bags, Glove-cases, Sachets, Lunch-cloths, Napkins, Table-mats, Doylies, Tray-covers, Tea-cloths, Curtains, Banners, Screens, Sofa-cushions, Scarfs, Sofa-rugs, etc. The only standard book on the subject of Needle-work. Price, Post-paid, 50 Cents. The four books for $1.75. Stamps taken.

Address J. E. JEWETT, 77 Bible House, New York.

LACES.

JAMES McCREERY & CO.

Will have a special Sale this week of Chantilly and Spanish Guipure Lace Flounces, 4 inches wide, at $1.50 per yard and upward. Black and Cream Drapery Netts, 48 and 54 inches wide, at $1.25 per yard and upward. Russian Brussels and Fancy Netts in Black, Cream and all the leading colors.

A Special line of Ladies' French Initial Handkerchiefs at $1.50 per half dozen. Torchon, Medici and Florentine Laces, Embroideries, Ruffling &c.

JAMES McCREERY & CO.,

Broadway and 11th St.

New Catalogue. Now Ready

BEFORE YOU BUY ANY BOOKS FOR YOUR

SUNDAY-SCHOOL LIBRARY,

Send to me for a full Catalogue of the cheapest and best Sunday-School Books ever offered, and our SPECIAL OFFER TO SUNDAY-SCHOOLS. Satisfaction guaranteed or money refunded.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller, 77 Bible House, New York.

For Gas

BAILEY'S COMPOUND Light-spreading Silver-Plated CORRUGATED GLASS REFLECTORS
A wonderful invention for Lighting Churches, Halls, etc. Handsome designs. Satisfaction guaranteed. Catalogue and price list free.
Bailey Reflector Co.
113 Wood st. Pittsburgh, Pa.

1,000 Agents Wanted to Sell 100,000 Copies National Hand Book of American Progress,

E. O. HAVEN, LL.D., & others,
1492 to date. Six Vols in One. A non-partisan reference Cyclopædia, of History, Biography, Statistics, Politics, for School, Home and Office. Illustrated, 6 pages, $2. E. B. TREAT, Pub. 771 B'way, N.

THE BRYANT SCHOOL, ROSLYN, L. I., N.
23 miles from N. Y., overlooking L. I. Sound.
Incorporated Academy for Boys. English, Classical, Commercial. Military organization under graduate of U. S. M. A. (West Point). Buildings, grounds and general equipment unsurpassed. Apply to
Geo. Bruce Cortelyou, Principal.

UNIVERSITY ORGANS.
They Lead the World.—$55 to $500.
Sold Direct to Families. No Middlemen.
Solid Walnut 5-Octaves-Double Couplers. Guaranteed for Six Years and sent, with Stool and Book, for TRIAL IN YOUR OWN HOME BEFORE YOU BUY. ESTABLISHED 1859. $35
MARCHAL & SMITH,
285 East 21st Street, New York.

"Demonology or Spiritualism,* Ancient and Modern."—"An effective weapon."—"A sword of fire."—"Only unanswerable work on the subject."—Startling disclosures.—History facts and data—Scores saved already. Whole communities re-cued. Every family, preacher and christian worker needs one. 310 pp. 12mo, cloth. Price reduced to $1. Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price. Address J. E. JEWETT, 77 Bible House, New York.

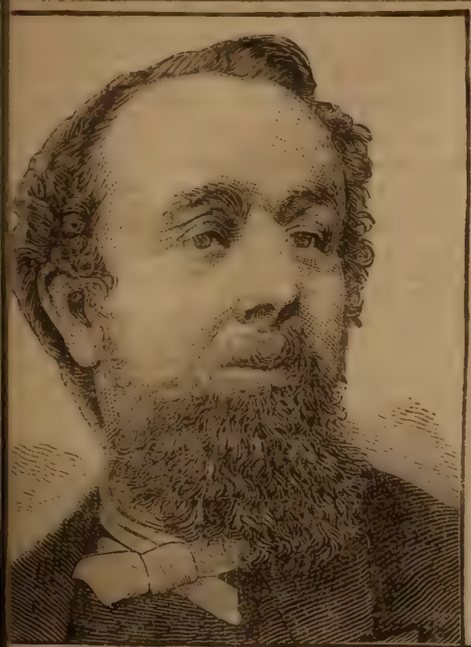
AGENTS WANTED to sell "The Child's Bible." Introduction by Bishop J. H. Vincent, D.D. The best selling book handled by agents. Recommended by all clergymen. Address Cassell & Co., B.B.S.D., 104 and 108 Fourth Ave., New York; 40 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

$75.00 to $250.00 A MONTH can be made working for us. Agents preferred who can furnish a horse and give their whole time to the business. Spare moments may be profitably employed also. A few vacancies in towns and cities. E. F. Johnson & Co., Pub's, 1009 Main St., Richmond, Va.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1888, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.

Vol. XI., No. 36. Office, 63 Bible House. N. Y. THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 6, 1888. Annual Subscription, $1.50.



CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

PORTRAITS AND LIVES OF THE REV. THOMAS, AND THE LATE MRS. WAKEFIELD, Missionaries in East Africa.

PLASTERS THAT WILL NOT STICK. A Vacation Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

THE PROPHETIC DAY—Aug. 14-15.

The Juggernaut Festival Last Month—The Healing of a Chicago Clergyman—A Cheerful Missionary—A Chinese Demoniac—Italian Newspaper Enterprise, etc.

THE WICKED AT CHRIST'S COMING. By Rev. Henry Varley.

THE LORD'S SUPPER: A REMEMBRANCE. A New Sermon by C. H. Spurgeon.

Gems from New Books: A Praying General, etc.

PORTRAIT OF THE NEW CHIEF-JUSTICE FULLER.

PICTURE OF THE PANIC AMONG ELEPHANTS AT THE BAVARIAN CENTENNIAL.

A PROVIDENTIAL ESCAPE. (With Illustration.)

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE. A New Serial Story by Rev. L. S. Keyser. (Continued.)

THE SMITTEN ROCK. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

AN EAST AFRICAN MISSION HOUSE.

A GROUP OF NATIVE GALLAS CHRISTIANS OF RIBÉ.

A FAMILY OF HEATHEN NATIVE GALLAS OF RIBÉ.

IN THE SLAVE MARKET, ZANZIBAR.

REV. THOMAS, AND THE LATE MRS. WAKEFIELD, Formerly Missionaries in East Africa—Scenes in the Sphere of their Work.

REV. THOMAS WAKEFIELD.

President of the Methodist Free Churches.

Born in 1836 - Apprenticed to a Printer in 1852—Converted at Nantwich—Enters the Ministry in 1858—Becomes a Missionary to Africa in 1861 Arrival at Zanzibar in 1862—Struggles and Successes at Ribé—Visits the Galla Country in 1865—Returns Home in 1868—Further Service and Sorrow in East Africa—Another Visit Home in 1882—Founds the Galla Mission in 1883—Home Labors—Elected President.

THE Free Methodist denomination in England has made a wise and welcome innovation in placing in its seat of honor this year a minister whose laurels have been won in heathen lands. This step is the more gratifying because there has been a tendency in the past on the part of the churches of all denominations to regard missionaries as in a sense inferior in rank to the preacher at home. We are glad to notice that the Congregationalists have also entertained the same project, though the Rev. Griffith John, the eminent missionary in China, who was the missionary suggested for the chairmanship of the Union, declines the honor on account of the urgency of his work in China.

The newly elected Free Methodist President, Rev. Thomas Wakefield, was born at Derby, Eng., on June 23, 1836, so that he has now passed his fifty-second year. When he was only three years old the family removed to the city of Chester, where his mother died in 1886, at the age of ninety-two years. As a child he was affectionate and thoughtful, as well as diligent in reading every book he could lay his hands on. Full of fun and frolic as a boy, he has carried a sparkling cheerfulness with him all through life, which has no doubt brightened him in long seasons of darkness and depression. In 1852 he was apprenticed to a printer in Nantwich. While resident in this ancient town he was converted to God, and began to preach the gospel. In the early part of 1858 he entered the ministry of the United Methodist Free Churches, and was appointed to the Bodmin Circuit. After the Assembly of 1860 he removed to the Helston Circuit, until he was led in the year following to offer himself for the work of

The New Mission in East Africa.

The establishment of this mission was greeted throughout the whole of the connexion with immense enthusiasm, and deep interest has ever since surrounded the history of it. The first missionary party consisted of Dr. Krapf (the German missionary pioneer), two other Germans, and the Revs. T. Wakefield and J. Woolner. They arrived at Zanzibar after a tedious and perilous voyage in January 1862. In time they proceeded to Mombasa, and then to Ribé, where the mission was established. Dr. Krapf and the Germans soon left the mission and returned to Europe. Mr. Woolner was prostrated by fever, and in a few weeks had to be brought back to Europe with a shattered constitution. Left alone in a strange land, and repeatedly prostrated by African fever, Mr. Wakefield yet struggled on to establish the mission, and to erect the buildings which were necessary.

The heroic servant of Christ was at length gladdened by the arrival in April, 1863, of the brave and self-denying Rev. Charles New, and in the spring of the following year by the lamented Edmund Butterworth. Then came a long hard struggle with many discouragements, brightened now and then with promise of success, some of the heathen desiring to give themselves to God. Mr. Wakefield made an interesting in 1865, an account of which was published under the title of "Footprints in Eastern Africa." In the following year, accompanied by Mr. New, he visited another part of the Galla country with a view to obtain consent to open a mission there; but the time had not yet come, and the missionaries returned to Ribé to plod on and hope for brighter days.

Journey to the Galla Country

In October, 1868, Mr. Wakefield visited England to recruit his health, remaining till the spring of 1870, and doing work of immense service to the churches as a missionary deputation. His descriptions of missionary life and labors were received with intense interest by the audiences which assembled. Then, accompanied by Mrs. Wakefield and the Rev. W. Yates, he returned to East Africa. Mr. Yates was compelled to return home through illness, and his solitude was still more sadly intensified by the illness and death of his beloved wife. This was followed in a few months by the death of Mr. New on his return from Chagga. Mr. Wakefield's health became so shattered that he quite expected his own grave would be added to those already made. However, it pleased God to restore him to health, and he gave himself with fresh zeal to the carrying out of the work.

In 1882, after another visit to England, and another spell of deputation work, his residence was fixed at Jomvu, and he again visited the Galla country, and at length fulfilled the long-cherished hope of the Free Churches in the Establishment of the Galla Mission.

It was in December, 1885, that this mission was taken charge of by Rev. J Houghton (whose portrait and life appeared in this journal on January 27, 1887) and his wife. They took up their quarters at Golbanti; but only a few weeks later the dreaded Masai warriors suddenly appeared in the neighborhood, burned down a number of huts, took away cattle, and killed between forty and fifty of the Gallas, among whom were four Christians. On May 3, 1886, the Masai warriors speared to death both Mr. Houghton and his devoted wife; but the gospel standard had been planted, and though the hands that bore it were laid in the grave, it has not fallen. The cause has won many triumphs, and the good work is satisfactorily progressing.

For many years Mr. Wakefield devoted himself to the translation of portions of the Holy Scriptures and Christian hymns into the languages and dialects of eastern Africa, so that he has produced a literature which will no doubt do much in the near future for the evangelization of those regions.

In May, 1887, Mr. Wakefield again returned to his native land in broken health, and with the probability that for a long time, at least, he would not be able to return to Africa, where in he had toiled for the uplifting of the degraded races of that land, and the spread of the gospel in the dark places, which are full of the habitations of cruelty. Amid dangers in travel over sea and land, in perils from disease, and the yet more treacherous conduct of the natives and others, with death striking down one after another of his co-laborers and loved ones, through long periods of solitude occasioned by these sad bereavements, he stood with unflinching courage and devotion to his post, carrying on the work with a steadfast perseverance which has resulted in the establishment of a Christian church in that portion of the Dark Continent.

The Labor of Twenty-Six Years

He settled in Leeds, and, with an improvement in health, engaged in deputation work. At the Louth Assembly last year Mr. Wakefield was nominated for the chair, the nomination being received with acclamation; but on account doubtless of his want of acquaintance with home affairs, he withdrew from the nomination, but was afterwards elected a member of the Missionary Committee. This manifestation of enthusiasm virtually assured his election as President at the Assembly this year.

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION—1888.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled, "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting 75 cents. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God.

THE LATE MRS. WAKEFIELD.

Born in 1844—Takes Charge of a School—Interest in Christian Work—Goes to Birmingham in 1864—Accepts an Offer of Marriage from Rev. J. Mitchil, a Missionary in Ceylon—Aids in a Revival—Death of Mr. Mitchil—Life at Woolwich—First Meeting with Mr. Wakefield—Marriage—Sets Sail for Africa in 1870—Visits the Zanzibar Slave-Market—Mission Labors—Death of a Son in 1873—Illness, Farewell Interview with Native Christians, and Death.

MRS. REBECCA WAKEFIELD (née Brewin), for nearly four years the wife and efficient helpmeet of her husband, now the President of the Methodist Free Church Conference, was born at Mountsorrel, England, on August 19, 1844, and died on July 16, 1873, in the twenty-ninth year of her age, at Ribé, in eastern Africa. Her childhood was a very sunny one, until her good father's death in 1857. In the spring of 1861 she took charge of a young ladies' school in her native village, and there she continued her duties as principal for three years. On Sundays she taught in the Sunday-school, and engaged in tract distribution. From a child she was greatly interested in mission work; and the salvation of the heathen was at all times very near her heart.

In November, 1862, Rebecca was called to follow her mother to the grave. This great trial fell very heavily upon her. The school was kept on for eighteen months afterwards, during which period she lived with her aunt, in whom she found a mother's watchful care and tender affection. In the summer of 1864 a lady in Birmingham, a cousin of her mother, and in delicate health, strongly desired Miss Brewin's companionship, and offered her a quiet, comfortable home. She acceded to the proposal, and her connection with the Mountsorrel school terminated.

One morning, a few days after the closing of her school-life, an event occurred which for a time changed the current of her thoughts in reference to her own future, and promised also to change the whole course of her life. It was the receipt of a letter, just as she was leaving her aunt's with a party of friends to spend a day in Bradgate Park. She did not open the letter until the rendezvous was reached. Standing under a tree, and hidden by its friendly trunk from the remainder of the company, she breaks the seal. It is closely written on very thin paper, and the envelope bears a foreign stamp. There is a somewhat troubled, tearful smile upon the beautiful countenance that is bending over it, for it contains from the Rev. John Mitchil, a friend of her earlier years, and who was at this time the Principal of the Educational Department of the Missionary College at Jaffna, Ceylon. The offer was ultimately accepted.

An Offer of Marriage

In August, 1865, Asiatic cholera was raging around the mission-house at Jaffna. The Rev. John Mitchil assiduously devoted himself to relieving the bodily and spiritual necessities of the many helpless natives stricken by when suddenly it seized him in its relentless grasp, and on November 6 he lay down upon his couch in the study of the mission-house to die. His last audible words were, "I am going to Jesus," and on the evening of November 7 he sank peacefully away. The tidings reached England on December 14, and filled with anguish the heart of the expectant bride; but she cast her sorrow upon the Saviour, and found needed consolation and efficient support in Him.

The Dreadful Pestilence,

Miss Brewin removed to London in August, 1867, where she joined the Beresford Street Church, Woolwich, which was under her brother's care, and identified herself with its various organizations and agencies, and God richly blessed her work, both to her own heart and to the hearts of others. In the spring of 1869 she attended the "May Meetings" in London. The annual gathering of the United Methodist Free Churches Missions was especially interesting to ner, on account of the presence on the platform of Exeter Hall of one of the earliest of the east African missionaries, Rev. Thomas Wakefield, whom she now saw for the first time. During the sitting of the Annual Assembly in Sunderland, in July and August of the same year, Mr. Wakefield offered her marriage, and was accepted.

Her Marriage

took place on December 2, 1869, at Louth, Lincolnshire. On February 24, 1870, Mr. and Mrs. Wakefield set sail from Gravesend, together with the Rev. W. Yates, and Dado, a negro boy whom Mr. Wakefield had rescued from slavery just prior to his visit to England. On June 2 anchor was dropped in the harbor of Zanzibar.

One evening Mr. Wakefield took his wife to see the well-known slave-market in this place, and the sight filled her with wonder and sorrow. She writes: "I could scarcely believe my own eyes as we threaded our way among the crowds of buyers and sellers of human flesh and blood. The poor creatures offered for sale stood in rows here and there; and were marked on the forehead by a daub of yellow paint, to distinguish them. They were of all ages, from two years and upward; aye, and less than that, for a mother with a baby in her arms or strapped at her back, gypsy fashion, were frequently offered in one lot. Several auctioneers were busy pushing their way among the crowd, dragging by the wrist the wretched victim they were selling, and shouting at the top of their voices the highest bid that had yet been reached, while the buyers felt the arms of the poor slave as she was hurried past them. I had read of slave-markets before, but never thought that I should myself be a witness of the horrid doings and painful sights of these still existing places of traffic. (See Illustration No. 4.)

It was not, however, until the following January that Mr. and Mrs. Wakefield removed to Their Home at Ribe.

They proceeded by way of Mombasa, about 120 miles; then for about twelve miles in a small boat up a creek and river, and finally, overland for six miles, to the Mission station at Ribé, where, excepting occasional changes between that place and Mombasa, they remained till the day of Mrs. Wakefield's death. (Specimens of the Ribé are depicted in the Illustration, No. 2.)

Into the details of missionary life it is not possible here to enter. Sunshine and sorrow alternated with Mr. and Mrs. Wakefield, as they do in all households, and not less in missionary households than in others. At length, however, just after a son was born to them (a daughter had been given them in December, 1870), the mother was smitten by disease, with which she bravely battled for six weeks, at the end of which time she succumbed. But before her own departure her little son died. This was on July 12, 1873. What remains of this sorrowful day's history is best told in Mr. Wakefield's own words: "In the evening, when was ready, I brought it into the bedroom, and laid little Bertie in it. I got Mrs. Wakefield up with great difficulty, and dressed her, and she sat upon the edge of the bed. Her tender, motherly love wanted to do something in assisting me with the preparations, and she made several efforts; but her right arm, for some time paralyzed by rheumatism, was now utterly powerless. After laying Bertie in his last narrow bed, my wife took a last look at her babe, and I carried him into the next room. When I returned to her she put something into my hand and told me to lay it in the coffin, on Bertie's breast. It was a few African wild-flowers, and the sight touched my heart. What her feelings were at that time I cannot tell: she did not weep; one more calm and subdued I never saw.

The Babe's Coffin

A Pathetic Interview

took place on July 16, when the natives residing on the station, Gallas, Wanika, and Wasawahili, were admitted to a last look at their beloved dying friend. As they stood by her bedside, Mr. Wakefield reminded them of how much she had undergone for their sakes; of her leaving home; of the long and tempestuous voyage across the ocean; of her trials at Zanzibar; of the rough passage to Mombasa; of the discomforts of the house there; of her successive attacks of fever at Ribé, and of her great sufferings in other respects. "All this," he continued "has been bravely, and without a murmur, endured for your sakes. For you who are standing around her dying bed, she has sacrificed comfort, health, friends, brother, home, and all that is bright and joyous, and borne the burden and heat of a fever-stricken country. She can no longer speak to you: but if she could do so, she would even now tell you to love Jesus, to give yourselves to Him, to live for heaven, and follow her to the rest to which she is going."

After this address the people retired. Soon after sunset that evening it became evident that the last conflict was at hand, and at ten minutes after 7 o'clock, with her right hand firmly clasped by those of her husband, Mrs. Wakefield calmly drew her last breath, and, with a sweet smile, indicative of her joyous confidence, passed away from her work on earth to her reward in heaven.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Fatal Fall from a Scaffold.—Mr. Hamilton observes: "A young man had been out to his work in the morning, and coming home, had breakfasted with his wife and children, and then returned to his work at the building upon which he was employed. To reach the place at which he was working he had to climb up to a scaffolding. He reached the scaffolding in safety, but when about to pass from one part of it to another, he trod upon a plank imperfectly attached, and in a moment was precipitated to the ground. His fellow-workmen rushed to the spot, and strove to bring him to consciousness, but it was of no avail. In a few minutes all was over. The man had gone to give an account to God of the deeds done in this life. In the face of such a calamity no one thought of resuming work that day. The men might have been seen in groups of threes and fours talking over the sad occurence, and the general burden of their talk was, 'It was so sudden!' May not your call and mine be as sudden? 'Prepare to meet thy God.'"

From the Hospital to Heaven.—Mr. Hogg says: "I knew a little boy who was converted at a children's meeting, and what a joyous little fellow he was! I think I hear him now singing his favorite hymn, 'Shall we gather at the river?' He left home when nineteen years of age and joined the Seventy-first Regiment, with which he went out to Egypt and at the battle of Tel-el-Kebir he was wounded in both legs. After the battle he was removed to the hospital, where his shattered limbs were amputated, but he did not long survive the operation. A lady was visiting the hospital, and as she walked along between the beds she was surprised to hear one of the wounded men singing. It was this soldier repeating his favorite hymn. He had no fear at the approach of death. The lady promised to send a message to his parents. She left the hospital and telegraphed to them, telling them of their son's condition. She returned to the dying soldier's bedside, but ere she got back he had gone to be with Christ. His last words were, 'Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me, Thy rod and Thy staff they comfort me.'"

His Last Drunken Spree.—A Seaman Related: "I thank God that He takes a man when he is 'down in his luck,' as we say, when the devil has been paying him his wages. I had just returned from a fifteen months' voyage, and had over $300 in my pocket. I arrived at a port in the west of England, and at once set out for a spree. I do not know how I got on, but one night I found myself lying in an out of the way corner in a Glasgow street, with dirty, ragged clothes on, and only a few pennies in my pocket; this in only a few days after my return. I got up and spent the remaining money on beer. Then I began to wander aimlessly about; I had not even the heart to look for a ship. As I walked along I came upon an open-air Gospel meeting. I stopped and listened to the singing; if I had had a penny in my pocket I do not believe I should have done so. While there a gentleman came up to me, and, placing his hand upon my shoulder, kindly said, 'My man, you seem a bit downcast.' 'Not more so than usual,' was my surly response. Taking no notice of this, he continued, 'Come along into our meeting, and spend an hour.' 'I would rather not,' I replied. Seeing I was determined to be contrary he left me. The singers went into the hall; I went in and listened. They sang beautifully. I was sitting as near the door as possible, but there the Holy Spirit met me and led me to Christ, who saved me, and, bless His name, has kept me ever since."

Willie Joins Jane and Effie.—Mr. McFarlane remarks: "I was lately visiting a lady, who, when telling me of the death of one of her children, said: 'Formerly I did not believe all that I heard about children and their faith in Christ. But since my little boy, eight years of age, has died, I could believe anything. When he was taken ill at first we did not send for a doctor. As he lay in bed one day, he said to me, 'I want to go with Jane and Effie to be with Jesus.' 'But they are both dead,' I answered. 'Yes, but they are with Jesus, and I am going to Him, too,' he replied. And he would speak so fondly and familiarly about Jesus, all the while he was not supposed to be seriously ill. At length his father, becoming alarmed with the boy's serious talk, unwisely said to him, 'Now Willie, you must not speak like that; you know if you die we shall have to put you in a big hole, and leave you there.' The dear little fellow just looked up into his father's face, and, with a smile, said, 'I am not afraid; for soon God will send an angel, who will say, "Willie, arise," and I shall get up.' At last he fell asleep in Jesus, leaving a bright testimonial behind."

Native Preachers Clubbed to Death.—Rev. J. Jones said: "I remember that on one occasion, when I asked who would go to a certain tribe, there were two men, named Wagidro and Motace; and Wagidro said, 'I will go,' and Motace followed, and said, 'I will go with him.' Others offered themselves, and thus the whole tribes were supplied, and the preachers went forth on the Monday morning. That day the savages prepared to attack them, and as these two men went forth they heard the report that they were to be killed. But they had often heard such reports as that, and they said, 'It matters not. We have given ourselves to work for the Lord Jesus Christ, and we shall go, even if we die'; and they went forth. On their way they met another tribe, who endeavored to dissuade them from proceeding, on account of the danger; but, not listening to them, they suddenly came into a district where there was a stretch of forest, and there they met some armed men. The old man was leading in front, having a stick of sugar-cane for his walking-stick. With calm demeanor he stood and said: 'What is this? Are you come to kill us, as we have heard?' The calmness of the question seemed to paralyze them, and as the calm was stealing over them there came a shout from one behind. That was the rallying cry, and in a moment the calm was dispelled. Their eyes glared, the clubs were uplifted, and the savages fell upon the two men, and killed them on the spot. But let me tell you that that man who shouted that cry afterward accepted Christ, and became a deacon of the church. After about ten years of weary waiting, and of toil and danger and labor, the whole of these tribes became converted."

An Invaluable Work on Prophecy by G. H. Pember, M. A., entitled "The Great Prophecies concerning the Jews the Gentiles, and the Church of God," is for sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York. It is written in a most popular and eloquent style, and describes the impending fulfilment of Revelation and Daniel, and is illustrated by a colored chart. 458 pages. Price, including postage, $1

PLASTERS THAT WILL NOT STICK.

A Vacation Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

"Miserable comforters are ye all." Job. 16:2.

The Fair World Ruined by Sin—A Predominance of Thorns—Consequent Need of Comforters—Persons Incompetent to Console—I. Very Voluble People—Tearing the Bandages off a Wound—II. Worldly Philosophers—An Instrument of Many Strings—Edmund Burke's Emotion Over a Horse—The Blessed Relief of Tears—III. The Hypochondriac—IV. People Who Have Had no Trouble—The Mystery of a Broken Heart—Suggestions to Comforters—God Sends Trouble in Love—To Increase Usefulness—Iron in the Furnace—Trouble a Revelation—Future Reconstruction Assured—A Preparation for Glory—A Light in a Chamber of Death.

THE man of Uz had a great many trials—the loss of his family, the loss of his property, the loss of his health; but the most exasperating thing that came upon him was the tantalizing talk of those who ought to have sympathized with him. Looking around upon them, and weighing what they had said, he utters the words of my text.

Why did God let sin come into the world? It is a question I often hear discussed, but never satisfactorily answered.

God Made the World Fair and beautiful at the start. If our first parents had not sinned in Eden, they might have gone out of that garden, and found fifty paradises all around the earth—Europe, Asia, Africa, North and South America so many flower-gardens, or orchards of fruit redolent and luscious. I suppose that when God poured out the Gihon and the Hiddekel, he poured out, at the same time, the Hudson and the Susquehanna; the whole earth was very fair and beautiful to look upon. Why did it not stay so? God had the power to keep back sin and woe. Why did He not keep them back? Why not every cloud a roseate, and every step a joy, and every sound music, and all the ages a long jubilee of sinless men and sinless women? God can make a rose as easily as He can make a thorn. Why, then,

The Predominance of Thorns?

He can make good, fair, ripe fruit as well as gnarled and sour fruit. Why so much, then, that is gnarled and sour? He can make men robust in health. Why, then, are there so many invalids? Why not have for our whole race perpetual leisure, instead of this tug and toil and tussle for a livelihood? I will tell you why God let sin come into the world—when I get on the other side of the River of Death. That is the place where such questions will be answered, and such mysteries solved. He who this side that river attempts to answer the question, only illustrates his own ignorance and incompetency. All I know is one great fact, and that is, that a herd of woes have come in upon us, tramping down everything fair and beautiful. A sword at the gate of Eden, and a sword at every gate. More people under the ground than on it. The graveyards in vast majority. The six thousand winters have made more scars than the six thousand summers can cover up. Trouble has taken the tender heart of this world in its two rough hands, and pinched it until with the agony. If all the mounds of graveyards that have been lifted were put side by side, you might step on them and on nothing else, going all around the world, and around again, and around again. These are the facts. And now I have to say that, in a world like this, the grandest occupation is that of giving condolence. This holy science of imparting comfort to the troubled we ought all of us to study. There are many of you who could look around upon some of your very best friends who wish you well and are very intelligent, and yet be able truthfully to say to them in your days of trouble, "Miserable comforters are ye all!"

The Nations Wail

I remark, in the first place, that very

Voluble People

are incompetent for the work of giving comfort. Bildad and Eliphaz had the gift of language, and with their words almost bothered Job's life out. Alas for these voluble people that go among the houses of the afflicted, and talk, and talk, and talk! They rehearse their own sorrows, and then they tell the poor sufferers that they feel badly now, but they will feel worse after a while. Silence! Do you expect, with a thin court-plaster of words, to heal a wound deep as the soul? Step very gently around about a broken heart. Talk very softly around those whom God has bereft. Then go your way. Deep sympathy has not much to say. A firm grasp of the hand, a compassionate look, just one word that means as much as a whole dictionary, and you have given, perhaps, all the comfort that a soul needs.

A man has a terrible wound in his arm. The surgeon comes and binds it up. "Now," he says, "carry that arm in a sling, and be very careful of it. Let no one touch it." But the neighbors have heard of the accident, and they come in, and they say, "Let us see it." And

The Bandage is Pulled Off,

and this one and that one must feel it, and see how much it is swollen; and there is irritation and inflammation and exasperation, where there ought to be healing and cooling. The surgeon comes in and says, "What does all this mean? You have no business to touch those bandages. That wound will never heal unless you let it alone." So there are souls broken down in sorrow. What they most want is rest, or very careful and gentle treatment; but the neighbors have heard of the bereavement or of the loss, and they come in to sympathize, and they say, "Show us now the wound. What were his last words? Rehearse now the whole scene. How did you feel when you found you were an orphan?" Tearing off the bandages here, and pulling them off there, leaving a ghastly wound that the balm of God's grace had already begun to heal. Oh, let no loquacious people, with ever-rattling tongues, go into the homes of the distressed!

Again I remark, that all those persons are incompetent to give any kind of comfort who act as Worldly Philosophers.

They come in and say, "Why, this is what you ought to have expected. The laws of nature must have their way;" and then they get eloquent over something they have seen in post-mortem examinations. Now, away with all human philosophy at such a time! What difference does it make to that father and mother what disease their son died of? He is dead, and it makes no difference whether the trouble was in the epigastric or hypogastric region. If the philosopher be of the stoical school he will come and say, "You ought to control your feelings. You must not cry so. You must cultivate a cooler temperament. You must have self-reliance, self-government, self-control"; an iceberg reproving a hyacinth for having a drop of dew in its eye.

A violinist has his instrument, and he sweeps his fingers across the strings, now evoking strains of joy, and now strains of sadness. He cannot play all the tunes on one string. The human soul is an instrument of a thousand strings, and all sorts of emotions were made to play on it. Now an anthem, now a dirge. It is no evidence of weakness when one is overcome of sorrow. Edmund Burke was found in the pasture-field with his arms around a horse's neck, caressing him, and some one said, "Why, the great man has lost his mind!" No; that horse belonged to his son who had recently died, and his great heart broke over the grief. It is no sign of weakness that men are overcome of their sorrows. Thank God for

The Relief of Tears.

Have you never been in deep trouble when you could not weep, and you would have given anything for a good cry? David did well when he mourned for Absalom, Abraham did well when he bemoaned Sarah, Christ did well when he wept for Lazarus; and the last man I want to see come anywhere near me when I have any kind of trouble, is a worldly philosopher.

Again I remark, that those persons are incompetent for the work of comfort-bearing who have nothing but cant to offer. There are those who have the idea that you must groan over the distressed and afflicted. There are times in grief when one cheerful face dawning upon a man's soul is worth a thousand dollars to him. Do not whine over the afflicted. Take the promises of the gospel, and utter them in a manly tone. Do not be afraid to smile, if you feel like it. Do not drive any more hearses through that poor soul. Do not tell him the trouble was foreordained; it will not be any comfort to know it was a million years coming. If you want to find splints for a broken bone, do not take cast-iron. Do not tell them it is God's justice that weighs out grief. They want now to hear of God's tender mercy. In other words, do not give them aqua fortis when they need valerian.

Again I remark, that those persons are poor comforters who have themselves. A larkspur can not lecture on the nature of a snow-flake—it never saw a snow-flake; and those people who have always lived in the summer of prosperity cannot talk to those who are frozen in disaster. God keeps aged people in the world, I think, for this very work of sympathy. They have been through all these trials. They know all that which irritates and all that which soothes. If there are men and women here who have old people in the house, or near at hand, so that they can easily reach them, I congratulate them. Some of us have had trials in life, and although we have had many friends around about us, we have wished that father and mother were still alive, that we might go and tell them. Perhaps they could not say much, but it would have been such a comfort to have them around. These aged ones who have been all through the trials of life know how to give condolence. Cherish them, let them lean on your arm—these aged people. If when you speak to them they cannot hear just what you say the first time, and you have to say it a second time, when you say it the second time do not say it sharply. If you do, you will be sorry for it on the day when you take the last look and brush back the silvery locks from the wrinkled brow just before they screw the lid on. Blessed be God for the old people! They may not have so much strength to go around, but they are God's appointed ministers of comfort to a broken heart.

Never Had any Trouble

People who have not had trial themselves cannot give comfort to others. They may talk very beautifully, and they may give you a great deal of poetic sentiment; but while poetry is perfume that smells sweet, it makes a very poor salve. If you have a grave in your pathway, and somebody comes and covers it all over with flowers, it is a grave yet. Those who have not had grief themselves know not

The Mystery of a Broken Heart.

They know not the meaning of childlessness and the having no one to put to bed at night, or the standing in a room where every book and picture and door is full of memories—the door mat where she sat, the cup out of which she drank, the place where she stood at the door and clapped her hands, the odd figures that she scribbled, the blocks she built into a house. Ah, no; you must have trouble yourself before you can comfort trouble in others. But come, all ye who have been bereft, and ye who have been comforted in your sorrows, and stand around these afflicted souls, and say to them, "I had that very sorrow myself. God comforted me, and He will comfort you."; and that will go right to the spot. In other words, to comfort others we must have faith in God, practical experience, and good, sound common sense.

But there are three or four consideration that I will bring this morning to those who are sorrowful and distressed, and that we can always bring to them knowing that they will effect a cure. And the first consideration is that in love. I often hear people in their troubles say, "Why, I wonder what God has against me!

God Sends Our Troubles

hey seem to think God has some grudge gainst them because trouble and misfortune ave come. Oh no. Do you not remember at passage of Scripture, "Whom the Lord veth He chasteneth"? A child comes in with very bad splinter in its hand, and you try to :tract it. It is a very painful operation. The ild draws back from you, but you persist. ou take the child with a

Gentle but Firm

asp; for although there may be pain in , the splinter must come out. And it is ve that dictates it, and makes you persist. y friends, I really think that nearly all our rrows in this world are only the hand of ir Father extracting some thorn. If all these rrows were sent by enemies, I would say, arm ourselves against them; and, as in tropical imes, when a tiger comes down from the ountains and carries off a child from the vil- ge, the neighbors band together and go into ie forest and hunt the monster, so I would ave you, if I thought these misfortunes were ent by an enemy, go out and battle against iem. But no; they come from a Father so ind, so loving, so gentle, that the prophet, peaking of His tenderness and mercy, drops ie idea of a father, and says, "As one whom is mother comforteth, so will I comfort you."

Again I remark, there is comfort in the nought that God, by all this process, is going To Make You Useful.

Do you know that those who accomplish the ost for God and heaven have all been under he harrow? Show me a man that has done any- ning for Christ in this day, in a public or pri- ate place, who has had no trouble, and whose ath has been smooth. Ah, no!

I once went through an axe-factory, and I aw them take the bars of iron and thrust them nto the terrible furnaces. Then besweated orkmen with long tongs stirred the blaze. Then they brought out a bar of iron and put it nto a crushing-machine, and then they put it etween jaws that bit it in twain. Then they ut it on an anvil, and there were great ham- ers swung by machinery—each one a half- on in weight—that went thump! thump! thump! f that iron could have spoken, it would have aid, "Why all this beating? Why must I be ounded any more than any other iron?" The orkmen would have said, "We want to make xes out of you, keen, sharp axes—axes with hich to hew down the forest, and build the hip, and erect houses, and carry on a thousand nterprises of civilization. That's the reason re pound you." Now, God puts a soul into nd then it is brought out and run through the rushing-machine, and then it comes down on he anvil, and upon it blow after blow, blow fter blow, and the soul cries out, "O Lord, what does all this mean?" God says, "I want o make something very useful out of you. You shall be something to hew with, and something o build with. It is a practical process through which I am putting you." Yes, my Christian riends, we want more tools in the Church of God. Not more wedges to split with; we have enough of these. Not more bores with which o drill; we have too many bores. What we really want is keen, sharp, well-tempered axes, nd if there be any other way of making them than in the hot furnace, and on the hard anvil, and under the heavy hammer, I do not know what it is. Remember that if God brings any kind of chastisement upon you, it is only to make you useful. Do not sit down discouraged, and say, "I have no more reason for living; I wish I were dead!" Oh, there never was so much reason for your living as now! By this ordeal you have been consecrated a priest of the Most High God. Go out and do your whole work for the Master.

The Furnace of Trial,

There is comfort in the thought that all our Troubles are a Revelation.

Have you ever thought of it in that connection? The man who has never been through chastise- ment is ignorant about a thousand things in his soul he ought to know. For instance, here is a man who prides himself on his cheerfulness of character. He has no patience with anybody who is depressed in spirits. Oh, it is easy for him to be cheerful, with his fine house, his filled wardrobe, and well-strung instruments of music, and tapestried parlor, and plenty of money in the bank waiting for some permanent invest- ment. It is easy for him to be cheerful. But suppose his fortune goes to pieces, and his house goes down under the sheriff's hammer, and the banks will not have anything to do with his paper! Suppose those people who were once elegantly entertained at his table get so short- sighted that they cannot recognize him upon the street! How then?

Is it Easy to be Cheerful?

It is easy to be cheerful in the home, after the day's work is done, and the gas is turned on, and the house is full of romping little ones. But suppose the piano is shut because the fin- gers that played on it will no more touch the keys, and the childish voice that asked so many questions will ask no more. Then is it so easy? When a man wakes up and finds that his re- sources are all gone, he begins to rebel, and he says, "God is hard; God is outrageous. He had no business to do this to me!" My friends, those of us who have been through trouble know what a sinful and rebellious heart we have, and how much God has to put up with, and how much we need pardon. It is only in the light of a flaming furnace that we can learn our own weakness and our own lack of moral resource.

There is also a great deal of comfort in the fact that there will be a family

Reconstruction in a Better Place.

From Scotland or England or Ireland a child emigrates to this country. It is very hard part- ing, but he comes, after a while writing home as to what a good land it is. Another brother comes, a sister comes, and another, and after a while the mother comes, and after a while the father comes, and now they are all here, and they have a time of great congratula- tion and a very pleasant reunion. Well, it is just so with our families: they are emigrat- ing to a better land. Now, one goes out. Oh, how hard it is to part with him! Another goes. Oh, how hard it is to part with her! And another, and another, and we ourselves will after a while go over, and then we will be together. Oh, what a reunion! Do you be- lieve that? "Yes," you say. You do not! You do not believe it as you believe other things. If you did, why, it would take nine- tenths of your trouble off your heart!

The fact is, heaven to many of us is a great fog. It is away off somewhere, filled with an uncertain and indefinite population. That is the kind of heaven that many of us dream about; but it is the most tremendous fact in all the uni- verse—this heaven of the gospel. Our departed friends are not afloat. The residence in which you live is not so real as the residence in which they stay. You are afloat, you who do not know in the morning what will happen before night. They are housed and safe forever. Do not, therefore, pity your departed friends who have died in Christ. They do not need any of your pity. You might as well send a letter of condolence to Queen Victoria on her obscurity, or to the Rothschilds on their poverty, as to pity those who have won the palm. Do not say of those who are departed, "Poor child!" "Poor father!" "Poor mother!" They are not poor. You are poor—you whose homes have been shattered—not they. You do not dwell much with your families in this world. All day long you are off to business. Will it not be pleasant all the while? If you have had four children, and one is gone, and anybody asks how many children you have, do not be so infidel as to say three. Say four—one in heaven. Do not think that the grave is unfriendly. You go into your room and dress for some grand entertainment, and you come forth beautifully appareled; and the grave is only the place where we go to dress for the glorious Resurrection, and we will come out radiant, radiant, mortality having become immortality. Oh, how much condolence there is in this thought!

When You Can be Together

I expect to see my kindred in heaven; I ex- pect to see them as certainly as I expect to go home to-day. Ay, I shall most certainly see them. Eight or ten will come up from the graveyard back of Somerville; and one will come up from the mountains back of Amoy, China; and another will come up from the sea off Cape Hatteras; and thirty will come up from Greenwood; and I shall know them better than I ever knew them here. And your friends—they may be across the sea, but the trumpet that sounds here will sound there. You will come up on just the same day. Some morning you have overslept yourself, and you open your eyes and see that the sun is high in the heav- ens, and you say, "I have overslept, and I must be up and off." So you will open your eyes on the morning of the Resurrection, in the full blaze of God's light, and you will say, "I must be up and away." Oh yes, you will come up, and there will be a re-union, a reconstruction of your family. I like what Halburton—I think it was good old Mr. Halburton—said in his last mo- ments: "I thank God that I ever lived, and that I have a father in heaven, and a mother in heaven, and brothers in heaven, and sisters in heaven, and I am now going up to see them."

I remark, once more: our troubles are Preparative for Glory.

What a transition it was for Paul—from the slippery deck of a foundering ship to the calm presence of Jesus! What a transition it was for Latimer—from the stake to a throne! What a transition it was for Robert Hall—from insan- ity to glory! What a transition it was for Rich- ard Baxter—from the dropsy to the "saint's everlasting rest"! And what a transition it will be for you—from a world of sorrow to a world of joy! John Holland, when he was dying, said, "What means this brightness in the room? Have you lighted the candles?" "No," they replied, "we have not lighted any candles." Then said he, "Welcome, heaven!" the light already beaming upon his pillow. O ye who are persecuted in this world! your enemies will get off the track after a while, and all will speak well of you among the thrones. Ho! ye who are sick now, no medicines to take there. One breath of the eternal hills will thrill you with immortal vigor. And ye who are lonesome now, there will be a thousand

Spirits to Welcome You

into their companionship. O ye bereft souls! there will be no grave-digger's spade that will cleave the side of that hill, and there will be no dirge wailing from that temple. The river of God, deep as the joy of heaven, will roll on be- tween banks odorous with balm, and over depths bright with jewels, and under skies rose- ate with gladness, argosies of light going down the stream to the stroke of glittering oar and the song of angels! Not one sigh in the wind; not one tear mingling with the waters!

"There shall I bathe my weary soul
In seas of heavenly rest,
And not a wave of trouble roll
Across my peaceful breast."

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman (London), edited by the Rev. M. Baxter, may be had from the office of this journal, 63 Bible House, New York; price six cents, including postage. Annual subscription, seventy cents. The following articles, among others, are contained in the number for August:

"The Unknown Tongues." By "Octoginta."
The Nineteenth Century in the Light of Prophecy. By the Rev. E. J. Hytche.
"What the World's Coming to." By one of the Benighted.
Earthquakes in Prophecy. By W. Appleford. (Continued.)
The Holy Spirit in the Coming Age.
The Fate of the Wicked at Christ's Coming. By the Rev. Henry Varley.
The Seven Trumpets Explained in their past Year-day Historical Fulfilment. The Distress at Jerusalem.
The Final Seven Years; or, Daniel's Seventieth Week.
Passing Events Viewed from a Prophetic Standpoint.

[Bound volumes containing the monthly numbers for 1884 and 1883 may be had; price $1.]

THE WICKED AT CHRIST'S COMING.

By Rev. Henry Varley.

The Distinction Made—The Moral Characteristics of the Age—The World Unconverted at Christ's Coming—The Thousand Years in the Prison House—Paul's Vision—Heresy in the Last Days.

"WHERE shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?" The distinction is between the righteous and the ungodly, the saved and the sinner. It is asked, Where shall they appear? That is—at the Lord's return. He distinctly says His coming shall be "as a snare to all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth." And again, "The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with His mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ." If any feel a doubt as to the moral characteristics which belong to this age of the end, these passages may set your mind at rest. Observe He is taking vengeance—He would not so come if the moral condition of things did not demand it. If the large proportion of people were prepared for His coming, then such a manifestation of His wrath would be altogether out of place. Then, again, we are told that when He comes the kings of the earth and other great men are to call to the mountains and rocks, "Fall on us, and hide us from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb." Is that a picture of a world brought to Christ by the preaching of the gospel? Do you not see the truth clearly emphasized that the world-rulers shall be in opposition to God, and shall be dashed to pieces at the coming of Christ? And, indeed, do we not see a foreshadowing of that state of things in the frightful condition of Europe to-day? Fourteen or fifteen million armed men; science lending her mighty aid in the perfection of the forces of destruction. The only key to unlock the wards of this lock is the Coming of Christ.

To Come in Flaming Fire,

And when He does come, where will you, my unconverted friends, appear? The materialistic in which we live laughs these things to scorn, but "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be anathema maranatha"; let him be accursed at the coming of the Lord. Note also in Eph. 5 : 5, "This ye know, that no whoremonger, nor unclean person, nor covetous man, who is an idolater, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God." That kingdom comprehends, I believe, the thousand years of blessing. "The wicked," it is written, "lived not again till the thousand years are finished." Without question, that immortal personality of yours will, O unconverted hearer! at the coming of the Lord, enter the abode of condemned spirits, the prison house, as Isaiah calls it, till the thousand years are past, and then comes the fulfilling of judgment. When these years are over and eternal ages dawn, your doom is described by the great King Himself in these awful words, "The fearful, and unbelieving, and the abominable, and murderers, and whoremongers, and sorcerers, and idolaters, and all liars, shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone: which is the second death."

Scepticism of the Age

Such is the testimony of Scripture, and if we are asked "Where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?" we can only reply—in perdition with unblest spirits. After that thousand years of remand—for it is judicially a remand until the trial at the great white throne—then Judgment and Doom.

Do you wonder that men of old, realizing this, wept over their congregations? Do you wonder that Paul says, "I ceased not to warn every one night and day with tears?" Do you marvel he calls God to record "How greatly I long after you all in the mind and heart of Jesus Christ?" Paul knew the future of the unsaved, he had seen God, for he tells us of being translated into Paradise—very likely (as you will find by comparing Acts 14 : 19, 20 with II Cor. 12 : 2) when his body was lying stoned apparently to death outside the city of Lystra.

I remember dear Henry Bewley saying to me at Dublin: "What do you think was the power that moved Paul?" I replied, "The love of Christ." "Yes, that constrained him, but I will tell you what I think—when caught up to Paradise he saw the King in His beauty; from that moment he was dead to the world." Now, while you and I cannot expect to see God with the outward eye, we may have such a view of Him by faith, which is a whole second sense to us—that we may henceforth live as we have never yet done.

I trust my testimony may lead many who are believers to come out and be separate, looking heedfully to the times in which we live.

These are Appalling Times.

Think of the laxity in love and truth among professing Christians, and thank God that beloved ministers are standing out for God's truth and against error on every hand. Away with teachers who make light of the atonement: away with all principles that profess to seek a righteousness in man! Seek the righteousness of God, which is by faith; and when He comes this poor disordered earth shall become as the garden of the Lord.

Man's government is wellnigh at an end; the sand-glass of time is running out. He is coming whose right is to reign; the Lamb of God, whose blood fell around the precincts of the Cross of Calvary. He is coming again in power and great glory to bring this reprobate earth into the beneficence of His government, and into harmony with the mind of God. Then shall be fulfilled the first prayer that came from His blessed lips, that prayer He has taught us to pray: "Thy Kingdom come: Thy will be done on earth as it is in Heaven." That prayer of faith shall shortly be accomplished as surely as He lives. Meanwhile, let us occupy till He comes.

THE PROPHETIC DAY—AUGUST 14-15.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

SEVERAL years ago Dr. Bright, in his "Coming of the Antichrist" who, he believes, will be a Napoleon, predicted that August 15, being both the Bonapartist Fête Day and the Feast of the Assumption of the Virgin Mary, would probably be a very notable date in the future career of the Antichrist.

Strange to relate, when in March 1887, it was discovered that the Last Day of Passover Week, April 11, 1901, will be the End of this Age, as being 2,345 years distant from the "Command to rebuild Jerusalem" (Dan. 8 : 14; 9 : 25; 12 : 11, 12; Nehem. 2), it then appears that the first day of Antichrist's reign for 1,260 days will actually be August 15, 1897, because that day is exactly 1,335 days previous to April 11, 1901. (Daniel 12 : 12.)

On Wednesday, August 15, this year, the Bonapartists held their annual fête as usual. Imperialist masses were celebrated in several churches, artificial violets were worn by the faithful, and Platonic addresses were signed and sent to Prince Victor Napoleon. Since the death of the Prince Imperial deprived them of a rallying-point, the Bonapartists have been split up into rival factions. Prince Napoleon is an exile in Switzerland, and Prince Victor, his recalcitrant son, has sought refuge in Belgium. Both aspire to the purple; Prince Victor is the favorite. His partisans are the more numerous, influential, and perhaps the more noisy—witness the diatribes of his leading advocate, Paul de Cassagnac.

The 15th of August is also a great religious and social fête. The day remains, in spite of revolution, what it has been for centuries—one of the highest festivals of the Roman Catholic Church, that on which the assumption of the Holy Virgin is commemorated. This event was duly observed this year in France by pompous services in the churches. Formerly processions took place outside the sacred edifices, but they are now forbidden save in the country villages. The procession was instituted by Louis XIII. as a thanksgiving to the Virgin Mary for the birth of a son, which he attributed to her divine intercession. Although shorn of this outward splendor the festival attracts as many of the faithful as ever. The churches were well attended, despite the fact that a goodly portion of the regular congregations were at the seaside. Evidently atheistical teachings have not yet done much harm to the Catholic Church in Paris. So much for the religious side of the date.

Its social character is equally interesting. The French, as most people, do not keep birthdays like other nations, but the days of the saints after whom they are christened. August 15 is the Sainte Marie, and as nearly every family has a Mary in it, it is easy to see the amount of feasting that must attend every Mary's birthday throughout the country. From early morn people were seen hurrying to and fro in all directions, with nosegays and pots of flowers in their hands, en route to all their female relatives whose fête it is. Gifts of all kinds were made, but the great majority choose flowers, the sale of which, during August 15, is something fabulous. Perhaps this is one of the prettiest observances to be met with anywhere. It is not costly, and everybody can share in it. Old as well as young receive these floral offerings of affection, and sad indeed is any Mary in France who is forgotten or neglected.

THE JUGGERNAUT FESTIVAL.

THE ceremony of the migration of Juggernaut, the Indian deity, takes place still at this season of the year. The Indian Witness thus speaks of the spectacle as it is now witnessed: "Juggernaut, seated on his car of state, is dragged from his own house to that of his father-in-law, Radhabullub, and after a stay of eight days returns with his bride and is dragged back to his own quarters, where he lives in connubial bliss till next year. Playing at dolls we might call it, but the festival attracts thousands to Comillah from the outlying districts. Among the crowds who begin to pour in a week beforehand, there are Hindoos and Mahommedans, hill men and women, Tipperahs, Kukis, and a few Lushais, with their picturesque costumes and Mongolian cast of features, easily distinguishable among the crowd. On the day the car is to be dragged, the crowds assemble in their thousands round it; a strong force of police preserves the peace; the District Superintendent is also out, and as much order as can be expected is observed.

"The car itself is a trumpery affair, constructed almost entirely of bamboos, three stories high. Tinsel, red cloth, and other ornaments are lavishly laid on wherever they can be induced to stick, and the whole is daubed over with red paint in barbarous profusion. The musicians are seated on the top story, which is roofed in with a pyramid roof, exactly like a huge red extinguisher, with a flag at the apex. The instruments they play are drums, clarionets, flutes, and brass gongs. The gentlemen on the gongs are particularly energetic, and have several solos allotted to them. Offerings of fruits and flowers are placed before the god. Those who cannot get near enough to place them at his feet throw them about at each other, and it simply rains pineapples, plantains, chunks of plantain-tree, and over-ripe melons.

"The Prime Minister of Hill Tipperah arrives, seated on a richly caparisoned elephant, followed by his suite, also on elephants. The tamasha then begins. The shouting grows louder and louder, the people, worked up to the highest pitch of religious frenzy, fight and dance and behave like lunatics. The procession of elephants goes seven times round the car, when at a given signal from the head priest—who, as master of the ceremonies, stands and waves his baton from the second story, while two men with daos stand by ready to cut the ropes, should any fanatic wish to throw himself under the wheel—and the car is started. The musicians put their instruments to the severest tests, and the gongs are heard even above the shouts and yells of the multitude. Every one tries either to touch the car or to drag the ropes; it being laid down that all who are so fortunate as to do so, will have an exceptionally good time during the next life.

"With innumerable halts, the car at last reaches its destination—a quarter of a mile from starting-point. Here it is housed, and the crowds disperse. Dancing, singing, and festivities of all sorts are the order of the day for a week.

"There is not quite so much enthusiasm in Calcutta as at Comillah, but the thousands who gather there, and the frenzy which many of the devotees develop on the occasion, are still marvellous. To see native gentlemen, who hold high and trusted positions in commercial and civil life, half naked before the little car, singing and gesticulating in the most intense manner is not an edifying sight. The old flames burst out again under these weird enchantments, and the poor ignorant ones are ready to fall beneath the car as their ancestors did, but these would-be martyrs have a very wholesome dread of an officer's whip, and a very light stroke of it dispels every desire for suicide."

ITALIAN NEWSPAPER ENTERPRISE.

A VOLUNTEER service to gospel work, which God may bless, though it proceeds from secular motives, has been undertaken in Milan by Signor Sonzogno, the proprietor of the leading daily newspaper, the Secolo, who has commenced the issue of a popular edition of the Bible in half-penny numbers. The paper and type are to be excellent, and about one fifth of each page is text, and the rest notes and illustrations. The cheapness of the book is such as to bring it within the reach of all. Signor Sonzogno undertakes this work not in the interest of religion, but apparently as a commercial venture, yet believing that the Bible tends to promote liberty. In his paper, the Secolo, he uses the following remarkable words: "There is one book which gathers up the poetry and the science of humanity, and that book is the Bible, and with this book no other work in any literature can be compared. It is a book that Newton read continually, that Cromwell carried at his saddle, and that Voltaire kept always on his study-table. It is a book that believers and unbelievers should alike study, and that ought to be found in every house. The text will be that of Martini, translated from the Vulgate, and care will be taken to insure accuracy." This edition cannot be hindered by the Church of Rome. It cannot be said that it is circulated by Protestants or by foreigners, and it will be a breach of the new penal code to interfere with the liberty of publication. There surely is hope for Italy in this enterprise. Fifty thousand copies of the first number were sold in one week. It is on all the news-stands, and sells at one cent.

A CHEERFUL MISSIONARY.

A GRAPHIC picture of missionary work in Japan is given in a letter from the Rev. J. P. Hearst, who writes to the Church from Osaka. The extract here given is especially worthy of note on account of the light it sheds on the character of the writer. Few men when pelted with mud would have seen in it grounds for thankfulness, but Mr. Hearst gratefully acknowledges that there were no stones in it. He says: "We have a very hopeful mission. It is true that evangelistic work, in which most of us are engaged, is not so pleasant in many respects as school work either in the academic or theological department. We cannot have things as systematic as our friends the teachers have, nor have we as many opportunties of study, as we are constantly preaching to simple-minded people, and a great deal of time is necessarily spent away from home; and then the small steamers and jinrikishas—not the most comfortable means of travelling ever invented—are not friendly to books. But still we have our encouragements as well as our discomforts. It is always a pleasure to preach the gospel to large and appreciative audiences, and if we do now and then get a few curses or a little mud, yet for my own part I am glad to say that I have never yet had stones thrown with my mud, an experience which some of my friends have met. Usually our audiences are wonderfully patient. They will sit through three hours' preaching without any disturbance except it be an occasional howl of no! no! We do not mind that very much, as we are sure most of the company are glad to hear. Wherever one goes, there are always good audiences, and I do not hesitate to say that while some places are more hopeful than others, there is no place where one may not begin work with full expectation of some immediate fruit from his labor.

LABOR-SAVING IN CHINA.

A PRACTICAL lesson in labor-saving appliances and the advantages of Western methods in a time of emergency was recently given in China, much to the astonishment of the natives. It is much to be wished that some among them who are laboriously striving, by good works and offerings to impotent idols, to work out their salvation might go to Western missionaries, who also would be able to show them "a more excellent way." (Rom. 8: 3.)

"The awful devastation in the province of Honan, China, caused by the overflow of the Yellow River, has apparently been the means," says a missionary of the American Board, "of bringing more enlightenment to the people of the province than could probably have been secured in any other way in so short a time. A Chinese paper gives an account of the way in which the repairs in the breach in the river-banks have been conducted. At first long lines of workmen were formed, with baskets and wheelbarrows, bringing earth a distance, in some cases, of several miles. This process was desperately slow, whereas great haste was necessary. Moreover, the quarrels among the workmen were so frequent that, shocking as it was to Chinese prejudices, a portable railroad was obtained. Officials and laborers watched with unbounded delight the operations of the new and swift method of carrying the earth. So great was the necessity for haste that work was kept up day and night; and working with candles was difficult and so unsatisfactory that soon an electric-lighting machine with twenty-five lights was set up. It was found to be a great saving of expense as well as a great help to the work. People came in large numbers from all the surrounding country to look upon the new light and see the railroad, and were profoundly impressed with the value of foreign inventions."

A CHICAGO CLERGYMAN HEALED.

THE recent remarkable recovery of the Rev. Dr. John Williamson, of Chicago, from a disorder usually both painful and tedious, is reported by the Rev. A. B. Simpson in his Christian Alliance. Dr. Williamson, who has been pastor of the First Methodist Episcopal Church, the Wabash Avenue, and the Michigan Avenue churches, described his cure at a meeting of Methodist ministers, after which he was interviewed by a reporter.

"Mine was an uræmic ailment," he said; "my liver was also affected, and I was in a bad way generally. I know also that I was overworked, and sometimes felt that perhaps, I might never be able to do regular work in my pulpit again. I consulted some of the best physicians in Chicago, and they advised me to rest. I did not want to give up my labors, but I am enough of a physician to know that nature will assert itself. I am a graduate of Rush Medical College, though I have never practiced. Thus it was I went to God. I prayed as I had never prayed before, and I felt that I was in close and perfect communion with Him. I cannot describe it. I told God all my troubles, and received assurances that everything would be well. My plan of action was to lay down three rules, if they can so be called—prayer to God, cessation from work, and to take more physical exercise. I understood, of course, that rest and exercise would not effect the complete cure wished for."

"What is the difference, Doctor, between your prayers at this time and those previously?" was asked.

"I had something definite to ask for; that was all," he replied. "I wanted to be cured," he added, with a smile. "The trouble with too many people is, that when they pray they don't know what they want. I knew exactly what I wanted, and got it."

"How soon after your prayer to God did you realize that you had been answered?"

"Almost immediately. I have been able to work right along, with the exception of a short time when I was at Bay View. I took a rest there in the summer, and spent my days in rowing and praying to God. While I have no regular charge now, I fill the pulpit of some brother nearly every Sunday, and have other labors in addition, so that I cannot say that I am not busy."

"Have you any idea, Doctor, what might have been the result had you depended on ordinary physical treatment, and taken the year's rest the physicians recommended?"

"I simply would have lost a year's work, and probably not felt so well as I do now. In fact, I might not have recovered at all, though I do not assert this. But my recovery has been wonderful in this, that I did not follow the advice of my physicians, and I took no medicines. My cure is the direct result of divine healing, and so I have been free to proclaim."

A CHINESE DEMONIAC.

AN appeal for help was recently made to a missionary in China, who, if the afflicted man correctly diagnosed his own case, was authorized to give him relief. (Mark 16: 17.) The Rev. W. P. Chalfant, Presbyterian missionary at Tsinanfu, says in a letter to the Church: "I had a curious experience at the inn at which I was stopping, which, by the way, belongs to the Christian Fang. A man 'possessed with a devil' came into the inn and fell down before Mr. Fang, beseeching him to help him. They called me out to see him. I found him sitting in a chair, trembling from head to foot, and with tears streaming down his face. He was about fifty years of age, and rather small of stature. His face bore an expression of intense nervous apprehension. He said that he had been afflicted by this devil for more than ten years. The paroxysms came on suddenly, sometimes in the middle of the night. He described with excited vividness how the devil would begin by trying to 'scoop out his eyes,' and then would give him a succession of sharp pricks in different parts of his body, and would end by 'whispering in his ear' that he should 'go and strike that man!' 'Take this club and run up and down the street.' He said that he could not sleep, and had no appetite; in short, he presented the appearance of a nervous wreck. He besought me to go out to his house and drive away the demon. I must say I felt somewhat embarrassed. I tried to calm him by telling him that I thought he was merely troubled with a nervous disease, but I soon saw that I was hoplessly in the minority, even my own helper politely hinting that, with all deference to western rationalism, he thought that there actually was a devil in the man. Finally I was compelled to go with Mr. Fang and the helper to the unfortunate man's cottage just outside the village. We sat down in the humble abode and spoke a few comforting words, directing the attention of the family to Him who once cast out demons in a land 'not so very far from China.' I then called upon the helper to pray. I could hardly suppress a smile as he began, 'O Lord, we are not sure whether this man is really possessed of the devil or not, but if it be so, then, Lord, drive it out,' etc. By the time we had finished the man was considerably calmer."

The Antichrist Babylon and the Coming of the Kingdom, by G. H. Pember, M. A. A new work of remarkable originality and power, written in a popular and simple style, yet showing much scholarly research, 171 pages; Price in cloth covers, 50 cents. For sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

EVERY NUMBER CONTAINS:

The Portrait and Biography of some eminent person.
The Sermon Dr. Talmage preached the last Sunday morning.
An Exposition of Unfulfilled Prophecy.
A Summary of the Events of the Week, Notes of Religious and Temperance Movements, etc.
A Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, of London, from advance sheets sent by special arrangement.
Pictures of Missionary Life, etc., and Descriptive Articles.
An instalment of a Serial Story.
An Exposition of the International Sunday-School Lesson, by Mrs. M. Baxter.

PUBLISHER'S NOTICE.

THE whole edition of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was mailed last week to subscribers during Tuesday, August 28. The last delivery at the New York Post-office was made at 11:55 P. M. It is unnecessary to continue these notices, as those made here for three months past show that the variation in the time of mailing is one of minutes only. Subscribers may be assured that the paper is invariably mailed on the Tuesday of each week, and they may therefore calculate when it ought to reach them. When it is late, complaint should be made to the local postmaster. If it should not come at all, notice should be sent to this office, so that if there is any error in the address, it may be rectified immediately; and if there is no error, the case will be reported to the Postmaster-General.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The House Committee on Foreign Affairs has responded to the President's request for power to deal with the Fishery question by retaliation. It has framed a bill granting both the requests he made. Its first section gives him authority to suspend in whole or in part the transportation across United States territory, in bond and without payment of duties, of merchandise imported into or exported from Canada through United States ports. The second section authorizes the President, whenever there is discrimination against American vessels in the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence River, and Chambly canals, to impose a toll on Canadian vessels for the use of the Sault Ste. Marie and St. Clair Flats canals, or to prohibit their use to such vessels. In both cases the exercise of this authority is left to the discretion of the President, and it is understood that he will not use it if the Canadian Government yields the points in dispute.

The New York State Republican Convention which assembled at Saratoga on August 28, had a duty to perform of momentous concern to the party. The selection of a State ticket for New York at an election in which the vote of the State will probably decide the Presidential contest, was a responsible undertaking, the import of which was fully realized both within and without the State. The convention, however, consented to register the decision previously made by Ex-Senator Platt and the other three managers of the party. Ex-Senator Warner Miller was nominated by acclamation for Governor, and Col. S. V. R. Cruger for Lieutenant-Governor. The comments made by the Republican daily journals indicate that the result does not satisfy the party in New York City, but it is accepted as the only basis on which the dissensions of the past twelve years could be held in abeyance for a time. Mr. Miller profits by the internal jealousies now, as he did when he gained a seat in the United States Senate. The platform adopted by the convention is the result of a similar compromise, and must have cost the committee which framed it enormous labor. The High License plank, which Warner Miller insisted on incorporating, was adopted, though many influential liquor-dealers were among the delegates. It declares that the Republican party unequivocally condemns the course of Governor Hill in obstructing, by his vetoes, acts for increasing the fees for licenses, by which a larger share of the cost of government might be levied on the liquor traffic, and approves the efforts of the Republicans in the last Legislature upon the liquor question, especially on passing the act, nullified by such Executive action, to restrict that traffic by charges which would lift some of the burdens of taxation caused by the liquor traffic from the home and farm; and expresses the belief that such charges should be advanced by standards similar to those successfully enforced in other States under Republican control. Though this plank is not sufficiently outspoken to satisfy the temperance element in the party, it is an offence to the liquor interest.

The Settlement of a Colony of Mormons in Wyoming Territory is reported. It is stated by the Salt Lake Herald that four hundred Mormon families have gone into the southwestern part of the Territory and taken homesteads there. The Herald copies from a Wyoming paper the prediction that the census-takers in 1890 will find in the western part of the Territory Mormons enough to control the county elections. It is well known that thousands of Mormons have settled in Idaho, and it is stated by political managers there that one-fourth of the men of voting age in the Territory are Mormons. There are colonies also in Colorado and Arizona. In Nevada the number of Mormon settlers is so large that the Salt Lake Herald declares it would not be difficult for them to gain control of the government of the State if they make an organized effort to do so.

The Yellow Fever Scourge at Jacksonville, Fla., continued its terrible ravages all through last week. On Wednesday the number of new cases rose to thirty-three, and four deaths for the twenty-four hours. On Thursday the new cases were twenty-three, and the deaths three; but the ominous feature was noticed that the new cases were scattered over the city, instead of being confined to any one district. On Friday the new cases were again twenty-three, and the deaths four. On Thursday the official bulletin gave the total number of cases to that date as 188. Of those, twenty-six had died, thirty-four had recovered, and the remainder were still under treatment. About a thousand people left the city during the first four days of the week, at the suggestion of the executive committee, who believe that in depopulating the city as far as possible, the most effectual way of fighting the scourge is to be found. All who are willing to go are sent to Camp Ferry. No fugitives are allowed to go beyond Way Cross. This order, issued by Surgeon-General Hamilton, is causing much indignation, and will increase the distress already existing, as many women and children were being sent out to the mountain districts of Georgia, and other places impregnable to yellow fever. At the close of last week business was almost entirely suspended, only a few grocery stores remaining open. The clergy remain bravely at their posts, and the Protestant Episcopal Bishop, who was away on vacation, promptly returned when he heard of the outbreak of the fever.

The Tension between France and Italy, which two weeks ago assumed a menacing aspect, has been relieved by the prudence, or forbearance, of the French Government. It was caused by Italy taking possession of a strip of land on the African coast of the Red Sea, including Massowah and the town of Zulla, a seaport south of Massowah. The Italian Government duly notified the European powers that the Italian flag has been hoisted, and that a protectorate has been proclaimed, in compliance with the demands of the local sheiks. M. Goblet, French Minister of Foreign Affairs, then sent a note to the French representatives abroad in reference to the announcement, entering a protest against the annexation, as a violation of Italian pledges. The French newspapers also claim that Zulla was ceded to France, under a treaty signed by Abyssinia. The situation was further complicated by an ostentatious visit of Signor Crispi, the Italian Premier, to Berlin, which had the appearance of an intimation to France that Italy was under German protection. After the publication of a series of inflammatory articles in the newspapers of France and Germany, the French Government relieved the strain last week by the publication of a despatch to the Italian Court, stating that France desires to avoid entering upon irritating polemics, and does not care to prolong the debate; but it is impossible to avoid recalling the fact that a French Consulate, sanctioned by the Porte, was established at Massowah twenty-five years before the date of the Italian occupation.

A Plan for the Settlement of the Bulgarian question is said to be under the consideration of the Powers interested in its solution. The fact that it emanates from Russia renders its acceptance probable, especially as it conciliates England and Austria, which are the opponents of the Russian policy in the Balkans, and also would be regarded favorably for other reasons by Germany. The proposal is to place the Duke of Cumberland on the Bulgarian throne. The Duke is a cousin of Queen Victoria, and he is also a claimant to the throne of Hanover, and has pressed his claims against the Berlin Government with a pertinacity which will render his elevation to the throne of Bulgaria a relief to Bismarck. It is rumored that the Czar proposes not only to amalgamate Bulgaria with the Ottoman province known as Eastern Roumelia, but to annex also a section of Macedonia, thus giving the new kingdom access to the Ægean. Turkey would thus be cut off from land communication with Albania and her possessions west of Salonica, most of which would naturally fall to Austria. Italy would be placated by a small strip of the Dalmatian seacoast, which Austria would probably surrender to balance the acquisition of so large a slice of territory. The sufferer, as in every new rearrangement of the European map, would be Turkey, which is too helpless to resist. This extensive project is at present merely a matter of rumor, but it is clearly on the lines of prophecy.

Another Nihilist Plot to Assassinate the Czar is reported from St. Petersburg. The Gaulois publishes despatches from that city stating that only a timely discovery prevented the present Czar dying a similar death to that of his father. The quarters occupied by the conspirators, which were near the imperial palace, were raided by the police, who captured twelve men and three women. They also secured a number of bombs. Since this raid, several other arrests are said to have been made.

The German Socialists have Won a Victory at the polls. They succeeded on August 30 in electing Herr Liebknecht, their candidate for the Reichstag, in the sixth district of Berlin. He received 26,067 votes in a total of 41,791. The successful candidate is known as one of the most prominent men of his party, a friend and disciple of the late Karl Marx, and at present the ablest expounder of socialism in Germany. The district which elected him is a densely populated one, its inhabitants chiefly consisting of storekeepers and workingmen. Hasenclever, who formerly represented it, was also a socialist, but he became incurably insane, hence the necessity for the election of last week. Liebknecht's election was vigorously opposed by the Government. The man himself was personally obnoxious to the Court party, as he bore a musket in the rising of 1848. The election was carried chiefly by the efforts of the wives and daughters of the socialists, who canvassed actively for Liebknecht from house to house, and succeeded better than any man could have done in disseminating socialistic literature in violation of the law.

Canvassers Wanted to Sell, from House to House, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Any man, woman or youth may easily add to their income every week by selling the paper in their spare hours in their own neighborhood. For terms address Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers in the South with this journal have been received, since our last acknowledgment, to the amount of $9. They are from Kansasville, Wis., $5; Fort Edward, N. Y., $2; Titusville, Penn., $2. On behalf of the nine ministers whose names we are thus enabled to place on our list, we heartily thank the friends who have sent these contributions. We earnestly pray that still more money for the same object may be sent. Patriotic Christians who are concerned about the welfare of the colored race will easily perceive that this is an excellent method of helping them through their pastors. Many of these have no commentary nor theological work, and they sadly need just such help in their studies as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD supplies. We have over a hundred applications from colored clergymen now waiting. Every dollar not only helps one minister directly, but the whole congregation to whom he ministers.

The Imprisoned Boston Clergyman, the Rev. W. F. Davis, is to be released to-morrow, September 7. He has served about ten months of the year in the Charles Street Jail, to which he was sentenced for preaching on the Common. As he has a time allowance of thirty-six days for good behavior, the authorities have no right to hold him longer. Mr. Davis, after his release, will remain a week with his family in Boston, then visit friends in Providence, and will probably preach at Olneyville, where at one time he was settled as a pastor. Later, he will preach in Connecticut.

An Ingenious Device for Photographing thieves has been constructed by an inventor in Connecticut. In describing it recently to a reporter of a local journal, he said: "I propose to have it fixed in the vaults of banks to protect them from burglars. I have a camera connected with a flash-light, the camera placed in a position where it would command in the field of the lens a space of ten feet square or more in front of the door of the vault, and have the other apparatus so arranged that as soon as tampering with the vault door was attempted the whole would be placed in operation. My plan would of course include retaining the burglar alarm connecting with police headquarters. As soon as the burglars had begun operations the police would be alarmed, and at the same instant a picture of the men would be made by the camera and flash-light combined, so that even if the men escaped the police, they would leave behind them evidence which would very probably eventually result in their detection." Even so ingenious a device might fail if the burglars were not at the moment in the field of the camera, but all wrongdoers may be sure that they leave evidence behind them of which God takes cognizance, and which, unless they obtain pardon through Christ, must bring down upon them everlasting punishment. We are explicitly told that He "setteth a print on the heels of our feet." (Job. 13:27.)

Two Tramps Were Caught in Burning Oil during a stolen ride on the Pennsylvania Railroad on August 27. A long freight train, while proceeding from Devon to Stratford, parted into two sections owing to the breaking of a coupling. There was a considerable space between the two at the top of an incline, but the rear section continued moving slowly until it began to descend, when its speed became accelerated, and it passed down the declivity at a fearful rate. At the foot, it crashed into the forward section with terrific force. The last car of the forward section was laden with grain, and the first car of the rear section with cans of oil. The concussion exploded the oil, and in a minute the grain was on fire and burning fiercely. While the train-hands were congratulating themselves that no one happened to be on those cars two fearful shrieks rent the air, and two men, their clothes blazing, sprang out of the wrecked grain car. The flames were speedily extinguished, but the men were both badly burned, and one of them will die. They were tramps, who had crawled into the grain car before the train started to steal a ride. It doubtless seemed to them then a very comfortable place in which to travel, and they must have been amazed when it turned out to be the most fatal place on the train. Similar amazement will one day come upon some who have entered the church for the sake of its comfort and respectability, but having no right to be there will be cast into the fire prepared, not for men, but for Satan and his angels. (Matt. 25:41.)

A Spacious House Floating on Long Island Sound caused some astonishment to people on shore on August 30. Inside the house the family appeared to be pursuing their ordinary course of life. At one of the windows a young lady sat rocking herself and reading. The servants were cooking in the kitchen, and even the household cat was comfortably sleeping on the rail of the piazza. The house rested on two immense scows, securely lashed together, and three puffing tugboats in front dragged it along. It appears that the house formerly stood on one of the hills at Stratford, Conn., but the owner desired to remove to Bridgeport, so had his house brought bodily to the shore of the Housatonic River, where it was lifted on the scows and towed down the river into the Sound to the Bridgeport Harbor. A site had been prepared for it, and on its arrival, work was at once commenced on the removal of the house from the water to its final resting-place. A party of friends accompanied the owner and his family on the novel voyage, and had a merry time on board as the strange craft floated to its destination. It would be well if the families who are unconcernedly floating down the stream of time toward their eternal destination had a similar reason for unconcern. Unhappily many of them, unlike this family, have not troubled themselves about the end of their voyage, and have not accepted the offer God makes to them of an everlasting habitation. (1 Tim. 6:19.)

A Disappointed Immigrant Committed Suicide in New York on August 30. As the sun was setting that evening, a pale, wan-faced man, about thirty years of age, was walking on the pier at the foot of Fifth Street. He was shabbily dressed, and his depressed expression of countenance attracted the notice of the passers-by. Suddenly he threw off his coat and plunged into the river. It was impossible to rescue him, for the tide carried him under the crowd of boats around the pier. It was not until the tide turned that his body was recovered. In his coat-pocket was a letter addressed to his wife, in Germany, which had not been mailed, probably because he had not money to buy a postage-stamp. In the letter he told his wife that he was bitterly disappointed with this country. He had not been able to obtain work in several weeks, and was not only unable to send the money he had promised, to bring her over, but had not money to buy food for himself. He had been fourteen weeks in America, and they had been weeks of such hardship that he expressed an ardent wish that he could get enough money to pay for a passage back to Germany. Hardships and trials come to those who undertake the pilgrimage to the heavenly country, but they have no such desire. They are supported and sustained on their way, and we are expressly told that, though they might have opportunity to return to the country whence they came out, they journey on to the city God has prepared for them. (Heb. 11:15, 16.)

A Bride and Bridegroom Separated, Bewailed their condition last week in New York. A reporter observing a crowd in Forsyth Street, made inquiries as to its cause, and found that a wedding-party had been summarily dispersed by an indignant woman. On going into one of the houses he found a young man locked up in an upper room, who complained bitterly that his mother had rushed him in-doors, driven away the wife whom he had just married, and locked him in his bedroom. Down-stairs, the mother, in a state of wild excitement, declared that her son should never have his wife, that she was not good enough for him, that the marriage should be dissolved, and otherwise manifesting her displeasure. On the other side the street the reporter discovered the bride, hiding in the rear of a house, in terror at the threats of her mother-in-law, whose shrill voice could be distinctly heard denouncing her. She was weeping over the loss of her young husband, and protesting against the cruelty of the separation. Public sympathy was evidently with the young people and against the vixenish mother-in-law, but no active interference was made with her arrangements. She was clearly a woman with whom it was dangerous to meddle, and as she had overawed her son, there seemed no probability of connubial bliss at present. If, however, the young people are true to each other they must eventually be reunited, as no one has a legal right to keep them separate. In the union between Christ and His church, of which marriage is a type, separation is also impossible, though Satan uses various agencies and exhausts all his arts in trying to effect it. We have apostolic assurance that even death, which dissolves all other ties, only consummates that one. (Rom. 8:38, 39.)

BRIEF NOTES.

There are about fifty-four thousand men in the penitentiaries of the United States, and about five thousand women.

The National Association of Methodist Local Preachers holds its next annual convention in Columbus, Ohio, September 15–18.

Rev. D. L. Moody and Mr. Sankey were at Greenfield, Mass., on August 26. The Second Presbyterian Church, in which the meetings were held, was crowded.

An important conference on Jewish missions will be held in the Hebrew Christian Church (Rev. Jacob Freshman's), 17 St. Mark's Place, N. Y., October 30 and 31.

New York State has $60,000,000 invested in prisons, asylums, hospitals, and almshouses. New York City alone has 10,000 dram-shops to help provide the inmates.

Mr. J. H. Kellogg, of Troy, N. Y., has given $1,000 to the National W. C. T. U., to be used in prosecuting its work. This is the largest single contribution ever received by the society.

Philadelphia calls attention to the fact that she has now 675 churches to New York's 432, Chicago's 371, and Brooklyn's 300. These 675 churches represent 46 different denominations.

Dr. Dowkontt, Director of Medical Missions in New York, announces that nine young Norwegian missionaries, who have had a medical and a theological training, are about to leave for South Africa and Madagascar.

The Twenty-first Convention of the General Council of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in North America will be held in St. John's Church, Minneapolis, Minn., Rev. G. H. Trabert, pastor, commencing on Thursday, September 13, at 10 o'clock A. M.

A Dutch missionary in Africa bought a negro boy, two years old, who was deaf and dumb, for six pounds of salt. But for the interposition of the missionary, the child would have been put to death on account of his infirmity. He is now a pupil in an institution for deaf mutes at Maestricht.

Dr. L. W. Munhall took part on August 24 in the dedication of a lay college at Crescent Beach, Mass. The Institution is founded to give Christian young men who have "a good English education, three years of academic and religious education, to prepare them for evangelical work or as assistants to pastors."

The Presiding Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church is about to celebrate his jubilee. It was on September 2, 1838, that John Williams was ordained a deacon in Christ Church, Middletown, Conn., by Bishop Brownell, whom he has since succeeded both as Bishop of Connecticut and as Presiding Bishop.

By the will of Isaac N. Phelps, the millionaire banker of New York city, the American Bible Society will get $5,000; the American Home Mission Society, $10,000; the American Tract Society, $5,000; the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, $10,000; and other philanthropic organizations smaller ones.

A Russian physician declares that subcutaneous injections of strychnine are an infallible cure for drunkenness. The patient, he claims, will after a treatment of eight days loathe the taste and smell of intoxicating liquor. The dose is one grain in 200 drops of water, and five drops of the solution injected every twenty-four hours.

Senor Vila, of Malaga, Spain, has been sentenced to two years' imprisonment, merely because he had been faithful and courageous enough to protest against the degrading form of image worship which prevailed so largely throughout his native land. His protest was a reply to a violent attack by a Romish priest upon the Reformed Church.

THE LORD'S SUPPER: A REMEMBRANCE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"This do in remembrance of Me." Luke 22: 19.

The Command Precise—Peter Astonished at the Mass—I. The Main Object of the Lord's Supper—Personal Remembrance—As a Saviour—As Soon to Come—II. The Mode—The Mass a Puerility—The Apostles at St. Paul's Cathedral—Especially a Remembrance of His Death—Of the New Covenant—III. The Result—Most Inviting—Increases Strength—Restores Backsliders—No Perfect Church—The Place for Ending Quarrels.

"THIS do"—that is, take bread, give thanks, break it, and eat it—take the cup, filled with the fruit of the vine, give thanks, and drink ye all of it. "This do." Take care that you do just what Jesus did; no more, and no less. This act was done at a table where they had been eating the Passover. This act was performed at a common meal, and was not a sacrifice, nor a celebration, nor a function, nor anything more than a significant eating of bread and drinking of wine after a devout fashion. This do, then. As often as ye break the bread, and as often as ye drink of the cup, remember the Lord Jesus. It is this that we are to do, and not something else, which may be supposed to grow out of it.

Alas, how sadly have men forgotten this! The plain supper has not been a grand enough display. To break bread, and to drink wine, have not seemed to them to be sufficiently solemn, or sufficiently gorgeous, and so they have added all kinds of rites and institutions. That which was only a table, they have made into an altar, and that which was a supper and nothing more, they have changed into a celebration, They do not this, but they do something else which they have devised. Imagine Paul or and observing the various genuflexions—the movings to and fro, the liftings up, and the stoopings down, and all the various operations of the Roman priesthood, too many to describe! Paul would pluck Peter by the sleeve, and say: "Our Master did nothing like this when He took bread and gave thanks and brake it." Peter would reply, "Very different this from the guest-chamber at Jerusalem!" And Paul would add, "Ay, indeed, my brother, very different this from the time when the first believers met together, and brake bread, and drank of the cup in common, in remembrance of their Lord."

Peter Attending Mass,

Whatever other communities may do, be it ours, my brethren, to stand fast by "This do in remembrance of Me." "This," simply "this," and nothing more, and nothing less; bread, not a wafer; fruit of the vine, not the concoction of chemistry inflamed with fiery spirit. We use this fruit of the vine in a cup, and that cup not reserved, but partaken of by all. We have before us bread, and that not worshipped, as at the elevation of the host, but broken and eaten. The Lord and His disciples sat at a table and ate: it was a feast, and not a sacrifice; they reclined, and did not kneel. So would we do, because He said, "This do," and not something else.

Seeing that this is a feast of remembrance, let us ask ourselves a question—

Do We Know the Lord?

"This do in remembrance of Me." If you know nothing of a person; if you have had no acquaintance with him, you cannot remember him. Like a two-edged sword, this simple statement of truth sweeps through this audience, and divides it in twain. Whether or not I may come to the Lord's table must depend upon whether I know the Lord Jesus, or do not know Him. If I am a stranger to Him, I may not come, for I may only come to remember Him, and I cannot come to remember Him if I do not know Him; so that it were a profanation of this blessed institution for any man to draw near to the table who does not know Christ already. O sirs, this is no saving ordinance: it was never meant to be; its intent relates only to those who are saved. To know Jesus Christ is eternal life; and you may not come without that knowledge.

If any of you dream that your participation, in your last moments, in what is called "the sacrament" will save you, you are under a deep delusion. You may as well trust to the incantations of a witch as to the performance of any ceremony whatever, by whomsoever, in order to convey salvation to you. Salvation is by faith in Jesus Christ; and that is not wrought by the corporeal act of swallowing bread and wine. Ye must be born again; and that is not effected by material substances, however consecrated; it is the work of the Holy Spirit. Until you have believed in Jesus, and so know Him, and know His power within you, and have come to personal dealings with Him, instead of getting a blessing from the ordinance, you would eat and drink condemnation to yourselves, not discerning the Lord's body. You are not capable of discerning that body if you have no faith. Let every man examine himself as to his knowledge of our Lord, and so let him eat of this bread and drink of this cup. If you do not know Him you cannot remember Him, and therefore, hands off from the tokens of remembrance.

I. My first point shall be, that of the Lord's supper is evidently that we should remember Christ by it. Notice this particularly. It is not that you should call to mind a doctrine, though I would not have you ignorant or unmindful of any truth which the Spirit of God has revealed; neither is it that you should be mindful of a precept, though, beloved, I would have you careful that in all things you do your Saviour's will. But the pith and the essence of your business at His table is, "This do in remembrance of Me," that is, of Himself—of His own blessed person. Think not of Him as an abstraction! Dream not of Him as a mere idea! Do not merely contemplate Him as a historical personage who was once before men, and has now passed from off the canvas of history, as Confucius, Zoroaster, or the like. No; He ever liveth, and abideth an actual, ever-energetic force and Power among Men of Every Age.

The Main Object

And if we do this, we shall remember Him, first, with gratitude as our Saviour. If I have aught of hope, I owe it all to Thee, incarnate God, Son of the Highest, and Son of Mary, too. Thy love, Thy life, Thy death, Thy resurrection, Thy power at the right hand of God—these must be the pillars of my hope, if hope I have at all. Remember Jesus Himself, I pray you, and think neither of pardon, nor of justification, nor of sanctification apart from Him.

You must remember Him, next, with profound reverence as your living example—your living and reigning Lord. Know ye not that as many of you as have been washed in His blood are henceforth God's servants, even as He was? You are not to do your own will, but His will who has redeemed you. His example is to you the embodiment of the Lord's will. It is yours, then, to remember the Lord Jesus that you may follow Him. In sickness, recollect Him in His patience. When you are persecuted, recollect Him in His gentleness. In holy service, remember Him with His burning zeal. In your times of solitude, remember Him and His midnight prayers; and when you are in public, and have to bear witness, remember Him and His lion-like declarations of the gospel. Remember Him so that He becomes your pattern, and you are the reproduction of Himself, and so the best memorial of Him Remember Him, again, as Soon to Come.

Perhaps while yet these lips are feebly fashioning halting words concerning wondrous mysteries, the trumpet may ring out above all earthly sounds. Even on this Sabbath night we may be called to behold the cloud upon which the Son of Man has come! He said long ago, "Behold, I come quickly." He has been coming in haste ever since, and He must be drawing very near. Now, this is what we are always to remember, for His coming will be the manifestation of His people as well as of Himself. His coming will witness the reward of His saints as well as His own reward. Then shall He shine forth; and with Him "the righteous shall shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father."

Alas, we too much forget Him in all these aspects! I fear that we more easily forget than remember; and yet the remembrance of one so dear should be natural to us. How often we act as if we had not the living Christ to run to! We fret as if Jesus were still lying in the sepulchre. We act as if we were going to live here for ever, and did not expect our Lord to come and take us away to be with Him. We act as if we had no Master but our own wanton will. We act despairingly as if we had no Shepherd to take care of us, and no Saviour who had redeemed us with His precious blood. Come, brethren, this will never do. It is dishonorable to our Lord, and disgraceful to ourselves. You see the reason why the supper should have been instituted; our treacherous memories require it.

II. And now I take a second point. I want to show you all that which our Lord has ordained of helping our memories is in itself exceedingly striking. It could not be more so. If I stood opposite to an altar garnished with paper roses and other childish things, and if I were to try and perform, before you all, some of these prettinesses which are considered sacred by the followers of Rome, I should want a long time to explain it all to you; and when I had done my best, you would not be able to make head or tail of it. I have stood and watched the Catholic priest at the altar with the earnest desire to see if there was anything to be learned, and I could not learn anything. I could not make out what the ornamental person was at. I think I have read as much as most people about such things; but it does seem to me that if the behavior of the priest at the mass be a symbol, it is a very dark one: if it is intended to teach the people, they need to know a great deal before they can learn anything from it. Surely to find anything in the mass, the devout must bring it with them, for there is nothing there. But if you take the cloth from yonder table, you will see before you simply bread and wine; and when you see us celebrate the ordinance, you will notice that we do nought but break the bread and eat it, and pass round the wine-cup and drink therefrom. All that is done is and the Saviour seemed to wish for that simplicity, because He was Himself a very simple, unaffected, plain man. Only fancy some of His disciples rising from the dead and stepping into—well—St. Paul's cathedral, which is called Protestant, but is about as Popish as it very well can be! Supposing they walked in there—James and John together—the two sons of Zebedee. Perhaps, stopping before some of the pretty things, James would wonderingly ask, "John, where have we got?" And John would say, "We are in a chamber of imagery, a temple of idols. Our Lord Jesus would not be happy here." "Why," says James, "it is Paul's church! fetch him in." Surely when Paul came in, and looked at all those images and decorations, he would say, "Here I see another gospel, which is not another; but there be some that trouble you, and would pervert the gospel of Christ."

The Mode

Extremely Simple;

We are getting to have the idolatries of Rome set up in the churches called national; and this is not done by those called, outwardly and honestly, Romanists, but by those who are really so in their hearts, and yet wear the Protestant name. The Lord Jesus Christ was just

A Simple Peasant at Galilee,

and the dress he wore was analogous to our common smock-frock, a garment "without seam, woven from the top throughout." There was not a bit of stateliness or affectation about Him; and in all that He ordained you cannot find one single pompous ceremony. Where did He make the sign of the cross, or set forth sponsors? His followers gathered for worship and sang hymns in His praise, but where were their "thurifers," nd their "crucifers"? Where are all these hings in the Scriptures? They are inventions f later and darker days, but Jesus knew noth- ng of them; neither did His apostles, and those who followed them, know anything of such rub- ish. It was all plain telling out of the dear ove of God to men, and of how men should ove one another, and love Jesus as their Sav- our; and that was all. Our Lord instituted his simple supper as the memorial of a plain, imple, honest Saviour, who had no gaudy tricks r priestcraft about Him, but was simply a man mong men.

But, next, our Lord's Supper was intended to e very frequent. "This do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of Me." He has laid lown no rule as to when we shall break bread; but the custom was certainly to break it on the irst day of the week, and I think oftener, for it eems to me that they broke bread from house o house. It was not a ceremony that required a minister or a priest. When believers were to- gether they broke bread in memory of Christ— any two or three of them—and so they remem- bered Him. It is most delightful, when travel- ing, to remember Christ in your own room, where two or three brethren meet together. I know of nothing more sweet or more instructive han this divine ordinance, which grows more mpressive the oftener you attend to it. It ought o be frequent.

But to come a little closer to the table. I want you to notice that when our Lord bids us emember Himself—"This do in remembrance of Me"—He gives us an ordinance which brings before us His death. He Himself regarded heart, and soul of what He would fix on our memories. Therefore those who say that His example is everything, or His teaching is every- thing, do greatly err; for when we remember Him, the first thing to remember is, "He hath redeemed us to God by His blood." "Redeemer" s the name to which our memories must most tenaciously cling. His blood, His redemption, His atonement, His substitutionary sacrifice, are always to be kept to the front. "We preach Christ crucified," and you believe in Christ crucified. The reason of our success under God in this house of prayer is, that we have al- ways preached Christ as the atoning sacrifice, the sinner's substitute; and whosoever shall preach this boldly, clearly, and thoroughly, put- ting it as the crown of the gospel system, shall find God bless his word.

His Death as the Very Centre,

Next, notice another thing: this festival re- minds us of the covenant of grace. Our Lord Jesus Christ, while He bade us remember Him- self, said of the cup, "This cup is the new cove- nant in My blood." That is the word. Read 'testament," if you prefer it; but I feel sure you are nearer the sense when you read "the new covenant in My blood." What, then? When I am to remember Jesus Himself, I am to take the cup which is the token of the cov- enant. As we take that cup, we do own and accept joyfully our interest in that covenant which was made with Christ, which is establish- ed on the sure foundation of His perfect obedi- ence. Behold the blood of the everlasting covenant!

III. Now, lastly, the object for which we are to come, namely, to Remember Christ,

is one which is in itself most inviting. Let me show you what I mean. There is one here who cries, "I have forgotten my Saviour. I did love Him. I hope my love has not quite gone, but I seem to be very chill and cold. Alas? I have forgotten my Lord." Where should you go to have that love revived and refreshed? Should you not come where you will be helped to re- member Him? He says, "This do in remem- brance of Me." You say that you have forgot- ten your Lord. Come, and remember Him again. Do not stay away, but come with all the more eagerness. Remember Him as you did at first, when you came laden with guilt, and full of fears, and when you just cast yourself upon your Lord, and found peace. Come, and rest in Him over again.

"Oh, but I feel so weak." Yes, but when a little child is very weak, there is still one thing which it can surely do: it can remember its mother. Memory is often quickened by our need: it is well when our sense of weakness makes us remember where our great strength lieth. Remember, then, the Lord, who is your strength and your song, for He also hath be- come your salvation. Now, you poor little weak ones, where are you? How gladly would I help you; but what better help can you desire than that which your Lord sets before you in these dear memorials of His death?

No Perfect Church.

There is one more thing I am going to say, and I feel half ashamed to say it. Some pro- fessedly Christian people urge that they cannot come to the table because there are certain per- sons there who, in their judgment, should not be allowed to come. Is the Lord's table to be a judgment-seat, whereat we are to revise the verdict of the church? "I cannot," said one to me, "join a church, because I cannot find one that is perfect." No, I said; and if you do not join a church till you find a perfect one, you must wait till you get to heaven; and, besides, my dear friend, if you ever find a perfect church they will not take you in; for I am sure they would not be perfect any longer if they did. One sickly sheep would then have passed into the fold. So it is idle for you to be looking out for perfection.

"But there is a person at communion who acted inconsistently." That is highly probable; and he may be wearing your coat, and looking out of your eyes. If you know of any case of open sin, let the elders of the church be inform- ed, and it will be dealt with tenderly and firmly. In so large a church as this there may be cases of evil living not known to the overseers of the flock; but we invite the co-operation of all in maintaining the purity of the entire body, and we trust that we have it. But now, really, what have you to do with the faults of others, when you are remembering Christ Jesus? Sure- ly this is the most unseasonable time for harsh judgments; or, indeed, for any judgments. I know many a brother with whom I could not agree in certain points, but I agree with him in remembering the Lord Jesus. I could not work with him in all things; but if he wants to re- member Jesus, I am sure I will join him in that. It will do him good, and it will do me good, to think of Jesus. That dear name is so sweet to me that I will remember Jesus with the poorest, meanest, and most imperfect of mortals.

A precious Christ He is, not only to have saved me, but tens of thousands of His saints everywhere: for there are even in the churches that are most full of error. Shall I then set myself up for a judge, and say, "No, I will not remember my Lord, because one of the brethren does not behave properly"? What would you say to your child if he said, "Father, I shall not come to see you on your birth- day; I shall not join with the rest of the family in the usual festival"? Why not? "Because my brother is not what he ought to be; and till he mends his ways, I shall not keep your birth- day." Your father would say, "My dear son, is that any reason why you should not remember me? Surely I am not to blame for what your brother does. Come to the feast, and think of me." So do I say to you, if you have any per- sonal angers and differences, do not smother them, but end them. Do not come to the table till you have got rid of them, for you have no right to come; but end all wrath at once. Get rid of every ugly feeling you have toward every- body in the world, and love all believers in Christ for Christ's sake, and then come to this table, and you will find it help you to remember your Master as you shall join with others who remember Him. I think I may say that you will not be likely to see anybody at the table worse than yourself. So come along, and let not pride keep you back. May God's infinite mercy bless the Lord's Supper to the Lord's people!

People of His in all Churches,

And as for those that cannot come and re- member Him, because they do not know Him, may they go home and seek Him; and if they seek Him, He will reveal Himself to them. If you desire Christ, Christ desires you. If you have a spark of love to Him, He has a furnace full of love to you; and if you want to come to Him and trust Him to save you, come and wel- come. The Lord bless you, for His name's sake! Amen.

[The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors, and those whose sermons, articles or labors for Christ are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's peo- ple. Dr. Talmage and Mr. Spurgeon especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

A PRAYING HERO.*

GEN. MORGAN, the hero of so many fields, professed religion and united himself with the Presbyterian Church in Winchester, Va., under the pastoral care of the Rev. Dr. Hill, who preached in that house some forty years. His last days were passed in that town; and while sinking to the grave, he related to his minister the experience of his soul. "People thought," said he, "that Daniel Morgan never prayed; people said that old Morgan never was afraid. People did not know." He then proceeded to relate in his blunt manner, among other things, that the night they stormed Quebec, while wait- ing in the darkness and storm with his men paraded for the word to advance, he felt un- happy. The enterprise appeared more than perilous; it seemed to him that nothing less than a miracle could bring them off safe from an encounter at such an amazing disadvantage.

He stepped aside, and kneeling down by a can- non, most fervently prayed that God would be his shield and defence, for nothing less than an almighty arm could protect him. He continued on his knees till the word passed along the line. He fully believed that his safety during that night of peril was due to the interposition of God.

Again, he said about the battle of the Cow- pens, which covered him with glory as a leader and a soldier, he had felt afraid to fight Tarle- ton, whose numerous army was flushed with success, and that he retreated as long as he could, until his men complained, and he could go no further. Drawing up his army in three lines on the hillside, contemplating the scene, in the distance the glitter of the advancing en- emy, he trembled for the fate of the day. Going to the woods in the rear, he kneeled in an old tree-top, and poured out a prayer to God for his army, for himself, and for his country. With relieved spirits he returned to the lines, and in his rough manner cheered them for the fight. As he passed along they answered him bravely. The terrible carnage that followed the deadly aim of his lines decided the victory. In a few moments Tarleton fled.

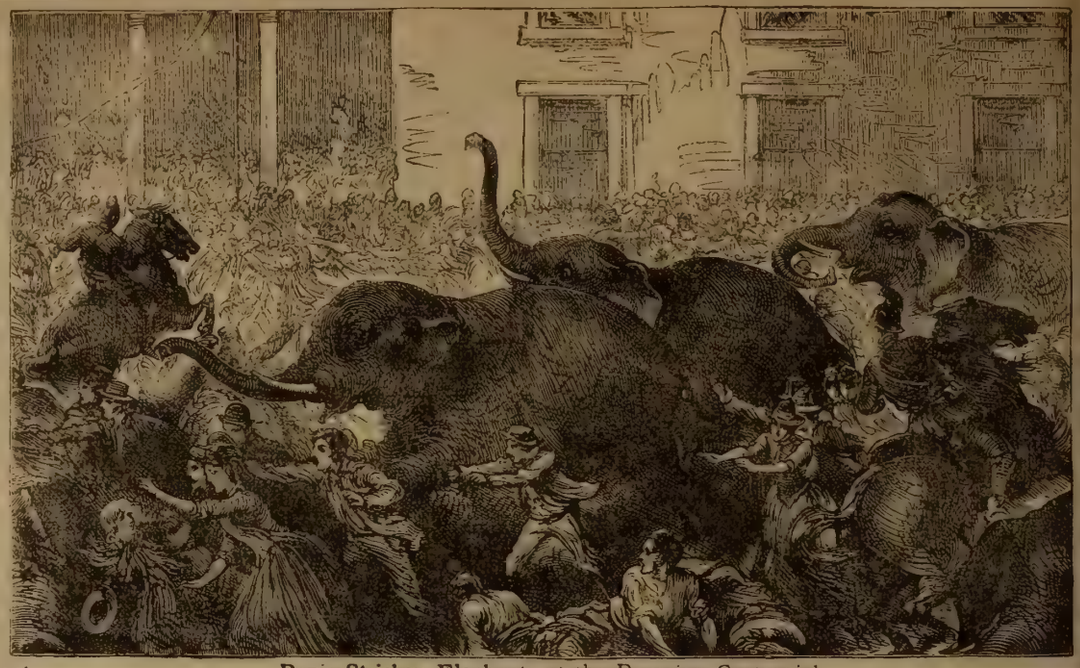
"Ah!" said he, "people said old Morgan never feared, they thought Morgan never pray- ed. They did not know. Old Morgan was oft- en miserably afraid." And if he had not been in the circumstances of crushing responsibility in which he was placed, how could he have been brave?

A Heroine of the Revolution.

When New York and Rhode Island were in the possession of the British armies, and the Jerseys, overrun by their victorious generals, op- posed but a feeble resistance to their over- whelming power, Lord Cornwallis, commanding a large division of their troops stationed at Bordentown, addressing Mrs. Borden, who resided on her estate in a mansion of superior elegance, demanded in an authoritative tone, "Where, Madame, is your rebel husband? Where is your rebel son?"

* From "The Boston Tea Party and other Stories of the Revolution." By Henry C. Watson. 222 pages. Illustrated. Price, by mail, 35 cents. Published by Lee & Shepard, Boston, Mass.

Chief-Justice Fuller, of the U. S. Supreme Court.



Panic-Stricken Elephants at the Bavarian Centennial.

"Doing their duty to their country, under the orders of General Washington," was the prompt reply.

"We are well apprised," rejoined the English officer, "of the influence you exercise over the political creed of your family, and that to them your opinion is law. Be wise then in time, and while mercy is tendered to you, fail not to accept it. Bid them quit the standard of rebellion, and cordially unite with us in bringing his Majesty's deluded subjects to submission, and a proper sense of their errors and ingratitude to the best of kings. Your property will then be protected and remain without injury in your possession. But should you hesitate to profit by our clemency, the wasting of your estate and the destruction of your mansion will inevitably follow."

"Begin, then, the havoc which you threaten," replied the heroic lady; "the sight of my house in flames would be a joy to me, for I have seen enough of you to know that you never injure what it is possible for you to keep and enjoy. The application of the torch would I know be the signal for your departure, and I should consider the retreat of the spoiler an ample compensation for the loss of my property."

The house was burned, and the whole property consigned to waste and desolation. But, as had been foreseen, the perpetrator of the ruthless deed retreated to return no more.

CHIEF-JUSTICE FULLER.

(See Portrait.)

The office of Chief-Justice of the United States Supreme Court, the highest judicial position in the country, is now filled, after the mature consideration of the Senate, by the lawyer whose portrait appears on this page. When the eminent Chief-Justice Waite died it was expected that the President would have promoted one of the Justices to the vacant post, and filled the lower position from the Bar; but in the exercise of his discretion he selected Melville Weston Fuller, of Illinois, for the Chief-Justiceship, and as both the Republican Senators from Illinois approved of the nomination, the Senate after some delay confirmed it.

The new Chief-Justice was born at Augusta, Me., on February 11, 1833. He is therefore in his fifty-sixth year. He studied at Bowdoin, from which institution he graduated in 1853. He studied law at Bangor and Harvard, and began his practice in Augusta. Though successful there, and prominent in municipal affairs, he removed to Chicago, where he at once sprang into prominence in legal and political circles. In 1862 his personal popularity placed him at the head of the poll in a Republican district for a seat in the Legislature. He rendered distinguished service there in constitutional questions, and though a strong party man, took a broad view of public measures.

In person Mr. Fuller is short of stature and slight of form. His hair and mustache are now silvery, but his face is singularly youthful and handsome. He has been twice married, the second time in 1866. He has five daughters and one son; and the family is said by Illinois society to be one so remarkable for geniality and vivacity as to be sure of winning its way to popularity in the Capital

PANIC-STRICKEN ELEPHANTS.

(See Illustration.)

The stories of Oriental magnificence which came across the Atlantic from Munich, in Bavaria, at the time of the death of the demented King, are almost paralleled by recent accounts of a wonderful festival in the same city. It was held to celebrate the centennial anniversary of the birth of King Ludwig I. The decorations and illuminations made the city like fairyland, and a wonderful procession, in which the celebration culminated, is described as magnificent beyond conception. A prominent feature of it was the triumphal cars, which were designed by Munich artists. One of the most singular of these was the car bearing the golden cradle of King Ludwig I., heralded by one hundred singing children in white, mounted, and escorted by a number of blooming maidens draped in the elegant attire of the time of Louis XVI.

Another very striking adjunct of the procession was the representation of mechanical art with a monstrous dragon covered with many-colored scales, and ejecting smoke and steam from its mouth. This was the cause of a catastrophe that marred the peaceful course of the day's pageantry. Eight elephants—some recently arrived from Ceylon—marched with their keepers in the Oriental department. In doubling back in the Ludwig Strasse, these elephants unfortunately came opposite the steam-dragon, and taking alarm, broke their chain bindings, and, under the impulse of terror, dashed through the panic-stricken crowd. The animals backed into the Wittelsbacker Platz, rushed down the Brienner Strasse, on to the Hof Theatre, and to the Mint, upsetting people and cabs, breaking through doors, and dashing into all manner of strange places. One boy of sixteen was seized by the trunk of an elephant, and hurled into the river Isar with no further injury. At length, about 5 o'clock, most of the beasts, having been got into a cellar, were secured. As it was, thirteen persons were seriously injured and four are dead.

A PROVIDENTIAL ESCAPE.

(See Illustration on Page 573.)

"It's going to be a real lovely day for the picnic, Ada. Ain't you glad you'll breathe sea-air instead of sweltering in that factory? I've been dreaming about it all night. Do get up and look at the sky!"

"Don't worry so, Rachel; there's no need to get up. What's the use of being so excited about it? I guess I'll enjoy it without going crazy over it. And it wasn't the sea-air you were dreaming about, Rachel Ellis. Much you'd care about the sea-air if it wasn't that Edgar Milverton was going!"

A conscious laugh from Rachel confirmed her sister's imputation, and led to her adding:

"You are fairly gone on that man, Rachel. I cannot make you out. I wish to goodness you'd have nothing more to do with him. He don't belong to us, any way. I'd sooner by half marry a good, industrious, sensible young fellow in the factory than a man like that Milverton. You've never been to Sunday-school since you took up with him, nor to church at night. You know what we promised mother before she died. Say, Rachel, give him up, I know you'll repent it if you don't."

"I couldn't, Ada; it would kill me. I know it sounds crazy, but I'd die for him!"

"Has he ever asked you to marry him? Tell me that, Rachel Ellis!"

"No; not exactly," in a hesitating voice, "but he means it; and I think he'll say it straight out to-day."

"He'd better, if he means business. If he does not pretty soon, I'll ask him myself. I'm not going to stand by and see my sister fooled, and her heart broken by a lazy good-for-nothing. I've a good mind to speak to him this very morning, before we start."

"Oh! don't do that, Ada; now you must leave that to me. I'll tell him to-day how you feel about it, and I know he'll speak straight and honorably. He's sure to want to go away from the others when we get to the beach, and I'll take the opportunity. I will, indeed. Now you won't speak to him, will you Ada?"

"Well, I don't want to interfere."

Rachel had her own reasons for wishing to bring her admirer to a decisive attitude, and she therefore lost no time, when the party of factory-hands reached the beach, in going away at his desire for a stroll over the rocks. Her sister Ada saw them go, and most devoutly hoped hat Rachel would keep her romise.

"Guess that fellow has illed Rachel and eaten ier," said one of the party o Ada, about two hours ater. Look at the conceited ellow sitting on that rock moking! He wasn't too roud to come with us, but e's too proud to join in he games."

"I don't like him," said Ada. "Where is Rachel? f she does not come soon, 'll go and ask him where he is, though I hate to peak to him."

"Oh, there's no need to go o him, he'll soon be here. The ide is coming in, and that ock where he is sitting will e under water by and by."

Ada ran away to join in he games and make the est of the opportunity, very are with her and her com-anions of enjoying them-elves. She cast uneasy lances now and again in he direction of the rock here Milverton sat, and at ast saw him rise and stroll oward the sandy beach, hough to a point distant rom that where the games ere in progress.

"What's the matter yon-er?" she asked, presently, f one of her friends. "What re they all running to look t? Let us go and see."

They hurried off, and skirt-ng a rock which shut out heir view of the object, what-ver it was, that interested the throng of gazers, ame among them. Milverton also had joined he crowd, and stood looking, with his hands in is pockets, in the languid, nonchalant style abitual with him. One glance sufficed to arouse da to agonizing distress. Rachel was stand-ng on a low rock, the waves all around her, and hreatening to overwhelm her. She turned round and faced Milverton. "What do you nean by standing idle there?" she cried. "Don't ou see she will be drowned? You led her out here. If you have any manliness in you, go nd save her."

"I cannot swim," he said. "I could not save er. I did not know she was there; she left me n hour ago."

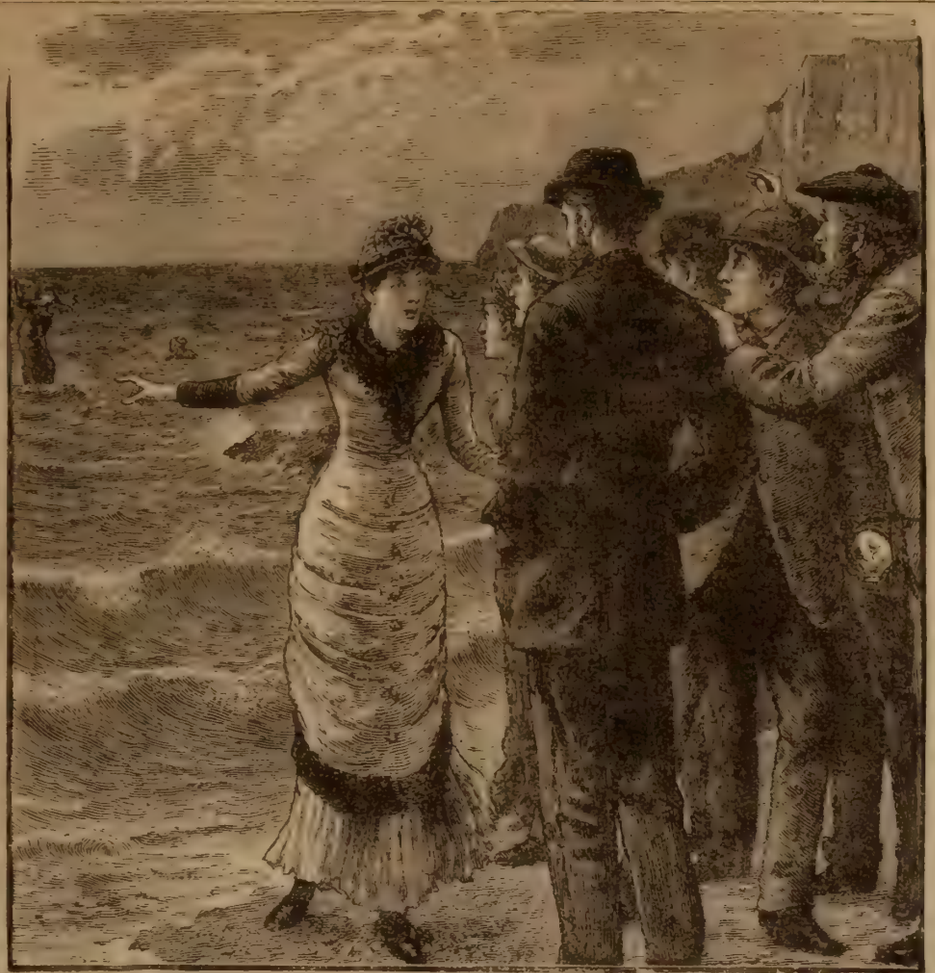
"Are you going to let her perish, you hound?" hrieked Ada.

"I cannot save her; I should only be drowned myself," he said.

A fisherman laid a hand on Milverton's shoul-der. "There's a line of rocks out there where ou could wade to her. The place is only half a mile away. If I was young and strong like you, I'd run for it. It's just there where you ee the foam on top of the water."

Milverton shook his head. He was not of a eroic mould. Happily, however, help was ap-roaching the imperilled girl. A man was strik-ng out boldly for the rock, and others were ushing a boat down from the place whence he tarted, to follow him. The swimmer was soon at the rock on which Rachel stood, and as a wave struck her and floated her off, the watch-rs saw him catch her and support her in the water. A few minutes later the boat reached hem, and, with a sigh of relief, Ada saw rescuer nd rescued lifted on board.

"Well," said Ada, when Rachel's clothes were dried, and they were sitting together under a hospitable roof, waiting for the time fixed for the departure of their friends, "I should think you'll have no more to do with that Milverton. He wouldn't have cared if you'd been drowned."



A Sister's Fruitless Appeal for Help.

"No, Ada, I won't. I found him out before the water came. It was just as you said; he is a wicked man. He spoke heartlessly to me, and I sat down to cry. I suppose I fainted, for the next thing I knew the water was all around me, and I was almost drowned."

"Well," said Ada, "it was almost worth the fright, Rachel, to have you saved from that man. He was causing you to forget God. You'd have made a bad bargain if you'd lost your soul in gaining a husband."

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. L. S. Keyser.

(Continued from page 558.)

Artful Intrigue.

THE Saturday morning on which Hadley delivered his famous speech, formed an epoch in the spiritual history of our two young exponents of infidelity. Both had publicly avowed their sentiments, so that their reasons for concealment were now removed, and they therefore became bold in their arraignments of Christianity. At every favorable opportunity, in private conversation and public address, they made known their principles. Vulcan himself could not have forged more fiery thunderbolts than those hurled by the young iconoclasts at sacred institutions. They were only made more acrimonious by the severe scourgings they received from their fellow-students, many of whom, though not professing Christians, had the intelligence to perceive the weakness of their arguments, and the courage to tell the young men that arrogance and conceit were poor equipment for a campaign against religion. Unhappily, the attitude which Madelling and Dane had taken was so openly hostile that even the real Christians in the college felt reluctance in manifesting a friendly interest in their spiritual welfare, and could do nothing for them but pray in private that God would open their eyes to the truth.

Among those who listened to Hadley not one was more elated than Belle Havelock. The gleam in her eye and the exultant smile on her lips evidenced her delight. The speech went beyond her expectations in its directness and positiveness. During its delivery she slyly watched the face of Miss Winters. That young lady was evidently deeply agitated. As Hadley uttered some of his most daring sentences she became pale and flushed by turns. There was no anger, no cynicism on her countenance, but every expression was indicative of profound distress and inexpressible pain.

As Belle watched the varying expressions on the face of her rival, she believed that her plan for alienating Miss Winters from Hadley Madelling had been successful. Little did Belle know of the motives that actuate the life of a true Christian. The very fact that Hadley was so blindly confident in advocating error would be an irresistible incentive, to a girl like Madeline Winters, to try to bring him under her influence, and point him to the way of escape from his perplexities. But to this overpowering motive Belle had no key.

Her surprise and consternation were therefore beyond all description when, a few evenings afterward, she met Mr. Madelling and Miss Winters walking together along the street, engaged so earnestly in conversation that they did not notice her as she passed them. The moon revealed a face that was almost lurid with the fires of jealousy and hatred, as Belle turned and looked after the pre-occupied couple. She felt that it was base to act the spy upon them, but the impulse was irresistible, and so she turned and followed them at some distance, and saw, to her agony, that Hadley entered the house with Miss Winters. Belle passed the house, and saw through the open blinds that the young couple were seated together in the parlor, still engrossed in an earnest colloquy.

The agitated girl put her hand to her heart a moment, and then passed on beyond the house several blocks. Presently she retraced her steps, and though she despised herself for her prying espionage, she halted a few minutes, and looked into the parlor through the window. Hadley had risen, and she could see by his animated gestures that he was speaking very earnestly, while Miss Winters sat before him with blanched cheeks and appealing eyes. Presently she put her handkerchief to her face, and Belle knew that she was weeping. Then the agitated spectator of the scene saw the young man whom she loved step up to her rival, and tenderly take her hand.

Poor Belle could endure no more. She almost sprang from the spot to which she had been riveted for a few minutes, and made her way home with fluttering, uncertain steps. Once in her room, she abandoned herself to a wild paroxysm of despair.

So well had the girl schooled herself that it was not long before she overcame her emotions, and then she set her wits to work to thwart Miss Winters in her attempt to win young Madelling; for Belle believed that this was her rival's ulterior purpose. During the night the girl's plans were laid. She was ready to do anything that would bring to her side and under her influence the object of her passionate love,

Her scheme required an ally, and she felt convinced that Duneman, if skilfully handled, would not hesitate to enter into the conspiracy. The next evening saw him at her door, and a few minutes later closeted with her in earnest conversation.

"How strange it is," said Miss Havelock, after a few commonplace remarks, "that Miss Winters should still continue her intimacy with Mr. Madelling! I should have thought that his exhibition last Saturday would have erased his name from her list of friends."

"I think it must have done so," said Duneman. "No good Christian girl would associate with so avowed an enemy to Christianity as he showed himself to be. I think he has ruined his character in that quarter beyond recovery."

"Yes; that would be a logical conclusion, yet facts are against it. Mr. Madelling had a friendly conversation with Miss Winters only last evening, and she gave him a very cordial welcome at her home."

"You amaze me!" said Duneman; "you are surely misinformed."

"Oh no! I am not. I have the evidence of my own eyesight." And Belle told him what she had witnessed, with a fullness of detail that made Duneman writhe with jealous rage. She knew by her own experience how, by a few dexterous touches, to fan the flame until his sluggish nature was thoroughly aroused to the required pitch of intensity. She ended with the abrupt question, "Well, what do you mean to do?"

"I do not know," he said, "I am too surprised and agitated to form any plan. But I am resolved that he shall not win this good girl without a struggle. It would be monstrous. She would be miserable all her life allied to such a man. Any scheme would be justifiable which would put an end to her infatuation, and save her from her own folly and his wiles."

That was the point to which Belle desired to bring him. When a man declares that the end justifies the means, he is not likely to be troubled with scruples in his choice of means.

"I have had nearly twenty-fours hours start of you in considering this matter," said Belle; "and I have thought out a plan which is a little complicated, but which promises success. If you approve I will aid you in carrying it out."

Belle drew her chair nearer to that occupied by Duneman, and in tones slightly suppressed, but with increased intensity, laid before him the details of her scheme. He listened intently, and before he quitted her home had not only approved it, but pledged himself to aid in its execution.

The next morning, when the early train left the Bromfield depot Belle Havelock was one of the passengers. Some time after dark the following evening she found herself at the station in the town of Banesville, the village near Hadley's home, in the academy of which he and George Dane had pursued their preparatory studies. Having found accommodations at a small and quiet hotel, she retired early, and slept soundly until the next morning's sun shone into her window.

Then she began in earnest to carry out her machinations. Her winsome ways and fascinating beauty abetted all her plans. By deft inquiries she extracted from the garrulous landlady a large amount of information concerning the village and surrounding country. It was soon evident that this woman, who was versed in all the local gossip, was the very tool she needed for her purposes.

It was early winter, approaching the holiday season, and there had been a considerable snowfall during the night, which wrapped the earth in a winding-sheet of glowing white. While Belle was listening to a long story, told with much voluble circumlocution and many tiresome parentheses by the landlady, she heard the jingle of sleigh-bells upon the street.

"What a delightful day for a sleighride!" exclaimed Belle in delight. "I have a few days to spend here on business, and if you will go with me, Mrs. Dossing, I will hire a sleigh for a drive into the country. I would like to see the neighborhood, and as you seem to be acquainted with everybody, you could give me a great deal of useful information."

Her hostess was only too glad to assent to the proposition, especially as it would not subject her to expense, and therefore as soon as the mid-day meal was over, the sleigh was driven to the door of the hotel, and the two strangely assorted companions, warmly robed, were starting out on their post-prandial drive.

"By the way," said Belle, with an assumed carelessness, "were you acquainted with a young man by the name of Madelling, who lives—"

"Hadley Madelling?" exclaimed Mrs. Dossing. "Guess I ought to know him; he used to take his meals here when he went to the academy. He is smart! He's at college now."

"Do you know where his mother lives?"

"Guess I do! I'm acquainted all through this neighborhood for ten miles around, and if you want to go anywhere I can give you the history of every family—"

"Suppose we drive out to the place where Mr. Madelling's mother lives. I have met the gentleman several times, and his character and brilliant talents interest me."

"All right. Turn the horse down this street."

They drove rapidly until they had reached the open country. Belle studied the topography of the country with close scrutiny, so as to familiarize herself with its changing scenery. While her eye was thus busily engaged, her ears were also on the alert for all the information that came from the lips of her talkative companion, taking special pains to learn the names of all the families in the neighborhood.

"We will soon be there now—at Hadley Madelling's home," said Mrs. Dossing. As they emerged from an oak forest at the top of a small, sloping hill, the landlady exclaimed, "There it is!"

A neat cottage by the wayside, surrounded by pines and hemlocks and fruit trees, greeted Belle's sight and made her pulse flutter with excitement. While passing the house, an elderly lady, doubtless attracted by the jingling of sleigh-bells, stepped to the window and looked out.

"That's Hadley's mother," the landlady informed her.

After that Belle adroitly encouraged her companion to speak more fully of Hadley's early life, and was pleased to learn that he bore a good reputation, albeit "he was such an infidel," as the landlady vouchsafed. In this way she managed to glean many interesting biographical facts concerning the young man in whom she was engrossed, all of which were valuable accessories to her schemes.

Following the curvatures of the wood a mile further, they came in sight of a large well-built house, embowered among the snow-laden trees at the foot of a long, steep hill. It was the residence of a wealthy farmer.

"This is where Mr. Richardson lives," said Belle's companion. By the by, he has a very handsome daughter, that Hadley Madelling was once interested in when he was around here in these parts; so they say, anyway. Of course, he was very young then, and since he has gone to college I guess he has forgotten her, and I guess she has forgotten him too, for she has a regular beau now from Wilmot, a town about ten miles from here. She is a real beauty, and pretty well educated, too."

"Richardson, did you say? What's her Christian name?" queried Belle, with an interest she could scarcely disguise.

"Mabel Lettie," answered the other.

During the remainder of the drive Belle was comparatively silent, but very attentive to her communicative friend's rattling talk. On their return, she again drove past Hadley's home, making more observations.

That night a light might have been seen burning in her room until long past midnight, and could one have entered the apartment unperceived, it would have been seen that she was bending over a desk engaged in writing. It might have been noticed, further, that she wrote in a disguised hand, although the chirography was delicately feminine. One sheet after another was filled, and then torn up before she was satisfied with her efforts. At last she folded her letter and enclosed it in an envelope, on which she wrote in the same disguised hand the address, "Mr. Hadley C. Madelling, Bromfield, I——." Having carefully locked it in her portmanteau she retired.

Early the next morning she found her way to the post-office and asked the postmaster, who, she saw, was a young man, for a stamp, which she fastened upon the envelope. The office, like the village, was a small one, and, as Belle had hoped would be the case, the postmaster put the postmark of the office upon the wrapper as soon as she handed it to him, and then threw it into the letter-box with other mail matter. Belle had made a feint to turn away, but reappeared a moment later at the stamp-window.

"If you please," she said, pretending considerable uneasiness, "I have forgotten to put something of importance into that letter. Will you allow me to take it again?"

"Certainly," said the postmaster, courteously; for the face at the window was of that order of beauty to make a susceptible country postmaster forget the regulations which Uncle Sam has framed for the conduct of his employees. The letter was put back into her hand. With a winsome smile and a polite "Thank you," she took it and hurried back to her room. Her design had been to get the printed impression of the Banesville post-office upon the envelope, and when this was accomplished she locked it up carefully, and it never went back into the hands of the gentlemanly postmaster.

In the afternoon she ordered a sleigh and drove out alone into the same locality which she had visited the day before, her chief design being to make herself more familiar with the neighborhood of Hadley's home. After driving along several roads, each of which afforded her a new view of the place, she turned in the direction of the house belonging to Mr. Richardson. It might prove an invaluable acquisition to her plans if she could see the girl whom her hostess had called Mabel.

When she had driven up before the house, she sprang nimbly from the sleigh, tied her horse at the hitching-post, and in a moment was ringing the bell at the front door. An elderly lady answered the summons.

"Excuse my troubling you," said Belle, courteously, "I am a stranger in this neighborhood and I am chilled with a long drive. Would you kindly allow me to warm myself and inquire the way to Banesville?"

She was welcomed into the warm sitting-room with cordial hospitality. A young lady was sitting in the room, doing some crochet work, and Belle knew instinctively that it was Mabel Richardson. She was a beautiful girl, with her gray, expressive eyes and jet black hair and brows.

Belle chatted on good-humoredly about the weather, the neighborhood, and the people for a few minutes and then receiving directions as to her way, drove off with many thanks. On her road she called again on the courteous postmaster.

"If any mail should come to this office for Mabel R. Richerson, will you be kind enough to forward it to Bromfield, I——?" she said.

"Ah! is Miss Richardson going away?" inquired the postmaster, inclined to prolong his conversation with the beautiful girl before him.

"Oh, you mistake," corrected Belle. "I believe there is a Miss Richardson in this neighborhood, and it is very vexing that there should be such a close similarity in the names. It might cause confusion if there were a less intelligent postmaster, but I am sure you will take care that there is no mistake. If you will give me a slip of paper I will write my name, and then it will be quite clear. There, you see, Mabel R. Richerson, not Mabel L. Richardson," said Belle, with a sweet smile, as she handed back the paper.

Belle returned to the hotel and prepared for departure on the next train. "It has been so pleasant," she said to the friendly landlady in taking leave, "and you have been so kind, that I shall surely come to you when I am in this neighborhood again; and if I should be in need of information for business purposes about any of your people you will not mind my writing to ask you? I know I can rely on what you say."

The landlady was profuse in her promises to oblige, and Belle was soon speeding back home with a heart elated by the success of her visit.

(To be Continued.)

THE SMITTEN ROCK.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for September 16, Num. 20: 1-13. Golden Text, 1 Cor. 10: 4.

The Thirst of the Desert—The Complaint of the People—Proved Their Lack of Faith—Moses Reproached for the Trouble—The Appeal to the Lord—Commanded to Speak to the Rock—The Patience of Moses Exhausted—His Denunciation of the People as Rebels—Justified but not Enjoined—Assumption of Personal Authority—The Punishment—The Failures of God's People.

THE children of Israel, in the course of their journeys, came into the desert of Zin, and abode in Kadesh. One of the condemned generation which listened to the evil report of the spies was Miriam, Moses' sister, and God's word was fulfilled in her case, for she died here in the wilderness. Now a trial of no light order overtook the people: "There was no water for the congregation." From a human point of view, madness and death stared them in the face; and if they had been unacquainted with God, we should not have wondered that "They gathered themselves together against Moses, and against Aaron. And the people chode with Moses, and spake, saying, Would God we had died when our own brethren died before the Lord." But had they had no experience of God's providing care, that they should thus ignore the God who made them, and turn in such against a man who was a creature like themselves? Alas, when men are angry, they do not and can not reason. An angry man is always a fool. Once the Lord had sweetened the bitter waters for them when they thirsted (Ex. 15: 23-25), and once He had brought water out of the rock. Were these things to be forgotten in the urgency of the present need! Oh, how often have we been like them, and under some fresh pressure have forgotten God's past wonders of love and faithful answers to prayer! When the people were in Rephidius, there had been no water for them to drink, and they had then reproached Moses, and murmured against him, saying, "Give us water, that we may drink. . . Wherefore is this that thou hast brought us up out of Egypt, to kill us and our children and our cattle with thirst?" The need was a real one, indeed. But instead of looking upon it as who had done so much for them, they thought themselves badly used, and visited their anger upon Moses, just as though he had imposed upon them in bringing them out of Egypt. No thought of gratitude for his devotedness possessed them: they counted him as a traitor and an enemy. He had sacrificed all for them, and they imputed to him the worst of motives. It was enough to arouse the indignation of Moses. But he dwelt too much in the presence of God to be moved as another man would be. His instinct and his habit was to take everything as it arose to God. He "cried unto the Lord, saying, What shall I do unto this people? they be almost ready to stone me. And the Lord said unto Moses, Go on before the people, and take with thee of the elders of Israel; and thy rod wherewith thou smotest the river, take in thine hand and go: behold, I will stand before thee there upon the rock in Horeb; and thou shalt smite the rock, and there shall come water out of it, that the people may drink. And Moses did so in the sight of the elders of Israel. And yet these very elders and this very people were acting now as though no such intervention of God had ever taken place, and as though the living God among them counted for nothing at all.

Senseless Anger

An Opportunity to Trust the Lord,

Now, in Kadesh their murmurings were yet louder and more bitter than at Rephidim, and they reproached Moses and Aaron, saying, "Wherefore have ye made us to come up out of Egypt, to bring us into this evil place? It is no place of seed, or of figs, or of vines, or of pomegranates; neither is there any water to drink." They well knew, if they had reflected for a moment, that had it not been for their unbelief, when the spies brought up their report of the land, they would have been now possessors of the promised land, which was the place of seed and figs and pomegranates. They were hindering Moses and Aaron from going up into the land; it was neither God nor Moses and Aaron who hindered them. Their own stubbornness, wilfulness, and unbelief were the cause of all their present misery. Yet Moses speaks no reproach; the people were in sore need, and Moses and Aaron did not argue with people who were half mad with anger and suffering. They "went from the presence of the assembly unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and they did what the people ought to have done, "they fell upon their faces": And the glory of God, who was only waiting to be called upon, appeared to them. "And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Take the rod and gather thou the assembly together, thou and Aaron thy brother, before their eyes; and it shall give forth his water, and thou shalt bring forth to them water out of the rock: so shalt thou give the congregation and their beasts drink." At Rephidim Moses was to smite the rock, now he was but to speak to it. But Moses, for the first and only time in his life, added to and changed the command of his God. Moses was the meekest man upon the face of the earth (Num. 12: 3), but this once the people "provoked his spirit, so that he spake unadvisedly with his lips." (Ps. 106: 33.) True, "He took the rod from before the Lord, as He commanded him," but in the heat of his spirit, stirred up to indignation that a second time the people should accuse both God and him so falsely, he said, "Hear now, ye rebels; must we fetch you water out of this rock? And Moses lifted up his hand, and with his rod he smote the rock twice." Was this sin? There are many, and among them are some dear children of God, who would say of an ebullition of temper such as this that it was only righteous indignation. But God counted it sin, and for this sin Moses lost the promised land! God forbid that we should Lower God's Standard of Sin!

Speak Ye Unto the Rock

Perhaps there are few children of God who do not sometimes know the temptation to anger, heat of spirit, and indignation when under sore provocation. There are few who are not tempted to retaliate, and to yield to such a temptation is sin, and this sin in a religious teacher, a leader such as Moses, is a thousand-fold more guilty than is one to whom God has not committed so much. Thank God, there is no need to yield to the temptation; the power of God is enough to keep us under any temptation. We are "kept by the power of God through faith" (1 Pet. 1: 5), and if we fall it is because we do not believe and yield ourselves fully up to God. A fall always comes from considering ourselves, or relying upon ourselves. Moses' habitual meekness was not sufficient to keep him at this time: his past wondrous communing with God for forty days and nights on two several occasions had no power to keep him now: he was guilty of disobedience and of unbelief. True, the water came out abundantly, and the congregation were relieved from their terrible pressure of need. But God in very faithfulness could not suffer the sin of Moses and Aaron to pass unnoticed and unpunished. He said to them, "Because ye believed Me not to sanctify Me in the eyes of the children of Israel, therefore ye shall not bring this congregation into the land which I have given them."

Some may argue, "Was not this a severe punishment for so small a sin as a moment's anger and disobedience? Was there, after all, so much difference between speaking to the rock and smiting the rock?" Yes; much more was involved than is seen at first sight. It is not for man to and Moses, in his anger, had gone so far as attempt to do this. The people had already seen how God could bring water out of the rock when Moses smote it with his rod, the very rod which he had lifted up in Egypt, when such wonders followed, and they may have imagined that God could do nothing without Moses' rod. God makes use of every emergency in which we are placed to teach us something new about Himself, and they were to learn just now the power of His word, apart from any outward means, and that the water would flow in response to the message of God through Moses, just as much as through the striking of the rock. Moses' fit of anger had intercepted the lesson of God on its way to the people; he had failed to sanctify God before them, and he had come under their spirit instead of under the Spirit of God. God forgive us if we excuse ourselves when we fail to sanctify God in the eyes of our children and those who surround us. Oh how often have we too smitten the Rock of Ages when God would have had us only speak to the Rock, Christ Jesus, and surely the living water would have flowed out to us.

Improve Upon the Plan of God;

There is no doubt that Moses and Aaron were under the pressure of thirst equally with the people, and the temptation to irritability is tenfold greater when under physical suffering or extreme weakness, which makes the nerves unstrung, than at any other time. Oh what need, then, in our moments of weakness to commit our way very specially to the Lord, that He may hold us up! It is very striking how many of God's truest and holiest servants mentioned in Scripture met with some failure. Abraham failed in truthfulness, Moses in temper, Aaron fell into idolatry, David into impurity, Asa into unbelief, etc. Even Peter fell into dissimulation, and Paul called the high priest "Thou whited wall!" and said to the Galatians, "I would they were even cut off which trouble you!" God thus teaches us that no man is perfect in himself, and it is His grace which keeps as well as saves us.

MRS. M. BAXTER'S WORKS.

THE following works by Mrs. M. Baxter, and others, may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York:

"Words for Daily Life." "Practical Lessons." "Life Lessons," "Leaves from Genesis," "Trials and Teachings of Paul." By Mrs. M. Baxter. Each, paper, 25 cts.; cloth, 35 cts. "Record of International Conference on Divine Healing. London," 15; Paper, 25 cts. "Living Word in the Gospel of St. John." Paper, 25 cts.; cloth, 50 cts. "God's Prophets." Paper 35 cts.; cloth 50 cts. "Lessons from St. Matthew's Gospel." Paper, 35 cts.; cloth 50 cts. "Teachings from St. Mark's Gospel." Paper, 35 cts.; cloth, 50 cts. "Sunday-School Lessons, 1877 and 78." By Mrs. M. Baxter. Each, cloth, 50 cts.

Any of Mrs. M. Baxter's tracts in the following list may also be had at one cent each or ten cents the dozen: "If it be Thy Will," "Does Sickness Sanctify?" "Casting All Your Care," Two cents each or twenty cents the dozen, "God's Purpose in Sickness," "The Great Physician," "Job's Sickness," "God's Side of Prayer," "Pastor Rein." "The Body for the Lord." Also the following tracts at one cent each, or ten cents the dozen, by the late Rev. W. E. Boardman: "He Careth for You," "A Perfected Self," "Paul's Thorn," "The Father's Rod," at two cents each, or twenty cents the dozen. "The Law of Liberty," at three cents each, or thirty cents the dozen. "Bethshan, a House for Healing," and "Enduement with Power," Miss C. C. Murray's tracts, at one cent each, or ten cents the dozen. "Repeating Prayer," "Thou Art Loosed," at two cents each, or twenty cents the dozen. "Redeemed from all Evil," "Anointing Him with Oil," at three cents each, or thirty cents the dozen. "Pastor Blumhardt," by Miss Sisson, at one cent each, or ten cents the dozen. "What About the Use of Means," and "The Apostolic Attitude," at two cents each, or twenty cents the dozen. "Asking and Receiving," by Mrs. Boardman, at two cents each, or twenty cents the dozen.

BY-AND-BY.

BY MRS HELEN E. BROWN.

By-and-by all will be over,
All the earthly care and pain;
Every wearying endeavor
After worldly good and gain,
Discord sharp, and tribulations
Which like fire our spirits try,
All the tears and all the sighing
Will be over by-and-by.

By-and-by will come the victory,
Satan bruised beneath our feet;
Sin no more shall sting and wound us,
We no more temptations meet;
Weapons of defence and warfare
Conquerors need no longer ply;
We may lay aside the armor
In the triumph, by-and-by.

By-and-by will shine the glory
All about us and within,
When in heaven we join the anthem
To the blood that makes us clean.
Oh, the long, the blissful rapture
Of the bride, the bridegroom nigh!
When in joy supreme, eternal,
We are with Him by-and-by!

By-and-by! Why heed the present?
Though the shadows thickly fall;
Be the anguish ne'er so bitter,
Be the plesures ne'er so small,
An eternal weight of glory
Afterward shall satisfy;
We can bear life's worst and longest
With the watchword, By-and-by.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike), will be sent post-paid, for 10 cts., or 100 for 20 cts. Postage stamps taken.

Horsford's Acid Phosphate
For the Tired Brain from over-exertion. Try it.

"There is a divinity that shapes our ends, Rough hew them as we may."

No close observer of human affairs can gainsay the poet as above quoted. The close observer aforesaid must have noted, however, that there are many persons who seem to think that their ends will be shaped without any "rough hewing" on their part. How much nobler is it for young men to strike boldly out to build well their own characters under God's guidance. To all who aspire to do a good work and do it well, we say write to B. F. Johnson & Co., Publishers, 1,009 Main St., Richmond, Va., who will give you helpful suggestions.

The latest and best imperial Photographs of Dr. Talmage and Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, with their fac-simile autograph, and also imperial photograph of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, can be obtained from J. E. Jewett, 77 Bible House, New York. Sent postpaid for twenty-five cents each. Postage stamps taken.

MEXICO

Contributions in aid of Christian work in Mexico are most pressingly needed, and can be mailed to the address of

BISHOP H. C. RILEY,
Care of J. P. HEATH,
43 Bible House, New York.

TO OUR CHRISTIAN FRIENDS:

As there is a regular monthly expense in connection with the work a regular monthly income is needed to meet that expense. We, therefore, specially ask for regular monthly contributions in its behalf. If many will each send a little every month, or quarter, or whenever they can, it will do great good. Remember, every little helps.

H. CHAUNCEY RILEY.

LIVE COALS. By T. DeWitt Talmage. Price, $2.00. 25 000 copies already sold. Agents wanted everywhere. Liberal terms. Distance no hindrance as all books are delivered free. Agents in Texas sold 38 in one day, another in Kansas 34. WILBUR B. KETCHAM, Publisher, 77 Bible House, N.Y.

CHRISTIAN WORKERS,
Y. M. C. Associations, Sunday-Schools and others, should send for catalogue and Sample Packet (one cent for postage) of Tracts and Books.
TRACT DEPOT, Orillia, Canada.

To Our Fellow Christians

Who Are Forwarding Contributions in Aid of Christian Work in Mexico.

Bishop Riley requests me to inform the kind friends who are generously contributing in aid of Christian work in Mexico, that we have now over one hundred monthly subscribers who are forwarding contributions every month in its behalf. Bishop Riley sends to all who are contributing in aid of the work in Mexico his most sincere thanks for their timely gifts.

As there are, no doubt, many who would be glad to contribute something monthly in behalf of the cause of Christ in Mexico, but who feel that they cannot afford to give as much as one dollar a month, we venture the suggestion, that when possible the friends of the work should try and collect small contributions from such and forward the same with their own contributions to Bishop Riley, 43 Bible House, New York. For example, some friend of the work who is now forwarding one dollar a month, might induce ten others, to each give ten cents a month, and collect and forward the same with his own contribution. Another who now contributes one dollar a month, might induce four others to each give one cent a day, or thirty-one cents a month, and collect and forward the same with his own contribution monthly. Still a third who now contributes a dollar a month might induce two friends, to each give fifty cents a month, and collect and forward the same regularly with his own contribution.

If this plan could be adopted generally among the more than one hundred regular monthly subscribers to the work, we might soon be able to report to our friends that we had over two hundred dollars a month contributed regularly in behalf of the work in Mexico.

We remind our friends that to continue the work in Mexico effectively we most pressingly need a regular monthly income, as we have to meet a regular monthly expense.

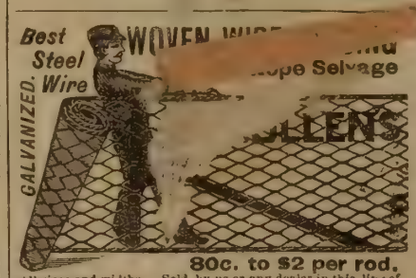
A most precious Christian work has been commenced in Mexico, and we are doing what we can to continue it, by raising an income in its behalf. We earnestly appeal to our fellow Christians to aid us in this effort. There are one hundred and thirteen millions who speak the English language, and seventy-five millions who speak the Spanish or Portuguese languages. Among those who speak the English language, there are multitudes who know and love the pure gospel, and are doing what they can for the Master. Among those who speak the Spanish or the Portuguese languages, there are a few who know and love the pure gospel, and are faithfully working for our dear Master. Our Spanish-American society is working hard to raise an income to aid in building up a strong centre of Christian work in Mexico. The influence of that work has already extended into Spain and Cuba, and, we trust, will yet extend into South America. Fellow Christians, think of seventy-five millions who speak the Spanish or Portuguese languages, millions and millions, and millions of whom have never had a Bible in their hands!!! Help us! help us! to do Christian work in their midst.

Bishop Riley has been instrumental in having more than one hundred thousand copies of the Bible or New Testament circulated in Mexico. Many hundreds of children have been educated in Christian schools established by him. More than forty congregations have been gathered in the Republic of Mexico through his efforts. He has secured two magnificent stone churches in the City of Mexico where the Gospel has been preached for years. He has trained up a noble band of able preachers of the pure gospel. He has given nineteen years of his life and his fortune to aid in building up this great work, and he now appeals to his fellow Christians to contribute the monthly income needed to continue it effectively.

Dear friends, will you not only continue to contribute to this good work yourselves, but also encourage others to do the same. Some may not be able to contribute monthly but could do so occasionally. Occasional gifts are most thankfully received. Pray for the work, and that many may be moved to befriend it.

With best Chsistian wishes, I am, your brother in Christ,

A. D. MAINE.



80c. to $2 per rod.
All sizes and widths. Sold by us or any dealer in this line of goods. FREIGHT PAID. Information free. Write The McMULLEN WOVEN WIRE FENCE CO.
N. Market and Ontario Sts., Chicago, Ill

TEAS LADIES Send at once for our new terms. THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO., 31 and 33 Vesey St., New York, N. Y.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED FOR MY STORY OF THE WAR
By Mary A. Livermore
Her own narrative of "Four Years' Personal Experience as Field and Hospital Nurse." It portrays the Womanly or "Heavenly" side of the War. Its Lights and Shadows "as a woman saw them." Bright, Pure, and Good, full of "laughter and tears" of thrilling interest and touching pathos, it sells at sight to all. Splendid Steel-Plates, and famous old Battle-Flags richly colored in exact fac-simile. The "booming" book for Men and Women Agents. $100 to $200 a month made. Distance no hindrance, for we Pay Freights and give Extra Terms. Write for circulars to A. D. WORTHINGTON & CO., Hartford, Conn.

"Demonology or Spiritualism,
Ancient and Modern." "An effective weapon." "A sword of fire." "Only unanswerable work on the subject." "Startling disclosures.—History facts and data.—Scores saved already. Whole communities rescued. Every family, preacher and christian worker needs one. 310 pp. 12mo, cloth. Price reduced to $1. Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price. Address J. E. JEWETT, 77 Bible House, New York

KEYS TO THE WORD
HELP TO BIBLE STUDY.
By ARTHUR T. PIERSON, D.
16mo., Cloth, 75 Cents.

"An admirable book for all who desire an intelligent understanding of the special object and meaning of various books of the Bible. It gives the KEY word of each book, the KEY verse, the general characteristics, salient points of detail, and the leading divisions. It will be an invaluable help to all who desire to study the Bible spiritually."

WORKS OF
REV. T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D.

The following are among the best Sermons preached in the Tabernacle, Brooklyn, by Dr. Talmage.

Vol. I. Sundown. 33 Sermons. 12mo. Cloth. Price reduced to.....$1.50

Vol. II. Fishing too Near Shore. 36 Sermons. 12mo. Cloth. $2.00. Price reduced to.....

Vol. III. Old Wells Dug Out. 24 Sermons. 12mo. Cloth. $2.00. Price reduced to.....

Vol. IV. Every-day Religion. 33 Sermons. 12mo. Cloth. $2.00. Price reduced to.....

The Marriage Ring. A volume of 15 Sermons on Marriage, Family Ties and Duties. 12mo. Cloth. Beautifully bound.....

Around the Tea Table. A series of Family Talks about Home and Every-Day Matters. 12mo. 504 pp. Cloth.....

The Brooklyn Tabernacle. By T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D. Containing 104 Sermons. 1 vol., crown 8vo, cloth.....

Live Coals. A volume of 678 Large Octavo Pages, cloth, 16 full-page illustrations and a life-like frontispiece of the author, with 40 pages devoted to his life and work brought down to date. Price.....

The Masque Torn Off. Contains the discourses delivered in Brooklyn Tabernacle, giving Dr. Talmage's experience and observations as seen by him in company with two elders of his church and three high police officials, during their midnight explorations in the haunts of vice in New York City. One large octavo volume of 526 pages, elegantly illustrated with 14 full-page engravings. Price.....

New Tabernacle Sermons. 30 Sermons, 12mo, cloth, 400 pages. Price.....

Traps for Men. Large 12mo, cloth, 180 pages.

Foes of Society. Large 12mo, illustrated, cloth, 170 pages.

Night Sides of City Life. Large 12mo, cloth, pages.

These three volumes are contained in "The Masque Torn Off."

Woman: Her Power and Privileges. A series of Sermons by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage. Just published. 12mo. 200 pages. Paper cover.....

Labor Sermons. A series of sermons on the LABOR QUESTION Authorized and revised by Talmage. Paper cover.....

Either of the above books will be sent by mail, postpaid on receipt of price. Address

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller
77 Bible House, New York.

SEATTLE The largest City in Washington Territory. Population 20,000. Commercial center of PUGET SOUND Country. Coal, Iron, Timber and Agricultural Lands. Send for full information of Queen City
SE-AT-TLE. CHAS. H. KITTINGER, Seattle, Wash. Ter.

1,000 Agents Wanted to Sell 100,000 Copies National Hand Book of American Progress,
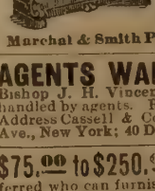
E. O. HAVEN, LL.D., & others,
1492 to date. Six Vols in One. A non-partisan reference Cyclopædia, of History, Biography, Statistics, Politics, for School, Home and Office. Illustrated pages, $2. E. B. TREAT, Pub. 771 B'way.

THE BRYANT SCHOOL, ROSLYN, L. I., N.
23 miles from N. Y., overlooking L. I. Sound. Incorporated Academy for Boys. English, Classical, Commercial. Military organization under graduate of U. S. M. A. (West Point). Buildings, grounds and general equipment unsurpassed. Apply to
Geo. Bruce Cortelyou, Principal.



UNIVERSITY-PIANOS
FROM $180 TO $15
FINEST PIANOS IN THE WORLD
SOLD DIRECT TO FAMILIES, saving the enormous expenses of agents. Sent with beautiful cover, stool and book, for trial in your home before you buy. Guaranteed six years. Send for catalogue.
Marshal & Smith Piano Co., 285 E. 21st St., N.Y.

AGENTS WANTED to sell "The Christian Bible." Introductory price. Bishop J. H. Vincent, D.D. The best selling book handled by agents. Recommended by all clergymen. Address Cassell & Co., B.B.S.D., 104 and 108 Fourth Ave., New York; 40 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

$75.00 to $250.00 A MONTH can be made working for us. Agents preferred who can furnish a horse and give their whole time to the business. Spare moments may be profitably employed also. A few vacancies in towns and cities. F. Johnson & Co., Pub's, 1009 Main St., Richmond, Va.

IF YOU WANT ANY BOOKS,
it makes no difference where you see them advertised or by whom or where they are published or how to get them, send your orders to me and I will attend to them promptly, send all books to you prepaid, and guarantee that they reach you safely. Postage stamps received for fractional parts of a dollar.
J. E. JEWETT, 77 Bible House, New York.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1888, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington

Vol. XI., No. 37. Office, 63 Bible House. N. Y. THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 13, 1888. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

PORTRAIT AND LIFE OF MR. THOMAS A. EDISON, the Electrician and Inventor.

THE DEER HUNT. Dr. Talmage's Sermon last Sunday Morning.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

THE SLAYING OF THE WITNESSES.

PICTURE OF TWO PATAGONIAN INDIANS.

JOHN BARTON'S BIBLE READING. (Illust'd.)

A Blind Buddhist in Japan—An Inquiry from a Car-Window—Preaching in Persian Shops—A Six Years' Wedding Tour—A Royal Reception at Stockholm—A Criminal Trial in Africa.

ANTICHRIST'S BROKEN TREATY. By Rev. John Storie.

SOWN AMONG THORNS. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

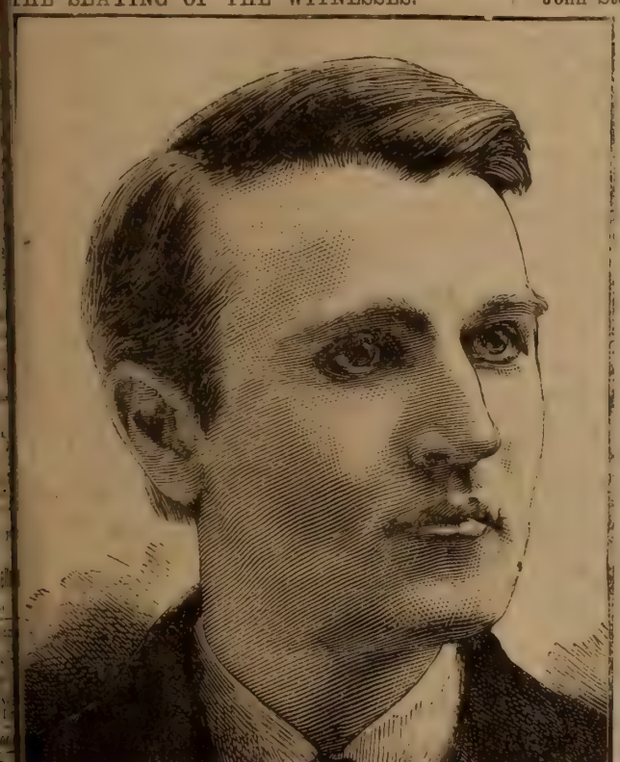
Gems from New Books: A King's Answer to a Proselyter—The Massacre at Toulouse, etc.

PORTRAIT OF REV. THOMAS CHAMPNESS.

HOW LAND WAS BOUGHT IN SPAIN.

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE. (Continued.)

THE DEATH OF MOSES. By Mrs. M. Baxter.



R. THOMAS A. EDISON—REGISTERING A CONCERT ON THE PHONOGRAPH—LISTENING TO A REPRODUCTION BY THE PHONOGRAPH.

MR. THOMAS A. EDISON.
The Electrician.

A Curious Entertainment—Listening to Automatic Voices—A Visit to Menlo Park—Wonderful Inventions—Mr. Edison's Early Years—A Newspaper Printed on a Train—Disastrous Chemical Experiments—The Turning-Point—The Invention of the Ticker—His Brilliant Success—Domestic Life—His Rapid Courtship—An Interesting Experiment at a Concert.

A REMARKABLE evening's entertainment was given on August 14 by an American gentleman in London to a party of astonished friends. He informed his guests that Mr. Thomas A. Edison would be the speaker of the evening, and though Mr. Edison was at home, in New Jersey, three thousand miles away, the promise was duly kept. The mystery was explained when the host, Col. Gourand, produced Mr. Edison's famous invention, the Phonograph, the sensitive plates of which had been subjected, two weeks before, to the concussion of Mr. Edison's voice. He had talked and sung into the Phonograph for a whole evening, and the wonderful instrument had not only accurately registered every word and sound, but, after two weeks and a long voyage, reproduced them distinctly, to the amazement of the company. First of all gave utterance to a speech by Mr. Edison in his exact tone of voice, in which he dwelt upon his first visit to England, eighteen years ago, and then devoted himself to a humorous criticism of English politics and climate. He then proceeded to amaze the company by reciting "Bingen on the Rhine," and winding up with a most extraordinary whistling spasm. Then he sang a funeral march, and without waiting gave "Mary had a little lamb." He told funny stories, and, in fact, conducted quite a variety entertainment all by himself.

The Wonderful Phonograph

The company were then invited to talk to Mr. Edison. The wax cylinders received, first, ringing cheers, which were given as an expression of gratitude for his novel entertainment, then each member made a little speech into the phonograph, and afterward some, who were of a musical turn, sang into it, others whistled. The machine was then packed up and sent back to America, where Mr. Edison would be able to extract from it the kind words and humorous felicitations of his friends in their own tones of voice and expression.

A Visit To Menlo Park,

the home of Mr. Edison, is thus described by a press correspondent: After an hour's ride from New York, on the Pennsylvania road, the train stops at Menlo Park—no ancestral domain, with its grand oaks and towering beeches, but a new-looking suburban hamlet, the country home of a few New York business men. One of the villas to the right of the station is Professor Edison's house, and to the left, across a wide meadow, on rising ground, is a long two-storied wooden building, painted white, with a piazza at one end. This is the laboratory of

The Magician of the 19th Century,

as his countrymen love to call him. At night-time light streams from every window, and the whirr of machinery in motion breaks the illusion of the country quiet. The visitor passes up the dark stairs, and enters a long, well-lighted room, fitted at intervals with all kinds of strange-looking apparatus. The walls are lined with shelves containing bottles filled with chemicals, and the whole place smells like a photographer's studio. About a dozen plain-looking mechanics are engaged, apparently, in conducting some chemical experiments. One of them is bending thoughtfully over a number of lamps. He is a slight man, about forty-one years of age, with a mass of dark hair, already streaked with gray, which hangs tumbled and unkempt over his forehead. His features are large and prominent, and but for the wrinkles into which they are knit, he looks quite youthful. The hands are stained with acids, and his shabby clothes are of common make. He glanced at the letter of introduction I presented. The dull-looking gray eyes brightened, and he came back, as it were, from some far-off region of thought, into which he had wandered, with a cordial smile of welcome. It was Edison himself,

The Great Inventor of the Age.

Here was the great genius at home. You walk with him round the laboratory, and see jumbled together like so much lumber some of his most wonderful inventions. Here is the Phonograph, which registers by slight indentations on a disc of tinfoil the most delicate intonations of the human voice. Here, too, is the projected Aerophone, a giant two-hundred-and-fifty voice power, which might have belonged to Virgil's fabled Cyclops. This wonderful instrument acts by fluttering the valves of a steam jet, which carries the tones of the voice to the limit of its capacity, and is designed to lift up its mighty tones from lighthouses and ships at sea.

Near the Aerophone are lying the disjecta membra of what looks like a great speaking-trumpet, and two ear-trumpets. This is the Megaphone. By its help, two persons can converse at a distance of four miles, but the instrument has an unhappy trick, at present, of gathering up all intermediate sounds. Thus, two lovers, separated by distance, might find their fond vows intermingled with the amorous croaking of the frogs in an intervening pond. Here is a talking-box, and a bird to fly a thousand feet, mere playful excrescences of inventive genius. Here, too, is a new system of telegraph printing, by which the sender of a message can transmit his own handwriting. The writing is in white ink, which rises in strong relief on the paper. These are only specimens of his inventions, noticed at random as one walks round Edison's laboratory.

The History of the Man Himself, apart from the marvellously developed faculty which makes him stand out an unique figure among the crowd of every-day inventors, is commonplace enough. Thomas Alva Edison was born in 1847, of humble parentage—Dutch on the father's side—at Milan, Erie Co., Ohio. His mother, though born in Massachusetts, was the daughter of Scotch parents. At her knee he received his education, or rather such education as he had acquired previous to the age of twelve, when he began the battle of life. No other member of the family has shown any signs of remarkable talent. The boy himself was one of those shy, studious little fellows who shrink from the ruder play of their companions. At ten he was reading Hume's "England," Gibbon's "Rome," and the "Penny Encyclopædia." At twelve he began to earn his living as a train-boy on the Grand Trunk Railroad of Canada and Central Michigan, and combined with a legitmate business in the daily news, a trade in apples, pea-nuts, and figs. But young as he was, the boy began to show promise of the metal of which he was made, and gave Promise of his Brilliant Future.

An old baggage-car was given up to him to store his wares. By making friends with some of the printers of the Detroit Free Press, into which town his train ran, he managed to buy some founts of old type, and started the Grand Trunk Herald, a weekly sheet, edited and printed by himself on the cars, the contributors being all railway hands. It had the honor of being the only newspaper in the world printed on a railway train. The young train-boy combined the study of chemistry with the pursuit of journalism, but a little bottle of phosphorus happened to break and ignite one day, and set the baggage-van in flames, and came near burning the train; whereupon the irate conductor hurled chemicals, printing-press, and all out of the car, and gave the editor of the Grand Trunk Herald a good thrashing, which unfortunate circumstance led to the suspension of that journal.

Then it was that Edison struck the groove in which he was to win fame. Telegraphy attracted his attention. He fitted up the basement of his father's house with telegraph wires, using in the batteries stove-pipe wire, old bowls and zinc, which friendly companions obtained clandestinely from under their domestic kitchen-stoves, and retailed to him at three cents a pound. His passion for reading still continued unabated. He conceived the strange boyish notion of reading all through the Detroit Free Library, and actually succeeded in wading through fifteen feet in a line, including such books as Newton's "Principia," and Burton's "Anatomy of Melancholy." The accident, however, of his saving a telegraph operator's child from an approaching train, at Detroit, was which definitely started him on the track of his great inventions. The grateful father taught him telegraphy. His history during the next four years was still one of apparent failure. His erratic disposition was calling him irresistibly to one new pursuit after another; and he was constantly being dismissed from his situations for neglect of duty, till, having been successively employed at Port Huron, at various places in Michigan, and in Canada, and at Indianapolis, Cincinnati, and Boston, somewhere about 1868 he reached New York. Here a happy circumstance occurred to him. He repaired the indicator of the Gold and Stock Company, and invented an automatic printer of stock quotations, familiarly known as "the ticker," in use to this day, and on the manufacture of which he at one time employed a force of 300 men; and so indefatigable was he in his labors that at one time his corps of assistants were busy upon no less than forty-five different inventions. The Western Union Telegraph Company became his patrons, and from that moment his success has been rapid and unbroken. It was here that he invented what is known as the quadruplex system, the transmission of four simultaneous messages by one wire through the division of the electric current, and he talks hopefully of sextuplex. He has spent about $500,000 in the last few years in experiments, but his income from his inventions is enormous. The Western Union Company paid him $100,000 for the carbon telephone, and as much again for the quadruplex system. He is the owner of over a hundred patents of inventions, and he is said to receive a royalty of $500 a week for the exhibition of the phonograph alone.

The Turning-Point in His Career,

Edison's domestic life is tinged with the color of his ruling passion, telegraphy. His wife was a lady telegraph-operator, whose soft and nimble fingers attracted the shy student's attention as she worked at one of his instruments, and the following is

The Story of the Courtship,

and is thoroughly characteristic of the man. One day when standing behind the chair of one of his female employees, Miss May Stillwell, that young lady suddenly turned round and exclaimed, "Mr. Edison, I can always tell when you are behind me or near me." "How do you account for that?" mechanically asked Mr. Edison, still absorbed in his work. "I don't know, I am sure," she answered; "but I seem to feel when you are near me." "Miss Stillwell," said Mr. Edison, looking the lady in the face, "I've been thinking considerably of you of late, and if you are willing to have me I'd like to marry you." "You astonish me!" exclaimed Miss Stillwell. "I—I never—" "I know you never thought I would be your wooer," interrupted Mr. Edison, "but think over my proposal, Miss Stillwell, and talk it over with your mother." Then he added in the same off-hand, business-like way, as though he might be experimenting upon a new mode of courtship, "Let me know as early as possible, as, if you consent to marry me, and your mother is willing, we can be married next Tuesday." This was the extent of Mr. Edison's courtship. The lady laid the abrupt proposal before her mother, and next day informed her lover of the maternal consent. "That's all right," said Mr. Edison, in reply; "we will be married a week from to-day." And so they were. The two were married in a week and a day from the beginning of Mr. Edison's novel and precipitate courtship. For once, also, the old adage of "ma ied in haste" proved false, as the union was in very sense thoroughly happy. Two of his little nes, who climb on his knees when he comes ome from work, are named Dot and Dash, after he letters of the telegraphic alphabet.

A Notable Experiment

vith the Phonograph is the subject of the pper illustration on the first page. It was used vith a large trumpet-like attachment at a grand oncert. The instrument was fixed in the gallery opposite the orchestra, when Handel's "Israel in Egypt" was sung by four thousand voices. The entrancing strains were fully caught and egistered, and, after the concert, were clearly eproduced. The plates or phonograms are in he possession of Mr. Edison, and will doubtless e a source of gratification to musical parties.

HOW LAND WAS BOUGHT IN SPAIN.

MRS. EMILY LOPEZ RODRIGUEZ, whose heroic work for Christ in Spain is widely known, sends his narrative to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

"There is urgent need for a Gospel Hall in he busy market town of Figueras. A friend, ately travelling in Italy, most kindly wrote telling us to buy the land at once, adding, 'I will over the cost.' Pastor Rodriguez lost not a noment in trying to secure it, but the lawyer would not credit the assurance that the money would shortly be sent, and refused to draw up he necessary document. The landlady, however, agreed to wait a couple of weeks. The Romanists at once seized the opportunity. Deputations from the Societies of St. Vincent e Paul and the Holy Cross, headed by the Rector of St. Peter's, the largest church here, alled on the landlady, and urged that she must, n no account, be guilty of selling land for a Protestant capilla! At the same time, they laid own the money, $2,000, for the site, and also 8,000 to purchase a house and garden adjoining, thus effectually shutting the Protestants ut on each side. All we could do was to unite n prayer that the Lord would undertake for us, nd for the honor of His cause. The triumph f the enemies of the truth seemed complete. But, contrary to all expectations, a far better ite was immediately offered for sale. It is situated in a principal street in a central part of he town, having also the great advantage that commands a back street, by which many who, ke Nicodemus, lack courage may be able to nter the hall unobserved. Our only difficulty as that the price, came to $1,250 more than e had in hand. This we laid before the ord in prayer, and He graciously answered by nclining the hearts of His servants to come to he rescue. In addition to a former liberal donation of $500, a friend sent $1,000, and another host kindly sent $250. Thus the exact sum eeded arrived just in time for the purchase to e made, which called forth our most heartfelt raise. All that now remains for us to do is to uild the first permanent Gospel Hall in the rovince of Gerona. Since writing the above, e have heard, on reliable authority, that a riest belonging to a church quite near to our ew site, said, 'I would gladly have given $5,000 o have prevented the Protestants buying that lot of land.' Last Sunday night as we were returning from the service, a man was seen hanging about our house, armed with two long nives, and was fortunately arrested by the ivic guards. We thank God for what we believe to have been a narrow escape."

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION—1888.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled rophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled, "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of HE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by emitting 75 cents. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely ound in cloth, and contains fifty full-page pictures and diarams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a ésumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts arefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian ra down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most seful and complete guide the student can have on entering he study of that portion of the Word of God.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Bengali Schoolboys to the Rescue. The Rev. A. Jewson, the Baptist missionary of Commilla, India, says: "In March, 1886, I went into a district where there is no missionary. A million of people are there without a Christian teacher or minister. I preached at a large agricultural show as it was getting dark. Crowds of people, almost all young Mussulmans, stood in front of me, and presently those behind gave a lurch and rushed upon me. With the utmost difficulty I kept my feet. I knew it was no good expostulating, so I was pleasant with them and kept my temper; but it was hard work to keep my feet. I looked away, and saw the Bengali police; but they did not come to me, and I thought it was better to trust in God than in the Bengali police. The field was covered with great ant-hills, and it was with the utmost difficulty that I could keep standing, as I was pushed down between those ant-hills, wondering at what moment I should be trampled down by that crowd of roughs. But suddenly I heard a cry, and I saw a lot of Bengali schoolboys striking out from the shoulder, and that great crowd of Mussulman roughs cleaved in twain, and I was rescued.

An Astonished Missionary.—Rev. Mr. Haffenden says: "I know an American missionary who was sent to Burmah thirty years ago to make inquiries about the languages. He himself spoke Burmese, and travelled up the country for many hundred miles. One night he encamped near a small village. Here he heard prayer going on in Burmese. He listened, and to his utter astonishment heard, not the name of Buddha, or that of any idol, but the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. He was the more surprised, for he knew that no missionary or white man had ever been to that part of the world, and so he went into the village and began to make inquiries. He found out that the headman of the village had some years previously been down to another village some miles distant, and had bought an article of food wrapped up in Burmese-printed paper, which happened to be one single chapter of the Word of God, with a piece torn out of the corner. He read it, and having himself sought to put sin away, he found that Saviour which is the Son of God, and who he found was able to cleanse from sin. He now called his friends together, and read that piece of the Word of God to them, and induced them to put away their idols. And when this missionary found them, they had been for six years praying to Christ as the Saviour of sinners. Thus is the blessing of God upon our work of spreading abroad simply and solely the Truth as in Jesus Christ."

Tourists Overtaken by the Tide.—Mr. Thomson said: "Two young fellows were travelling in the north of Scotland, and in the course of their sight-seeing took a walk along the beach to view the beautiful scenery. They walked thoughtlessly on, admiring their surroundings, but never casting a glance upon the fast-approaching waters until they were startled by a man on the rocks above them shouting: 'Young men, the tide is coming in, and the only road from the shore is almost covered.' The young men stopped and looked about them. From where they were they could not see the imminence of their peril. For a moment they wavered, then continued their walk. Again the man shouted a warning to them, but they took no notice of it. Soon, however, seeing the tide getting nearer and nearer, they began to be alarmed, and turned back. They tried to find a road up the cliff, but there was none. They rushed quickly along the beach, thinking to escape by the way they had come, but the road was covered. In despair they tried to climb the face of the rock, but it was too steep. The water rose higher and higher until it reached their necks, then covered them. There was a brief convulsive struggle, and then they were gone. They did not know that that warning voice was their last opportunity or they would gladly have hearkened to it. Sinners, too, if they knew this would be the last time salvation would be offered to them, would eagerly accept it. To neglect the warning is to run great risk of being lost for ever."

"Still in the Same Box."—An Evangelist said: "I was holding meetings in a country place some time ago, and one day when on the way to visit some friends, I saw before me a man to whom I had often seriously spoken at the meetings, but who would never decide, who was always trying to believe, and trying to do his best, as he said. Overtaking him, I asked, 'Are you still in the same box, my friend?' 'Still in the same place, sir,' he rejoined. I then said to him: 'You are like a man who has tumbled into deep water, and, being unable to swim, is struggling about, but whose efforts only serve to make him weaker. Out from the shore comes a strong swimmer, and when near the struggling man he stops and shouts, "Cease your struggles, shut your mouth, and put your hands down. Trust me, and I will save you." The man hears, and knows his only chance is to obey. He does so. The swimmer approaches, helps, and soon both are in safety. This is what Christ wants us to do—to cease our struggles, our own feeble efforts, and trust Him.' Then, lifting his eyes to mine, and taking hold of my hand, he said, simply, 'I see it now; I can trust my Saviour.'"

A Priest was Converted Through the Confessional recently, as related in Evangelical Christendom. "An anxious penitent in a Spanish town confessed to a priest that she had been to a Protestant service. He questioned her closely, for his curiosity was greatly excited. She gave him a full account, and acknowledged that a great impression had been made on her mind. The impression communicated itself to him, and shortly after he requested his own sister to go to the nearest place where Protestants assembled, to listen, as with his ears, and under his responsibility, and to bring him full details of everything. Reluctantly she did so, but faithfully reported all. The priest was convinced that there were truths of which he was ignorant. entered into communication with the pastor, appointed a secret place for a prolonged interview, and found immediate peace in the finished work of Jesus. The secluded place in which he labors allows him comparative freedom of action; he preaches Jesus; all his parishioners have the New Testament; the children learn more of Christ than of ceremonies; and confessions are stopped short, and belief in the full satisfaction wrought by the Lord Jesus is substituted for penance."

How the Lieutenant Lost His Life.—The Rev. Mr. Hamilton related: "A ship was crossing the Bay of Biscay one dark night, when the cry arose, 'A man overboard!' In a moment the lieutenant of the watch leaped into the water and swam to the rescue. The boats were lowered with all speed, and anxiously the men looked around to see who was missing. It was soon discovered that the captain of the foretop was not at his post. A death-like silence reigned on board. Suddenly a voice from the masthead shouted, 'I hear them.' And presently the dip of the oars became audible to all. The commander seized his trumpet and inquired, 'Have you got them both?' 'Yes, sir,' was the reply. And a grateful murmur of 'Thank God!' went through the company. But soon they were busy with the rescuer and the rescued. The seaman was sensible, and as he was helped on deck he said, 'Noble fellow; I had gone down, but he dived for me and saved my life.' But what of the officer? He had saved his fellow-creature's life, but died in doing so. The grief of that rescued sailor over the death of his savior was overwhelming. He treasured up every word that he had ever spoken to him, and determined to live as much as possible after the character of the man who had died for him, and who was a true Christian. So the sinner when he is saved resolves to live no longer unto himself, but unto Christ who died for him."

THE DEER HUNT.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday Morning, September 9, 1888.

"As the hart panteth after the water brooks." Ps. 42 : 1.

Allusions to the Deer in the Bible—A Talk with a Hunter in the Adirondacks—The Race to the Lake—People Pursued by the Hounds of Trouble—The Mistake of Fighting Them—A Wounded Dog—Antler Against Tooth—Shedding the Horns—The Finer the Stag, the Hotter the Pursuit—The Hounds Kept by Sin and Trouble—A Chain of Three Letters—King Nimrod's Three Vases—A Christian Woman in an Earthquake—A Lost Insane Man Rescued and Restored.

DAVID, who must some time have seen a deer hunt, points us here to a hunted stag making for the water. The fascinating animal, called in my text the hart, is the same animal that in sacred and profane literature is called the stag, the roebuck, the hind, the gazelle, the reindeer. In central Syria in Bible times there were whole pasture fields of them, as Solomon suggests when he says: "I charge you by the hinds of the field." Their antlers jutted from the long grass as they lay down. No hunter who has been long in "John Brown's track" will wonder that in the Bible they were classed among clean animals, for the dews, the showers, the lakes, washed them as clean as the sky. When Jacob, the patriarch, longed for venison, Esau shot and brought home a roebuck. Isaiah compares the sprightliness of the restored cripple of millennial times to the long and quick jump of the stag, saying: "The lame shall leap as the hart." Solomon expressed his disgust at a hunter who, having shot a deer, is too lazy to cook it, saying: "The slothful man roasteth not that which he took in hunting." But one day David, while far from the home from which he had been driven, and sitting near the door of a lonely cave where he had lodged, and on the banks of a pond or river, hears a pack of Hounds in Swift Pursuit.

Because of the previous silence of the forest the clangor startles him, and he says to himself: "I wonder what those dogs are after!" Then there is a crackling in the brushwood, and the loud breathing of some rushing wonder of the woods, and the antlers of a deer rend the leaves of the thicket, and by an instinct which all hunters recognize, plunges into a pond or lake or river to cool its thirst, and at the same time by its capacity for swifter and longer swimming, to get away from the foaming harriers.

David says to himself: "Aha, that is myself! Saul after me, Absalom after me, enemies without number after me; I am chased, their bloody muzzles at my heels, barking at my good name, barking after my body, barking after my soul. Oh, the hounds, the hounds! But look there," says David, "that reindeer has splashed into the water. It puts its hot lips and nostrils into the cool wave that washes the lathered flanks, and it swims away from the fiery canines, and it is free at last. Oh, that I might find in the deep, wide lake of God's mercy and consolation escape from my pursuers! Oh, for the waters of life and rescue! As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after Thee, O God."

I have just come from the Adirondacks, and the breath of the balsam and spruce and pine is still on me. The Adirondacks are now populous with hunters, and by the score. Talking a few days ago with a hunter, I thought I would like to see whether my text was accurate in its allusion, and as I heard the dogs baying a little way off, and supposed they were on the track of a deer, I said to the hunter in rough corduroy: "Do the deer always make for the water when they are pursued?" He said: "Oh yes, Mister; you see they are a hot and thirsty animal, and they know where the water is, and when they hear danger in the distance, they lift their antlers and snuff the breeze and start for Racquet or Loon or Saranac; and we get into our cedar shell boat or stand by the 'runway' with rifle loaded ready to blaze away."

The Deer Are Being Slain

My friends, that is one reason why I like the Bible so much—its allusions are so true to nature. Its partridges are real partridges, its ostriches real ostriches, and its reindeer real reindeer. I do not wonder that of the text makes the hunter's eye sparkle, and his cheek glow, and his respiration quicken. To say nothing of its usefulness, although it is the most useful of all game, its flesh delicious, its skin turned into human apparel, its sinews fashioned into bow-strings, its antlers putting handles on cutlery, and the shavings of its horns, used as a restorative, taken from the name of the hart and called hartshorn. But putting aside its usefulness, this enchanting creature seems made out of gracefulness and elasticity. What an eye, with a liquid brightness as if gathered up from a hundred lakes of sunset! The horns, a coronal branching into every possible curve, and after it seems done, advancing into other projections of exquisiteness, a tree of polished bone, uplifted in pride, or swung down for awful combat. It is velocity embodied. Timidity impersonated. The enchantment of the woods. Eye lustrous in life and pathetic in death. The splendid animal a complete rhythm of muscle and bone and color and attitude and locomotion, whether couched in the grass among the shadows, or a living bolt shot through the forest, or turning at bay to attack the hounds, or rearing for its last fall under the buckshot of the trapper.

This Antlered Glory

It is a splendid appearance, that the painter's pencil fails to sketch, and only a hunter's dream on a pillow of hemlock at the foot of St. Regis is able to picture. When, twenty miles from any settlement, it comes down at eventide to the lake's edge, to drink among the lily-pads, and, with its sharp-edged hoof, shatters the crystal of Long Lake, it is very picturesque. But only when, after miles of pursuit, with heaving sides and lolling tongue and eyes swimming in death, the stag leaps from the cliff into Upper Saranac, can you realize how much David had suffered from his troubles, and how much he wanted God when he expressed himself in the words: "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after Thee, O God."

The Hounds of Trouble.

Well now, let all those who have coming after them the lean hounds of poverty, or the black hounds of persecution, or the spotted hounds of vicissitude, or the pale hounds of death, or who are in anywise pursued, fly to the wide, deep, glorious lake of divine solace and rescue. The most of the men and women whom I happen to know, at different times, if not now, have had trouble after them, sharp-muzzled troubles, swift troubles, all-devouring troubles. Many of you have made the mistake of Trying to Fight Them.

Somebody meanly attacked you, and you attacked them; they depreciated you, and you depreciated them; or they overreached you in a bargain, and you tried, in Wall Street parlance, to get a corner on them; or you have had a bereavement, and instead of being submissive, you are fighting that bereavement; you charge on the doctors who have failed to effect a cure; or you charge on the carelessness of the railroad company through which the accident occurred; or you are a chronic invalid, and you fret and worry and scold, and wonder why you cannot be well like other people, and you angrily charge on the neuralgia or the laryngitis or the ague or the sick-headache. The fact is, you are a deer at bay. Instead of running to the waters of divine consolation, and slaking your thirst, and cooling your body and soul in the good cheer of the gospel, and swimming away into the mighty deeps of God's love, you are fighting a whole kennel of harriers.

A few days ago I saw in the Adirondacks a dog lying across the road, and he seemed unable to get up, and I said to some hunters: "What is the matter with that dog?" They answered:

"A Deer Hurt Him."

And I saw he had a great swollen paw and a battered head, showing where the antlers struck him. And the probability is that some of you might give a mighty clip to your pursuers; you might damage their business, you might worry them into ill-health, you might hurt them as much as they have hurt you; but, after all, it is not worth while. You only have hurt a hound. Better be off for the Upper Saranac, into which the mountains of God's eternal strength look down and moor their shadows. As for your physical disorders, the worst strychnine you can take is fretfulness, and the best medicine is religion. I know people who were only a little disordered, yet have fretted themselves into complete valetudinarianism, while others put their trust in God, and came up from the very shadow of death, and have lived comfortably twenty-five years with only one lung. A man with one lung, but God with him, is better off than a Godless man with two lungs. Some of you have been for a long time sailing around Cape Fear, when you ought to have been sailing around Cape Good Hope. Do not turn back, but go ahead. The deer will accomplish more with its swift feet than with its horns. I saw in the Adirondacks, and from one height you can see thirty; and there are said to be over eight hundred in the great wilderness. So near are they to each other that your mountain guide picks up and carries the boat from lake to lake, the small distance between them for that reason called a "carry." And the realm of God's Word is one long chain of bright, refreshing lakes; each promise a lake, a very short carry between them, and though for ages the pursued have been drinking out of them, they are full, up to the top of the green banks; and the same David describes them, and they seem so near together that in three different places he speaks of them as a continuous river, saying: "There is a river the streams whereof shall make glad the city of God"; "Thou shalt make them drink of the rivers of Thy pleasures"; "Thou greatly enrichest it with the river of God, which is full of water."

Whole Chains of Lakes

But many of you have turned your back on that supply, and confront your trouble, and you are soured with your circumstances, and you are fighting society, and you are fighting a pursuing world; and troubles, instead of driving you into the cool lake of heavenly comfort, have made you stop and turn round and lower your head, and it is simply Antler Against Tooth.

I do not blame you. Probably under the same circumstances I would have done worse. But you are all wrong. You need to do as the reindeer does in February and March—it sheds its horns. The Rabbinical writers allude to this resignation of antlers by the stag when they say of a man who ventures his money in risky enterprises, he has hung it on the stag's horns; and a proverb in the far East tells a man who has foolishly lost his fortune, to go and find where the deer shed his horns. My brother, quit the antagonism of your circumstances, quit misanthropy, quit complaint, quit pitching into your pursuers, be as wise as, next spring, will be the deer of the Adirondacks. Shed your horns!

But very many of you who are wronged of the world—and if in any assembly between Sandy Hook, New York, and Golden Gate, San Francisco, it were asked that all those that had been sometimes badly treated should raise both their hands, and full response should be made, there would be twice as many hands lifted as persons present—I say many of you would declare: "We have always done the best we could and tried to be useful, and why we become or invalidism, or mishap, is inscrutable." Why, do you not know that the finer a deer, and the more elegant its proportions, and the more beautiful its bearing, the more anxious the hunters and the hounds are to capture it? Had that roebuck a ragged fur, and broken hoofs, and an obliterated eye, and a limping gait, the hunters would have said, "Pshaw! don't let us waste our ammunition on a sick deer." And the hounds would have given a few sniffs of the track, and then darted off in another direction for better game. But when they see a deer with antlers lifted in mighty challenge to earth and sky, and the sleek hide looks as if it had been smoothed by invisible hands, and the fat sides enclose the richest pasture that could be nibbled from the bank of rills so clear they seem to have dropped out of heaven, and the stamp of its foot defies the jack-shooting lantern and the rifle, the horn and the hound, that deer they will have if they must needs break their neck in the rapids. So if there were no noble stuff in your make-up, if you were a bifurcated nothing, if you were a forlorn failure, you would be allowed to go undisturbed; but the fact that the whole pack is in full cry after you is proof positive that and worth capturing. Therefore sarcasm draws on you its "finest bead." Therefore the world goes gunning for you with its best Maynard breach-loader. Highest compliment is it to your talent, or your virtue, or your usefulness. You will be assailed in proportion to your great achievements. The best and the mightiest being the world ever saw had set after Him all the hounds, terrestrial and diabolic, and they lapped His blood after the Calvarean massacre. The world paid nothing to its Redeemer but a bramble and a cross. Many who have done their best to make the world better have had such a rough time of it that all their pleasure is in anticipation of the next world, and they would, if they could, express their own feelings in the words of the Baroness of Nairn, at the close of her long life:

The Victims of Malignment,

You Are Splendid Game

"Would you be young again?
So would not I;
One tear of memory given Onward I'll hie;
Life's dark wave forded o'er,
All but at rest on shore,
Say, would you plunge once more,
With home so nigh?

"If you might, would you now,
Retrace your way?
Wander through stormy wilds,
Faint and astray?
Night's gloomy watches fled,
Morning all beaming red,
Hope's smile around us shed,
Heavenward, away!"

Yes; for some people in this world there seems no let up. They are pursued from youth to manhood, and from manhood into old age. Very distinguished are Lord Stafford's hounds, and the Earl of Yarborough's hounds, and the Duke of Rutland's hounds; and Queen Victoria pays eight thousand five hundred dollars per year to her Master of Buckhounds. But all of them put together do not equal in number or speed, or power to hunt down the great kennel of hounds of which Sin and Trouble are owner and master.

But what is a relief for all those pursuits of trouble and annoyance and pain and bereavement? My text gives it to you in a word of three letters, but each letter is a chariot if you would triumph, or a throne if you want to be crowned, or a lake if you would slake your thirst—yea,

A Chain of Three Letters

—G-o-d, the One for whom David longed, and the One whom David found. You might as well meet a stag which, after its sixth mile of running at the topmost speen through thicket and gorge, and with the breath of the dogs on its heels, has come in full sight of Scroon Lake, and tried to cool its projecting and blistered tongue with a drop of dew from a blade of grass, as to attempt to satisfy an immortal soul, when flying from trouble and sin, with anything less deep and high and broad and immense and infinite and eternal than God. His comfort, why, it embosoms all distress. His arm, it wrenches off all bondage; His hand, it wipes away all tears. His Christly atonement, it makes us all right with the past, and all right with the future, and all right with God, all right with man, and all right forever.

King Nimrod's Three Vases.

Lamartine tells us that King Nimrod said to his three sons: "Here are three vases, and one is of clay, another of amber, and another of gold. Choose now which you will have." The eldest son, having the first choice, chose the vase of gold, on which was written the word "Empire," and when opened, it was found to contain human blood. The second son, making the next choice, chose the vase of amber, inscribed with the word "Glory," and when opened, it contained the ashes of those who were once called great. The third son took the vase of clay, and opening it, found it empty, but on the bottom of it was inscribed the name of God. King Nimrod asked his courtiers which vase they thought weighed the most. The avaricious men of his court said the vase of gold. The poets said the one of amber. But the wisest men said the empty vase, because one letter of the name of God outweighed a universe.

For Him I thirst: for His grace I beg; on His promise I build my all. Without Him I cannot be happy. I have tried the world, and it does well enough as far as it goes, but it is too uncertain a world, too evanescent a world. I am not a prejudiced witness. I have nothing against this world. I have been or, to use a more Christian word, one of the most blessed of men, blessed in my parents, blessed in the place of my nativity, blessed in my health, blessed in my field of work, blessed in my natural temperament, blessed in my family, blessed in my opportunities, blessed in a comfortable livlihood, blessed in the hope that my soul will go to Heaven through the pardoning mercy of God, and my body, unless it be lost at sea or cremated in some conflagration, will lie down in the gardens of Greenwood among my kindred and friends, some already gone, and others to come after me. Life to many has been a disappointment, but to me it has been a pleasant surprise, and yet I declare that if I did not feel that God was now my friend and ever present help, I should be wretched and terror-struck. But I want more of Him. I have thought over this text and preached this sermon to myself until with all the aroused energies of my body, mind, and soul, I can cry out: "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after Thee, O God."

One of The Most Fortunate,

Through Jesus Christ make this God your God, and

You Can Withstand Anything,

and everything, and that which affrights others will inspire you. As in time of earthquake, when an old Christian woman was asked whether she was scared, answered: "No, I am glad that I have a God who can shake the world," or as in a financial panic, when a Christian merchant was asked if he did not fear he would break, answered: "Yes I shall break when the fiftieth Psalm breaks in the fifteenth verse: 'Call upon me in the day of trouble; I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me.'" O Christian men and women, pursued of annoyances and exasperations, remember that this hunt, whether a still hunt or a hunt in full cry, will soon be over. If ever a whelp looks ashamed and ready to slink out of sight it is when in the Adirondacks a deer by one long, tremendous plunge into Big Tupper Lake gets away from him. The disappointed canine swims in a little way but, defeated, swims out again, and cringes with humiliated yawn at the feet of his master. And how abashed and ashamed will all your earthly troubles be when you have dashed into the river from under the throne of God, and the heights and depths of heaven are between you and your pursuers.

We are told in Revelations 22d and 15th: "Without are dogs," by which I conclude there is a whole kennel of hounds outside the gate of heaven, or, as when a master goes in a door, his dog lies on the steps waiting for him to come out, so the troubles of this life may follow us to the shining door, but they cannot get in. "Without are dogs!" I have seen dogs, and owned dogs, that I would not be chagrined to see in the heavenly city. Some of the

Grand Old Watch-Dogs

who are the constabulary of the homes in solitary places, and for years have been the only protection of wife and child; some of the shepherd dogs that drive back the wolves and bark away the flocks from going too near the precipice; and some of the dogs whose neck and paw Landseer, the painter, has made immortal, would not find me shutting them out from the gate of shining pearl. Some of those old St. Bernard dogs that have lifted perishing travellers out of the Alpine snow; the dog that John Brown, the Scotch essayist, saw ready to spring at the surgeon lest, in removing the cancer, he too much hurt the poor woman whom the dog felt bound to protect; and dogs that we caressed in our childhood days, or that in later time laid down on the rug in seeming sympathy when our homes were desolated. I say, if some soul entering heaven should happen to leave the gate ajar, and these faithful creatures should quietly walk in, it would not at all disturb my heaven. But all those human or brutal hounds that have chased and torn and lacerated the the world; yea, all that now bite or worry or tear to pieces, shall be prohibited. "Without are dogs!" No place there for harsh critics or backbiters, or despoilers of the reputation of others! Down with you to the kennels of darkness and despair! The hart has reached

The Eternal Water Brooks, and the panting of the long chase is quieted in still pastures, and "there shall be nothing to hunt or destroy in all God's holy mount." Oh, when some of you get there, it will be like what a hunter tells of when he was pushing his canoe far up north in the winter, and amid the ice-floes, and a hundred miles, as he thought, from any other human beings: He was startled one day as he heard a stepping on the ice, and he cocked the rifle ready to meet anything that came near. He found a man, barefooted and insane from long exposure, approaching him. Taking him into his canoe, and kindling fires to warm him, he restored him, and found out where he had lived, and took him to his home, and found all

The Village in Great Excitement.

A hundred men were searching for this lost man, and his family and friends rushed out to meet him; and as had been agreed at his first appearance, bells were rung, and guns were discharged, and banquets spread, aud the rescuer loaded with presents. Well, when some of you step out of this wilderness, where you have been chilled and torn, and sometimes lost amid the icebergs, into the warm greetings of all the villages of the glorified, and your friends rush out to give you welcoming kiss, the news that there is another soul forever saved, will call the caterers of heaven to spread the banquet, and the bell-men to lay hold of the rope in the tower, and while the chalices click at the feast, and the bells clang from the towers, it will be a scene so uplifting, I pray God I may be there to take part in the celestial merriment. And now do you not think the prayer in Solomon's Song, where he compared Christ to a reindeer coming down in the night to pasture on the plains, would make an exquisitely appropriate peroration to my sermon: "Until the day break and the shadows flee away, be thou like a roe or a young hart upon the mountains of Bether"?

The Seeking Saviour and Other Themes, by the late Dr. Mackay, of Hull. This work has been published since Dr. Mackay's death, but the greater part was ready for publication when he died, and to that has been added the striking discourse which he delivered the last time he entered the pulpit, and a few manuscripts found among his papers. 247 pages, cloth cover; Price 75 cents, including postage, For sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York.

A BLIND BUDDHIST IN JAPAN.

IN a letter from Dr. H. Loomis, who is laboring at Yokohama, Japan, to the Interior, he mentions the following interesting incident of spiritual vision resulting from the cure of natural blindness: "In the town of Fugioka lives a man sixty four years of age, named Machida Totaro. He has long been afflicted with a weakness in his eyes, and went from place to place and to various doctors and priests for some remedy. But his efforts were of no avail, and he become almost totally blind. Then he heard that there was a skilful foreign physician living in Tokyo, by the name of Whitney, and he went to him for relief. After careful treatment for awhile his sight was partially restored, and he was greatly rejoiced and thankful for the services that had been rendered. Hitherto, he had been a firm believer in the Buddhist religion. But this kindness on the part of a Christian doctor so touched his heart that he quite changed his views, and was very ready to hear about the Christian belief. After some instruction from the doctor and others, he made a full confession of his faith in Christ as his Saviour, and received baptism from the Rev. Mr. Fuwa. So there has come to him a double healing, and he can now truly say with a double meaning, 'Whereas I was once blind, now I can see.'"

A wonderful work among prisoners in Japan, is also reported by Dr. Loomis. He says: "The pastor of the church at Shidzuoka has been visiting the prison and holding services for the benefit of the inmates. The result has been a most marked change in the mind and conduct of many of the prisoners. About fifty copies of the New Testament have been purchased by them, and several have united with the church upon their release from confinement. The officers are much interested, and are also studying the Bible. A Christian has been for some time employed as a teacher of morals in Kobe prison. As the result of his work, he reports the conversion of some of the most hardened criminals. These men have been released, and are now living honest and industrious lives."

A ROYAL RECEPTION AT STOCKHOLM.

AN interesting letter has been kindly sent to us by the secretary of the International Committee of Young Men's Christian Associations, which he has received from a delegate to the recent Conference in Stockholm. In addition to the reports we have already published, the writer supplies the following details of the reception tendered to the Conference by the royal family of Sweden: The King was absent in Berlin at the opening of the Conference, but as the delegates were sitting at dinner a telegram was read from him expressing his regrets that he could not be present to enjoy the benefits of the Convention and participate in the deliberations and invoking the benediction of the Holy Spirit on the Convention. The contents of the telegram were announced in English, French, German, and Swedish. The health of the King was then drunk (in water) and the national hymns of Sweden, Great Britain, and America were then sung. Mr. Morse, of New York, then proposed the health of the Queen. The King and Queen and his Royal Highness the Crown Prince have exhibited much interest in the preparatory arrangements for the Conference. It was held in Stockholm at the personal solicitation of the King, and both he and the Crown Prince made liberal subscriptions for the expenses of it.

On Monday, August 19, the delegates left the city by special boat for a lunch, on special invitation, with the Crown Prince at the Royal Palace at Drottningholm. The palace and royal garden were thrown open to the visitors. The Crown Prince, in the absence of the King, who is in Germany, and the Queen, who is in Norway, presided, and welcomed the delegates. A very pleasant afternoon was spent, and the party returned to the city by boat at 4 o'clock.

The Convention has been a very successful one, and everybody, from the King and Queen and royal family down to the servants in the hotels, has done everything to make it a success and to provide for the comfort of the delegates. The King makes a liberal contribution annually to the Y. M. C. A., and the court chaplains, the chamberlains, cabinet officers, and other prominent men are in sympathy with it. The Queen is an earnest Christian woman, the King's sister is president of a home for cripples and the orphan asylum; home for old men, home for old ladies and other benevolent institutions have the support of the Royal Family.

A SIX YEARS' WEDDING TOUR.

THE guests at a wedding solemnized in Buffalo, N. Y., in 1882, were amused at an invitation given on the wedding cards. It stated that the bride and groom would be at their home in Sacramento, Cal., on May 10, 1888, six years from date, and would be pleased to receive their friends. They were going on a bridal tour around the world, and they set out immediately after the marriage ceremony. The San Francisco papers in announcing their return, say: "There is scarcely a spot of interest on the globe that they have not visited. Children were born to them en route—twin boys in St. Petersburg; a girl in China, and another boy in Brazil. The journey cost them $75,000. The remarkable fact, however, which astonished the invited guests, was that the bridal couple returned punctually on the day specified, though so much had intervened that might have delayed them. There will be far greater astonishment among unwatchful Christians in a few years, when they hear that the Bridegroom has come, as He said He would (Matt. 24: 44), and those that were ready have gone in with Him to the marriage.

A CRIMINAL TRIAL IN AFRICA.

A BARBAROUS method of deciding the guilt or innocence of suspected persons in Africa is described by Dr. George D. Dowkontt, the director of the Medical Missionary Society of New York, in his Medical Missionary Record. He states that two missionaries, Messrs. Henry and M'Intyre, on two occasions, witnessed the cruel and absurd practice of testing guilt by drinking mwavi. The chief suspected some among his people of crime, among them one of his wives, and he wanted to find out who was guilty. The chief "resolved to settle the matter by making all the men and some women of his own and some surrounding villages drink mwavi. His plan was to bring so many to his village at one time, and, placing them in a circle, make them drink the poison in public. If they lived, they were held to be guiltless; if they died, no one seemed to care much. This scene occurred on the meadow on the edge of which our tent was pitched. After the people were assembled, a fantastic figure, dressed up with a head-dress of feathers, danced about the circle for a time. The poison, which is the bark of the sassy-tree, was then beaten with a rude mortar and pestle, and, being put into water, was drunk by the suspected, who came up by twos for this purpose, and then ran off to vomit or die. This was given to about two hundred and fifty people the first time, and to more than a hundred the second time. One of the head-men said that the poison was made weak, yet each time one person died, and on previous occasions six died.

AN INQUIRY FROM A CAR WINDOW.

WHEN there is only a moment's opportunity for a friend to ask a question and receive a reply, the information sought is sure to be that which the questioner deems most important. The following incident, which is related in the Watchword, suggests the thought that a time is coming when there will be but one question that will be really worth asking in respect to our friends: A dear brother of the writer, living in New York, was recently on a train which was just leaving the station. By the side of it, on the next track, was another train, which was about starting in the opposite direction. A man near my brother suddenly jumped to his feet, opened the window, and hurriedly called, "John!" A man at an open window in the other train, instantly recognized his friend, and quickly responded, "William!" A hearty grasp of hands, and the short, solemn inquiry came ringing from William:

"John, have ye kept the faith?"

"Aye, by the help of God, I have."

The cars moved away, a smile of pleasure on the face of each, and they saw each other no more. Was it strange that a thrill of Christian sympathy took possession of my brother's heart, as he at once took a seat by the side of William, who had hitherto been a stranger, but now was known to him as a Christian brother?

Not, "Have you made money?" "Have you made a great name for yourself?" but, "Have you kept the faith?" What stronger evidence of conversion could have been given, than in the question and answer which came from these two travelers to eternity?

Happy the man who can give a right answer to this important question, and who at the end of life, and in the day of judgment, can say with Paul, "I have kept the faith."

THE HEALING OF A CRIPPLE.

AT a recent meeting at Bethshan, Miss Stone related a remarkable experience, which Mrs. Baxter publishes in Thy Healer.* Miss Stone, who said that she had travelled over a hundred miles to give her testimony to the Lord's power to heal, as manifested in her experience, said: "Twenty-six years ago an accident was permitted to befall me, and I was made a helpless cripple. I came, or rather was brought, up to London to see if anything could be done for me, for I had two bones dislocated. Two others came up with me. Dr. Hutton (the late well-known bone-setter) put the bones in their places, but there was no hope for me. I went back home to lie on my bed for twenty-three years. Then a sister told me how she had given her sickness and everything else to the Lord, and the Spirit revealed to me, as He had never done before, the meaning of Matt. 8: 16, 17: "And He cast out the spirits with His word, and healed all that were sick; that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of by Esaias the prophet, saying, Himself took our infirmities, and bare our sicknesses." I believed that He had taken my infirmities as well as my sins, and He raised me up three years ago, and I have been able to walk since then, and have not had to lie in bed one day, nor be awake one night."

PREACHING IN PERSIAN SHOPS.

AN account of a tour through a few Persian villages, is sent by Rev. S. G. Wilson, of Tabriz, to the Church. In the course of his narrative he says: "When we came to Boshminch, I went into the bazaars. After a few words of greeting, a trader invited me to sit down in his open shop, the floor of which is about three feet above-ground, and on the front of which his merchandise is exhibited. A crowd gathered around, drawn to see a new thing. The gospel words and narrative attracted them; the claims put forth for Christ drew out lively repartee, and a shower of questions which led over a large range of the topics at issue between Christianity and Islam. Only a few showed a bigoted spirit, while the majority listened to the exaltation of Christ as the divine Redeemer and Judge of all, perhaps smiling at the idea of their becoming converts. After some conversation and reading, a spirit of opposition arose, and on the morrow they tried to persuade our host to oust us, as defiling to his house. Poor man! In the morning his milk was spilt, and in the evening one of his cows died. 'The curse of heaven,' will be the popular verdict. When I next went out into the street I thought to moderate pubic feeling by talking on a subject about which we could all agree, namely, repentance; and narrated the parable of the Prodigal Son. Before finished, a man stuffed his fingers into his ears and went away, saying that it was defiling to listen to me. His ground of offence was, that I had mentioned 'swine,' and said the father embraced the boy who had been feeding them.

* Thy Healer and Faith Witness, a monthly Magazine, edited by Mrs. M. Baxter, contains original articles on Holiness and Healing, Authentic Testimonies of Divine Healing, and Items of Intelligence from Heathen Lands where missionaries are laboring in faith, soliciting no help from man, but relying solely on God for support. Annual Subscription, 75 cents, may be sent to Manager of CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

"At the next place we had a good reception, and a fine opportunity for work in the house of a soldier. Having been to Teheran, and under the drill of European officers, he, like his class, was somewhat liberalized. In the course of conversation he asked me if I knew of dog-worshippers. I told him I had heard of fire-worshippers, and even snake-worshippers, but not of dog-worshippers. He said he had seen some in Teheran. I asked him who. He said there were people in the capital who fed dogs at their own table, washed and clothed them, took them in their laps, and in their carriages to ride. Were they not dog-worshippers? This misconception of the lap-dog craze, while ludicrous in itself, shows how the common people conceive that all customs have a bearing on religion."

ANTICHRIST'S BROKEN TREATY.

By Rev. John Storie.*

Antichrist Conciliating the Jews—Undertakes to Protect Them—Encourages Them to Rebuild he Temple—The Treaty Ruptured—Their Deady Enemy—His Death and Resurrection—The Tribulation of the 1260 Days.

WHEN the last awful week [Daniel's final seven years; Dan. 9:24] of Time begins, the Jews return and seek to rebuild their Temple. It is then that the Antichrist rises into power. It is then that the Messiah is in Parousia in these terrestrial heavens. It is then that the events of judgment, in the Book of the Revelation will be consummated. Before these closing years begin, many of the Jews will, it would appear, have been gathered back, still in unbelief but in expectation, to the land of their fathers.

"The Prince, the Coming One," the Antichrist who is to be, stands forward in His earliest policy as the advocate of religious freedom, and oppressed; and, seeking to attach the Jewish race, with their vast resources of wealth and their immense influence over the moving nations, as allies in the confederacy he is forming, is willing to sustain the attitude of their patron and their friend. They accept His protection, and enter into a seven years' league or covenant with Him, during which He is to protect them in their land, their city, and their worship. They then complete the temple and revive its ritual—the sacrifice and oblation—in the impious spirit foretold in Isaiah 28:14 and 66. With this predicted event is renewed the broken succession of the Seventy weeks; and now too, commence the last eventful seven years of this dispensation; the last septenary of Daniel's prophecy.

The Protector of the Persecuted

Thus will these Jews act in covenant with the Man of Sin; corrupted by his flatteries—Dan. 11: 32—deluded and defiant, for the first half of this last septenary; and then, "in the middle of the week," of the approaching tribulation. He breaks the covenant; turns against them; marches into their land; interdicts their worship: "causes the sacrifices and oblations to cease." And then commences his own "consummate impiety and transgression," when opposing and exalting himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped, "he seats himself in the very temple" they have reared, "showing himself that he is God," and demanding worship. That temple is at last made the central seat and shrine of impious "abominations." (Dan. 9: 27; 2 Thess. 11: 4; Rev. 13: 8, 12.)

They Hear the First Knell

The last words in the prophecy are brief. "And upon the wing of Abomination shall be the Desolator." (ver. 27.) Here, "the Desolator" is evidently this King—the Man of Sin—become the persecutor and oppressor. Next, the term "Abomination" as the common term in Hebrew for a false god or his idolatrous image, like Milcom or Chemish or Moloch. Here it may designate the Man of Sin, his image, his worship (Rev. 13: 14, 15), and again, "the wing" is apparently some pinnacle or summit of

The Profanad Temple.

To this the Lord's words of warning apply; "When ye therefore shall see the Abomination of Desolation spoken of by Daniel, the prophet, stand in the Holy Place..... then let them which be in Judea flee to the mountain," (Matthew 24: 15, 16.) There may be some mysterious descent on the temple's wing, so calculated and arranged as to present the Man of Sin to the assembled Jews as in the predicted advent of their Messiah: "And the Lord whom ye seek shall suddenly come to His temple; even the Messenger of the covenant whom ye delight in." (Mal. 3: 1.) However that be, this impious and defiant profanation will be permitted to go on till it reach "the consummation"; and the persecution of those of the Jews who refuse to receive his mark, will proceed, till "that which has been determined" in the Divine Decree is in its full measure "poured upon the desolate."

We have here, too, a new and startling fact in the manifestation of the Man of Sin:

His Death and Resurrection.

"And I saw one of his heads as having been slain to death; and his death-stroke was healed; and the whole earth, or land, wondered after the Beast." (Ver. 3.) That Head is still the seventh. After reigning for a time as king; after breaking the covenant with Israel; and it may be immediately before Satan's expulsion from the heavens; He had fallen assassinated or slain in battle. Men had seen Him stabbed by a sword. They had seen His body lie slain and dead. But now He lives, raised or risen from the dead; reanimate by the power of Satan, to occupy the Satanic throne, and consummate the "mystery of iniquity." The death wound is there, on His body; visible, tangible, as were the wounded hands and side of Jesus. "The whole world wondered" as they heard of the miracle or gazed on Him, captivated, entranced. All men begin to render.

Homage to the Dragon, in whose power this glorious Head of Empire has come (ver. 4), and they worship the Man of Sin, saying "Who is like Him" in knowledge, in magnificence, in spiritual power? This is He who has conquered death! This is He who is bringing life and immortality to men! Who is like to this glorious and deathless King? Who, in heaven or earth, "is able to make war with Him," the universal, invincible Lord. (Ver. 4.) And to Him "there was given a mouth (the lion's mouth), speaking great things," in the way of revelation and promise, for the advance of manhood to a diviner eminence; and "blaspheming the name of God and His tabernacle, and them that are in His tabernacle with Him" (ver. 6); that is the Lord, Christ, and those already with Him in that heavenly pavilion—the risen and raptured saints who, in the morn of His advent, had been taken up, and are now with their Lord. (Matt. 24: 39, 41; 1 Thess. 4: 17. Rev. 4: 2-8.) "And it was given him to make war on the saints, and to overcome them"; not in their faith and fidelity, for many of them, if not all, remain steadfast. But

The Great Tribulation is Come;

and the "unwise virgins," and those who have not been "ready" to rise and join the Lord will, almost equally with those of Judah, have now to pass, living or dying, through its persecution and its agony; for the mighty and merciless sway of this dread king is to extend "over every tribe, and people, and tongue, and nation." (ver. 7). This is given Him by Satan, and by Jehovah's fiat permitted; "and all who are dwelling on the earth shall worship him" as the present and incarnate deity; and be compelled to worship (ver. 15, 27); all except those "whose names are written in the Book of Life of the Lamb." (ver. 8). And so shall be completed the apostacy from God and His Christ.

Here, again, the duration of this period of oppression and blasphemy is determined. It is to last "forty and two months" (ver. 5); that is, 1,260 days. It begins in the middle of the last septenary—the last of the seventy weeks revealed to Daniel—when the Man of Sin breaks his covenant with the Jewish nation; and it terminates with the Epiphany of the Lord. (Rev. 19: 20.)

*From an article entitled "The Final Seven Years," in The Prophetic News for August; price six cents by mail. On sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York.

THE SLAYING OF THE WITNESSES.

By the Rev. Dr. John Snodgrass.

THE persecution of the Albigensis and Waldenses, and the cruel martyrdom of those two holy men, John Huss and Jerome, of Prague, was not the last persecution of the Church by Antichrist, which the prophecy of the Slaying of the Witnesses (Rev. 11: 3-10) plainly supposes it to have been. The same objection in Rev. 11: 3-13 holds against any subsequent period of the Church's sufferings that has yet occurred, whether at the Reformation, the Parisian massacre, the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, or any other.

As this prophecy, then, remains to be fulfilled in the future sufferings of the Church from the hand of Antichrist, it confirms the opinion of those men who have thought that his power and tyranny will then prevail; that the true church will suffer much from his implacable enmity, and religion be brought to a very low ebb. It must, indeed, be acknowledged that appearances, at present, are against this opinion. Popery's dominion seems greatly declined, and the progress of knowledge threatens speedy destruction. We learn from experience, however, that appearances are not to be built upon. Worldly power may forcibly obstruct the progress of knowledge, and unforeseen events revive the influence of the Romanists of Rome.

After many awful judgments poured out upon them, we shall still see them,

Under the Sixth Vial,

uniting with the dragon, and gathering together, by their influence, the kings of the earth, and of the whole world, to fight in his cause. This shows what great power Romanists shall have immediately before their total overthrow. About that time, then, probably we may look for the slaying of the Witnesses, as described in this prophecy; for we know it shall be a time of great difficulty and danger to the saints. Therefore our Lord saith, "Behold, I come as a thief: blessed is he that watcheth."

The third angel in Rev. 14: 9 will probably appear soon after the second angel who cries, "Babylon is fallen"; for then the judgments upon the Romish Antichrist will hasten on apace. But his voice will be chiefly heard from the time of the drying-up of the great river Euphrates till the battle of Armageddon. During that period, every possible artifice will be employed in the support of the last interests of tyranny and superstition; and the enmity and cruelty of Antichrist against the people of God will again break forth. This will be a trying time to Christians. Every seductive allurement, and every terrifying menace, shall be made use of, to gain their compliance with the iniquitous system, which at the same time shall be colored over with every sophistical recommendation. It was therefore necessary that an antidote should be provided against so great a danger. This is done by the voice of the third angel, who in the clear accomplishment of prophecy, and in the awful appearances of Providence against these enemies of God, will solemnly and loudly proclaim the guilt and danger of all who stand in connection with them.

An Invaluable Work on Prophecy by G. H. Pember, M. A, entitled "The Great Prophecies concerning the Jews the Gentiles, and the Church of God." is for sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York It is written in a most popular and eloquent style, and describes the impending fulfilment of Revelation and Daniel, and is illustrated by a colored chart. 458 pages. Price, including postage, $1.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

EVERY NUMBER CONTAINS:

The Portrait and Biography of some eminent person.
The Sermon Dr. Talmage preached the last Sunday morning.
An Exposition of Unfulfilled Prophecy.
A Summary of the Events of the Week, Notes of Religious and Temperance Movements, etc.
A Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, of London, from advance sheets sent by special arrangement.
Personal or Missionary Life, etc., and Descriptive Articles.
An instalment of a Serial Story.
An Exposition of the International Sunday-School Lesson, by Mrs. M. Baxter.

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION, $1.50.

New Subscriptions can commence at any time. When no date is mentioned, we begin it with the issue of the week in which the subscription is received.

Remittances by Mail should be by Post-office money order, bank cheque, draft, or express money order, whenever possible, and should always be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Letters containing money sent in this way need not be registered, as when lost, duplicates can always be obtained.

If a Postal Note or currency is sent, it should always be in a registered letter. Letters can be registered at any office. Subscribers sending money of this kind, and not registering, do it at their own risk.

Change of Address. Name of Post-office and State, of both old and new address, should always be given in case of removal, as without the previous address it is impossible to find the name on our list.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Rumored Rejection by China of the New treaty led to the prompt passage last week by Congress of a rigid exclusion bill. Official notice of the failure of the treaty had not been received, but Congress acted on its own responsibility. There are, it appears, some twelve thousand Chinamen now in China who are entitled to return to this country under the old treaty, as they hold certificates granted by our courts of their previous residence here. A suspicion is prevalent that those certificates are sold in China to men sufficiently resembling the original holders in personal appearance, to escape detection. The bill passed by Congress, therefore, prohibits the issue of any more certificates by the courts, and absolutely prohibits the landing of any more Chinamen, except such as have a family in this country, or property here of specified value. This is in effect to dishonor the certificates legally issued by our own courts, on the faith of which Chinamen visited their own country. If the bill should become law by the signature of the President, it will give the Chinese a very unfavorable idea of our national morality. Some measure for the detection of illegal transfer of certificates would have been legitimate, but to prohibit a Chinaman landing after guaranteeing him permission to do so is a dishonorable violation of our engagements.

The Restriction of Immigration Which is now advocated by both the political parties, is the object of a bill in course of preparation by Representative Oates, of Alabama, who acts under the request of the select Committee on Immigration. The bill, as at present drawn, has not yet been endorsed by the Committee, but Mr. Oates intimates that in the event of its rejection, he will offer it in the House as an individual expression of opinion. It provides that the entire inspection of immigrants shall be placed in the hands of the Treasury Department instead of, as now, partly in the hands of Federal and State authorities. This, he believes, will lead to more efficient and responsible supervision. A substantial head tax, which Mr. Oates thinks should be fifty dollars at least, should be exacted from the steamship companies to discourage the importation of paupers. Intending immigrants are to be required to inform American Consuls six months before leaving home, and on their arrival in this country will have to make affidavit that they have not been assisted by National or municipal authorities; that they are not under contract; have not been convicted of felony nor taken from poorhouses. Part of the head tax is to be set apart for hospitals and such buildings as may be required to shelter immigrants detained for examination. The bill will also prescribe a punishment for steamship companies who violate its provisions.

The Liquor Dealer's Convention which Assembled at Buffalo, N. Y., on September 4, made an emphatic protest against high license. The Convention declared: "That we are opposed to that attempt to regulate which seeks by high license to discriminate between the rich and the poor, or against one locality. We are willing to pay a reasonable license that yields such a revenue to the State as our industry can bear with justice to them engaged in it, but are opposed to the effort to grind such enormous sums from one branch of business as will drive responsible men from the trade and destroy our property." The ridiculous feature of the resolution is that high license does not drive responsible men out of the trade, but is expressly devised to exclude all but responsible men from it, though it does not succeed in doing that. The resolution was a surprise to people who believe that liquor dealers, as a rule, do not object to high license. It was probably passed in deference to the wish of large brewers who hold mortgages on small saloons, and who find that high license will render their traffic less profitable. Even they are not wise in their generation, or they would see that high license is a bulwark between them and prohibition.

The Reports from Jacksonville, Fla., Grew more gloomy last week. The worst record was that of Friday, when the number of new cases reached seventy. On Wednesday it was decided by the Association to issue an appeal for help. The committee accordingly sent out a statement that the epidemic had reached a stage at which the funds were insufficient to meet the demand, and as business was entirely suspended, outside help was necessary. Mr. James M. Schumacher, the President of the First National Bank, was appointed treasurer for the fund, and authorized to receive subscriptions. A census of the city has been taken, showing that there are now 13,757 persons still there. Of these, the number without means is 8,995. The project of temporarily depopulating the city has not yet been executed, though the citizens are especially anxious to have the women and children sent away. The Surgeon-General, however, remains firm in prohibiting the exodus, fearing the infection of other localities. A refugee camp in now being constructed on land purchased for the purpose on the Florida Railway line, seven miles away, as Camp Perry is almost useless owing to the damp character of the land. The accommodation and management of the camp are also defective. All reports speak in the highest terms of the heroism of the physicians and clergymen, who are doing their duty nobly. Dr. W. L. Baldwin, one of the most prominent of the physicians, has fallen a victim to the fever, and his death is deeply regretted. It is remarked by attentive observers, that while the disease attacks all races and all classes, those who are the least likely to recover from it are those addicted to strong drink.

A Destructive Hurricane Passed over the island of Cuba on September 4, doing much damage to property and causing the loss of many lives. In Sagua alone fifty persons perished. The loss of life in Havana was not so severe, but the pecuniary loss is overwhelming. A telegram from that city says: "Ruin and destruction mark the path of the storm throughout the city; not a street but bears evidence of the force of the hurricane. All the principal cafés, places of amusement, and public buildings were more or less damaged. In all the parks and boulevards extending from La Punta to Calzada del Monte, and also in the plazas del Cristo, Armas, Tacon, and Infanta, immense trees were uprooted, in some instances their huge trunks being carried several blocks by the force of the wind. Signs, shutters, and débris of every description were piled in the streets, blocking traffic. To add to the horror of the scene nearly all the street lamps were destroyed, leaving the city in total darkness throughout the night." The northern streets were all inundated. The chief loss of life occurred in the harbor, which, though landlocked, was beaten by huge waves. Some of the shipping was sunk, and some beaten to pieces against the wharves. The telegraph wires are down, so that reports from other districts had not been received in Havana, but it is feared that the devastation is general throughout the island.

Extracts from the Private Journals of the late Emperor William, of Germany, were published last week by order of his grandson, the present Emperor. The documents show a meek, humble, religious spirit, in sharp contrast with the undignified swagger of the young Kaiser. In one of them, written in 1878, after his recovery from the wounds inflicted by the assassin, Nobiling, the aged monarch wrote: "I must submit to the will of God, who permits all this to happen. At the same time let His grace and mercy predominate, for not only did He spare my life, but healed me in such a way that I could once more fulfil the duties of my post. Specially I offer my warmest thanks to my consort for the love and sympathy she gave me, notwithstanding her own sufferings; then to my daughter, who tended me with filial affection, and to all the members of my family. And whence comes this sympathy? Whence but from the Almighty, who willed it that I should be so circumstanced in this world that His grace, which watched over me, should settle upon all around me. Men have been willing to overlook my weaknesses and mistakes, but may He, who knows them, be to me afterward a merciful Judge in cases where I have not respected the doctrines and precepts of the only begotten Son of our heavenly Father. Lord, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven."

The Warlike Disposition of the German Emperor was displayed last week in a thorough review of several army corps. The Emperor had two sham-fights conducted in one day for his delectation. His energy and the profound interest he manifested in the manœuvres recalled the traditions of his favorite model, his predecessor, Frederick the Great. One of the sham-fights took place at a village ten miles west of the city of Posen. In this, two regiments of foot and one of hussars had to defend the village against an enemy of equal strength advancing from the south. The latter, after cleverly turning their right flank, compelled the defenders to retreat. Other reviews and sham-fights are ordered for this week. A notable feature of them will be the first introduction of the telephone to connect the outposts with headquarters. The telephone to be used consists of a wooden box containing dry clements the composition of which is a secret. It is fastened by a broad belt to a soldier, who carries it wherever it is wanted.

The Mysterious White Pasha who is Reported to be at the head of a large native army in the Soudan is not yet identified. All kinds of conjectures are hazarded about him. Some assert that it is Stanley, others believe that Emin Pasha has made his escape from Wadelai, and others, again, believe that the White Pasha is General Gordon, whose death in Khartoum they think may have been falsely reported. The mystery deepens as the improbabilities of either of the three leading a force against the Mahdi are considered. It appears certain, however, that the White Pasha, whoever he may be, is an able general, and has a powerful force under his command. A despatch from Suakim, dated August 31, states that the Mahdi has sent out three expeditions to annihilate his approaching foe, and that each one has been repulsed.

Canvassers Wanted to Sell, from House to House, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Any man, woman or youth may easily add to their income every week by selling the paper in their spare hours in their own neighborhood. For terms address Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

A Horrible Parody on a Christian Instituion is reported from Chicago. The correspondent in that city of the New York Herald, states that the anarchists and socialists have established Sunday-schools for the propagation of their doctrines, and for instruction in socialistic warfare. He says that those in charge of the classes where instruction is given, are careful as to who are admitted, and an outsider will find it an impossibility to gain an entrance. These schools have not been organized more than a month, but the attandence upon them is already large, and constantly upon the increase. It is estimated by Grottkau and others interested that 25,000 people will soon be enrolled in these schools, including children. Of those now attendants many are children not more than ten years of age.

Doubtful Amusements Have Long Been Recgnized as a prominent cause of the alienation of young people from the churches. Pastors who are concerned about the growth of the evil will be glad to learn that a remedy which has been extensively tried has proved remarkably successful. General testimony from pastors in all our States, who have organized Christian Endeavor Societies in connection with their churches, is to the effect that the Societies have given the young people so much earnest aggressive work to do for Christ, that not only has their leisure time been occupied, but they have conceived a distaste for worldly amusements. "The result of their labors," says one pastor, "have been no less a blessing to the church than their own increased spirituality.

A Baroness was Married to a New York clergyman in Hanover on September 3. The cable brings the news that a wedding was solemnized between the Rev. G. F. W. Busse, pastor of St. Luke's Lutheran Church, in Forty-second Street, New York, and Baroness Agnes Harlessem, daughter of Counsellor Rudolf Harlessem. Justice Harlessem's family is one of the oldest in Hanover, and can be traced back to the ninth century. Mr. Busse has been pastor of St. Luke's church for fourteen years. About three months ago he went abroad for recreation, expecting to return in October. At the time of his departure, it is said, he had no idea of being married, though the Harlessem family have long been among his friends. The Baroness is twenty-one years old, and is said to be both beautiful and charming. Mr. Busse is expected to arrive with his bride from Antwerp on September 18. Among European aristocrats it is possible that the Baroness will be regarded as having married beneath her rank. The time is coming, however, when the world's ideas of nobility will undergo a radical change. Those whom God has made kings will be known as such. (Rev. 5 : 10.)

A Remarkable Family Reunion Took Place in Minnesota on September 2. Twenty-seven years ago a young man was living with his parents in Missouri. He married shortly before the war broke out, but being an eager politician, he left his home and entered the Union army. His parents became unpopular in the locality on account of their northern principles, and they found it advisable to leave suddenly. They wandered about for some time, but finally settled on a lonely farm some ten miles from Stonville, Minn. The soldier's wife stayed behind, in Missouri, but she died about six months afterward, in giving birth to a daughter. In some way a false report came that the soldier had been killed. The babe was adopted by a family who moved West, and when the soldier returned from the war, he could find no trace of his parents or his child. He had no funds for making an extended personal search, but after obtaining employment in Philadelphia, he sent letters of inquiry to all the old friends of the family. They were widely scattered, and most of his letters went to the dead-letter office. He gave up the search until a month ago, when he heard that the daughter, whom he had never seen, was married, and living in a Wisconsin town. He immediately set out to visit her; and, by an extraordinary coincidence, in passing through Minneapolis, discovered the whereabouts of his parents. The joy of the parents on seeing their son and granddaughter after twenty-seven years may be imagined. An analogous coincidence occurs with every man at his conversion. He not only finds God to be his loving Father, but he realizes that he has many brethren. (1 John 3 : 14)

The Subsidence of the Earth in a District of Pennsylvania has caused a serious loss to some families living there. A despatch from Wilkesbarre states that a big cave-in occurred over the abandoned workings of the old Waddel mine at Pittston on August 29. The surface, which covers an area of five acres, went down about two feet. It was covered with gardens, which disappeared entirely from view. That morning the owners were congratulating themselves on their good crops. Now all their labor is lost. Several houses were nearly wrecked, and the new Lehigh Valley Railroad bridge was damaged. In some places the gaps in the earth's surface are large enough to admit a man's body. That is the fate of much of human labor. Those who toil for an earthly reward are often disappointed. If it does not pass out of their hands, they have to leave it when death summons them. Happily, Christ has told us of labor the reward of which is sure and everlasting. (Luke 12 : 33.)

A Dog's Curious Vocation is Described in a Boston journal. It states that in a family, well known to the editor, is a small boy, not more than five years old, who has an inveterate habit of straying away. He is a sturdy, stout-legged little fellow of great courage and enterprise, but his father and mother have been put to a good deal of anxiety on his account. Sometimes he is found by the railroad, and again in a certain pasture where he enjoys the congenial society of several young colts, but it is always a matter of doubt where he will be discovered. Recently, however, the family have acquired a sagacious dog, recommended for the purpose, who hunts up Sammy with unerring accuracy. Whenever Sammy is missing, his mother shows his jacket to the dog and tells him to find the boy, whereupon the animal sets off with his nose to the ground, the hired man or somebody else follows, and in due time the young vagabond is brought to bay. In God's family upon earth are many afflicted with a similar habit of straying away. It is a matter for joy and thankfulness that very often hounds of trial and affliction follow them and drive them back to God repentant. (Ps. 119 : 67.)

A New Ship was Sold for Ten Dollars by the Government recently. Before the close of the war the construction of a large wooden frigate was commenced. She was built of well-seasoned oak, and over a quarter of a million dollars were spent upon her. The preparations for launching her were completed, even to the finishing of her boilers and engines, which were all ready to be shipped and set up in the vessel. When launched she was to be called the New York, and her tonnage would be slightly larger than the Chicago. When the era of steel vessels set in, work was suspended on the frigate, and she has remained unfinished on the stocks in the navy-yard for nearly a quarter of a century. A large sum would still be required to finish her, and then she would be comparatively worthless against a hostile power with steel cruisers. It was therefore decided by the Navy Department to spend no more money on her, and to break her up. It was found, however, that the wood was so hard, and her timbers so securely bolted together, that it would be a work of difficulty. Finally she was offered for sale to contractors who would break her up. The price asked by the Government was more than any contractor would pay, and it was lowered until the ship has finally been sold for ten dollars. He would have been a bold man who would have predicted twenty-five years ago that the magnificent ship, which had cost a quarter of a million, so well proportioned and so strongly made, would be sold for ten dollars before ever she touched water. So it has been, however, and we are told in the Bible that much human work, now highly valued, will one day shrink to even less value when it is tried by the supreme test that God will apply. (1 Cor. 3: 13-15.)

An Inebriate's Gratitude has been Signally displayed by a western immigrant. Six years ago temperance meetings were being held at Erie, Penn. Among the men who came forward to sign the pledge was one who had much difficulty in staggering across the platform and writing his name. The man had once been prosperous, but he had got through all his property, had been cast out by his family, and was clothed in filthy rags. Still, there was one man who believed in him, and that man not only encouraged him to sign the pledge, and inspired him with the belief that he could keep it, but lent him two hundred dollars to go West. Fortune favored the immigrant, who was a man of good business capacity. He began to prosper, soon repaid the loan, and went on accumulating a fortune. Two weeks ago he died in Kansas City, Mo., leaving in city lots, western lands, and railroad stocks in Albuquerque, New Mexico, about $150,000 worth of property. By his will, recorded on August 29, the bulk of this sum, after the payment of a few small legacies, is left to the man who stood by him in his degradation, and helped him to recover himself. The Church of Christ would not now have to restrict her missionary and other evangelistic enterprises for lack of funds if all who, through her instrumentality, have been rescued were similarly mindful of their obligations. (Phil. 19.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Sunday marriages are null and void in Pennsylvania.

Two boys, one six, the other seven years old, were recently taken to the Receiving Hospital, San Francisco, drunk and incapable.

Bishop Taylor, of Africa, recently raised $5,000 for mission work after preaching a sermon one hour and fifty-five minutes long at Ocean Grove.

Rev. J. C. Lamphier, who has conducted the Fulton Street Daily Prayer-Meeting for more than a quarter of a century, entered upon his eightieth year on September 3.

John Currie, the self-educated evangelist, after a series of meetings at Leadville went to Cheyenne, where the meetings were well attended, and good results followed.

The seventy-ninth annual meeting of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions will be held in Cleveland, Ohio, beginning on October 2, 1888.

A new church at Talus, in South Africa, has adopted the regulation: "No member of this church shall drink the white man's grog nor native beer, nor touch it with his lips."

An effort is being made by the Rev. Constantine Stauder to build a Home for the "Italian Young Men's Christian Association," and for the "Italian Young Women's Christian Association," of New York.

The Central Union Mission of Washington, D. C., is doing valuable and successful work in reaching the dissipated, the vicious, and criminal classes of the city. They are holding forty meetings a week.

George W. Cable, in a recent address, emphasized in strong words mission work among the colored people of the South. He said, "Right here at our doors is the greediest people of education and the gospel there is on the face of the earth."

The death of Mrs. Harriet Beecher-Stowe, author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," was hourly expected through last week. She was attacked two weeks ago by congestion of the brain, and did not recover consciousness. She was seventy-six years of age last June.

It is proposed to hold a world's Sunday-school convention in London next June. If this convention is held it will be made up of delegates from all parts of the world, and a ship will be chartered which will take three hundred delegates to London from this country alone.

The Presbyterian General Assembly enjoined the presbyteries to "take such steps as to them appear wisest, to discourage and put a stop to such riding on Sunday trains and steamboats by church members, and by ministers of the gospel in going and returning from appointments, as cannot be justified on the grounds of necessity or mercy."

The pastors of six churches in California, five of whom are resident in San Francisco, have recently each received a letter in which was enclosed from an unknown donor a check for $5,000, amounting to $30,000 in all, to be used according to the custodians' judgment for the benefit of the church. The benefactor is a resident of San Francisco, is sick, and wished to disposed of his fortune before his death.

SOWN AMONG THORNS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And some fell among thorns; and the thorns sprung up, and choked them." Matt. 13 : 7.

"He also that received seed among the thorns is he that heareth the word; and the care of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, choke the word, and he becometh unfruitful." Matt. 13 : 22.

Preaching Wasted without Conversions—The Difference in the Ground—I. The Seed—The Same in each Case—Received with Pleasure—Accepted—The Seed Living and Growing—II. The Thorns—Natural to the Soil—Established in It—Rob the Seed of Nutriment—Four Specified Thorns—A Preacher Neglecting his Duties to Catch Butterflies—III. The Result—The Seed Choked—A Pie-vender's Answer—Badly Washed Christians—A Showman's Indifference—The Use of the Thorns.

WHEN that which comes of his sowing is unfruitful, the sower's work is wasted: he has spent his strength for nought. Without fruit the sower's work would even seem to be insane; for he takes good wheat, throws it away, and loses it in the ground. Preaching is the idlest of occupations if the word be not adapted to enter the heart and produce good results. O my hearers, if you are not converted, I waste time and energy in standing here! Men might well think it madness that one whole day in the week should be given up to hearing speeches: madness, indeed, it would be if nothing came of it to conscience and heart. If you do not bring forth fruit unto holiness, and the end is not everlasting life, I should be better employed in breaking stones on the roadside than in preaching to you.

Fruit-bearing Made the Difference

appear in the various soils upon which the sower scattered seed. You would not so certainly have known the quality if you had not seen the failure or success of the seed. We do not know your hearts till we see your bearing toward the gospel. If it produces in you holiness and love to God and man, then we know that there is good soil in you: but if you are merely promising people, but not performing people, then we know that the ground of your heart is hard, or stony, or thorny. The word of the Lord tries the heart and reins of the children of men, and in this it is as the fire which distinguishes between metal and dross. O my dear hearers, you undergo a test to-day! Peradventure you will be judging the preacher, but a greater than the preacher will be judging you. For the Word itself shall judge you.

What fruit have you borne hitherto from all your hearing? May I venture to put the question to each one of you very pointedly? Some of you have been hearers from your childhood—are you any the better? What long lists of sermons you must have heard by now! Count over your Sundays; how many they have been! Think of the good men now in heaven, to whom you once listened! Remember the tears that were drawn from you by their discourses! If you are not saved yet, will you ever be saved? At this time I will only deal with one class of you. I will not speak to those of you who hear the Word, and retain none of it because of the hardness of your hearts; such are the wayside hearers. Neither will I address myself to those who receive the truth with sudden enthusiasm, and as readily quit it when trial befalls them; such are the rocky-ground hearers. But I will deal with those of you who hear the Word attentively, and, in a sense, receive it into your hearts and understandings, so that the seed grows, though fruit never comes to perfection.

I. First, a little about

The Seed.

Remember, first, that it was the same seed in every case. Yonder it has brought forth thirty-fold; it was the same seed which was lost upon you. In a still better case, the seed has brought forth a hundred-fold; it was precisely the same corn with which your field has been sown. The sower went to his master's granary for all his seed; how is it that in your case it is all lost? They heard no more than you have heard, but how much better they treated it than you have done! I want you to consider this. How covered with briars and thorns must your mind be that the gospel which converted your sister or friend never touched you! Though you may be nominally a believer in the Word of God, it has never so affected you as to make you gracious and holy. You are still a hearer only. How is this? The fault is not in the seed, for it is the same which has been so useful to others.

Those described in my text were not only hearers, but in a measure they accepted the good Word. The seed fell not only on this ground, but into it, so that

It Began to Grow.

Of you it is true that you do not refuse the gospel, or raise disputes concerning it. I am glad that you have no difficulties about the inspiration of Scripture, or the Deity of our Lord, or the fact of His atonement. You do not befog yourself with "modern thought," but you avow your belief in the old, old gospel. So far, so good; but what shall I make of the strange fact that your acceptance of the truth has no effect upon you? It is a very lamentable case, is it not, that a man should believe the gospel to be true, and yet should live as if it were a lie? If it be the truth, why do you not yield obedience to it?

The seed sown among thorns lived and continued to grow. And in many men's minds the gospel of divine truth is growing after a fashion: they understand it better, can defend it more valorously, and speak of it more fluently. Moreover, it does influence them in some form and degree, for gross vices are forsaken. They are decent imitations of believers: you can see the shape of an ear: the stalk has struggled up through the thorns until you can see its head, and are led to expect corn. But go to that apparent wheat-ear, and feel it: there are the sheaths, but there is nothing in them; you have all the makings of an ear of wheat, but it will Yield no Grain.

I would speak to those before me who, perhaps, have been baptized, and are members of the church; I want to ask of them a question or two. Do you not think that there is a great deal of empty profession nowadays? Do you not think that many have a name to live and are dead? "Yes," say you, "I know a neighbor whom I judge to be in that condition." May not another neighbor judge the same of you? Would it not be well to raise the question about yourself? Have you really believed in the Lord Jesus? Are you truly converted from sin and self? Turn that sharp eye of yours homeward for a while. Examine your own actions, and judge your condition by them. A thorough examination will do the healthy no harm, and it may bless the sick. "Lord, let me know the worst of my case!" is one of my frequent prayers.

II. But now I would speak a little about

The Thorns.

They are by Matthew described as "the care of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches." Luke adds, "and pleasures of this life"; and Mark still further mentions, "the lusts of other things." I suppose that the sower did not see any thorns when he threw the handful of corn: they had all been cut down level with the surface. He probably hoped that it was all good ground, and therefore he sowed it, little suspecting that the thorns were in possession.

Note well that thorns are natural to the soil. Evil things are easy things: for they are natural to our fallen nature. Right things are rare flowers that need cultivation. If any of you are being injured by the cares of the world and the deceitfulness of riches, I am not astonished; it is natural that it should be so. Therefore, be on your guard against these mischiefs. I pray you say to yourself, "Come, there is something in this man's talk. He is very slow and dull, but still there is something in what he says. I may, after all, be tolerating those thorns in my heart which will kill the good seed, for I am of like passions and infirmities with other men." I beseech you look to yourselves, that you be not deceived at the last.

The thorns were already established in the soil. They were not only the natural inhabitants of the soil, but in it. Our sins within us claim the freehold of our faculties, and they will not give it up if they can help it. They will not give way to the Holy Spirit, or to the new life, or to the influences of divine grace, without a desperate struggle. The roots of sin run through and through our nature, grasp it with wonderful force, and keep up their grasp with marvellous tenacity. Sin has encrasped our nature as a boa-constrictor encircles its victim; and when it has maintained its hold for twenty, forty, or sixty years, I hope you are not so foolish as to think that holy things will easily get the mastery. Our evil nature is radically conservative, and it will endeavor to crush out every attempt at a revolution by which the grace of God should reign through righteousness. Wherefore, watch and pray, lest temptation choke that which is good in you. Watch earnestly, for grace is a tender plant in a foreign soil, in an uncongenial clime; while sin is in its own element, and is strongly rooted in the soil.

They were Rooted and Fixed

The thorns sucked away all the nutriment from the wheat, and it was starved; for there is only a certain quantity of nourishment in the soil, and if the thorns have it, the wheat must go without it. There is only a certain amount of thought and energy in a man; and if the world gets it, Christ cannot have it. If our thoughts run upon care and pleasure, they cannot be eager about true religion; is not that clear? That is the way in which those thorns preserved the wheat; by devouring its food, and they choked it by keeping off the air and sun; and the poor thing became shrivelled and weak, and quite unable to produce the grain which the sower expected from it. So it is with many professing Christians. They are at first worldly, but not so very worldly. They are fairly religious, though by no means too zealous. They seek the pleasures of the world, but by no means quite so much as others we could name. But very soon the thorns grow, and it becomes doubtful which will win, sin or grace, the world or Christ. Two masters there cannot be; and in this case it is specially impossible, since neither of the contending powers will brook a rival. Sin has sprung from a royal though evil stock, and if it be in the heart it will struggle for the throne. So it came to pass that the tares, being tolerated, choked the good seed.

They Starved it

Let me describe these thorns a little. Putting together Matthew, Mark, and Luke we find that there were Four Sorts of Thorns.

The first is called "The care of this world." This assuredly comes to the poor; they are apt to grow anxious and mistrustful about temporal things. "What shall we eat? What shall we drink? Wherewithal shall we be clothed?" This trinity of doleful questions much afflicts many. But anxiety comes to rich people also. Care dwells with wealth as well as with poverty. "How shall I get more? How shall I lay it up? How shall I still increase it?"—and so on.

There were others who felt "the deceitfulness of riches." Our Lord does not say "riches," but "the deceitfulness of riches." The two things grow together: riches are evermore deceitful. They deceive people in the getting of them, for they judge matters very unfairly when a prospect of gain is before them. The jingle of the charming guinea, or of "the almighty dollar," makes a world of difference to the mind when it is hearing a case. Men cannot afford to lose by integrity, and so they take the doubtful way, and either sail near the wind, or speculate till it amounts to gambling. They would not endure the idea of such conduct, were it not that the hope of gain deceives them. One line of conduct ought never to be ruled by gain or loss. Do right, if the heavens fall. Do no wrong, even though a kingdom should be the reward.

Riches are very deceitful when they are ined, for they breed in men many vices which ey do not themselves suspect. One man is rse-proud, but he thinks he is humble. ere is apt to grow up in the mind an idolatry this world and its treasures. "I don't love oney," says one. "You know it is not oney that is the root of all evil, but the love it." Just so; but are you sure that you do t love it? Your thoughts run a good deal er it. You hug it rather closely, and you d it hard to part with it. I will not cuse you; but I would have you awake to the t that riches worm themselves into a man's art before he is well aware of it.

Luke tells us of

Another Kind of Weed,

mely, "the pleasures of this life." I am sure ese thorns play a dreadful part nowadays. I ve nothing to say against recreation in its oper place. Certain forms of recreation are edful and useful; but it is a wretched thing ien amusement becomes a vocation. Amuse- nt should be used to do us good, "like a edicine"; it must never be used as the food the man. From early morning till late at ght some spend their time in a round of fri- lities, or else their very work is simply carried to furnish them funds for their pleasures. his is vicious. Many have had all holy thoughts d gracious resolutions stamped out by per- tual trifling.

Mark adds, "and the lusts of other things." vill not enumerate all those other things; but things except the things of Christ and of the ther are "other things." One person is emi- ntly scientific, and he will do well if his sci- ce is used for holy purposes; but it can be ed to choke the seed. I met with a clergy- n many years ago who was going a long dis- ce to find a new beetle. He was

A Great Entomologist,

d I did not blame him for his study of it, to a thoughtful man entomology may yield iny profitable lessons. But if he neglected his eaching to catch insects, then I do not wonder at a parishioner should wish that the beetles ould nibble his old sermons, for they were very ale. The seed is choked in our souls whenever rist is not our all in all. You see my drift: it what it may—gain, glory, study, pleasure all these may be briers that choke the seed. My dear friend, Dr. Taylor, of New York, eaks of some Christians nowadays as having a utterfly Christianity." When time and rength and thought and talent are all spent on mere amusement, what else are men and omen but mere butterflies? "Society" is just mass of idle people, keeping each other in untenance. Oh, dear hearers, surely we did come into this world to play away our days! lo not think we came into this world either slave ourselves to death, or to rust away in iness. We have come here as a man enters to the porch, that he may afterwards enter the use. This life is the doorway to the palace heaven. Pass through it in such style that u may enter before the King with holy joy. you give your minds and thoughts to these ssing things, be they what they may, you ll ruin your souls, for the seed cannot grow.

III. So I close in the last place by noticing ne seed was unfruitful. These briers and thorns uld not pull the seed up, or throw it away: it mained where it was; but they choked it. So may be that your business, your cares, your easures, have not torn up your religion by the ots—it is there still, such as it is. But these ings suffocate your better feelings. What an nount of choked religion we have around us! may be alive: I do not know whether it is or t; but it looks very black in the face. God ve you from having your religion choked!

The Result.

I have already told you it was drained of all sustenance. Look at many Christians; I ll them Christians, for they call themselves . A boy in the streets, selling mince-pies, pt crying, "Hot mince-pies!" A person bought one of them, and found it quite cold. "Boy," said he, "why did you call these pies hot?" "That's the name they go by, sir," said the boy. So there are plenty of people that are called Christians, but they are not Christians—that's the name they go by; but all the substance is drained out of them by other matters. You see the shape of a Christian, the make of a Christian, and some of the talk of a Christian, but the fruit of a Christian is not there. That is the result of the choking by the thorns of care, riches, pleasure, and Worldliness in General.

What life there was in the wheat was very sickly. Let me remind certain persons that their spiritual life is growing weak at this time. Morning prayer this morning, how long did it take? Do not grow red in the face. I will say no more about it. You are not coming out to-night, are you? Half a Sunday is enough worship for you. Would you not like to live in some country place, where you did not need to go to a place of worship even once? Such people never seem to bathe in their religion, but they give themselves a wetting with the end of the towel; thus they try to look decent, but they are not inwardly cleansed.

When it comes to defending the gospel, where do you see it in this age? I hoped that many would be found among Baptists who would care for the truth; but now I come to the conclusion that it is with many as with when asked which was Wellington and which was Buonaparte: "Whichever you please, my little dears. Pay your money, and take your choice!" Free will or free grace, human merit or Christ's atonement, it does not matter now. New theology or old theology, human speculation or divine revelation—who minds? What do they care whether God's truth stands or the devil's lies? I am weary of these drivellers! The thorns have choked the seed in the pulpits and in the churches, as well as in individuals.

The Showman,

Thank God we have some brethren here whose prayers could unlock the windows of heaven or shut them up! but it is not so with many. Go to the prayer-meetings of most of the churches. What poor things! Of course I find in country places that many drop the prayer-meeting during hay-time and harvest. In London they do not drop in summer, because they are too small to need dropping; they take up the fragment of a prayer-meeting and mend with it the worn-out lecture, so that it becomes neither lecture nor prayer-meeting. How can we expect a blessing when we are too lazy to ask for it? Is it not evidence of a dying religion when, to cover their carelessness about meeting for prayer, we even hear ministers doubting the value of prayer-meetings, and calling them "religious expedients"?

The Prayer-Meetings

I would put it to you, my dear hearer, Have you been fruitful? Have you been fruitful with your wealth? Have you been fruitful with your talent? Have you been fruitful with your time? What are you doing for Jesus now? Salvation is not by doings, you are saved by grace; but if you are so saved, prove it by your devoted lives. Consecrate yourself anew this day wholly to your Master's service. You are not your own, but bought with a price; and if you would not be like these thorn-choked seeds, live while you live, with all-consuming zeal. Still, there is

A Use for Thorns.

What is that use? First, if you have thorns about you to-day, make a child's use of them. What does a child do? If he gets a thorn in his finger, he looks at it and cries. How it smarts! Then he runs off to his mother. That is one of the sweet uses of his adversity—it admits him to his mother at once. She might say, "What are you coming in for? Run about the garden." But he cries, "Please, mother, I've got a thorn in my finger." This is quite enough argument to secure him the best attention of the queen of the house. See how tenderly she takes out the little dagger! Let your cares drive you to God. I shall not mind if you have many of them, if each one leads to you to prayer.

May we meet in heaven! Oh, may we all meet in heaven! What a congregation I have addressed this morning! I feel overawed as I look at you. From the ends of the earth have many of you come. The Lord bless you! Strangers are here in vast numbers, for the most of our regular hearers are at the seaside. I may never see you again on earth. May we all meet in heaven, where thorns will never grow! May we be gathered by the angels in that day when the Lord shall say, "Gather the wheat into my barn!" Amen. So let it be.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

THE HUGUENOT MASSACRE AT TOULOUSE.*

JEAN ESTIENNE DURANTI, the first President of the Parliament at Toulouse, warmly advocated the persecution of the Huguenots, and took an active part in extending the massacre that began on St. Bartholomew's Day [August 24, 1572] to the city of Toulouse. Soon after the tidings came of the murderous work done at the capital, the unfortunate Protestants at Toulouse were thrown into the various convents and jails of the city. A few weeks later they were transferred to the Conciergerie, or prison, attached to the Parliament House. Some days passed, and the command was brought by Delpeuch and Madron, special messengers from Paris, that if the massacre had not yet been consummated, it should be at once put into execution.

The judges of Parliament were convened to deliberate with the "Capitouls" of the city respecting the course which was to be pursued. The majority of the members present drew back in horror from the proposal to perpetrate so foul a crime as that to which they were invited. Some were outspoken in favor of clemency. Others, more timid, shrugged their shoulders and kept their eyes upon the ground. But Duranti knew no compunction. Rising, he exclaimed to his more tolerant colleagues: "You will do what you please, and say what may seem good to you. As for myself, I am going to execute, in the King's name, what my charge and my duty require of me." Abruptly leaving the company, he at once issued the necessary orders.

How well he was obeyed appeared on the morrow, when two unworthy scholars of the University, with a following of seven or eight wretches of the like sanguinary type, forced their way into the Conciergerie, armed with cutlasses and axes. Summoned one by one into their presence, the prisoners were successively butchered at the foot of the stairs, to the number of three hundred or more. Surely Duranti was a follower of Holy Mother Church, whose exploits might well earn for him immunity from suspicion of disloyalty.

Henry's Answer to a Proselyter.

The Duke of Epernon, one of the principal minions of King Henry of Valois, took occasion to visit the court of King Henry of Navarre with the intention of inducing him to abjure Protestantism, and separate himself from the Huguenots. But the Duke's arguments availed nothing. The king had not yet forgotten his mother's instructions, and could not at present be persuaded to barter his convictions against temporal advantages. It was so that, a year before, he had met the solicitations of his cousin, the young Archbishop of Rouen, when that stripling—the prelate was not yet twenty-one years of age—requested him to change his religion in order to win favor with the nobles. "Tell those who make such proposals, my cousin," said he, "that religion—should they chance to know what religion is—is not stripped off like a shirt; for it has its home in the heart, and, thank God, is so deeply impressed upon

* From "The Huguenots and Henry of Navarre." By Henry M. Baird, Professor of History in the University of the City of New York. Two volumes. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, 743 Broadway, New York.

Rev. Thomas Champness.

John Barton's New Work.

mine that it is as little in my power to rid myself of it as it was at the beginning to enter upon it, this grace being of God alone, and coming from no other source. Believe me, cousin, the course of your life will teach you that the only true plan is to commit one's self to God, who guides all things, and who never punishes anything more severely than He does the abuse of the name of religion."

REV. THOMAS CHAMPNESS.

(See Portrait.)

A REMARKABLE work has been done in neglected districts in England by the earnest preacher and laborer whose portrait appears on this page. He has collected a band of young men, who devote themselves to open-air preaching, receiving no payment therefor but board and clothing. They now number twenty, but Mr. Champness hopes soon to have a hundred of them engaged in this self-denying labor for Christ. His own method, which is adopted by his young men, is to go out alone into the rural districts, to fairs or agricultural gatherings, or into the lowest streets in towns. He carries with him a few large pictures of Bible scenes, and a dark-lantern with which he illuminates the pictures at night. The exhibition of the pictures soon attracts a crowd, and then Mr. Champness begins to explain them, ending with an earnest exhortation, a hymn, and a prayer. It is astonishing how many souls have been won for Christ by these services, which have been held now for nine years past.

Mr. Champness has two brothers, both of whom are successful Methodist preachers. They are the sons of a workingman, who was induced by the keeper of a boarding-house to attend the services conducted by Dr. Osborne when, in his young days, he was first stirring the people by his marvellous eloquence. The man was converted, and now his three sons are preaching the gospel. Thomas was, in his youth, strongly drawn to foreign mission work. He offered himself to the Missionary Society, was accepted and sent out to western Africa. There he labored for six years, until his health was utterly broken down by that fatal climate, and further service there became impossible for him. One after another of his fellow-laborers there succumbed, and Champness sorrowfully buried them all. He continued the work alone until he too was stricken with the fever. He lay for some time so near the brink of the grave that he heard his attendants say, "He is gone!" He had just strength enough to murmur, "Not yet; I cannot leave the work. I must get better." He recovered, but could do no more work there. He returned home, and, after a short period of pastoral labor, commenced the enterprise above described.

JOHN BARTON'S BIBLE READING.

(See Illustration on this Page.)

"WHERE'S Lucy?" asked Mr. Dale, a prosperous farmer, as he came in hot and tired from the harvest-field and met his wife on the threshold of his home.

"She went out half an hour ago," said Mrs. Dale; "did you not meet her? I thought she went to look for you."

"Guess she went to look for John Barton," said the farmer.

"Well, I suppose you do not mind that," was the reply. "John is a steady fellow, and a sensible. Good family too, I guess. If he buys a farm near us, I should like that of all things. I cannot bear the thought of Lucy marrying and going a long way off."

"No, no, Lucy might do worse. It is astonishing how quick he is picking up farming ways, for a young fellow who was never on a farm till he came here. And that was a smart idea of his to come and work for a year or two on a farm before he bought land for himself. He's got a pretty good sum of his own too. No, I presume Lucy could not do better. Think there's anything in it?"

"Oh, I guess so. Lucy has not said anything, but she's brightened up wonderfully since Barton came. More like her old self. I haven't seen her so smiling and cheerful since—"

Mrs. Dale stopped sharply. She was entering on forbidden ground. Her husband knew what she was about to say, and his frown would have been translated into words if she finished her sentence. The fact was that there was a skeleton in the Dale household. The farmer's only son, Robert, was a scape-grace. He early showed a disinclination for farm life, and persuaded his father to get him employment in a city bank. There, in a moment of temptation, he borrowed some of the bank's funds, intending to replace them, but was detected before he could do so. The farmer was convinced of his guilt; he reimbursed the bank, but he cast his son off, and refused to ever see him again. Three years afterward, Robert, miserable, penniless, and repentant, came home and begged for fo giveness, but Mr. Dale, whose pride in his u stained name had been cruelly abased, dro him ignominiously from his doors, and when h wife and daughter pleaded for the boy, he ster ly forbade them ever mentioning his nar again. Since that time, Lucy, who tende loved her brother, had been sorrowful a gloomy, and had gone about the old farm wi a tearful face until the recent arrival of Jo Barton, the embryo farmer, whose cheerful fa and ways made her smile again.

Mr. Dale was right in his conjecture abo Lucy's object in going out. She did go to s John Barton. Not that she would have adm ted the fact under any circumstances. S wanted to go out, and perhaps she might s Mr. Barton. She found him hard at work i wagon, but not so busy that he did not see h

"Why, Mr. Barton, you are working as if the manner born," said Lucy. "Don't you fi it more fatiguing than you did preparing for examination at college?"

"Yes, it tires one more, but this work su me better; I never felt so strong and healt as I do now. I am very glad to see you to-d Miss Lucy. I have some news for you if y will wait for me to give it you." John Bart vaulted over the wagon's side, and came arou to where Lucy was standing. "I want you," said "to come around to my rooms to-nig There is some one there who is longing see you."

"Not Robert! Oh, is it Robert?" said Lu "There is no one else who could long to see m

Barton looked at her very much as if th might be such a longing in some one else, he only said: "Yes; it is Robert. I found h utterly despairing around the farm last nig and I spoke to him. In fact, I took him hc with me, and he is there now. He came make another appeal to his father, but when came to the point his courage failed."

"Oh, thank you, Mr. Barton," said Lu "God will reward you for your kindness. I sure I will come without fail."

"And when you come I will go and ha talk with Mr. Dale myself while you are chee your brother. I will try to soften his heart."

John Barton kept his word. When he Lucy wrapped in her brother's arms, he hur away to the farm, leaving them together. Dale was sorry Lucy was out, and worried a ut she said Lucy was only gone to a friend, and would be back pres- y. John was quite willing to re- n, and as it was Mr. Dale's custom nave family prayer early in the ning. John joined in the devotion. Shall I read for you, Mr. Dale?" asked.

Do, do!" said the farmer. "My s are not as good as they used to Lucy reads when she is at home." ohn took the Bible and opened the fifteenth chapter of Luke's pel. He was a cultivated reader, the inimitable parable of the odigal Son seemed to the assem- d family never so pathetic as it from his lips. Mrs. Dale wept ntly, and once or twice the far- r's lips quivered. His prayer was rt, for he could scarcely control voice. At its conclusion, when and Mr. and Mrs. Dale were left ne, John spoke. He said he had louble favor to ask. He wanted mission to ask Lucy to be his e, and he wanted Mr. Dale to for- e his son. The former was readily nted, but the latter needed some ading. The Bible reading, how- r, had prepared the way, and f an hour from the time that it s read, Mr. Dale was on his way the side of his prospective son- law, prepared to welcome the odigal with open arms.

HE PATAGONIAN INDIANS.

(See Illustration.)

THE Indian tribes found in the reme south of South America, ough known as Patagonians, de t themselves recognize that name. was given to them by the Span- ds, in allusion to the large foot- ps the Spaniards noticed in the l before they saw the men who d made them. The Indian name Tehuelche, or Tsonecas. This ain refers to the whole race, and ere are many subdivisions, the ief one being between the Indians the North and South. The north- n Tehuelches occupy the district tween the Cordilleras and the n, from the river Chupat northward to the o Negro. The southern branch is mainly lo- ted south of the Rio Santa Cruz, reaching as as Punta Arenas. A third branch is found tween the Rio Negro and the Chupat. They e called the Pampas Indians. A fourth tribe, om the Tehuelches call the Chennas, have eir headquarters at Las Manzanas. They are is erratic than the other three tribes, and own cks of sheep and herds of cattle. The num- r of the four tribes is now believed to be little ore than three thousand, the introduction of reign rum having caused an appalling mortal- among them.

Physically the Tehuelches are magnificent ecimens of humanity. The men are generally feet four inches in stature, and the women erage but little less than six feet. They are et of foot, and have an amazing power of durance. They have been known to bear, ithout apparent inconvenience, prolonged ab- inence from food, and to continue their march ith no relaxation of speed for several days with- nt nourishment of any kind. Their uniform uter garment is a loose and not ungraceful antle of guanaco-skin, worn with the hairy de in, and painted on the other side with gro- sque devices in various colors. Unlike other outh American Indians, they do not worship e sun, though they salute the new moon with a ecies of adoration. It was to these Tehuelches, r Patagonians, that Captain Allen Gardiner vhose portrait appeared in this journal on May 4) was endeavoring to carry the gospel message hen he went on his last and fatal journey. His death led to the organization of the South American Missionary Society, which has been successful, through God's blessing, in winning some of the Indians to the gospel, and encouraging reports are sent of future prospects.

Two Tehuelche Indians of Patagonia.

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. L. S. Keyser.

(Continued from page 575.)

A Pathetic Protest.

AN interview with Mr. Duneman was Belle Havelock's first business after her return from Banesville. The fire of jealousy which rendered him an apt instrument for her wicked purposes had not diminished in her absence.

"I cannot understand Miss Winters," he said. "She seems infatuated with that fellow."

"Yes," said Belle, "you use the right word; it is an infatuation and nothing else. It is very sad, for if she marries him she will be miserable all her life. In fact, it is an infatuation on both sides. Mr. Madelling would be miserable too. She is no fit wife for him. They are like two children who do not know what is good for themselves. Any one who separates them will do them a friendly service. It ought to be done for their own sakes."

"That is my own feeling," said Duneman. "I do not particularly care whether Madelling is miserable or not—the mischief he is working in the college deserves punishment—but I should be truly sorry if Miss Winters ruined her life, and I would do almost anything to save her. What success have you had with the scheme you mentioned to me?"

"The very best, and your part in it is one that will not strain your conscience unduly when you consider how good the object is that you are seeking to achieve. This is the letter. You see it is addressed to Mr. Madelling, stamp duly cancelled, and the stamp of the office upon it. Now all you have to do is to get it into Miss Winters's hands in such a way as will lead her to think that her precious admirer has received it here and dropped it; and that some good friend of hers has sent it to her to open her eyes to Madelling's duplicity."

"Very likely Miss Winters will just look at the address, and when she sees Madelling's name upon it will hand it to him without reading it."

"That you can prevent by enclosing it in an anonymous letter explaining that the enclosure vitally concerns her," said Belle. "If you word it shrewdly you may depend on a woman's curiosity for her reading it."

"I do not see how I could write such a letter without telling a lie in it, and I would not do that."

Belle looked at him in amazement. The whole scheme was a falsehood, and here was her confederate straining at swallowing this morsel. Her mental comment was: "You poor shallow hypocrite! This is truly straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel." But she was too prudent to expose the man to himself. "Look," she said, "there is no need to tell a direct falsehood," and drawing the paper to her she rapidly wrote a short note. "There is no lie there. You are not responsible for the construction Miss Winters puts upon it. If you write some such note as that the work will be done, and Mr. Madelling will have some difficulty in making any more engagements with Miss Winters."

Duneman took the note and read it critically. "Yes," he said, "I could write that with a clear conscience. There is nothing there but what is true, and it will accomplish the purpose."

That night, however, as he sat, pen in hand before his desk, he had a struggle with his better self. His conscience reproached him, and he felt inclined to withdraw from the scheme. "Suppose I do"—he said to himself. The vista, the hypothesis opened before him was not agreeable. He saw the girl he loved engaged to his rival, marrying him, being hurt day by day by his cruel scoffs at her religion; perhaps being herself drawn into infidelity. It was too horrible! If by practicing this little deception upon her he could save her from such a fate, ought he not to do it? So Jacob may have reasoned when he deceived his blind father. So many a man has reasoned on the brink of crime, justifying himself in wrong-doing by the purity of his motive. It is a most successful device of the evil one, that has entrapped many, and only those are safe from its seductions who are determined to do right at any cost and leave the issue with God. Duneman was not one of those. The letter was written in carefully disguised handwriting, the letter Miss Haverlock had given him was enclosed, and the packet placed in the post-office to do its work.

Then Duneman breathed more freely. He felt assured that when Miss Winters read the contents of that envelope she must sever her acquaintance with his rival. He was still at a loss, however, to understand how his former scheme had miscarried. How was it possible for so genuine a Christian girl as Madeline Winters to feel any pleasure in the society of so pronounced an infidel as Madelling?

The fact was, that it was precisely because she was so true a follower of Christ that she felt so strong an interest in the young man. The address to which she had listened that Saturday morning had shocked and pained her inexpressibly. Hadley's words spoken in so emphatic a manner from a public platform had pierced her soul like the thrust of a dagger. Little had she imagined that her generous friend, who had succored her from danger at the risk of his own life, would be capable of making so acrimonious an attack upon a holy cause. The religion of Christ had been so potent an influence for good in her life, had so often strengthened her against temptation, and had so comforted her in sorrow, that Hadley's utterances shocked and appalled her. For awhile she felt herself repelled by him. A bad heart only, it seemed to her, could be the armory of such weapons as those which he was wielding. Perhaps Duneman had been right in his strictures upon the moral character of unbelievers, although at the time she had thought them unnecessarily severe. Perhaps it was true that those who reject Christianity have so deadened conscience and despoiled their higher nature, as to render them incapable of discerning and appreciating moral beauty, so that they have become like certain characters portrayed by the prophet, who call light darkness, and darkness light.

Yet it occurred to her that young Madelling had always in all her interviews with him shown himself honorable and magnanimous, and even now, as she listened to him, her quick mind noted the fact that he made no attack on morality. In fact his attack on the Bible was based on the mistaken view that it did not inculcate true morality of the highest standard. If such a man could be convinced of his error, could be brought to see that there is no moral standard so high as that of the Bible, then he would surely become the defender, not the assailant, of God's Word. Surely such a man was worth saving, and she determined to do her best to give him proper guidance. True, she felt unequal to the task, as far as her own strength was concerned, but there was One who could baptize the simplest word with divine efficiency.

The young man's arguments did not disturb her. With her, religion was a matter of experience, and no argument could dislodge her faith. She knew that religion was true, for she had tasted and seen that the Lord is good.

When she next met Mr. Madelling, she smiled upon him so kindly that he was greatly conciliated toward her, and even felt encouraged to approach her again and seek her society. It so happened a few days later that he was walking out one evening for relaxation after a hard day's study, and as he passed the post-office, he met Miss Winters on her way to her room. As she appeared friendly, he joined her, and they walked slowly along the dimly lighted street.

It was on this occasion that they passed Belle Havelock without noticing her. The reason of their pre-occupation was not far to seek. With gentle approach Miss Winters led the conversation to Hadley's speech. After entering the parlor the subject was resumed, and they were so engrossed in the discussion that they did not notice that the blind was still open.

Hadley, as might have been expected, stood on the defensive, and soon became so earnest that he denounced the Bible with great vehemence. Miss Winters had not wished to arouse him, but a word that she had said caused his impetuosity to get the better of him. It distressed the girl so much to hear him denounce in such bitter terms the religion she loved, that, notwithstanding her utmost efforts to control her emotions, she burst into tears.

The young man was touched, and immediately became penitent. Tenderly taking her hand, he begged her pardon for his harsh and ungenerous expressions. It was this scene that had been witnessed by Belle Havelock.

"Is it possible that religion means so much to you, Miss Winters?" he said, in astonishment. "I do not understand it."

"No, you do not know, Mr. Madelling," she said, smiling through her tears, "how terribly your words sound to one who has experienced the love of Christ."

"Please explain," he said, more mystified than ever.

"Let me illustrate," she rejoined. "Do you love and revere your mother?"

"I have the best of mothers," he responded, with some feeling.

"Suppose some one were to ridicule or abuse her?"

"I see that I am getting myself into a trap, but I will answer honestly: I should make him swallow his words, if I could."

"Ah! it would not only hurt you, but would stir your wrath. Well, it is with a still deeper feeling of filial reverence that we regard God when He has adopted us into His family, and has put the Spirit into our hearts; and do you not see how it must pain us if His Word is held up to contumely?"

"Did you feel so while I was speaking the other morning?" questioned Hadley, in quavering tones.

"I will tell you honestly, Mr. Madelling, that I could not have felt so painfully agitated if you had abused my own parents," she replied, feelingly. "I speak plainly, and assure you that I know whereof I affirm. Christ has done so much for me; He has expunged so much evil from my nature, has put so much love and light into my poor, riven life; His grace and promises have so often comforted me in sorrow, especially in bereavement—that my heart turns sick when I hear His Word derided."

"Great heavens!" exclaimed Hadley, in dismay. "I never heard any one speak as you do. Is it possible that religion, which has always seemed to me so fanciful, is a real power in your life? And have I been trampling so recklessly on your feelings? Why—I—I never supposed any one—. Yes, I remember now, my mother used to burst into tears when I assailed religion. You are like her. But I cannot understand you. I have never felt as you do, Miss Winters. I feel so bitter against religion, against the Bible, against God."

"I understand your feelings," she answered, kindly. "At one time in my life I was full of rebellion too, and chafed against the things that eluded my understanding and seemingly obstructed my pathway."

She hesitated, at which he asked, eagerly, "And how did you become so wonderfully changed?"

"The process was very simple. When I went to God humbly in prayer, He changed my nature, old things passed away, and all things became new, and His Spirit bore witness with my spirit that I belonged to His family. Pray do not think that this is mere cant; it is actual reality. After that experience the bitter feeling was gone, and a devout love for God took its place."

The young sceptic looked at her incredulously. He could not believe that the solution of the great problems of life was to be attained in that way. It would have been just as reasonable, in his opinion, to pray that God should solve a problem for him in Differential Calculus, or translate a stubborn Greek idiom. It was also incomprehensible to him that an intelligent girl like Miss Winters should resort to what seemed to him a puerile and illogical method of gaining light on any subject. Yet he could not disprove her assertions.

"Perhaps you are right," he said meditatively, "but it seems to me that it is a matter of temperament to a great extent. Some are more inclined to be religious than others."

"That may all be, for it does appear that there are persons who are almost naturally Christian; but none are so disinclined to spirituality that they cannot receive the assurance of which I have spoken, if they will use the proper means to secure it. I speak from experience when I say that I was inclined to be sceptical, to take nothing on trust. Yet this experience came to me. It is for all. It is for you, Mr Madelling," she added, in a voice of deep solicitude.

"Would you have me smother all my doubts and believe the Bible per force?" he queried, a little petulantly.

"Not by any means. That cannot be done. It is against the laws of mental action; it is a psychological impossibility to force belief. No one can believe without evidence. But you can open your heart to Christ, waiving all prejudice, and then He will enter and dispel all your unbelief and doubt. I hope that you will do this soon."

"I am willing to do anything reasonable for the sake of truth."

"Are you—perfectly?"

"Do you doubt it?"

"If you are," she replied, "I can say to you what Christ said to a young man who came to Him, 'Thou are not far from the kingdom of God!'"

"Do you really expect me to become a Christian?" he questioned, doubtfully.

"I do."

"And you care?" he ventured.

"More than I can tell."

"Why should you be so anxious about my welfare?"

"Because all those who make religion a real factor of their lives, are solicitous for the conversion of others."

Hadley was disappointed with her rejoinder. He was only one among many, then, for whose salvation she was concerned. He had hoped that her personal regard was the secret spring of her anxiety for him; but her remark had put him on a par with the whole circle of her acquaintances. He himself had little solicitude for those for whom he did not entertain a personal liking, and he "measured others by his own yardstick." For a few moments, while these reflections were passing through his mind, he had averted his face from her, and was looking abstractedly at the key-board of the piano. When he turned to her, he found that her eyes were bent anxiously upon him. So suddenly had he looked at her, that she flushed slightly, and her eyes dropped before his earnest gaze. What did it mean? Did she care for him after all, in a twofold way? The thought gave him a momentary thrill of rapture. How he loved this fair, winsome girl! He felt then how incomplete his life would be without her.

"My thoughts have been wandering away from the theme which we have been discussing," he remarked.

"Into forbidden paths?" she said, naïvely.

"I hope not, Miss Winters," he answered, looking her full in the face. A brief silence followed. "I hope not," he repeated. "I was thinking of—you."

"A very dull and unprofitable subject for a reverie," she said, laughing; but a rose bloomed on both cheeks.

"Very interesting to me."

Again her eyes fell, and she did not answer.

"Miss Winters," he said, rising and coming toward her.

"Mr. Madelling," she said, rising also, "let me advise you not to indulge in reveries. Or, perhaps, I should rather speak for myself than advise you. I am obliged to refrain from building castles in the air, and any other occupation that would divert my thoughts from my studies. Our time at college is so short, and our opportunities for acquiring knowledge so limited, that I resolutely put away from me thoughts of any subject that might engross my attention. Just now, too, when the examinations are so close upon us, and our work so difficult, it is more than usually important to have my mind free for work. So as it is getting late I shall say good-night."

Hadley smiled. He perfectly understood the kindness and delicacy which interposed, so gently, to prevent his making a premature and ill-considered declaration, and he had the good sense to perceive that he would gain rather than lose ground in her esteem by deferring the question upon his lips until a better opportunity. Pressing her hand gently, and with a look of affectionate regard, the meaning of which she could understand, he took his leave.

(To be Continued.)

DEATH AND BURIAL OF MOSES.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for September 23, Deut. 3 : 4. Golden Text, Prov. 4 : 18.

The Last Two Months of the Wilderness—A Figurative Day—A Significant Intervention of God for the Protection of Women—The Last Day of Moses' Life—God Calling Him—His Natural Powers in Full Vigor—No Disease—The Function of Ancient Physicians—A Fitting End to a Consecrated Life—His Last Words—His Miraculous Survey of Canaan—A Glorious Dying Hour—God's Epitaph on Moses.

THE journeys of the children of Israel in the wilderness were drawing to a close. Forty years they had wandered as a punishment for their unbelief at the time of the spies. It was in the eleventh month of the fortieth year that they made their last encampment by the Red Sea (Deut. 1 : 3), and now their marching orders were, "Straight forward, into the land." It was at this time, during the last two months of his life, that Moses recapitulated the law of God, and commanded the children of Israel to set up great stones, "and plaster them with plaster," and "write upon them all the words of this law." (Deut. 27 : 1–3.) It is somewhat difficult to understand the exact chronology of these last two months. Again and again we read of "this day," which, if we take it literally, would lead us to think that the whole book of Deuteronomy comprised but one day. For instance, "Thou art to pass over Jordan this day" (Deut. 9 : 1); "This day will I begin to put the dread of thee and the fear of thee upon the nations that are under the whole heaven" (Deut. 2 : 25); "Thou hast avouched this day the Lord to be thy God." (Deut. 26 : 17.) This cannot mean one literal day of twenty-four hours, because the people mourned for Moses thirty days out of this two months before they crossed over Jordan. It probably means this period of time which ended their wilderness journeys before they entered the promised land.

It is not quite clear when the account of Moses' last day on earth began; but, if not earlier, it certainly begins in the thirty-first chapter of Deuteronomy, but probably in the twenty-ninth. The people were encamped at this time "in the plains of Moab, by Jordan, near Jericho." Here it was that God taught Moses the extent of the land of their inheritance, singled out those who should divide it, and appointed the portions of the Levites, and the cities of refuge, and recognized the claim of the daughters of Zelophehad to hold property. Thus one of the latest interventions of God in the government of this people before entering on their possession, was an action for the protection of women. (Num. 33 : 50–56; 34 and 35.)

Moses' Last Day

had come. It was no day of sickness, surrounded with medical appliances, doctors, nurses, and anxious friends; it was a day of steady service from morning till evening. He said to the people, "I am an hundred and twenty years old this day; I can no more go out and come in." Did he mean that he had fallen lame, or that his muscular strength had waned? Did he mean that his hand was palsied and his back was bent with age? No; God Himself tells us that "his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated." Why, then, could he no more go out or come in? Why, because the Lord was calling him to another service, from time to eternity, from earth to heaven. "The Lord hath said unto me, Thou shalt not go over this Jordan." Moses was as willing to depart as to remain; during his long life, ever since his deep acquaintance with God, he had "endured as seeing Him who is invisible." (Heb. 11 : 27.) The light of eternity and the presence of God were not transient things with him, they were the atmosphere which he breathed.

Moses' last birthday, his last day on earth, was characteristic of the man; with the announcement of his own departure, he told the people that the Lord their God should go over before them, and destroy the nations before them, and that Joshua should be their leader; as much as to say, "My going will be no loss to you; the Lord will provide." He next called Joshua and constituted him leader "in the sight of all Israel," charging him to "be strong and of a good courage," because the Lord would go before him. He would not leave nor forsake him. He next wrote the law in such a compass that it might be contained in the ark, and carried with them into the land "for a witness against thee." (Deut. 31 : 1–26.) Probably he simply completed on this day the work of transcription, on which he had been long engaged. He next held communion with God, and the Lord showed him how the people would lapse into idolatry, and then inspired him to compose and write the song contained in the chapter 32, "that this song may be a witness for Me against the children of Israel." (Ch. 31 : 16–21.) Moses and taught it to the children of Israel." Was this all which took place on this remarkable dying day? No; "The Lord spake unto Moses that self-same day, saying, Get thee up into this mountain Abarim, unto Mount Nebo, which is in the land of Moab, that is over against Jericho: behold the land of Canaan, which I give unto the children of Israel for a possession: And die in the mount whither thou goest up, and be gathered to thy people; as Aaron, thy brother died in Mount Hor, and was gathered unto his people." What, climb a mountain to die! And at the age of a hundred and twenty, and after a tremendous day's work! Yes, the tabernacle of Moses' flesh had not to be taken down pin by pin, and curtain by curtain—a blind eye, a deaf ear, a lame leg, as the first preliminary warnings, and then all manner of diseases. We do not read of his having a vestige of disease or infirmity of any kind. When a man dies, everyone asks, "What did he die of?" as though no man had ever died without sickness or accident. The patriarchs never seem to have died of sickness. "Abraham gave up the ghost, and died in a good old age, an old man, and full of years, and was gathered to his people." (Gen. 25 : 8) Isaac gave up the ghost, and died, and was gathered unto his people." (Gen. 25 : 29.) "When Jacob had made an end of commanding his sons, he gathered up his feet into the bed, and yielded up the ghost, and was gathered unto his people." (Gen. 19 : 33.) Only after death were the physicians called in, not to lengthen out his life by all kinds of human contrivances—but to embalm his body, that he might be buried in the land promised to his fathers, and so express in his burial his faith in God. "These all died in faith" (Heb. 11 : 13), and their way home was not a forced march; they "gave up the ghost."

Wrote This Song the Same Day,

God's announcement to Moses that he was to die that day seems to have come to him like any other command; no doctor was called to help him to ward off death for a few hours, no lawyers to make a hurried will. Moses lived a life in which nothing that happened could be an interference: so long as God had His way, Moses had his, for his will was one with God's. To some who do not lean on the Lord for strength, it might appear impossible that after this full day's work he could do anything else.

His Last Words,

like the last words of his coming Master, were words of blessing, and as tribe after tribe passed before him, he uttered a blessing always prophetical of the future of that tribe. At last, his long day's work was at an end, and without a shade of weariness, with fresh and easy motion, keeping step with God as he ascended, Moses went up the mountain before the sun went down, to see the land of Canaan, and then go home! The Lord was his guide, the Lord Himself shewed him the land he must not enter. How he could take in the whole panorama is difficult to understand, but Moses was not nearsighted, and his eyes were in no way dim. It is not impossible that God gave him more than natural sight to view that land of promise. He had lost his right to a possession there because of his unbelief, but it was more to the heart of Moses that his people should have possession than that he should, and most surely he will hold possession in "a city which hath foundations, whose Builder and Maker is God." (Heb. 11 : 10.) God said to him, "This is the land which I sware unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, saying, I will give it unto thy seed; I have caused thee to see it with thine eyes, but thou shalt not go over thither." To a certain extent under judgment, but still in communion with God, suffering the loss of an earthly possession, but in full title to "an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away," it was when all was over; not the struggling for breath, the last injection, the last morsel of food, but the last commands and directions to the people of God, the last song of praise, the last blessing upon those he was leaving, the last mountain ascent alone with God, the last look at the promised land; there was nothing left to be done but to die. How did death get hold of this vigorous, hale, old man? God willed it, this was all, and Moses willed with God. "So Moses, the servant of the Lord, died thus in the land of Moab, According to the Word of the Lord."

A Glorious Dying Hour

Of Moses' funeral, and Moses' tomb, no one knows but God. He allowed no human hand to place His servant in the grave; "He buried him." No tears moistened his grave; no sad procession carried him. It was Moses' joy to die when God willed it, it was God's joy to receive him home. The children of Israel wept down in the plain, and mourned for Moses thirty days. It was a glorious and enviable death to die, with none other present than the Lord, and to have nothing to do but to die! Why should there be so few deaths like that of Moses, in full health and vigor, but just called home because God wills it? Is it not because so few live in His presence continually? Moses' service was not interrupted by sickness or death. When Jesus was transfigured, Moses appeared, testifying to the death which He should accomplish. He testified of God. "There is no one like unto the God of Jeshuron who rideth on the heavens in thy help" (Deut. 33 : 26), and God testified of him, "There arose not a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face." "When Moses was gone into the tabernacle of the congregation to speak with [God], then he heard the voice of One speaking unto him from off the mercy-seat that was upon the ark of testimony, from between the two cherubim, and He spake unto him." (Num. 7 : 39.) Such direct intercourse is not mentioned between God and any other man. "And in all the signs and the wonders which the Lord sent him to do in the land of Egypt to Pharaoh, and to all his servants, and to all his land, and to all that mighty land, and in all the great terror which Moses shewed in the sight of all Israel." Such is God's epitaph of Moses.

NEW EDITION OF REV. M. BAXTER'S PAMPHLETS.

THREE PAMPHLETS IN ONE.

1. Coming Wars from 1888 to 1891, and Translation of 144,000 living Christians on March 5, 1896, before the 3½ years' persecution by Napoleon, etc.

2. Twenty Predictions about Coming Wars, by Twenty Learned Expositors.

3. End of this Age by the Descent of Christ in Passover Week, April, 1901, being 45 years from the Crimean War Treaty of Peace in Passover Week, April, 1856, and 2,345 years from Passover Week, April, B. C. 444-5, as shown by Daniel's Dates.

The Three Pamphlets in an Illuminated Cover, 144 Pages, postage included,

Price Twenty Cents.

For sale at this office, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

IF WE KNEW.

If we knew when walking thoughtless
Through the crowded, noisy way,
That some pearl of wondrous whiteness
Close beside our pathway lay;
We would pause when now we hasten,
We would often look around,
Lest our careless feet should trample
Some rare jewel in the ground.

If we knew what forms were fainting
For the shade that we should fling,
If we knew what lips were parching
For the water we should bring,
We would haste with eager footsteps,
We would work with willing hands,
Bearing cups of cooling water,
Planting rows of shading palms.

If we knew when friends around us
Closely press to say, "Good bye,"
Which among the lips that kiss us,
First should 'neath the daisy lie;
We would clasp our arms around them,
Looking on them through our tears;
Tender words of love eternal
We would whisper in their ears.

If we knew what lives were darkened
By some thoughtless word of ours,
Which had ever lain among them
Like the frost among the flowers;
Oh! with what sincere repentings,
With what anguish of regret,
While our eyes were overflowing,
Would we cry—forgive,—forget!

If we knew—alas, and do we Ever care or seek to know,
Whether bitter herbs or roses
In our neighbor's gardens grow?
God forgive us, lest hereafter,
Our hearts break to hear Him say,
"Careless child I never knew you,
From my presence flee away."

—Selected.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike), will be sent post-paid, for 10 cts., or 100 for 20 cts. Postage stamps taken.

For Seasickness
Use Horsford's Acid Phosphate.
Dr. W. W. BLACKMAN, Brooklyn, N. Y. says: "I am very much pleased with it in seasickness. Several cases have been brought to my attention where it afforded prompt and entire relief."

Extraordinary but nevertheless true. We refer to the announcement of B. F. Johnson & Co., publishers, of Richmond, Va., in which they propose to show wide-awake and energetic men how to make from $75 to $250 a month above expenses.

The latest and best Imperial Photographs of Dr. Talmage and Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, with their fac-simile autograph, and also imperial photograph of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, can be obtained from J. E. Jewett, 77 Bible House, New York. Sent postpaid for twenty-five cents each. Postage stamps taken.

MEXICO

Contributions in aid of Christian work in Mexico are most pressingly needed, and can be mailed to the address of

BISHOP H. C. RILEY,
Care of J. P. HEATH,
43 Bible House, New York.

TO OUR CHRISTIAN FRIENDS:

As there is a regular monthly expense in connection with the work a regular monthly income is needed to meet that expense. We, therefore, specially ask for regular monthly contributions in its behalf. If many will each send a little every month, or quarter, or whenever they can, it will do great good. Remember, every little helps.

H. CHAUNCEY RILEY.

YOUR NAME ENGRAVED.

We will send you this plain rolled gold wedding ring with your own name, or your friend's name engraved in full inside for $1.00, or the initials only, for 75 cents. A chased solid gold ring of beautiful design with full name $1.50; initials only $1.35. Address
M. B. HART, Box 74, Hartford, Conn.

WANTED at once, a representative Man or Woman, in every vicinity until Dec. 25th. Liberal Pay. All time not necessary. Give references.
R. H. Woodward & Co., Baltimore, Md.

To Our Fellow Christians

Who Are Forwarding Contributions in Aid of Christian Work in Mexico.

Bishop Riley requests me to inform the kind friends who are generously contributing in aid of Christian work in Mexico, that we have now over one hundred monthly subscribers who are forwarding contributions every month in its behalf. Bishop Riley sends to all who are contributing in aid of the work in Mexico his most sincere thanks for their timely gifts.

As there are, no doubt, many who would be glad to contribute something monthly in behalf of the cause of Christ in Mexico, but who feel that they cannot afford to give as much as one dollar a month, we venture the suggestion, that when possible the friends of the work should try and collect small contributions from such and forward the same with their own contributions to Bishop Riley, 43 Bible House, New York. For example, some friend of the work who is now forwarding one dollar a month, might induce ten others, to each give ten cents a month, and collect and forward the same with his own contribution. Another who now contributes one dollar a month, might induce four others to each give one cent a day, or thirty-one cents a month, and collect and forward the same with his own contribution monthly. Still a third who now contributes a dollar a month might induce two friends, to each give fifty cents a month, and collect and forward the same regularly with his own contribution.

If this plan could be adopted generally among the more than one hundred regular monthly subscribers to the work, we might soon be able to report to our friends that we had over two hundred dollars a month contributed regularly in behalf of the work in Mexico.

We remind our friends that to continue the work in Mexico effectively we most pressingly need a regular monthly income, as we have to meet a regular monthly expense.

A most precious Christian work has been commenced in Mexico, and we are doing what we can to continue it, by raising an income in its behalf. We earnestly appeal to our fellow Christians to aid us in this effort. There are one hundred and thirteen millions who speak the English language, and seventy-five millions who speak the Spanish or Portuguese languages. Among those who speak the English language, there are multitudes who know and love the pure gospel, and are doing what they can for the Master. Among those who speak the Spanish or the Portuguese languages, there are a few who know and love the pure gospel, and are faithfully working for our dear Master. Our Spanish-American society is working hard to raise an income to aid in building up a strong centre of Christian work in Mexico. The influence of that work has already extended into Spain and Cuba, and, we trust, will yet extend into South America. Fellow Christians, think of seventy-five millions who speak the Spanish or Portuguese languages, millions and millions, and millions of whom have never had a Bible in their hands!!! Help us! help us! to do Christian work in their midst.

Bishop Riley has been instrumental in having more than one hundred thousand copies of the Bible or New Testament circulated in Mexico. Many hundreds of children have been educated in Christian schools established by him. More than forty congregations have been gathered in the Republic of Mexico through his efforts. He has secured two magnificent stone churches in the City of Mexico where the Gospel has been preached for years. He has trained up a noble band of able preachers of the pure gospel. He has given nineteen years of his life and his fortune to aid in building up this great work, and he now appeals to his fellow Christians to contribute the monthly income needed to continue it effectively.

Dear friends, will you not only continue to contribute to this good work yourselves, but also encourage others to do the same. Some may not be able to contribute monthly but could do so occasionally. Occasional gifts are most thankfully received. Pray for the work, and that many may be moved to befriend it.

With best Christian wishes, I am, your brother in Christ,

A. D. MAINE.

AGENTS WANTED to sell "The Child's Bible." Introduction by Bishop J. H. Vincent, D.D. The best selling book handled by agents. Recommended by all clergymen. Address Cassell & Co., B.B.S.D., 104 and 108 Fourth Ave., New York; 40 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

$75.00 to $250.00 A MONTH can be made working for us. Agents preferred who can furnish a horse and give their whole time to the business. Spare moments may be profitably employed also. A few vacancies in towns and cities. B. F. Johnson & Co., Pub's, 1009 Main St., Richmond, Va.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED FOR MY STORY OF THE WAR By Mary A. Livermore
Her own narrative of "Four Years' Personal Experience as Field and Hospital Nurse." It portrays the Womanly or "Heavenly" side of the War, its Lights and Shadows "as a woman saw them." Bright, Pure, and Good, full of "laughter and tears," of thrilling interest and touching pathos, it sells at sight to all. Splendid Steel-Plates, and famous old Battle-Flags richly colored in exact fac-simile. The "Booming" book for Men and Women Agents. $100 to $200 a month made. Distance no hindrance, for we Pay Freights and give Extra Terms. Write for circulars to
A. D. WORTHINGTON & CO., Hartford, Conn.

UNIVERSITY ORGANS.—They Lead the World.—$35 to $500. Sold Direct to Families. No Middlemen. Solid Walnut-5 Octaves-Double Couplers. Guaranteed for Six Years and sent, with Stool and Book, for TRIAL IN YOUR OWN HOME BEFORE YOU BUY. ESTABLISHED 1859. $35
MARCHAL & SMITH, 285 East 21st Street, New York.

James McCreery & Co.
Importers and Manufacturers
OF FINE DRY GOODS.

In this store customers can shop by mail as successfully as in person.

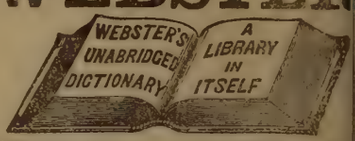
Samples for the Fall and Winter Season are now ready and will be sent upon application.

Orders by mail or by express are executed the same day they are received.

When ordering mention The Christian Herald.

JAMES McCREERY & CO.
Broadway and 11th St.,
New York.

WEBSTER



3000 more Words and nearly 2000 more Illustrations than any other American Dictionary.

Among the supplementary features, unequaled for concise and trustworthy information, are A Biographical Dictionary giving brief facts concerning 9,700 Noted Persons of ancient and modern times, A Gazetteer of the World locating and describing 25,000 Places; and a Vocabulary of the names of Noted Fictitious Persons and Places
The latter is not found in any other Dictionary. Webster excels in SYNONYMS which are appropriately found in the body of the work.
Sold by all Booksellers. Pamphlet free.
G. & C. MERRIAM & CO., Pub'rs, Springfield, Mass.

COMFORT vs. CUSTOM.
FELT vs. BRISTLES
[From New York Home Journal.]
"No one who has for some time used the recently invented felt tooth-brush, as has the writer of this paragraph, will ever consent to return to the use of bristles."

The comfort and the sweetness and sensation of utter cleanliness which it brings are so pronounced that the very thought of returning to bristles awakens a sense of discomfort."
HORSEY M'F'G CO., Utica, N. Y.

1,000 Agents Wanted to Sell 100 Copies National Hand Book of American Progress,

E. O. HAVEN, LL.D., & others,
1492 to date. Six Vols in One. A non-partisan reference Cyclopædia, of History, Biography, Statistics, Politics, for School, Home and Office. Illustrated pages, $2. E. B. TREAT, Pub. 771 B'way, N. Y.

THE BRYANT SCHOOL, ROSLYN, L. I., N. Y.
23 miles from N. Y., overlooking L. I. Sound. Incorporated Academy for Boys. English, Classical, Commercial. Military organization under graduate of U. S. M. A., West Point. Buildings, grounds and general equipment unsurpassed. Apply to
Geo. Bruce Cortelyou, Principal.

Dr. TALMAGE'S
SERMON ON
Cursing and Swearing,
AND HIS SERMON ON Modern Spiritualism
Lately preached, and which has been so largely commented upon by the newspapers, is now ready in pamphlet form, and will be sent, post-paid, to any address, 5 cts. each, or both for 5 cts., or 25 cts. per dozen. Special terms by the 100 or 1,000 to those who wish to distribute them. Address
J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller,
77 Bible House, New York.

TEAS LADIES Send at once for our new terms. THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO., 31 and 33 Vesey St., New York, P. O. Box 289.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1888, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington

Vol. XI., No. 38. Office, 63 Bible House. N. Y. THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1888. Price, 3 Cents. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

PORTRAITS AND LIVES OF FIVE LEADERS OF THE BIBLE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

THE CHAIN OF INFLUENCES. Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

PROPHETIC CHRONOLOGY. By G.H.Pember, M.A.

STRIKING CONVERSIONS AT WESLEY GROVE CAMP MEETING.

An Offering to God Accepted—A Wicked Plot Defeated—Chinese Idols Destroyed—Preaching Before Images—A Buddhist Parable.

PICTURE OF A NICHE IN THE ANCIENT WALL OF JERUSALEM.

THE MINER'S SECRET (with Illustration).

THE PERSONAL REVELATION. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

Gems from New Books: Toltec Marriages, etc.

PORTRAIT AND LIFE OF DR. SAMUEL A. CROWTHER, P. E. Bishop of the Niger.

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE. A New Serial Story by Rev. L. S. Keyser (Continued).

SELFISHNESS. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE LEADERS OF THE BIBLE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

1. The Late Rev. James Thorne—2. Rev. F. W. Bourne—3. Rev. John Keen, D. D., the President—4. Rev. W. H. Tickell—5. Mr. F. T. Gammon.

THE BIBLE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

THE origin of the denomination of Bible Christians, five leaders of which appear by portrait on the first page, was in the Wesleyan Methodist Church. In 1815 a local preacher in England, named William O'Bryan, was wonderfully successful in evangelistic work. He went into neglected districts, preaching the gospel where he could. Sometimes he preached in the open air, at other times in barns or cottages, but always the Holy Spirit honored his labors, and souls were converted. There were no Methodist churches in the villages where he labored, but O'Bryan gathered the converts together into societies, intending to have them incorporated in the Wesleyan Methodist communion to which he belonged. But a difficulty arose. Mr. O'Bryan being a married man, was ineligible for entrance into the Methodist ministry. The societies he had formed desired to retain his services as their pastor, and if they entered the Methodist body they must have a regular minister, and must bid farewell to O'Bryan. They preferred to remain outside the connection and keep their chosen preacher. They therefore formed a separate denomination and called themselves Bible Christians. They now have churches in all parts of the globe, and are remarkable for their energy and aggressive work. Their statistics are: 245 itinerant preachers, 1,854 local preachers, 830 church buildings, 139 preaching stations, 30,168 full members, 739 members on trial, 548 juvenile members, 9,012 Sunday-school teachers, and 51,038 scholars.

THE LATE REV. JAMES THORNE.

THE preacher whose portrait is in the centre of the group on the first page, was one of the earliest converts of William O'Bryan. He was born on September 21, 1795, and died on January 2, 1872, at the age of seventy-seven. There was a strong Puritan strand in his family line, and his father was remarkable for his stalwart piety. He was a hospitable man, and his house, in a secluded district of Devonshire, England, was always open to any Methodist preacher who might pass that way. In August, 1815, William O'Bryan held meetings in his native village. James attended, and was converted. He was twenty years old at that time, and his natural ardor led him to desire most earnestly to preach the gospel. He commenced in his father's house to a gathering of the neighbors, and later was appointed a regular local preacher like O'Bryan. When his spiritual father came out of the Wesleyan Methodist connection James Thorne followed, and became an itinerant preacher.

The itinerant ministry, in those years, was one of hardships and privations, but the young preacher did not shrink from it on this account. He devoted all the powers of body and mind to the work, toiling from early morning till late at night, and as riding was impossible, sometimes he was found walking nearly all night to reach his appointments. He labored like an apostle, and had an apostle's reward in seeing conversions at nearly every service he held. In August, 1819, at Launceston, where the first Bible Christian Conference took place, he was chosen secretary, and from that time forward, for half a century, he attended these annual gatherings of the brethren, and took the most prominent part in the proceedings. He had the distinguished privilege of being five times chosen President of the Conference. In 1837 he signed the temperance pledge, and became a most effective temperance lecturer. Through his efforts a few years later, in 1841, a Connexional school was established in his native town, Shebbear, which has since developed into a college.

His labors continued with a vigor which astonished all who witnessed them. Travelling continually, preaching in churches, barns, cottages, and the open air, the man's zeal seemed inexhaustible. Even after he had passed the age of threescore, and had been preaching forty years, he could not be persuaded to curtail his efforts. On December, 31, 1871, when he was over seventy-six years of age, he insisted on attending a watch-night service, and speaking for his Master. It was his last address. He was seized with paralysis that night, and two days later he passed from labor to reward.

THE REV. F. W. BOURNE.

IF the Bible Christians had an archbishop, the Rev. F. W. Bourne would be the unanimous choice of the connection. He is practically at the head of the denomination no matter who is chairman of the Conference. He is well known and highly respected in this country, which he visited in 1881. He is now fifty-eight years of age, having been born July 25, 1830, at Woodchurch, England. He received an excellent education at the local school, where he was conspicuous by his devotion to study and his brilliant talents.

At the age of fifteen he attended a revival conducted at the Bible Christian Church at Tenterden, where he was then residing. He was deeply impressed, and after a severe experience, passed from death into life. Almost insensibly his giving his testimony for Christ in the meetings passed into religious addresses, and those into sermons. God blessed them, and by the time he was eighteen years of age he was preaching every Sunday, and churches were eagerly seeking his services. He tells one amusing anecdote of this period of his life. He went to a country church that was very much crowded, the fact that the preacher was only eighteen, and yet so famous, having drawn a large congregation, and he could scarcely get in. He was pushing his way in as best he could, when one of the Elders of the chapel took hold of him in a very unceremonious way, and said, "What do you mean by pushing like that; do you not see there is no room?" He replied very quietly, "I suppose there will be nothing going on till I do get in." The Elder then said, "You bean't the preacher, be you?" And he said, "Yes, I be," and the Elder then graciously helped him forward.

Mr. Bourne occupied several of the most important stations of the Conference until 1869, when it was decided to give him functions of an episcopal character, and also to make him editor of the printed organ of the connection. From that time he resided in London, and visited the various churches as need arose. He has been twice president of the Conference, and has held other important and responsible offices. In 1881 he made a tour of the United States, Canada, Australia, and New Zealand, visiting the Bible Christian Churches, giving them counsel and stirring them up to greater zeal. Mr. Bourne has also found time to write several books. One of them, entitled, "The King's Son: a Memoir of Billy Bray," has found its way all over the world, and has been blessed to the conversion of many souls. Some time ago its sales had passed the 200,000 line. Mr. Bourne retains his natural and spiritual vigor, and is the right hand of the denomination.

THE REV. JOHN O. KEEN, D. D.

THE present president of the Conference of the Bible Christians is Dr. Keen, whose published works have won for him university recognition in the title of Doctor of Divinity. Dr. Keen, though only forty-two years of age, has been preaching for twenty-six years. His parents were members of the Bible Christian body, and his earliest impressions were received in a Bible Christian Sabbath-school. He was admitted into the church in 1860, when he was only fourteen years of age, and by the time he was sixteen he began to preach in cottages, and to fill engagements on emergencies. He continued this activity for over three years with so much success that he was urged to offer himself for the regular ministry. He was accepted, was put through a searching examination on account of his youth, and passed successfully. In 1865 he was regularly appointed, and at once became pastor of a church in Devonshire. He proved one of the most popular preachers in the denomination; the churches he presided over increased in numbers, and became active in aggressive labor.

Dr. Keen has published several pamphlets, and a volume of sermons remarkable for freshness and force, under the title, "On the King's Business," which has passed through several editions; also another volume similar in character and size, called "Suggestive Thoughts for Busy Workers"; and an exceedingly clever sketch, entitled "Parson Jacques"; he is also an occasional contributor to various English and Colonial magazines.

THE REV. WILLIAM H. TICKELL.

THE fourth of the group of portraits on the first page is that of a man who has trodden in his Master's footsteps as a friend of publicans and sinners. Mr. Tickell, in 1880, was appointed to the charge of a church in the poorest and most degraded section of London, familiarly known as "The New Cut." He set to work immediately to evangelize that hardest of all districts of the country. Church services were but a part of the agency he employed. He perceived that one of the chief sources of the misery which surrounded, was drunkenness, and he organized a Temperance Society to contend with it. A Fresh-air Excursion Fund, a Sick Benefit Society, and Benevolent Societies for the benefit of men and women were established, and the church became a centre of beneficent work. The poor, the miserable, the sick, blessed the church and its pastor. Men who had scoffed at religion were grateful when some good lady from the Bible Christian Church visited their sick wives and took care of the home and the children. Women who never went to church, rejoiced when their husbands quitted drinking under the influence of Mr. Tickell's Temperance Society. The church grew rapidly, not so much in wealth as in number and spirituality. It begged that Mr. Tickell's term might be renewed again and again, and the Conference, recognizing the value of his labors in the locality, consented. He is still there, and his labors are increasingly blessed.

Mr. Tickell is now forty-one years of age, having been born March 19, 1847. As in so many cases in which men become useful or famous, he had a remarkable providential escape from death in boyhood. When nine years of age he was playing with some companions near his home, when one of the walls of a house fell, and buried him in the ruins. He was taken out for dead, but consciousness being restored, it was found that his most severe injury was a mangled leg. This entailed confinement to bed and couch for six months, and it was during this lengthened period of enforced abstinence from exercise of all kinds that he first developed that passion for reading which has characterized the whole of his after life. As an instance of his love of books at this early age, it may be noted that he committed to memory the whole of the "Pilgrim's Progress."

His conversion occurred in 1867, when he was twenty years of age. He was then living in a town where there was no Bible Christian Church, so he joined the Methodist New Connection, but so strongly was he drawn to the church of his father and his own boyhood that he removed to Bodmin to be in that communion. He was ordained in 1874, and before settling in his present London Church of the New Cut, he labored successfully in several large principal churches.

MR. FREDERICK T. GAMMON.

OUR fifth portrait is that of a layman, but one whose activities have done much for the advancement of the Bible Christian Church. His father, the Rev. John Gammon, is one of the most highly respected ministers of the denomination. He was born in Somerset in 1849, and educated at the denominational college at Shebbear, where he was greatly respected. He left college at an early age and went to London to seek his fortune. He entered the employ of a well-known firm of publishers, and was found so capable and so trustworthy, that after a time they gave him the management of a department, and eventually he became the sole acting partner of the firm.

The first office he took in Christian work was in connection with a Bible Christian Sunday-school, where he accepted an invitation to do some secretarial work, but after a time he became superintendent, and so well has he performed his duties that the school is now one of the most prosperous and best regulated in London. His worth as a Christian worker has been thoroughly appreciated by the pastors under whom he has labored, as well as by his fellow-members. The Missionary Society has received his warmest support, and he has infused his own spirit into the school, so that a regular annual contribution of a large sum is always received from the school. The denomination have recently undertaken a China Mission, and he has shown his sympathy with the movement by becoming the largest contributor to its funds.

In addition to the work at his own school, Mr. Gammon undertook the secretaryship of the South London Auxiliary of the Sunday-school Union, and has thrice been elected President, which position he now holds. His interest in religious movements is deep and broad, and at the same time practical. The hardships and privations which Bible Christian ministers encountered in the early years of the denomination, showed him the difficulties that ministers have been called upon to undergo, and have thus given him considerable sympathy with these hardworking and underpaid brethren.

BUDDHA'S PARABLE.

THE following extract, from a recently published work, is significant just now when an effort is being made to propagate Buddhism in our great cities. This extract shows that though such an effort may succeed with some people, it can have no hope of success among any who are familiar with the Bible:

"Two of the most famous of Buddha's parables strikingly resemble in more than one feature those of the Sower and the Prodigal Son in the gospel. In the prodigal son, out of many wearisome details comes the image of the father full of compassion for the son, who, after leaving him has fallen into abject misery, while the father is living in wealth and plenty. He bemoans himself in a piteous manner that he, now old, broken down and ready to die, cannot find his son to make him the sharer of his goods; when, without knowing it the son comes back to the threshold of his father's palace, in vile raiment, and hoping for nothing but the pauper's portion. His father, who has recognized him, cries out in his joy: 'Lo, I have found him who is to inherit all that is mine. I thought of none but him. And now he is come of his own accord, and I am old and bent.' The reconciliation does not take place immediately, however. The father wishes to prove the wanderer, and so he sets him to the most menial tasks, that of sweeping up the refuse. At length after twenty years of this hard service, the father clasps him in his arms. 'Thou art my son,' he exclaims, 'and all that I have is thine.' But the son still stays outside the palace feeling his poverty. This is a sure proof that the ordeal is no longer needed. The father calls together all his relations, and pointing to the beggar, says: 'This man is my beloved son. [illegible] who begat him. For fifty years he disappeared from this town. Far and wide have I gone seeking him; I came back here, and lo I have found him. He is my son and I am his father. All this wealth is his.' The son falls at his father's feet, saying: 'Here am I then in possession of all these treasures!'"

...king Saviour and Other Themes. by ... Mackay, of Hull. This work has been published ... Mackay's death, but the greater part was ready for publication when he died, and to that has been added the striking discourse which he delivered the last time he entered the pulpit, and a few manuscripts found among his papers 247 pages, cloth cover; Price 75 cents, including postage, For sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

"When One Door Shuts, Another Opens."—"It is told of Whitefield that, on one occasion, he was speaking to a large congregation in the open air. His text was 'And the door was shut.' He impressively repeated his text several times. Two young men who stood in the crowd seemed to think the repetition superfluous, and one remarked to the other, 'Well, what matter if the door be shut. When one door shuts, another door opens.' The preacher seemed intuitively to know what was said, and thus continued: 'Some may say, What matter if one door be shut! another door will open. Yes, that is true. If the door of heaven is shut against you, the door of hell will open. If you are shut out of heaven, you must enter hell.' These solemn words went to the hearts of the young men, and at the end of the meeting they stayed to speak to the preacher, and, through God's grace, he was instrumental in bringing them both to Christ."

Charlie's Confession of Christ.—The Rev. Mr. Gullan remarks: "I know a little boy named Charlie, and on one occasion when I met him at his grandmother's home I asked, 'Charlie, do you love Jesus?' 'Yes, I do,' was the prompt reply. 'How long have you loved Him?' I inquired. 'For two years,' he said. 'Are you quite sure you have loved Him all that time?' I queried. 'Quite sure,' replied the little fellow confidently. 'If I were to ask your mother if she knew that you had been a Christian for two years, do you think that she would be surprised to hear it?' I next asked. 'No,' was the reply, 'I think she would know.' Soon afterward I saw his mother, and asked her if she knew that Charlie had been a Christian for two years. And this was her answer: 'Yes, I do know that he is a true Christian, and, I confidently believe, would die for Him if necessary to do so.' Yes; it was quite true: not only did the boy testify with his mouth, but his life also bore testimony for his Saviour."

Over the Parapet into the River.—"A Few years ago two gentlemen met. One was an energetic Christian worker, and the other, one of the world's respectable people. As they were together the latter said, 'Well, I do not know how you stand it all—Monday, a prayer-meeting; Tuesday, a prayer-meeting; Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday all the same. And on Sunday, what a day you have at it from morning to night! It must be the hardest working day you have. I would not make such a fuss about religion, and you will see that I shall be all right at the end. When I come to my death-bed I will make three words do it all. God is ready to save at any time. Soon afterward, that man met his death, but he had neither time nor presence of mind to say the three words on which he had built his hope, 'Lord, save me,' that were necessary to his salvation. He was driving in his carriage, and on an incline that led down to a river; the horses became restless, and rushed down the hill. The driver was unable to stop or guide them, and on they rushed. The bridge was before them, but it was narrow; they swerved, and half leaping, half tumbling, over the low parapet, they fell into the river, dragging the carriage and its helpless occupant with them. He only uttered one exclamation, and that was an oath. With that on his lips he was ushered into eternity."

A Forger's Sad Story.—A Clergyman Says: "There were two friends like David and Jonathan; they had been born in neighboring houses, had played together, gone to school together, and commenced life at one time, in the same office. At first both seemed to prosper alike, but when a certain height was reached one seemed to draw rapidly ahead. A few years passed, and one was the proprietor of a large business, while the other made no progress. But the prosperous merchant remembered his old companion, and invited him to become his general manager at a liberal salary. For years all went well, but one day a discovery was made—a forgery had been committed. It was traced to the manager. His employer called him in, and said: 'John, you know about this forgery. You did it. It is no use denying it.' 'I am not going to deny it. I did do it,' was the painful reply. 'Well, John, I am not going to prosecute you, but you cannot be here any longer.' The man at once rose, and taking one last look round, left the place. No more was heard of him until years afterward, when a little girl called at the house of the now wealthy merchant, and asked him to come and see John. The gentleman went, and there on a bed of straw lay his former friend, who feebly held out his hand, imploring forgiveness. With tears in his eyes, his former employer bent down and grasped his hand, saying, 'I do forgive you, John. 'Ah,' replied the dying man, 'I knew you would; but why did you send me away? I would have served you like a dog if you had only let me.' Christ's is no half forgiveness. When the repentant backslider returns, he, like Peter, is taken back into favor.

The Destroyer of His Comrade.—A Minister observes: "After one of our battles in the East a clergyman visited the military hospital in which our wounded lay. As he went from bed to bed whispering words of holy comfort and inquiry, he came to one bed in which lay a seriously wounded man. 'Can I help you by reading to or writing for you?' said the servant of God, kindly. 'No,' was the gruff reply. 'Can I do nothing for you?' inquired the minister, still lingering by his side. Here the man, raising himself on his elbow, glared into his visitor's eyes as he asked, 'Can you undo? I shall be glad of your help if you can undo!' By this time he had sunk back on his pillow, but he continued, 'When I joined the army first my chum was a Christian, a fellow who walked straight, and read his Bible, and I used to try to laugh him out of it, until at last he got ashamed of his religion. Not even then did I leave him alone. I took him to my haunts of vice until he was as evil as myself. All that was well enough as long as we were both well, but one day he marched into the battle never to return; he was shot by my side, and the one half-uttered word that escaped his lips as he fell helpless was an oath. How that oath cut me to the heart! That man is lost, sir, and it is through me. Tell me now, can you undo the past?' It is an awful thing to have on the conscience, that through our influence or example some soul has been turned away from God."

The Leisure Hour the Devil's Opportunity.—A Christian worker narrated: "In the town where I spent the first twenty years of my life the railway station was eighteen miles away. Into that town there ran an omnibus, over a lovely road, with gentlemen's mansions occasionally to the right and left of the road, and sometimes you would find a flaring pair of gates standing at the entrance to a gentleman's house; so that fresh young horses in that 'bus would start opposite the white gates. So the coachman, two or three hundred yards before getting up to the gates, would crack his whip and talk Welsh to the horses with the most marvellous effect. They pranced, and they danced, and they galloped past; the frisky member of the team had no time to think about the white gate, and went on peacefully and caused no trouble. Then, if you asked the driver why all this hubbub, 'Well,' the old man would say, 'you see that member of the team there; he is rather frisky and young, and on one or two occasions he has given me some trouble; and in order to put him past the white gate, I have just been shouting and cracking my whip, and getting up a tremendous noise so as to give him something to think on, and then he will pass the gate by harmlessly.' Now, the difficulty with the millions of our land is to give them something profitable to think on; some help to rush past the white gate of temptation—'something to think on. Oh that My people were wise,' says God, 'that they would consider their latter end.' But the devil doesn't like us to think."

THE CHAIN OF INFLUENCES.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon last Sunday Morning, September 16, 1888.

"Make a chain." Ezek. 7 : 23.

Bible Associations of the Chain—Adornment and Captivity—The Power of a Congeries of Links—The Chain of the Cradle—A Cradle Floating on the Ohio—The Links of the Chain—Prayer, Teaching, Example—The Chain that Pulls the Young from Evil—The Weak Link—The Collapse of a Chain Bridge in France—The Chain of Companionship—The Levelling Influence of Association—The Chain of Captivity—Directions for the Downward Road—The Chain Finished—Trying to Get Loose—A Power that can Break any Chain—The Demand of the King of Sparta—A World in Chains.

AT school and in college, in announcing the mechanical powers, we glorified the lever, the pulley, the inclined plane, the screw, the axle and the wheel, but my text calls us to study the philosophy of the chain. These links of metal, one with another, attracted the old Bible authors, and we hear the chain rattle, and see its coil all the way through from Genesis to Revelation, flashing as an adornment, or restraining as in captivity, or holding in conjunction as in case of machinery.

The Chain in the Bible.

To do him honor, Pharaoh hung a chain of gold about the neck of Joseph, and Belshazzar one about the neck of Daniel. The high priest had on his breast-plate two chains of gold. On the camels' necks, as the Ishmaelites drove up to Gideon, jingled chains of gold. The Bible refers to the Church as having such glittering adornments, saying: "Thy neck is comely with chains of gold." On the other hand, a chain means captivity. David, the psalmist, exults that power had been given over his enemies "to bind their kings with chains." The old missionary apostle cries out: "For the hope of Israel, I am bound with this chain." In the prison where Peter is incarcerated, you hear one day a great crash at the falling off of his chains. St. John saw an angel come down from heaven to manacle the powers of darkness, and having "a great chain in his hand," and the fallen angels are represented as "reserved in everlasting chains," while in my text for the arrest and limitation of the iniquity of his time, Ezekiel thunders out: "Make a chain!"

What I wish to impress upon myself and upon you is the strength, in right and wrong directions, of consecutive forces, the superior power of a chain of influences above one influence, the great advantage of above one link; and in all family government, and in all effort to rescue others, and in all attempt to stop iniquity, take the suggestion of my text and make a chain!

A Congeries of Links

That which contains the greatest importance, that which encloses the most tremendous opportunities, that which of earthly things is most watched by other worlds, that which has beating against its two sides all the eternities, is the cradle. The grave is nothing in importance compared with it, for that is only a gully that we step across in a second, but the cradle has within it a new eternity, just born and never to cease. When three or four years ago the Ohio River overflowed its banks, and the wild freshets swept down with them harvests and cities, one day was found floating on the bosom of the waters

A Cradle with a Child in it

all unhurt, wrapped up snug and warm, and its blue eyes looking into the blue of the open heavens. It was mentioned as something extraordinary. But every cradle is, with its young passenger, floating on the swift currents of the centuries, deep calling to deep, Ohios and St. Lawrences and Mississippis of influence bearing it onward. Now what shall be done with this new life recently launched? Teach him an evening prayer? That is important, but not enough. Hear him as soon as he can recite some gospel hymn or catechism? That is important, but not enough. Every Sabbath afternoon read him a Bible story? That is important, but not enough. Once in a while a lesson, once in a while a prayer, once in a while a restraining influence? All these are important, but not enough. Each one of these influences is only a link, and it will not hold him in the tremendous emergencies of life. Let it be constant instruction, constant prayer, constant application of good influences, a long line of consecutive impressions, reaching from his first year to his fifth, and from his fifth year to his tenth, and from his tenth year to his twentieth. "Make a chain!"

Spasmodic education, paroxysmal discipline, occasional fidelity, amount to nothing. You can as easily hold an anchor by one link as hold a child to the right by isolated and Intermittent Faithfulness.

The example must connect with the instruction. The conversation must combine with the actions. The week-day consistency must conjoin with the Sunday worship. Have family prayers, by all means; but be petulant and inconsistent and unreasonable in your household, and your family prayers will be a blasphemous farce. So great in our times are the temptations of young men to dissipation, and young women to social follies, that it is most important that the first eighteen years of their life be charged with a religious power that will hold them when they get out of the harbor of home into the stormy ocean of active life. There is such a thing as impressing children so powerfully with good, that sixty years will have no more power to efface it than sixty minutes.

What a rough time that young man has in doing wrong, carefully nurtured as he was! His father and mother have been dead for years, or over in Scotland, or England, or Ireland; but they have stood in the doorway of every dramshop that he entered, and under the chandelier of every house of dissipation, saying: "My son, this is no place for you. Have you forgotten the old folks? Don't you recognize these wrinkles, and this stoop in the shoulder, and this tremulous hand? Go home, my boy, go home! By the God to whom we consecrated you, by the cradle in which we rocked you, by the grass-grown graves in the old country churchyard, by the heaven where we hope yet to meet you, go home! Go home, my boy, go home!" And some Sunday you will be surprised to find that young man suddenly asking for the prayers of the church. Some Sunday you will see him at the sacrament, and perhaps drinking from the same kind of chalice that the old folks drank out of years ago when they commemorated the sufferings of the Lord. Yes, my lad, you do not have such fun in sin as you seem to have. I know

What Spoils Your Fun.

You cannot shake off the influences of those prayers long ago offered, or of those kind admonitions. You cannot make them go away, and you feel like saying: "Father, what are you doing here? Mother, why do you bother me with suggestions of those olden times?" But they will not go away. They will push you back from your evil paths, though they have to come down from their shining homes in heaven and stand in the very gates of hell, and their backs scorched of the fiery blast, and with their hand on your shoulder, and their breath on your brow, and their eyes looking straight into yours, they will say: "We have come to take you home, oh, son of many anxieties!" At last that young man turns, through the consecutive influences of a pious parentage, who out of fidelities innumerable made a chain. That is mightily this morning on five hundred of you. You may be too proud to shed a tear, and you may, to convince others of your imperturbability, smile to your friend beside you; but there is not so much power in an Alpine avalanche after it has slipped for a thousand feet, and having struck a lower cliff, is taking its second bound for fifteen hundred feet more of plunge, as there is power in the chain that pulls you this moment toward God and Christ and Heaven. Oh, the almighty pull of the long chain of early gracious influences!

The Chain that Pulls

But all people between thirty and forty years of age, yes, between forty and fifty—aye, between fifty and sixty years—and all septuagenarians as well, need a surrounding conjunction of good influences. In Sing Sing, Auburn, Moyamensing, and all the other great prisons, are men and women who went wrong in mid-life and old age. We need around us a cordon of good influences. We forget to apply the well-known rule that a chain is no stronger than

Its Weakest Link.

If the chain be made up of a thousand links, and nine hundred and ninety-nine are strong, but one is weak, the chain will be in danger of breaking at that one weak link. We may be strong in a thousand excellences and yet have one weakness which endangers us. That is the reason that we sometimes see men distinguished for a whole round of virtues collapse and go down. The weak link in the otherwise stout chain gave way under the pressure.

The first chain bridge was built in Scotland. Walter Scott tells how the French imitated it in a bridge across the river Seine. But there was one weak point in that chain bridge. There was a middle bolt that was of poor material, but they did not know how much depended on that middle bolt of the chain bridge. On the opening day a procession started, led on by the builder of the bridge: and, when the mighty weight of the procession was fairly on it, the bridge broke and precipitated the multitudes. The bridge was all right except in that middle bolt. So the bridge of character may be made up of mighty links strong enough to hold a mountain, but if there be one weak spot, that one point unlooked-after may be the destruction of everything. And what multitudes have gone down for all time and all eternity because in the chain bridge of their character there was lacking a strong middle bolt! He had and that was avarice; hence, forgery. He had but one fault, and that was a burning thirst for intoxicants; hence, his fatal debauch. She had but one fault, and that an inordinate fondness for dress; and hence, her own and her husband's bankruptcy. She had but one fault, and that a quick temper; hence, the disgraceful outburst. What we all want is to have put around us a strong chain of good influences. Christian association is a link. Good literature is a link. Church membership is a link. Habit of prayer is a link. Scripture research is a link. Faith in God is a link. Put together all these influences. Make a chain!

But one Fault,

Most excellent is it for us to get into company better than ourselves. If we are given to telling vile stories, let us put ourselves among those who will not abide such utterances. If we are stingy, let us put ourselves among the charitable. If we are morose, let us put ourselves among the good-natured. If we are given to tittle-tattle, let us put ourselves among those who speak no ill of their neighbors. If we are despondent, let us put ourselves among those who make the best of things. If evil is contagious, I am glad to say that good is also catching. People go up into the hill-country for physical health; so if you would be strong in your soul, get yourself up off the lowlands into the altitudes of High Moral Association.

For many of the circumstances of our life we are not responsible. For our parentage we are not responsible. For the place of our nativity, not responsible; for our features, our stature, our color, not responsible; for the family relation in which we were born, for our natural tastes, for our mental character, not responsible. But we are responsible for the associates that we choose and the moral influences under which we put ourselves. Character seeks an equilibrium. A B is a good man. Y Z is a bad man. Let them now voluntarily choose each other's society, A B will lose a part of his goodness and Y Z a part of his badness, and they will gradually approach each other in character and will finally stand on the same level. One of the old painters refused to look at poor pictures because he said it damaged his style.

A musician cannot afford to dwell among discords, nor can a writer afford to peruse books of inferior style, nor an architect walk out among disproportioned structures. And no man or woman was ever so good as to be able to afford to choose evil associations. Therefore, I said, have it a rule of your life to go among those better than yourselves. Cannot find them? Then what a pink of perfection you must be! When was your character completed? What a misfortune for the saintly and angelic of heaven that they are not enjoying the improving influence of your society! Ah, if you cannot find those better than yourself, it is because you are ignorant of yourself. Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites!

The Chain of Captivity.

But, as I remarked in the opening, in sacred and in all styles of literature a chain means not only adornment and royalty of nature, but sometimes captivity. And I suppose there are those in that sense deliberately and persistently making a chain. Now here is a young man of good physical health, good manners, and good education. How shall he put together enough links to make a chain for the down-hill road? I will give him some directions.

First, let him smoke. If he cannot stand cigars, let him try cigarettes. I think cigarettes will help him on this road a little more rapidly, because the doctors say there is more poison in them, and so he will be helped along faster; and I have the more confidence in proposing this because about fifty of the first young men of Brooklyn during the last year were, according to the doctors' reports, killed by cigarettes.

Let him drink light wines first, or ale or lager, and gradually he will be able to take something stronger, and as all styles of strong drink are more and more adulterated, his progress will be facilitated. With the old-time drinks a man seldom got delirium tremens before thirty or forty years of age; now he can get the madness by the time he is eighteen.

Let him play cards, enough money put up always to add interest to the game. If the father and mother will play with him, that will help by the way of countenancing the habit. And it will be such a pleasant thing to think over in the day of judgment, when the parents give account for the elevated manner in which they have reared their children.

Every pleasant Sunday afternoon take a carriage ride, and stop at the hotels on either side the road for Sabbath refreshments. Do not let the old-fogy prejudices against Sabbath-breaking dominate you. Have a membership in some club, where libertines go and tell about their victorious sins, and laugh as loud as any of them in derision of those who belong to the same sex as your sister and mother. Pitch your Bible overboard as old-fashioned and fit only for women and children. Read all the magazine articles that put Christianity at disadvantage, and go to hear all the lectures that malign Christ, who, they say, instead of being the Mighty One He pretended to be, was an impostor and the implanter of a great delusion. Go, at first out of curiosity, to see all the houses of dissipation, and then go because you have felt the thrall of their fascination. Getting along splendidly now!

The Chain Finished.

Let me see what further can I suggest in that direction. Become more defiant of all decency, more loud-mouthed in your atheism, more thoroughly alcoholized, and instead of the small stakes that will do well enough for games of chance in a ladies' parlor, put up something worthy, put up more, put up all you have. Well done! You have succeeded. You have made a chain—the tobacco habit one link, the rum habit one link, the impure club another link, infidelity another link, Sabbath desecration another link, uncleanness another link, and altogether they make a chain. And so there is a chain on your hand, and a chain on your foot, and a chain on your tongue, and a chain on your eye, and a chain on your brain, and a chain on your property, and

A Chain on your Soul.

Some day you wake up and you say: "I am tired of this, and I am going to get loose from this shackle." You pound away with the hammer of good resolution, but cannot break the thrall. Your friends join you in a conspiracy of help, but fall exhausted in the unavailing attempt. Now you begin, and with the writhing of a Laocoön, to try to break away, and the muscles are distended, and the great beads of perspiration dot your forehead, and with the concentered energies of body, mind, and soul you attempt to get loose, but have only made the chain sink deeper. All the devils that encamp in the wine-flask and the rum-jug and the decanter—for each one has a devil of its own—come out and sit around you and chatter.

In some midnight you spring from your couch and cry: "I am fast! O God, let me loose! O ye powers of darkness, let me loose! Father and mother and brothers and sisters, help me to get loose!" And you turn your prayer to blasphemy, and then your blasphemy into prayer, and to all the din and uproar there is played an accompaniment—not an accompaniment by key and pedal, but the accompaniment is rattle, and the rattle is that of a chain.

But I take a step higher, and tell you there is

A Power that can Break any Chain

—chain of body, chain of mind, chain of soul. The fetters that the hammer of the gospel have broken off, if piled together, would make a mountain. The captives whom Christ has set free, if stood side by side, would make an army. Quicker than a ship-chandler's furnace ever melted a cable, quicker than the bayonets of revolution pried open the Bastile, you may be liberated, and made a free son or a free daughter of God. You have only to choose between serfdom and emancipation, between a chain and a coronet, between Satan and God. Make up your mind, and make it up quick.

When the King of Sparta had crossed the Hellespont, and was about to march through Thrace, he sent word to the people in the different regions, asking them whether he should march through their countries as a friend or an enemy. "By all means as a friend," answered most of the regions; but the King of Macedon replied, "I will take time to consider it." "Then," said the King of Sparta, "let him consider it; but meantime we march — we march!" So Christ, our King, gives us our choice between His friendship and His frown, and many of us have long been considering what we had better do; but meantime He marches on, and our Opportunities are Marching by.

And we shall be the loving subjects of his reign, or the victims of our own obduracy. So, I urge you to precipitancy rather than slow deliberation, and I write all over your soul the words of Christ I saw inscribed on the monument of Princess Elizabeth, in the Isle of Wight, the words to which her index-finger pointed in the open Bible when she was found dead in her bed, "Come unto Me, all ye who are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

Is there a drunkard here? You may, by the Saviour's grace, have that fire of thirst utterly extinguished. Is there a defrauder here? You may be made a saint. Is there a libertine here? You may be made as pure as the light. When a minister, in an outdoor meeting in Scotland, was eulogizing goodness, there were hanging around the edge of the audience some of the most depraved men and women, and the minister said nothing about mercy for prodigals. And a depraved woman cried out, "Your rope is not long enough for the like of us." Blessed be God, our gospel can fathom the deepest depths, and reach to farthest wanderings, and here is a rope that is long enough to rescue the worst: "Whosoever will."

But why take extreme cases, when we all have been or are now the captives of sin and death? And we may, through drop our shackles and take a throne. You have looked at your hand and arm only as being useful now, and a curious piece of anatomy, but there is something about your hand and arm that makes me think they are an undeveloped wing. And if you would know what possibilities are suggested by that, ask the eagle, that has looked close into the eye of the noonday sun; or ask the albatross, that has struck its claw into the black locks of the tempest; or ask the condor that this morning is descending to the highest peak of Chimborazo. Your right hand and arm and your left hand and arm, two undeveloped wings, ready for the empyrean.

The Great Emancipator,

"Rise, my soul, and stretch thy wing, Thy better portion trace."

There have been chains famous in the world's history, such as the chain which fastened the prisoner of Chillon to the pillar—into the staple of which I have thrust my hand—on the isolated rock of the Lake of Geneva; such as the chain which the Russian exile clanks on his way to the mines of Siberia. Aye, there have been races in chains, and there has been but, thank God, the last one of them shall be broken, and, under the liberating power of the omnipotent Gospel, the shackles shall fall from the last neck and the last arm and the last foot. But these shattered fetters shall all be gathered up again from the dungeons and the workhouses and the mines and the rivers and the fields, and they shall again be welded and again strung link to link, and polished and transformed until this world, which has wandered off and been a recreant world and a lost world, shall by that chain be lifted and hung to the throne of God, no longer the iron chain of oppression, but the golden chain of redeeming love. There let this old ransomed world swing forever! Roll on, ye years, roll on, ye days, and hasten the glorious consummation!

A World in Chains;

THE WALLS OF JERUSALEM.

(See Illustration on Page 605.)

VISITORS to Jerusalem are generally disappointed by the comparatively modern character of its buildings, and still more by the fact that its chief religious edifices are devoted to Mohammedan worship. But few parts of the ancient city remain. Among those few is the fragment of the old wall depicted in the illustration. Mr. Laurence Oliphant states in his recently published work that "it is without doubt the oldest existing remains in Jerusalem, and formed part of the ramparts of the city." He believes its date to be the time of David.

The same author, who has spent many years in Jerusalem and other parts of Palestine, and who visited the city recently, was surprised to find a remarkable impression prevalent among the Jews who arrived there on pilgrimage, as well as among the settled population. He says that though he met and talked with Jews "of all nationalities and sects which, as a rule, hold each other in abhorrence, it is singular that they all have one view in common, or, rather, perhaps it should be said that they all seem to labor under one impression or presentiment, and that is, that before very long the Holy City will undergo a change of some sort." His descriptions of these conversations show that the expectation varies with the nationality of the person. Many expect annexation by either Russia or England, but all are feverishly inspired, as never before, with the idea that important changes are imminent which will in some way tend to the restoration of Jewish nationality. Thus not only are Jews of all nations vaguely expecting change, but Christians who, like Daniel, "understand by books the number of the years" (Dan. 9 : 2), are convinced that shortly, in about six years, the Jews under the protection of the Napoleonic Antichrist will return in large numbers to Jerusalem and commence the rebuilding of the city and the Temple.

STRIKING SCENES AT A CAMP-MEETING.

MANY striking conversions occurred at the recent camp-meeting at Wesley Grove, Orange County, N. Y., after the sermon which the Rev. Thomas Harrison preached, on "the Baptism of Fire." The Rev. John Boyd, who assisted in the personal work at the conclusion of the service, thus describes the most notable cases:

"An Aged Mother,

apparently near seventy years old, came to the altar in great distress, after listening to Mr. Harrison's sermon. 'Are you willing to give your heart to God?' said the brother to whom she spoke. 'I am,' said the aged woman, her eyes filled with tears. 'Then He accepts you now; do you believe it?' The Holy Spirit was working in her soul, and in a moment, with changed and glad countenance, she replied: 'I do give Him my heart, and I know He now saves me.' She rose to her feet, and told the friends standing by that her precious son, before he died, some time ago, had had a vision of heaven, with its gates of pearl, and shining walls, and the crystal throne, and hosts of glorious angels, and the sight was so resplendent that he seemed afterward unfit for earth, and a few days later he passed away. He earnestly desired to write what he had seen, but was unable to do so. When he died he had not even begun the book, which, could he have written it, would have been truly marvellous. 'Mother,' he said, shortly before he died, 'meet me in heaven. You are not a Christian now, but come to Jesus, and He will willingly save you.' The aged mother had been troubled in her soul from that moment, and found her way to Wesley Grove, where the seeking Saviour revealed Himself to her heart, and she went home rejoicing with joy unspeakable and full of glory.

"Seven Young Ladies

went forward, after the same sermon by Mr. Harrison, and found Christ for the first time. The more intelligent of the seven, who was a school-teacher, was the last and most difficult to direct and help—she was so fearful, should she obtain forgiveness, lest she might lose it; and Satan troubled on this line so much that there seemed little hope of her salvation. But the patient brother who assisted at the altar-service, kept looking to the Lord, that He might break the chain and set the captive at liberty; and the glad moment of her rescue at last came, and she exulted in her new-found Friend and Saviour.

"A Burden Removed.

"A lady who lives at Newburgh-on-the-Hudson, has been for many years a devoted and pious Christian lady, but for some time past had a burden on her heart, of which she could not speak to her nearest friend. She had no conception of how, if, indeed, she ever, in this world could obtain relief; but the Holy Spirit applied the sermon of Mr. Harrison to her soul, and suddenly she found herself deprived of her strength, and fell prostrate to the ground. She remained in this state for about thirty minutes, when suddenly she cried, 'Glory to God! glory to Jesus! O Lord and Master, how my soul loves Thee! Thou blessed and glorious Saviour, Thou Christ of my soul, praise be to Thy sweet name forever!' And rising to her feet, her face was seen to be lit up with divine sunshine, and she told the assembled thousands that the burden was gone from her heart, and the Lord had made her indescribably happy. The transformation in her face was indeed wonderful. It was now beautiful, indicating a heart relieved and filled with the love of God and the blessed influence of the Holy Spirit.

"A Long-Sought Possession.

"A similar case of direct operation of the Holy Spirit's power occurred on Sunday, August 19, in an Evangelical church in New York City. The regular pastor was absent, and the minister who supplied his pulpit preached an earnest sermon on the assurance of salvation given to those who believe. After the service an aged lady, whose name and family are well known in Christian and philanthropic circles in New York, went up to the platform and said to the preacher, clasping her hands, while the tears ran down her cheeks: 'O sir, is it possible for me to get that assurance of which you have been speaking? That is exactly what I want. I have been a member of ——— church for many years, but I have never had that witness of the Spirit that you have described.' 'Well Madam,' said the preacher, 'you know that it is there for you. You have only to take it by faith. Wait a moment, and we will pray that you may have the blessing.'

"The preacher beckoned two or three ladies, earnest members of the church, and two of the officers, who knelt down and joined the preacher and the lady in earnest pleading to God to reveal Himself by His Holy Spirit in the aged lady's heart. Her tears were still falling, and her expressive features showed how thoroughly in earnest she was. Addressing her, the preacher said: 'You know the Lord wants your heart, sister.' 'I do,' said she, with much feeling. 'He asks you for it now.' 'I know it,' said she. 'Are you willing, here and now, to give your heart to Him?' 'Why, yes, indeed I am,' was the quick and earnest response. 'Do you now give it to Him?' 'I do, most surely,' with much earnestness. 'Well, now, dear sister, does He accept it?' Before she could answer, the glory and salvation of God rushed into her soul, and her face was radiant with indescribable joy. She was overcome for a moment by the sudden rapture, but soon she rose from her knees crying, 'O glory to God, He has saved me! O Lord, I thank Thee, I thank Thee! I thought I was a Christian from my girlhood, but never until now, have I had the sure and certain witness of the Spirit. I have it now. Glory to God! Bless His Holy name!' She went away from that church with a new light on her face as clearly perceptible as the light that sparkled from the diamonds which glistened on her fingers and among her garments. God had filled her soul with joy unspeakable, and her face reflected His glory."

CHINESE IDOLS DESTROYED.

IN a letter recently received from a lady missionary of the China Island Mission, she says: "Mr. Chang brought his idols to be destroyed with those the old man in Yang's family had given us. After prayers we took them into the yard, and they were shivered to atoms. To our great joy, Mr. Yang stepped up and asked and gave the first blow to his, after which we all helped in turn. Those who have had the same experience will know something of our feelings as, for the first time, we saw the men smashing their false gods. Those who have not, can have no idea of the intense joy that welled up in our hearts, remembering the promise—'The idols shall be utterly abolished.' I am trusting to see the day when there shall not be one left in Hiao-i. That morning we found that Yang's old uncle had been smoking opium, and that his wife was in the habit of doing the same; we told them that this bad habit must also be given up, and they at once agreed to do so. They are both seventy-eight years old."

AN OFFERING TO GOD ACCEPTED.

A STRONG, healthy man recently gave the following testimony at Bethshan, as reported in Thy Healer:* "Fourteen years ago I was given up by doctors to die of consumption. I had three sisters who died at the ages of twenty-one, twenty-two, and twenty-six, of consumption. I was then taking an active part in open-air work, and the verdict was that unless I gave it all up I must die. I had been plastered and medicined, and all other things. One night I said: 'O Lord, if you will heal my body, and give me a pair of sound lungs, you shall have my body, and you shall have the good of it while I live.' I then and there, fourteen years ago, gave my body to the Lord. Then I said to my mother: 'I have done now with medicine and doctors for ever, by the grace of God.' She began to cry over me. She was afraid, for she had seen what the girls had gone through. I said: 'I have done now, and am going to the open air to preach Christ.' I then laid by the medicines and the plasters, and for fourteen years, excepting fourteen weeks in which I suffered from exhaustion through overwork, I have been in perfect health. I am a living proof that Jesus Christ is a living Saviour, and that His power is equal to all emergencies."

* Thy Healer and Faith Witness, a monthly Magazine, edited by Mrs. M. Baxter, contains original articles on Holiness and Healing, Authentic Testimonies of Divine Healing, and Items of Intelligence from Heathen Lands where missionaries are laboring in faith, soliciting no help from man, but relying solely on God for support. Annual Subscription, 75 cents, may be sent to Manager of CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

A WICKED PLOT DEFEATED.

A LADY missionary, who is laboring in India in connection with the Church Missionary Society, reports the following incident which occurred this spring, as an illustration of the hostility of the high-caste Hindoos to Christian converts: "One of our converts is a woman of a very respectable class of Hindoos. Her husband had deserted her, and left her to the care of her parents. Coming to the Mission Hospital one day as a patient, she heard for the first time the story of Jesus and His redeeming love which so impressed and moved her, that she could not rest until she had become His follower by public baptism. Her parents, on learning what she had done, became angry and at once separated her from all companionship with them. Henceforth she had to live in a miserable out-house alone with her child, being made to feel on every possible occasion, she was now a thing unlovable, untouchable, and unclean.

"All this she bore bravely, so long as her boy was permitted to share her isolation with her. But alas! the dreaded trial soon came. The child, her 'ankh ki putli' (pupil of the eye) as the natives so expressively call their children, was forcibly taken from her, lest he too should become, like his mother—a castaway. He was then sent to his father, who, in spite of his desertion of his wife, was considered by the woman's parents to be a better guardian of the boy's spiritual interests than his unhappy mother. But the poor creature's troubles were not to end here. A female relative, having heard of what ——— had done, instantly sent word that the parents should poison her, and thus rid the family of a living disgrace. At the same time she remarked that if there should be any difficulty about it, ——— might be sent on a visit to her. The parents not daring to do as was proposed, the female relative, a morose creature and hitherto no particular friend to ———, took the trouble to travel some hundreds of miles to see ———, and for the only time in her life showed excessive kindness to her newly made Christian relation, pressing her repeatedly to accompany her back to her home. Happily when heard of this spider-like attention to the innocent fly, and at once warned our young convert who, not suspecting the purpose for which she was invited, was most eager to go. The female relative soon after was obliged to leave. And thus the poor hunted soul escaped by the providence of God from the fatal net of the fowler.

A SERMON BEFORE IMAGES.

DURING a tour in Northern Mexico, which Mr. Crawford, of Hermosillo, describes in a letter to the Missionary Herald, he stopped at a village up the Sonora River, where, he says: "We held a meeting and the room was full. My Bible was lying upon the only table in the room, and it a family shrine, or at least used as such, for there was the large clay image of the Virgin adorned and crowned with gaudy dress and tinsel crown. I opened the Bible at Exodus 20, and talked to them for over half an hour upon the second and fourth commandments. Though I spoke of images, I took no notice nor made any allusion to the one at my back, close to the Bible from which I was reading. I dismissed them, but they sat still. It was then 9:30 P. M.

then explained to them the simple practice and usages of the gospel, but yet they made no move to go; so I took the hymn-book and sang several hymns alone. It was after 10 P. M. when they arose one by one, several requesting me to hold a meeting the next night. After all were gone, the owner of the house, sitting with me at the table with the image upon it, expressed the hope that we might come there and hold services, and when he learned that I had a wife and children he offered his house to us to live in and hold services. He was very kind, and charged nothing for his hospitality. When we wished to retire he provided me with a mat, which I laid down in the driveway to the corral, where it would be cool."

PROPHETIC CHRONOLOGY.

By G. H. Pember, M. A.*

The Suspension of Prophetic Time—Lasts During Israel's Subjection or Exclusion From Palestine—A Key to an Apparent Contradiction—The Ninety-three Years Missing From the Old Testament Record—Made Up of Five Periods of Suspension—The Line of Gentile Prophecy Unbroken From Nebuchadnezzar to Antichrist—The Resumption of Israel's Record Explained to Daniel—The People to Return Under Antichrist—The Last of the Seventy Heptads.

INSPIRED writers sometimes use a mystical chronology in dealing with the times of Israel which is based on a very simple principle. Israel once brought out of Egypt should have been the people of God for ever without any intermission. But they provoked Him by their idolatries, so that He repeatedly "sold them" into the hands of their enemies. And whenever He did so,

The Theocracy Was Suspended, and the time of their servitude was not reckoned in the mystic chronology.

A remarkable illustration of this fact is connected with the prophecy of the Seventy Weeks. There the whole time from the Lord's rejection as King by the daughter of Zion to the still future day on which Antichrist will make his covenant with the Jews, is omitted from the calculation, because it is the Lo-ammi-period, during which no Israelites of any tribe can be nationally recognized as the people of God.

Another instructive instance occurs in the Book of Kings (1 Kings 6:1), where we are told that Solomon began to build the Temple in the fourth year of his reign, and "in the four hundred and eightieth year after the children of Israel were come out of Egypt."

But if we turn to the thirteenth chapter of "Acts" we shall meet with a very different computation. For there Paul speaks of the Israelites as having passed forty years in the wilderness, four hundred and fifty under the judges, and forty under Saul. (Acts 13:18–21.) If to these five hundred and thirty years we add the forty during which David was king (1 Kings 2:11), and the three of Solomon's reign which had gone by before he commenced his great work, we see that Paul reckons five hundred and seventy-three years between the Exodus and the building of the Temple. Here, then, is of no small magnitude. For the same period contains—

An Apparent Discrepancy

According to Paul	573 years.
And according to the Book of Kings	480 "
So that the difference is	93 "

Now some chronologists defend Paul's calculation, some that of the Book of Kings: but, for aught they say, the result is in either case equally disastrous, since one of the two inspired writers is always shown to be wrong. If, however, we apply the principle stated above, the discrepancy vanishes, and it appears that neither the author of the Book of Kings nor Paul is mistaken; but that the former is reckoning by the mystical and the latter by the ordinary chronology. Nor is there any difficulty in demonstrating the fact.

During the period in question the only instances of God's formal, though temporary, rejection of His people occur in the Book of Judges. And turning to that book we find that He sold them to Chushan-rishathaim, king of Mesopotamia, for eight years; to Eglon, king of Moab, for eighteen; to Jabin, king of Canaan, for twenty; to the Midianites, for seven; and to the Philistines, for forty.

There is also mention of an oppression by the Ammonites lasting eighteen years; but this was contemporaneous with that of the Philistines (Judges 10:7), and may, therefore, be omitted from our calculation.

The times, then, during which their enemies ruled over the Israelites, and the theocracy was, consequently, suspended, were as follows:

Cushan-rishathaim	8 years.
Eglon	18 "
Jabin	20 "
The Midianites	7 "
The Philistines	40 "
	93 "

Thus the sum of the times of servitude is ninety-three years, which, as we have just seen, is the exact difference between the lengths assigned to the period from the Exodus to the Temple in the "Acts" and the Book of Kings.

This instance unquestionably demonstrates the principle of the mystic chronology as applied to the history of Israel. And, among other lessons, it warns us to beware of finding mistakes in the Scriptures. If a discrepancy so utterly hopeless, to all appearance, as that which we have been considering is made to vanish in a moment by the discovery and application of one of the Divine laws, should we not unhesitatingly attribute other difficulties which we may encounter to our own ignorance of the clue rather than to error in the revelation of God?

The whole line of

Gentile Prophecy,

flows in an unbroken stream from Nebuchadnezzar to the last great head of the Fourth Empire. And we are now in the clay-iron times of the feet of the image, and the world is soon to see the revival of the Roman Empire under the form of ten confederate kingdoms, the brief but memorable course of which will be cut short by the fall of the stone from the mountain—that is, by the descent of the Lord Jesus from the height of His power.

But while earth was bending to the sway of the Babylonian monarch, or shuddering beneath the tread of Persian myriads; while men were wondering at the lightning-rapidity and irresistible bravery of the legions of Alexander, or saluting Cæsar as Lord of the world and a present deity; when the crown was placed on the brow of Charlemagne, and the majesty of Rome again hovered over Europe; while the Eastern Empire was being destroyed by Moslem hordes; or while the armies of Napoleon were spreading like a prairie-fire over the surface of Christendom—what, during these long times of commotion and change, was the counsel of God in regard to the Jew? Had He cast away His people? God forbid! He had not cast away His people whom He foreknew.

Through all the turmoil of Gentile times His purpose concerning Israel has remained sure. And although the children of Abraham have long been a nation scattered and peeled, a nation meeted out and trodden down, whose land invaders, like overflowing rivers, have spoiled; yet when the iniquity of the Gentiles is full, and God's patience with them exhausted, Israel shall come into remembrance and be again gathered. Great Babylon shall fall, and Jerusalem shall arise and shine as the true city of the great King, and the joy of the whole earth.

The Key to the Future

of Israel is to be found in the ninth chapter of Daniel. If we understand that portion of God's Word, our difficulty with the remainder of Hebrew prophecy will be greatly diminished, and we shall easily see how to arrange other predictions each in its own place.

Nor is this all. The closing verses of the chapter, by marking out the times of God's dealings with the Jews, instruct us also in regard to the position of the Church in the grand progress of his purposes; and show us that, although her members will hereafter reign with Christ, she, nevertheless, at present occupies a mere parenthesis in the world-history. The Church has indeed a glorious destiny; but her calling is heavenly, while the Israelites shall be the Kings of the Earth. Since, therefore, prophecy mainly refers to earth, the Israelite has by far the greatest share of it.

The Lord has given but two continuous prophecies of the Church, while the prophetic Scriptures abound with details of the time when He will resume His covenant relations with Israel.

This was the outline of God's dealings with the Jews, as it was revealed to Daniel; For four hundred and eighty-three years, commencing with the decree of Artaxerxes. March 14. 445 B. C. His Spirit strives with them in their own land, and at the close of that appointed time, Messiah the Prince appears, and they reject Him. He comes unto His own, and His own receive Him not. Then He also rejects them, and casts them out to endure the curse uttered by Moses.

Anon they will return, and place themselves under the protection of the last head of the Fourth Gentile Empire. And when He makes His covenant with them, then man, the world, and Satan know that but seven short years remain for the indulgence of unbridled sin. At that time the great body of the nation will be in unbelief, and will, therefore, share in the madness of the world, and wonder after and worship the Beast. And of the small number who do fear Jehovah, few, if any, will know the Lord Jesus as the Lamb of God, however they may recognize Him as their Messiah and King; for, according to Zechariah, neither the house of David, nor the inhabitants of Jerusalem, will find out the fountain that is opened for sin and for uncleanness, until they have actually beheld the face of Him whom they pierced. That is implied in the eighth and ninth chapters of Daniel, and so it is also in the sixty-sixth of Isaiah. But the latter passage reveals to us the spirit in which the restored exiles will undertake the work, and the Lord's indignant rejection of that which is done by proud and self-willed sinners, who choose their own ways, and know nothing of the broken and contrite heart in which alone He delights.

They Will Rebuild the Temple,

At the same time there is a recognition of some few who will tremble at the word of the Lord, and whose brethren will hate them and cast them out for His name's sake, while they hypocritically say: "Let the Lord be glorified." These afflicted ones are strengthened for their brief trial by the significant words, "But He shall appear to your joy, and they shall be ashamed."

When the Temple has been thus erected by the unsuspecting Jews, all will be ready for the fearful scenes which are to close the dispensation, and which are especially foretold in the sermon on the Mount of Olives, and in some of the chapters of the Apocalypse.

* From the third edition of his invaluable work entitled "The Great Prophecies Concerning the Jews, the Gentiles, and the Church of God." It is written in a most popular and eloquent style, and describes the impending fulfilment of Revelation and Daniel, and is illustrated by a colored chart. 458 pages. For sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York. Price, including postage, $1.

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION—1888.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled, "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting 75 cents. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-Class Matter.

The thanks of the Publishers of "The Christian Herald" are cordially tendered to subscribers who are endeavoring to extend the sphere of its usefulness by sending it to their friends, to clergymen, and others to whom its contents may prove useful. In order to facilitate and multiply such efforts as far as possible, a concession in price will be made. Any person wishing to introduce "The Christian Herald" where it may do good, may send to the Manager, 63 Bible House, New York, for which sum the paper will be mailed from date until the end of the year 1888, to any address in the United States or Canada. A similar offer in former years has been much blessed. Persons have written to this office expressing their thankfulness that the paper, thus introduced to them through the kindness of some friend, has been the means of good to their own souls, or has helped them in their labors for the salvation of others. The Publishers prayerfully hope that a like result may attend the effort this year.

TWENTY-FIVE CENTS

CURRENT EVENTS.

The New York State Democratic Convention at Buffalo, on September 12, renominated David B. Hill for Governor. The nomination was made by acclamation, and was zealously pressed by influential members of the party. Unusual interest centres about this nomination. It was made in defiance of those Republicans who have been supporting Mr. Cleveland, and who are pledged to support him again this year. They, with a section of the Democrats, held a large meeting recently in New York City, to protest against the nomination, and warned the forthcoming convention that if Hill were nominated they would not vote for him. The Governor, however, has the enthusiastic support of the powerful liquor interest, which he earned by his veto of the High License bill. He has also the support of the older Democrats, who have no sympathy with the new civil-service system. Henry George, and several other prominent men, are as strongly opposed to him. They declare that they will vote the Democratic ticket for President, and the Republican ticket for Governor. The result will be worthy of analysis, as it will throw light on that much-disputed question—the value of the Mugwump vote.

Both Mr. Cleveland and Gen. Harrison have issued their letters of acceptance. It is clear that in both cases the candidates have made an effort to voice the platform of their respective parties, and to the critical reader it would seem that in each case an effort was needed. Mr. Cleveland apparently desires to conciliate the Randall wing of his party, while Gen. Harrison is anxious to secure the support of those western Republicans who are not so strongly protectionist as the eastern section of the party. Thus the two candidates approach each other more nearly than might have been expected of the leaders in so gigantic a struggle. Mr. Cleveland says: "We have entered upon no crusade of free trade. The reform we seek to inaugurate is predicated upon the utmost care for established industries and enterprises, and a jealous regard for the interests of American labor." Gen. Harrison, writing on the same subject, says: "We do not offer a fixed schedule, but a principle. We will revise the schedule and modify rates, but always with an intelligent provision as to the effect upon domestic production and the wages of our working-people." This in both letters appears to mean revision and reduction of duties, with special regard for the interests of labor. The American workman, who has not lost faith in the promises and pledges of candidates for his vote, will therefore be under no apprehension in either case, as both candidates promise that his interests shall be carefully guarded. One feature of Gen. Harrison's letter should not be overlooked. He declares himself an enemy of "trusts," which he stigmatizes as "abuses," and thinks that they should be dealt with by legislative authority. This is important, because Mr. Blaine's recent utterance on the same subject led many persons to believe that the Republican programme did not include hostile action against the trusts.

The Election in Maine Last Week did not afford the decisive indications expected of it as to the result of the Presidential contest. The average Republican plurality of September elections in Maine in the years in which the Republicans carried the State since 1868 has been, according to the New York Tribune, 18,228. Last week it was 18,495. In 1884 it was 19,851, and in 1886, 12,850. Comparing the party votes last week with the votes of the September election of 1884, the latest Presidential year, it appears that the Republican vote has increased by 1,824, and the Democratic vote has increased by 3,038. As the vote for the Presidency in the State is generally much heavier than in a State election, it is evident that neither party has much material on which to base an estimate. The Prohibition vote was 2,971, which is slightly less than in 1886, when it was 3,872. In 1884 it was 1,190.

The Death of the Famous Astronomer, Richard A. Proctor, caused a sensation in New York on September 12. Mr. Proctor died of yellow fever in a city hospital. He arrived from his home in Marion County, Florida, which is eighty miles from Jacksonville, on September 10. There was no case of yellow fever anywhere near his residence, but he had to travel through the infected district to reach New York. On his arrival he complained to the hotel-keeper of lassitude and fatigue, and as he came from Florida it was deemed advisable to have medical advice. The physician first summoned, on examining the patient suspected yellow fever, and called in two other physicians for consultation. His opinion was confirmed, and Mr. Proctor was removed to a hospital. The disease made rapid progress, and he died in less than twenty-four hours. The health authorities took prompt measures to prevent the spread of the infection. The entire contents of the room he had occupied at the hotel, were immediately removed and burned, and other preventive measures taken. Mr. Proctor was only fifty-one years of age. He was on his way to England for a lecture tour, his passage having been taken on a steamer which left New York on Sept. 15.

The State of Affairs at Jacksonville, Fla., throughout last week was one of increased depression. The plague continued to seize new victims, and the daily record of deaths grew heavier. On Wednesday the new cases were reported to be fifty-nine for the previous twenty-four hours. On Tuesday there were twelve deaths, the heaviest death-list for any day since the outbreak. The physicians and nurses are completely worn out, but others have heroically gone from various points to their relief. The most welcome of these volunteers was Dr. L. A. Bryan, who arrived from Houston, Tex., on September 13. He was one of the heroes of the Memphis epidemic ten years ago, and probably knows more about yellow fever than any physician in the country. A refugee train was at last permitted to leave the city on September 12. It carried about 320 persons. They were taken to Hendersonville, N. C., where they were to be detained in quarantine for ten days before proceeding to their respective destinations. A remarkable feature of the city in its affliction is the almost total cessation of liquor drinking. The warning of the physicians has had its effect on the people. Several bar-rooms have closed entirely, and in those that are still open customers are rare.

Destructive Floods are Reported from Mexico, with serious loss of life. The entire eastern coast has suffered severely. Advices from Orizaba state that all the rivers and creeks in that vicinity have overflowed their banks. Many houses have been thrown down, and several lives have been lost. All the streams on the road from the city of Mexico to Vera Cruz have risen, stopping traffic. Medellin was completely under water and abandoned, the inhabitants having fled to the hills. The Alvarado railroad is fully one meter under water, and in some parts even three meters. The inhabitants of Janapa, Medellin, Soledad, and Boca del Rio are in a pitiable condition, and are without the necessaries of life. The crops near the Catazaja and Janapa rivers and their tributaries are totally lost. At the Paso Solis de Soledad ranch over twenty thousand animals were drowned.

Ominous News from Africa was Received on September 13. Reports from the Congo River stated that intelligence had come from the expedition sent to find and relieve Mr. H. M. Stanley, that Major Barttelot, the leader of the expedition, had been murdered by his carriers. His companion, Jamieson, was reported to be at Stanley Falls, organizing a new expedition. Some many false reports of disaster to white explorers circulate among the natives that there is still hope that this news may not be true. Major Barttelot's expedition left Yambuga, on the Aruwimi River, in the spring, for Emin Pasha's station at Wadelai, with the 500 loads of goods for Emin which Stanley was compelled to leave behind him. Major Barttelot is the officer whom Stanley left in charge of his camp at Yambuga a year ago last June. He was to follow Stanley with the rest of the goods as soon as a sufficient number of carriers were obtained. Tippu Tib was unable for many months to furnish the carriers he had promised. Finally Tippu Tib and Mr. Jamieson, one of Stanley's officers, raised a force of carriers, and a note from Jamieson, dated April 15, this year, says that Major Barttelot and he were preparing to leave Yambuga for Wadelai with Tippu Tib and 900 men. A later despatch announced that the expedition had started. The carriers were, for the most part, natives recruited from Kasongo, the home of Tippu Tib.

A Remarkable Marriage Took Place in Turin, Italy, on September 11. The daughter of Prince Jerome Napoleon and the Princess Clotilde, sister of the King of Italy, was married to the Duke of Aosta, who is the brother of the Princess Clotilde, and therefore the uncle of his bride. The union, strange as it appears, is decreed perfectly legitimate by Roman Catholics, and the Pope granted his approval of it. The bridegroom is forty-three years old, and the bride twenty-two. The Duke was made King of Spain in 1870. He was popular for a short time, but in 1873 the discontent of the Spaniards with his rule culminated in plots against his life, and he therefore abdicated and returned to Italy. It is not impossible that he may succeed his brother, King Humbert, on the Italian throne, as the King's only son is in precarious health. The Duke of Aosta is the next heir.

The Emperor of Germany is to Visit Rome in October. A difficult question of royal etiquette has arisen out of his proposed trip. The Pope, whom the Emperor is especially desirous of conciliating, on account of his influence over German Catholics, haughtily refuses to recognize the King of Italy, who will be the Emperor's host during his visit to the Italian capital. Hence there was a necessity for delicate diplomatic negotiations to soothe the sensibilities of the Pope. An effort has been made to induce the Emperor to visit the Pope before going to the King's palace, but this is said to have been unsuccessful. Both the spiritual and temporal potentate are reported to be making great efforts to render the visit a memorable one.

The Offence of Preaching on the Common of Boston, Mass., has been expiated, and the offender, the Rev. W. F. Davis, having served his sentence of a year's imprisonment, with the usual deduction to which he was entitled by good behavior, has been set at liberty. Several carriages containing his friends went to meet him at the jail, and he received a warm welcome. A Boston journal reports that Mr. Davis preached to a large audience on the Sunday after his release. He spoke for an hour with much earnestness and seemingly unimpaired vigor. He declared that God had called him to the especial work of preaching Christ, and that he meant to persist in preaching the gospel to common people on common ground. His experience in jail he had found profitable, in that it had given him sympathy with and access to the people most in need of help. The city of Boston, in his opinion, is ruled by the rum-sellers and the Jesuits. Mr. Davis's counsel is reported to have secured a permit for his client, who will therefore not be molested hereafter by the police. He is said to have taken this step without the knowledge or consent of Mr. Davis.

The Opposition of the Roman Catholic Priests of Boston to the public schools, and their recent announcement that children attending them will not be prepared for their "first communion," has stirred up the Protestants of the city to united action. At a meeting of the Evangelical Alliance, held on September 10, it was resolved: "that the State should at once resume the entire control of public education, and make attendance compulsory upon all children of school age and good health, except those who attend such private schools as are under the approval of the State; and we hereby petition the General Court to enact laws that shall secure this result; and we call upon all citizens, irrespective of partisan relations, to unite in maintaining the public schools."

A Blind Man's Skill in Distinguishing Bank-notes was mentioned in the obituary notice of a well-known restaurant keeper of Paterson, N. J., last week. When he was a young man he was working at his trade as a machinist, and met with an accident which resulted in the loss of a leg. He started a restaurant. In a few years he became blind in one eye from cataract, and had numerous operations performed by Dr. Agnew and others. They were of no avail, and soon the disease extended to the other eye and he became totally blind. He possessed the faculty of making change as well as a man with his sight. Not only coins, but bank-bills could be distinguished by him. He never failed to recognize the denomination, except when the Government issued a new form, which would confuse him for a day or two. He said that each denomination had a distinct feeling about it that made it immediately distinguishable. He officiated for many years as cashier of his restaurant, and was never known to make a mistake. Astonishing as this faculty was in ordinary affairs, it is by no means uncommon in spiritual concerns. Many who are utterly blind to spiritual realities are unsurpassed in their power of accurately appraising earthly values. (1 Cor. 2: 14.)

A Romantic Legacy was paid Last Week to a widow in Brooklyn, N. Y. It appears that in 1863, the widow, then a girl of nineteen, was living with her father in Pennsylvania, not far from the field of Gettysburg. Her two brothers were privates in the Union army, and both fought in the celebrated three-days' struggle. One was killed, and the other, when wounded, was carried into his father's house, which had been converted into a hospital, and in which the girl herself was a most indefatigable nurse. Among the other inmates was a young Confederate officer, who had his left arm shot off. He recovered under the girl's care, and impressed her father so favorably that he agreed to be responsible for his parole. When the war closed, the young officer found himself in love, but the girl refused him. She said she could never bring herself to accept an officer of the army under whose bullets her beloved brother had fallen. He begged a lock of her hair as a memento, and returned to the South. The girl came north, married, and settled in Brooklyn. Her husband died last year and she opened a boarding-house. Nothing more was heard of the Confederate officer until last week, when the widow received a letter from a New Orleans lawyer, stating that the officer was dead and had left her $5,000. In the letter was a gold locket containing the lock of hair she had given him a quarter of a century ago. The officer must have kept track of her all those years without her knowledge. The widow was much surprised by the handsome bequest. In the day of final reward, similar surprise will be felt by many, whose deeds of love and kindness are then divinely acknowledged. (Matt. 25: 37-40.)

A Defective Rope Led to the Death of Two men and a woman in Ohio recently. A press despatch from Steubenville, O., states that a farmer near that town was, with his son's assistance, digging a well, hoisting the earth and stone with a windlass and big bucket. When one load was near the surface the rope broke, and the bucket fell ten feet upon the son, who was in the well. The father got help, and was lowered into the well, where he found the young man insensible. He tied the rope to his body, and the neighbors drew it out, and lowered the rope for the father; but as they drew him up, the rope again broke, and he fell to the bottom, breaking his neck and dying instantly. By the time the dead body of the father was brought out the son had died. The wife and mother was so shocked at the death of her husband and son, that she died in a few hours. It seems extraordinary that men who were about to depend on the strength of a rope should have neglected to thoroughly examine it before venturing their lives; yet men with eternal life at stake are found trusting to good works, religious profession, and other vain hopes of salvation, when an examination of them in the light of God's Word would reveal their frailty. (Acts 4: 12.)

Two Five-Thousand-Dollar Coffins are in process of construction in Boston, Mass. The Boston Budget states that a local manufacturer is executing an order for two caskets for a customer, who shows a princely disregard of outlay. They are intended for the use of himself and his wife when they die, and each will cost $5,000. They are made of mahogany, seven inches thick, carved in bold relief with the most elaborate designs. All of these are in some manner emblematic of death. On the panel a spider—itself symbolic of the grim destroyer—has caught the fly at last in a web delicately executed. In another place a griffin's claw supports a human skull, from a fracture in which a lizard is crawling. Still another panel shows an owl in the act of capturing a mouse, and so on, the intention being to express the idea that death comes soon or late to every living thing. On the top of each coffin is carved a coat-of-arms, and every available inch of the interior is beautified by the cutting tools. Inside of each of these superb caskets is swung a silken hammock for the eventual reception of a body, and a mausoleum to cost $150,000 is to be erected to contain them. It would appear that this couple intend that their bodies shall be splendidly housed after death, whatever may then be the condition of their souls. Happily, the place in which the soul will abide through eternity is not determined by wealth. The eternal mansions are open to the rich and poor without money and without price, and more of the poor than of the rich will inherit them. (Mark 10: 23.)

A Narrow Escape From a Rattlesnake Oc- curred to a Brooklyn, N. Y., girl two weeks ago in the Catskills. The reptiles have been unusually numerous and bold in that locality this year, and at the beginning of this month reports were circulated in the boarding-houses about Overlook Mountain, of a very large rattler having been seen in the woods on the mountain. A party was organized to go out and kill it, and several ladies insisted on going with the men. When a few black snakes were found, however, most of the ladies lost their courage, and returned home. A few went on, including a young lady from Brooklyn, who laughed at the idea of danger. As she had a persistent habit of wandering off on solitary rambles, she was warned against straying from the party on this occasion. But she slipped away after a time, and her absence was not noticed until a sharp scream, and then a second fainter one, alarmed the party. Rushing to the spot whence the cries proceeded, an enormous rattlesnake was seen already coiled, and about to spring on the prostrate body of the girl, who had swooned and was lying on the ground. A heavy blow from a stout cane crippled the snake, but it showed fight still, and there was considerable difficulty in killing it. When the girl recovered consciousness she insisted that the snake had bitten her, but she had not been injured. Unhappily, young people who disregard the warnings given them against going into moral danger seldom so escape. More frequently they are ruined, body and soul. (Prov. 28: 26.)

BRIEF NOTES.

A Baptist church in Louisville, Ky., reports an accession of ten members from the Church of Rome during the past three months.

Chancellor Horstman, of the Archdiocese of Philadelphia, says there are in that city 182,000 Romanists, and in the archdiocese 400,000.

Judge Ney, of Iowa, has decided that under the prohibitory liquor law of that State it is unlawful for a man to manufacture cider for use in his own family.

The eight theological seminaries of the Presbyterian Church had, last year, 607 students. The average cost for the education of each of these students was $453.

Rev. B. Fay Mills, the evangelist, is holding services near his home. In October he goes to Philadelphia for united services on the invitation of fifteen churches.

Senator Blair estimates that there are at least ten millions of people in the United States who are in favor of the abolition of the liquor traffic by national legislation.

The Boston Young Men's Christian Association are co-operating in gospel tent work, in that city, under the direction of G. S. Avery and Myron D. Fuller. The former is the evangelist.

Rev. Henry E. Benoit, of the Methodist Church, who has been appointed to missionary work among the four hundred thousand French residents in New England, proposes to itinerate with a tent.

An offer of $5,000 a year to play base-ball has been made to Mr. Stagg, of the last graduating class of Yale University. He has refused it to enter upon theological studies in preparation for the ministry.

The Day of Prayer designated by the officers of the World's and the National W. C. T. Unions is October 14. It is earnestly requested that on that day ministers will preach on the temperance question.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union of New Hampshire are making arrangements to open a home for intemperate women. The State Legislature has granted the sum of $5,000 to start the work.

Though printers and publishers of books complain that their business is dull beyond precedent, the Bible Society issued during the month of August 63,457 volumes, which make 389,851 issued since April.

Rev. Louis R. Scudder, M. D., has sailed with Mrs. Scudder on the Furnessia for Glasgow, on their way to join the Arcot Mission. The Students' Missionary Association has pledged itself for their support in the field.

Rev. John T. Vine, Baptist evangelist, has commenced his fall and winter special services in the First Baptist Church at Gouverneur, N. Y. Mr. Vine may be addressed at 238 West Fifty-first Street, New York City.

Arrangements are in progress for establishing a California Congregational Colony, in a very delightful and salubrious locality, which shall be a place of resort as well as residence, and an educational centre, with a church.

The treasurer of the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions states that the receipts for the eleven months of the fiscal year amount to $479,757, against $397,562 for the same period of the previous year.

At the Cincinnati annual Methodist Episcopal Conference, in session in Jamestown, O., Dr. I. C. Iliff, in charge of the Methodist Mission in Utah, said that, notwithstanding reports given out by the press in general, polygamy is on a decline in Utah, owing to the vigorous enforcement of the Edmunds law.

Mr. John Currie, the self-educated evangelist, has gone to Leadville, Col., with Mr. Peter Bilhorn, the gospel singer, to hold services among the miners. Mr. Bilhorn's hymn-book entitled "Crowning Glory," which contains his solos and songs is having a large sale. The profits go to the support of a People's Mission in Chicago.

THE PERSONAL REVELATION.

A New Sermon, by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven." Matt. 16: 17.

The Test Question—A Distinction Between the World and Disciples—Wrong Judgments—May be Respectful—Are Unblessed—The Knowledge the Disciples had of Jesus—I. Different from that of the World—Solemn and Personal—Definite—Permanent—II. Revealed in a Special Way—Reasoning Useless—Teaching Fails—Regeneration Necessary—Purity Essential—III. Its Peculiar Marks—Full of Certainty—Attended with Sacred Operations—Abides Forever—IV. Secures Peculiar Privileges.

THIS is one of the earliest places in the New Testament in which we find any mention of the church. Jesus says, in verse eighteen, "I will build my church." It is very significant that our Lord should connect with the church the right idea of Himself. In our text we have the test question which must be put to every one who is to be admitted into the assembly of the Lord—"Whom say ye that I am?" The first question to be put to one who would join the church is, "What thinkest thou of Jesus?" You cannot be right in the rest unless you think rightly of Him. If you do not begin aright with Jesus, the Christ, the Son of the living God, you will not go on aright, and your joining of any visible church will be a mistake which will be injurious both to yourself and the church. Beloved, let it be with you first Christ, then the church.

In putting the question about Himself, our Lord made a distinction between who are named as "men," and as His disciples. He inquired, "Whom do men say that I, the Son of man, am?" These "men" formed their judgment of Christ according to flesh and blood: they went upon the ground of carnal reasoning; or else they followed current opinion. They went upon natural, and not upon spiritual, grounds; they discerned nothing of spiritual things: their judgment was that of flesh and blood. What conclusion did they arrive at while guided by flesh and blood?

Two Classes of Persons,

The conclusions were diverse: "Some say thou art John the Baptist; some, Elias; and others, Jeremias, or one of the prophets." Error is multiform; truth is one. A thousand lies will live together, and tolerate each other, especially at this time, when errorists are all crying out, "Cast in thy lot with us; let us all have one purse," The results to-day of the judgments of men about Christ are very many; but they agree in this, that they contradict the one and only truth. To-day, some say, "He is a good man," others say, "Nay, but He deceiveth the people." Some say that He is divine, though not actually God; others, that He has become God, though He was not always so; and a third company think Him a divine man. Some agree that His teachings were admirable for the occasions on which He delivered them, but that they are somewhat stale in this advanced age; while others ridicule His teachings as altogether impracticable. The doctrines of flesh and blood concerning Jesus are various.

The Judgments of Men

here recorded are respectful to our Lord Jesus. It is usual nowadays to speak very respectfully of Him—if there can be any respectfulness in words which deny His Godhead. To-day they rend the seamless vesture of the Crucified. They retain His example, and profess to value it; but His sacrifice they fling aside as a rag of superstition. They dare to deny His miracles while they applaud His precepts: they will have nothing to do with the doctrine of the cross; but with the self-denial of the cross they affect to be enamored. Our Lord will not thus be divided. Those who take not a whole Christ take not Christ at all.

Whether the conclusions of flesh and blood are respectful to Jesus or not, they are every one of them wrong. In the favorable summary here given, not one conjecture of men is correct. Jesus was not John the Baptist, nor Elias, nor Jeremias, nor one of the prophets. Assuredly He was not Beelzebub. Men did not know what Jesus was. They neither knew Him, nor His Father. The character of Jesus is much too hard a nut for philosophic teeth to crack.

The conclusions of flesh and blood are unblessed. No blessing attached to any of the various notions which men hold concerning the Son of man; but that judgment which came by revelation from the Father made Simon Peter blessed, and our Lord beheld and declared the blessing. Gazing at Jesus as if He were John the Baptist, or Elias, brought no blessing with it; and if Jesus be not known by the revelation of the Holy Ghost, He is not known as a well-spring of blessedness to the soul. If you know no more of Christ than the world knows, than the learned know, than the philosophical know, you have not found the blessing. If you know no more of Christ than you have found out for yourselves, even by reading the Word of God, unaided by the Father, you are not blessed. If you know no more of Jesus than flesh and blood has revealed to you, it has brought you no more blessing than the conjectures of their age brought to the Pharisees and Sadducees, who remained an adulterous and unbelieving generation.

The Disciples' Knowledge.

There was a handful of people in the world in the Saviour's day who were known as His disciples. To them He put the question, "Whom say ye that I am?" They were disciples, that is, learners; they were not so much "thoughtful men," as the cant phrase now is, as learners. They received what He imparted to them; His "Verily, verily," being to them better than reasoning. As disciples, they were also servants—they learned obedience. They knew Jesus by following in His steps. Put these two things together, learners and servants, and you will see how different they were from the men of the world. Judge ye, dear hearers, to which you belong, whether ye are "men," boasting of your intellect, guided by "flesh and blood," or whether ye are "His disciples," who judge after the Spirit, and are taught of the Father.

I. Our first observation is this—the knowledge of the disciples of Jesus Differs From That of the World.

It is more serious, more thoughtful, more personal. Men of the world said, "We do not know who Jesus may be. He is a very remarkable person: He disturbs the quiet of the age, and He is certainly out of His element among us. We do not know who He may be, and we do not particularly care." Herod came to the hasty conclusion that John the Baptist was risen from the dead. Others said, "It is very likely Elijah, who was to appear before the coming of the Messiah." A third party, hearing of His sorrows, thought that He might be Jeremiah redivivus. He might be some other prophet, but it did not matter which. The disciples had arrived at their conclusion solemnly, thoughtfully, carefully, each one for himself; and when the Saviour said to them, "Whom say ye that I am?" they would any one of them have spoken, only they had fallen into the habit of making Peter the foreman and mouthpiece of the twelve, and so he spake first, and said, very properly and positively, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God."

To my mind these words have a tone of deep solemnity. Evidently the man means what he says, values the truth he speaks, and attaches deep importance to it. The replies of the world were flippant and frothy; but the answer of the apostles was devout and deliberate, for they judged the subject to be one of the highest importance. Now, beloved, what do you think of Jesus? Is His name a weighty matter with you? Has He washed you in His blood? Have you taken Him to be your all in all? Personally, for yourself, have you done this, and done it with care and deliberation? Will you repeat your choice this morning? Well, then, in this you are what a disciple should be.

In the next place, the disciples' knowledge

Is More Definite,

more clear, more assured. If you had asked the outsiders about Jesus, they would have said, "Well, perhaps He is John the Baptist, or perhaps He is Jeremias"; but their notions were all in the clouds: they could not make Him out. But to the disciples Jesus was known, and His personality was distinct. They knew enough to say for certain, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." I will not enlarge upon this, but come to the close grips with you. Do you believe in Jesus by an inward discernment of Him? Is He to you, clearly and distinctly, the Son of man and the Son of God? Is He to you, definitely, your Saviour, whom God hath set forth to be the propitiation for your sins? Is He your surety, substitute, and sacrifice? Beware of a misty religion! Beware of that which is without form, for it is sure to be void!

Thirdly, this knowledge of the disciples was unanimous. Outside the circle Jesus was a dozen things; inside the circle He was only one—"Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." Beloved, men sometimes talk to us of the divisions in the Christian church, and it is a pity there should be even the semblance of a division there; but I am bold to say that there is no real division in the true church of Jesus Christ. Those who are really taught of the Father believe one doctrine concerning Jesus.

Furthermore, the true disciples' knowledge of Christ differs from that of men in that

It is Permanent.

The verdict of men concerning the Lord Jesus is changeable as the wind. In one age Jesus was hounded down as the Nazarene, the blasphemer. By-and-by men would set up His statue in the Pantheon among the gods. In one age, His teachings were held to be deeply philosophical, and the gnostics began to mystify them at a great rate: at another period they were denounced as visionary, or ridiculed as absurd. They say well of Him one day, they speak ill of Him another day: what matters it what they say? He needs no honor from them, and He fears not their dishonor. Unless they will believe in Him as Lord and Saviour, it is of no importance what they think of Him.

Once more, the knowledge which disciples have of Christ differs from that of the world, in that it is more influential. The world is not influenced by believing on Jesus as John the Baptist; but we are greatly influenced by believing that He is the Son of God. This takes possession of our heart, our head, our eye, our hand, our foot, our body, our soul, and our spirit. This Son of God is Lord over us. He sits supreme upon the throne of our hearts, and our lives show that He rules and governs our thoughts. Is it not so? This is no inert opinion but a living, active principle. I leave these things with you that you may search yourselves and see whether you belong to the mass outside guessing and blundering; or whether you are of the inner circle, who are taught of the Father.

II. Secondly, and this is a very important point: The knowledge of Christ possessed by true disciples is Received in a Special Way.

"Flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee." Beloved, if we know the Saviour aright we have not learned it alone by the instruction of other men. Peter had heard others speak, but he did not know Jesus as the Christ till the Father revealed Him. Paul tells us concerning the gospel, that he neither received it of man, neither was he taught it, but he received it by the revelation of Jesus Christ. I grant you that God uses men to instruct us; but all the prophets and apostles could not teach us Christ if the Father did not reveal the Son in us.

Nor had Peter found out the nature and glory of the Lord Jesus by his own reasonings. These were the flesh and blood by which Jesus is never made out. No doubt, as he read the Old Testament, he said—"This prophecy and that are fulfilled in Jesus"; but, even that would not have sufficed to make Jesus known to him as hrist and God. The Father, who sent Jesus us, must also make Jesus known to each one us, or we shall remain in ignorance of Him.

an cannot by searching find out God, nay, not en God in Christ Jesus. Peter came to the nclusion that Jesus was the Son of the living od, because the Father in heaven made him see and know that it must be so.

Can you follow me experimentally in this? as the Father revealed Christ to you by a birth you? You can never know the Father till you come a son; you can never know the Son till ou are yourself a son.

A Spiritual Faculty

ust be created in us, by which we are enabled perceive the Son of God. "That which is rn of the flesh is flesh," and nothing more, d flesh cannot discern spiritual things. "That hich is born of the Spirit is spirit," and spirit one can enter into the spiritual world, and derstand spiritual things. "Ye must be born ain." You must be begotten again of the ather; otherwise Jesus Christ will be as little nown to you as the light of the sun is known dead men.

Moreover, the Father must also purify us. As e have already heard, "the pure in heart shall e God." It is only when the Father by the oly Spirit purifies the mental eye, by cleansing e heart and life, that we are able to understand and perceive the true nature, work, and fices of the Lord Jesus Christ. Regeneration ust be followed up by sanctification if we ould obtain edification in the things of Christ. Without holiness no man shall see the Lord": e may have the Lord set before him, but he nnot see Him without holiness; he may hear out Jesus, he may read about Jesus, but he nnot see him as Christ and God unless his ture is sanctified.

Let me refresh the memories of God's people. ave there not been times with you when e Son of God has been revealed in you with wer? Certain of these occasions have hapned when you were in trouble: you found no st till you thought of Jesus, your Lord and od, and then your peace was like a river. The orm raged till you saw Jesus walking on the e waves, and bidding them be still; and then u said, "Truly this is the Son of God." At mes my heart has been so full of joy that I uld hardly have endured more. Jesus has en heaven within my heart. In standing one, contending for the faith, I have enjoyed sweet content in the sole fellowship of my rd. In His presence, anxieties and fears ve fled away, and questions have been solved ce for all in a peaceful sense of infinite love.

III. Thirdly, this knowledge has

Its Own Peculiar Marks.

First, it has this mark—it comes with an illible certainty to the heart. If you read of sus in books, or hear of Him from ministers, is well; but if the Father reveals Him to you, is infinitely better; for then no shadow of spicion rests upon the testimony. The witss of God cannot be questioned. Men must t wonder that we grow indignant when the orious truths concerning our Lord are questoned; for to our hearts they are not in the reon of things to be disputed. There is conructive blasphemy in discussing those facts oncerning the Son of God which the Father as revealed to us. When such questions do oss our minds, they are exceedingly painful to , and we chase them out as thieves which de e the temple of the Lord; but when the ather is revealing Jesus as the Christ, the inuders do not come near; they could not. here is no doubting when the Father is witssing to the heart.

"Oh," saith one, "but the Father has never oken to me in that way." I am sorry for you. sk Him to do so. I am glad that you confess ur want of such an experience; but it is a ry serious want. The Lord must deal with u; His Spirit must come into contact with ur spirit: there must be an inward illumination by the Holy Ghost, or else you will never be truly blessed. It was not only what Peter knew, but the way in which he came to know it, which made Peter blessed. Truth thus revealed comes with a force far transcending the arguments of pure reason.

In the next place, this knowledge has this peculiar mark: that it is attended with sacred operations. When the Father reveals Christ to a man, He at the same time to himself. This discovery of the sin and ruin of self leads on to humiliation, contrition, repentance, and renewal. The man is moved to desire holiness, to long to be like Jesus; and this is a blessed fruit of knowing Jesus. All manner of holy and blessed work goes on in the heart at the time when Jesus becomes known: faith, hope, love, patience, zeal, and joy in the Holy Ghost come with a discovery of Jesus.

Reveals the Man

There is this one more mark about it, that this conviction of the Godhead and glory of Christ abides for ever. The man who has obtained his religion from other people may have it taken away by other people; but he who has received it from the Father, holds it by a tenure which cannot be broken. That which we have learned from the Father will never be unlearned. Nothing can erase what the Holy Spirit has engraved. Beloved, I beseech you beware of a home-made religion, cobbled on your own lapstone. Equally beware of a religion which is a sort of patchwork, made up by the kind contributions of Christian friends; and none of it your own. Jesus stood and cried, "If any man thirst, let him come unto Me, and drink." There is no safe religion in the world but that which comes through a personal application to Jesus, and a reception of Him for yourself. Get the better part by sitting at the feet of Jesus, and it will never be taken from you; but religion which does not come by a personal revelation is a mere mirage—there is no reality about it, and it will disappear like a dream of the night.

IV. Lastly, this knowledge

Secures Peculiar Privileges

to its possessor. What saith the Lord Jesus? "Blessed art thou, Simon, Bar-jona: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but My Father, which is in heaven." How was he blessed? Simon Peter was blessed, first, because he had eternal life. How do we know? Our Saviour said "This is life eternal, that they might know Thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom Thou hast sent." "This is life eternal": if you know Jesus as sent of God, you have eteral life. The knowledge of Him is life eternal. You read about Julius Cæsar, Mark Antony, and the like; but you certainly do not know them. You cannot know them. You know about them in proportion to your scholarship, but you do not know them as living persons, or as sent of God to you. They are dead and gone long ago, and to you they never had an existence or a mission. With regard to the Lord Jesus Christ, you not only know a great deal about Him, but I trust you know HIM. Is He a friend, a brother to you? This is life eternal.

He that knows Christ is in a favored position wherever he is. In every condition he is blessed. You are very ill—you are Blessed in Being Ill.

You are prospering in the world—if you know Christ, your prosperity is blessed. Do you lament that you are going down in the world? Mourn not, for your adversity is blessed. You are very simple-minded, and have not much education. Never mind, you are blessed if you know Christ; His knowledge is the most excellent of the sciences. Are you well-instructed? Rejoice not in all knowledge, but glory in this one thing, that thou knowest Jesus, and art blessed. Does the world curse thee? Fret not. Does the devil snuff at thee? Tremble not, but resist him. Jesus says thou art blessed, and I wot that he whom Christ blesses is blessed, and none shall reverse the word.

Do not suppose, my hearers, that you will find out the Lord Christ by your own wit and wisdom. Young man, do not say, "I will be a student, I will by my own ability discover this Son of man." Remember that Jesus can only be seen by His own light. Only Godhead can teach as Godhead. Christ is a book in which no man can read except Christ Himself shall spell the words to him. Jesus is His own interpreter. He is the door, but He is also the key. He is to be seen, but He supplies the light in which He is to be seen. Jesus came forth from God, and the power to know Jesus also comes forth from God, so that all comes from God; and unto God let us return it, adoring Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, one God for ever.

[The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors, and those whose sermons, articles or labors for Christ are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Dr. Talmage and Mr. Spurgeon especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

TOLTEC MARRIAGES.*

MARRIAGE among the Toltecs was celebrated with ceremonies it may interest the reader to know something about. On this occasion friends and relations were invited, the walls of the best apartment were adorned with pretty devices made with flowers and evergreens, whilst every table and bracket was covered with them. The bridegroom occupied a seat to the right, the bride sat on the floor to the left of the hearth, which stood in the middle of the room, where a bright fire was burning. Then the "marriage-maker," as he was called, stood up and addressed the young people, reminding them of their mutual duties in the life they were about to enter, and at the termination of his speech they were given new cloaks, and received the good wishes and congratulations of their friends, who, as they came up, threw each in turn some perfume on the hearth. Now the bride and bridegroom were crowned with chaplets of flowers, and the day was wound up with dances, music, and refreshments. There was also a religious ceremony similar to this in all respects, in which a priest officiated; when instead of cloaks they put on costly dresses with a skeleton head embroidered on them, and thus attired, the new married couple were accompanied to their home and left to themselves.

Counsel to a Toltec Bride.

A Toltec maiden about to enter married life was admonished with great tenderness by her father to preserve great simplicity in her manners and conversation. "Speak calmly," said he; "do not raise your voice very high, nor speak very low, but in a moderate tone. Neither mince when you speak, nor when you salute; nor speak through your nose; but let your words be proper and your voice gentle. In walking, see that you behave becomingly, neither going with haste nor too slowly. Walk through the streets quietly; do not look hither or thither, nor turn your head to look at this and that. See likewise that you paint neither your face nor your lips in order to look well, since this is a mark of vile and unmodest women. But that your husband may take pleasure in you, wash yourself and wear nothing but clean clothes. This was the course and manner of your ancestors. In this world it is necessary to live with prudence and circumspection. See that you guard yourself carefully and free from stain."

The Sculptures on Chapultepec.

Duran tells how Montezuma had himself and his first minister sculptured. Feeling that his end was drawing near, he summoned the doughty warrior, Tlacael, who for three reigns had shown his valor on the field of battle, and his wisdom in council: "Brother Tlacael," said the monarch, "it would be well that our names and persons should be graven on the rock of Chapultepec, and thus pass to posterity."

* From the Ancient Cities of the New World, by Désiré Charnay. 512 Pages, Illustrated. Published by Harper & Brothers, Franklin Square, New York.

Dr. Crowther, P. E. Bishop of the Niger.

The Miner's Reverie.

Tlacael answered, "Your wish, most noble king, shall be instantly obeyed." And calling together the most renowned sculptors, Tlacael communicated to them the royal command. In a few days, two bas-reliefs were executed, so striking in resemblance and so exquisite in workmanship, as to surprise Montezuma.

The Building of Campeche.

"Campeche," says the brilliant Charnay, "was built on the site of an Indian city, and visited by Antonio Cordova in his first expedition (1517). 'The natives', he says, 'were friendly, and took us to extensive buildings which had in them idols and sanctuaries. These edifices were built of lime and sand. On the walls were enormous serpents, and near them, paintings representing their idols, round a kind of altar stained with drops of blood still quite fresh.' The Spaniards sailed away, and did not settle at Campeche until 1541. In process of time Campeche became the most flourishing city of the peninsula, and was plundered several times by French and English privateers. Campeche with its tortuous suburbs, its drawbridges, its unsymmetrical high buildings, is the least eastern looking place in Mexico."

REV. SAMUEL A. CROWTHER, D. D.

(See Portrait.)

THE Protestant Episcopal Bishop of the Niger region in Africa, whose portrait is here given, has had a more eventful life than any bishop of his communion. His biography opens in the little town of Oshogun, in the Yoruba country of western Africa. He was then known as Adjai. When he was eleven years old, a slave raid led by the Eyo Mohammedans desolated the town. Many of the men were killed, Adjai's father among the number. The women and children, and such of the men as had been made prisoners, were made up into gangs, tied together by the neck and marched away. In the partition that followed, Adjai and one sister fell to the lot of one chief and his mother and a second sister to another chief. After a short time the chief bartered Adjai for a horse, and he was afterward sold again and again. Sometimes he was bought with money, but more frequently was thrown in, in a bargain for tobacco or rum. His last sale was to a Portuguese slave-dealer, who put him and a large number of others on board ship at Lagos. The vessel was captured before she had been twenty-four hours at sea by an English ship. The prize was taken to Sierra Leone and the captives set at liberty. Adjai was then little more than twelve years old. The date of the ship's arrival was June 17, 1822, so that he must be now about seventy-eight years old.

The boy was placed under the care of Christian missionaries at Bathurst, where he speedily became a favorite. He was intelligent and alert and took kindly to learning. His diligence soon placed him at the head of the two hundred boys then under the care of the missionaries. He learned to read the New Testament and gave evidence of a change of heart. In 1825, three years after his landing, he made profession of faith in Christ and was baptized by the name of Samuel Adjai Crowther. So encouraging was his progress in learning that he was sent to an institution at Fourah Bay, established for the training of evangelists. In 1842, at his earnest request, he was detailed for missionary work on the Niger by the Church Missionary Society. A preliminary course of study was deemed advisable, and he was sent to England for a term of instruction in the Society's Training College.

In December, 1843, he returned and commenced his missionary labors in his native country of Yoruba Land. He had not been there three weeks before he found his mother, whom he had not seen for twenty-one years. She had been ransomed from slavery in her old age, and had returned to her native country. She told her missionary son where his sisters were, and he succeeded in ransoming them both. His mission was a decided success. He worked assiduously at his headquarters at Abbeokuta, and made periodical mission journeys up the Niger, planting stations and establishing native teachers. In 1857 he and his wife visited England, to report progress and describe his work. He was invited to Windsor Castle, and there had an audience with the Queen, who expressed her deep interest in him and his labors. What was of more utility, he also succeeded in arousing the interest of persons willing to help him practically by their gifts for the support of his stations, and for the publication of a dictionary of the Yoruba language, and translations of books which he had prepared.

The Protestant Episcopal Church in 1864 decided to make the Niger region a bishopric, and, to facilitate ordinations, Samuel Crowther was made its first bishop, and the degree of D was conferred upon him. He was consecr in Canterbury Cathedral on June 29, 1864. has labored earnestly since that time, with most encouraging results. At the recent Anglican Council Bishop Crowther was ent, and was received with marked cordiali

THE MINER'S SECRET.

(See Illustration.)

"THAT is not one of your regular hands, I pose," said an evangelist who had descend coal-mine in company with the superinten to distribute tracts and have a few words of r ious talk with the men. He directed the su intendent's attention, as he spoke, to a who, having finished his mid-day meal, had f into a reverie with his pick in his hand.

"Oh yes, he has taken employment regular miner. One of the new men. Bee work about two weeks. He don't look as if been brought up to it, does he? I cannot i him out. When he came to ask for wo thought he wanted a clerk's place, but he not. He wanted to do regular work below I took him on. His hands look as if he handled a pen more than a pick."

"I should like to have a talk with that n the evangelist said. "What is his name?

"Tom Ward he calls himself."

The room in which, that night, the evi list found the man who had excited his int differed in no respect from those occupie the other miners in the village. The man hi though he was washed and shaved, wa dressed in broadcloth, as was the custom of men in the district who were addicted to ough ablutions. He wore the commones roughest clothes obtainable. His face ha sad, burdened expression which it had earlier in the day. But it was thoughtful the evangelist thought, bore the marks c ture. After apologizing for a visit that to a man might appear an intrusion, he said

"I am deeply concerned, my friend, your soul. When I saw you this morning strongly moved about you, and I could n until I had asked you if all is well betwee and God."

"That is very kind of you," said the "I assure you I sincerely appreciate your n Still, there are reasons why I prefer not swer your question. It would lead to discu would be pain-me, and could o beneficial

"
evangelist
d earnestly with an, but ineffect-
. Respectfully
rmly he refused drawn into con-
on. "May I offer
t prayer?" the Christian asked,
th.
rtainly," said the knelt down, e evangelist earnestly that ould reveal Him-ere as the loving

, willing to re-ll who come to n faith, willing give, to restore, the burden of eary and heavy and to comfort stressed. When from his knees
d out his hand strange compan-d said, "Good
, my brother;
od bless you in special need, er it may be."
y," said the
"I will speak
" With a strong ne mastered his n and said:
e is no need nto details; and
, I have not sufficient self-command. My a very sad and shameful one. I have Christian. More than that, I have been her of the gospel. But there was a taint blood. I knew my danger, and for years n the watch against it. I thought at last was eradicated, and I grew less vigilant.
moment of fierce temptation I fell into s sin, and brought scandal on the name ist. The world pounced upon my fall de it the occasion for jeering at religion igious professors. The mischief was ap-and it can never be undone, for I was I wanted to bury myself beyond the ity of discovery. I would like to have m the very face of God if that were pos-I came here. It was better than sui-nd perhaps I might be able, by teaching ance, and by kind words and acts, to do ing for these poor workers around me. I ot atone for the mischief I have done. I deceive myself about that, but I still kind, and would serve them if I could the short time I am likely to live. Now ow my case, and will understand why no hope of salvation for me."
I do not understand that, and I could mit it while the case of the Apostle Peter on record. There is hope for you, and ll receive you through Christ if you go to His blood cleanseth from all sin.'" miner shook his head; but the evangelinued pleading and arguing. At last the said, "Leave me now; I must think. I be alone. I will see you again."
next day a brief note came to the evan-
It simply said: "Come to me again to-I have found peace!" Very joyfully he e appointment, but the miner was not He waited some time, until the hurrying ed people through the streets attracted ntion. Inquiring the cause, he heard ere had been an explosion in the pit.
distress, he made his way to the scene of and was soon engaged in giving comfort to the afflicted women. He turned as a cry was raised, and saw that a dead body had been brought up from the pit. He bent over it and saw that it was the body of the man whom only a few hours before he had been instrumental in leading back to God.

A Fragment of the Ancient Wall of Jerusalem.

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. L. S. Keyser.

(Continued from page 591.)

The Tender Mercies of the Wicked.

As Hadley entered the recitation-room of one of the professors the next morning, his tutor took him to one side, saying that he wished to have a few words apart with him. The substance of his communication was, that the temperance people of Dundee, a village about five miles distant, had asked him to send them a good speaker to address them on the following Saturday evening in the Town Hall. As Hadley's temperance principles were well known, the professor decided to send him, if he would consent to go.

"My horse and sleigh are at your service," said the professor, "as you will have to go overland. You can take a friend with you, if you wish. I hope that you will not decline, sir."

Hadley had a temperance speech already prepared, which he had delivered in Banesville during one of his vacations, and he knew that he could soon revise it, and so he gave his consent.

While Hadley was taking his seat in the class after the interview with his professor, his eye fell upon the fair face of Miss Winters, and almost involuntarily the resolution formed itself in his mind to take her with him to the place in which he was to speak. The professor had said that a friend might accompany him. It was not long before he took steps to translate his resolve into a reality. While the class was passing down the stairs, from one recitation-room to another, he sought Miss Winters' side, and briefly stating the circumstances, he told her that he should be pleased to have her accompany him; to which she gave a ready assent.

All arrangements having been made, he set himself to work on the revision of his speech. It is uncertain whether the prospect of making the address, or the expectation of having a long drive with Miss Winters, filled him with the greater anxiety. He determined, for her sake as well as his own, that he would make the occasion a crowning triumph.

At last Saturday evening was approaching. The lecture was to begin at half-past 7. At 6 o'clock he was driving briskly, with jingling bells, toward the house in which Miss Winters roomed. In a moment she was at his side, and he felt that she had never looked so lovely as she did that evening, wrapped in her soft furs, while the sharp wintry air caused her cheeks to glow with the unmistakable hue of health.

The road wound about through the deep, flexuous valleys, and over hills of considerable altitude. As is apt to be the case with a speaker shortly before he is to deliver an address, Hadley was unusually taciturn on the way to the town: his mind, naturally enough, was divided between Miss Winters and his speech; and their conversation was, therefore, inclined to go by fits and starts, although it was none the less interesting on that account.

At a few minutes before the time for the lecture to begin, they drove up to the hall. Miss Winters was conducted to a seat, and Hadley was hurried by the chairman of the association to the ante-room, where he threw off his overcoat and gloves, and sat down for a few moments to draw breath and compose himself. Then he was conducted to the stage, and was greeted by a large audience.

Suffice it to say, that the speech was a marked success, even surpassing the expectations of the young orator himself. More than once was he greeted with vociferous cheers as he broke out into an impromptu burst of eloquence. Miss Winters was gratified with the firm stand he took against the hydra-headed evil he was denouncing; and especially when she saw that he put his argument on high humanitarian grounds. More than ever was she confirmed in her belief that, notwithstanding his hostility to religion, he was still actuated by high principles; and then she thought, if all his powers, all his philanthropic impulses, could be harnessed into the service of Christ, how useful he might be to his fellow-men. There was no doubt that Miss Winters was more prepossessed in the young man's favor than ever, as she listened.

His peroration was greeted with a storm of applause that shook the hall; and after many hearty congratulations from those who came to the platform to take his hand, he made his way to his sleigh, and was soon driving rapidly out of town with Miss Winters by his side.

The moon had risen, and her light falling upon the glistening snow, converted the night almost into day. How the girl's cheeks glowed in the mellow lunar light! Never before had her conversation been so bright and sparkling.

Hadley had not thought her capable of so much vivacity, and more than that, she referred to themes that proved her the possessor of a fund of knowledge that surprised him.

When they had left the town several miles in their rear, Hadley slackened the speed of his horse, concluding to allow the animal to walk the remainder of the way.

Miss Winters had said very little about his speech, for she was not given to profuse complimenting; but at last, when there was a lull in the conversation, she said:

"That was a magnificent address, Mr. Madelling. The argument was masterly and the earnestness almost electrifying."

"Miss Winters, that is a high encomium."

"But it is not extravagant," she declared. "I was much pleased with the stand you took for high principle. Nothing in your speech did me more good than your positive endorsement of the Pauline principle of abstaining from intoxicants for the sake of a weak and stumbling brother. That is putting the matter on high humanitarian ground."

"Ah! you thought," remarked Hadley, laughing, "that because I do not accept the Bible as Christians do, I am blind to everything good in it. In that way many persons misunderstand my position. I accept everything good and true, from whatever source it is derived. In short, I am an eclectic philosopher," he concluded, with a smile.

'That would all be very well if you recognized the true Source and Author of all good, which would give system and organic unity to your philosophy." Hesitating a moment, she added: "The Bible says that Christ 'is the light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world.'"

"You do not mean that He is the author of all the good there is in every system of religion and philosophy, do you?"

"That is my meaning in a nutshell," she said.

"I cannot see it so."

"Oh, I do not wish to argue the question; I only want you to look at the subject from that point of view. It is almost too bright a night to discuss abstruse theological questions;" and she settled comfortably in the seat of the sleigh.

"So it is—bright and romantic," he returned. "I am glad that you liked my speech this evening better than the one you heard me deliver in Chapel Hall not long ago."

"Yes, it was better in every respect. If you continue to improve, your prospects in life are very bright."

"My prospects in life!" echoed Hadley; then a pre-view of his future came before him in vivid relief, like a procession of pictures passing through a stereopticon, and as every new scene appeared, there was a bright being at his side. It was the girl who was with him now. But what if she should not be there! What if he should be compelled to make that long and tiresome journey alone, without the dear girl who held his happiness in her hands! A thrill of horror ran through his frame, and he could not endure to contemplate the picture of aridness painted upon the canvas of his fancy. He looked around at her furtively, and their eyes met in a glance that spoke more than the most voluble speech. Words came to his lips that would not be hushed.

"My prospects in life depend upon a very important circumstance," he ventured to say.

There was a moment of silence, broken only by the tinkling of the sleighbells and the creaking of the crisp snow under the runners.

"Oh, of course, we never can safely predict the future, for we do not know what contingencies await us," she remarked, thinking a trite utterance less embarrassing than silence.

"You misunderstand me," Hadley said, quickly. "I do not refer to those casualties over which we have no control. Miss Winters," he added, fervently, "my happiness in life depends very much on one person."

"That must be a very important individual," said the girl, with a rather perfunctory laugh.

"Will you allow me to say something very philosophical?" asked Hadley. "It is not very abstruse, however. This is what I wish to say: A man's life is very incomplete—indeed, it is scarcely half a life—unless it is complemented by the life of the woman he—loves."

The blood mounted to her cheeks. What could she say? With a carefully constrained voice, she remarked: "That certainly is a very recondite observation, but it seems to me that experience is necessary to test and verify its truth, and you—" the ingenuous girl stopped and blushed. It was evident that she was no adept at fencing, so transparent and truthful was her nature.

"Ah! there are some truths that one knows by intuition, and this is one of them," said Hadley, categorically. "But let us have done with circumlocution. It is better to be open and frank. It is not necessary for me to make a declaration of my feelings toward you, my dear—oh, if I dared to call you Madeline! You certainly must have drawn the correct inference from my words and actions since I have met you. It is not in my nature to conceal the emotions that stir me, unless there is sufficient reason for doing so. Yet, though you know it already, I must tell you plainly, my dear Madeline, that I love you." And he took her hand in his.

The blood rushed to her cheeks and as suddenly left them, rendering her face almost as white as the surrounding snow. Evidently very strong emotions had been stirred by Hadley's words, and were contending for the mastery. She would have spoken; but speech failed her. Hadley saw how deeply she was moved, and interpreting her silence in his favor, he continued:

"I have loved you from the first time I saw you, and my love has grown continuously ever since. I believe I could make you happy. I assure you it would be my most earnest endeavor to do so; and as for me, with you by my side, and your sweet influence inspiring me, I feel that I should be strong for labor and for good. We are made for each other. Say Madeline, will you not speak the word that will fill my heart with joy and hope?"

For a moment she was silent, but, at last, slowly and tremulously, her silvery voice sounding to his ear like the notes of an Æolian harp, she said: "I cannot—I must not answer you now. I must have time to think. My heart bids me give you the answer you wish. I admit that. But I distrust it."

"Oh listen to its voice, dear Madeline," said Hadley, eagerly. "It is a safe, a true counsellor. It is nature's voice, the great mother bids you unite your destiny with mine. It would be wrong to resist nature's pleadings."

"I am not sure of that," said Miss Winters. "Sometimes duty requires us to resist. The pleasant and the joyous are not always the right. I am sure you realize how momentous to us both is the question you ask. You would not have me decide on impulse. I must have time to think, I must consult my parents, and—why should I conceal it from you?—I must seek divine guidance."

Hadley, in spite of his softened mood, could not restrain a contemptuous smile, and Madeline saw it, in the moonlight, flit across his face. She shuddered, and if he could have known it, he did his cause real harm in that instant. "I would not hurry you against your own wish, my dear girl," he said. "But do remember how keen is my anxiety. Suspense will consume me. Think of it, and end it as quickly as you can. Will you send me the answer to-morrow?"

"I promise you to send it within a week," she said, and with that delay Hadley saw that he must content himself. But he had the assurance that her heart was with him, and he drew her more closely to his side.

All too soon the drive ended, and Hadley stopped before the gate at which he was to part with his companion. When she stood upon the sidewalk, he said, as he took her hands and pressed them between his own:

"Madeline, I shall await your answer with an anxiety I cannot describe. Remember, my existence will be riven and wretched if your reply is unfavorable. But forgive me: it is unmanly to appeal to your sympathy. Let your affections decide, and I shall abide by the result."

Then he lifted her hands tenderly, almost reverently, to his lips and kissed them with passionate fervor, and saying good-night, he leaped into the sleigh and drove rapidly away.

Madeline entered her room, and throwing herself into a chair, abandoned herself to pleasant thought. Serious questions must come soon, but just now it was impossible to think of anything but that this gifted and attractive young man really loved her and wanted her to be his wife. She had spoken truly when she said her heart bade her accept him. She knew that she loved him, and what true-hearted girl could not but rejoice that her love was reciprocated! But—

Madeline would not think of buts to-night. The black cloud on the horizon, the grim shadow of Hadley's infidelity, of his unconcealed opposition to religion, cast its shadow on her, but she would not be depressed by it now. He loved her, and her heart beat with joy. She would not put away from her the cup of happiness proffered to her, and the very thought that she might be compelled by her conscience to do so, made her clutch it the more convulsively now before it became forbidden nectar to her. She thought of Hadley at his best, and her heart yearned over him and exulted in his declaration of his love.

Her reverie was broken after a few minutes by the sight of a letter lying on her desk, which had escaped her notice on entering her room. She looked at it now, and its bulk and the well-known character of the handwriting excited her curiosity. She opened it and saw within a letter addressed in a delicate feminine hand to Hadley Madelling. She turned again to the outer envelope, thinking there must be some mistake. But no, it was clearly for her, addressed in masculine characters, name and address correct and in full. Then she looked at the paper in which the inner letter was wrapped, and there was the explanation!

It was very brief, and in the same writing as that on the outer envelope. The writer simply said: "A well wisher of Miss Winters, who knows something of her life and her associates, has been concerned by seeing her in company occasionally with a young man of whom she does know but little, or she would avoid him. The writer has a horror of young men who deliberately amuse themselves by flirting and winning the affections of young ladies, only to trifle with them. The enclosed letter tells its own story of a confiding girl placing her trust in one who, as Miss Winters must be aware, is acting as if no such girl were in existence. It fell into the writer's hands by a curious circumstance, and is sent to Miss Winters in the hope that it may save her from life-long misery, by revealing to her the duplicity of the young man whom she is honoring by her favor. Miss Winters may remember the missive handed to Cæsar on the fatal Ides of March, and avail herself of the information now fortunately at her service."

What woman would not have read the enclosure? The letter had been changed but little from the rough draft Belle Havelock had sketched. Duneman had used almost her exact words, and Belle had known how to excite the curiosity of one of her own sex. Madeline took up the letter addressed to Hadley Madelling, and looked at it critically. It bore the post-office stamp of Banesville, his home; and its writer, if the handwriting was evidence, must be a woman of culture. The end of the envelope was torn open, and as she drew the letter from it, Madeline thought it had the worn look of a paper that had been read and re-read and carried around for some time in a man's pocket. Hadley had probably dropped it somewhere, and it had been found by some one who knew them both. She drew her chair to the light, and opened the sheet to see what his correspondent had to

(To be Continued.)

SELFISHNESS.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.*

S. Lesson for September 30. Golden Text II Cor. 5: 15.

Apostolic Verdict on the Human Race—Selfishess Condemned by God's Word—Prompts Competition in Home Evangelism and Neglects Foreign Fields—Christ's Life a Witness Against Selfishness—His Teaching Against It—In the Sermon on the Mount—In the Parables—A Sunight Photograph of Men—The Unselfishness of he Consecrated Christian—Person, Time, and Money Given Up.

TAKE heed, and beware of covetousness, a man's life consisteth not in the abundance the things which he possesseth." (Luke 12:) Both the life and teaching of our Lord re eminently directed against the almost unisal sin of selfishness. "All seek their own," he apostle's summary of mankind in general. t so little is selfishness seen to be a sin that world absolutely admires it; "Men will ise thee when thou doest well to thyself." . 49: 18.) Business, politics, family and solife, are governed chiefly by the motive, What shall I get by it?" Even in the educaof children this debasing motive governs ents, "How shall I best educate my daughs to secure rich husbands?" or, "How shall I educate my sons to get on in the world?" h is the real motive.

Selfishness Governs Even Religion.

n of the world will profess just as much reon as they think will forward their own inests, give just as much in charity as will save ir reputation, thus making the world, and , and God revolve round them, as though rything and everybody existed for them. numbers of converted people seek in reon their own joy or comfort more than the y of God. Now the whole tone of God's rd is directed to subvert this tendency in nan nature. The law of God is against it. hou shalt love the Lord thy God with all heart" leaves self no longer as the heart's tre, but makes God first. "Thou shalt love neighbor as thyself," gives self only an equal re with others. If every converted man and nan loved God with all their heart, and their ghbor as themselves, the number of missions and the receipts of missionary societies ld be so large, that in a few years the diffiy would be to find a part of the earth which not evangelized.

elfishness governs churches and missions. no uncommon thing, when a good work is g in a place, for some other society to come set up another close to it, for the very pur of injuring the work of God, instead of go into fields which are unworked, and are cryout for laborers. India, China, Africa, are ng out for workers; if we banded together sent out one-half, and the best half, of those ave at home, it would be a benefit to the hen, and would make those at home to with greater diligence, and to be more apiated. The church at Jerusalem would bably have settled down in the enjoyment of knowledge of God, if He had not, through boldness of Stephen, permitted persecution reak out—then "they that were scattered ad went everywhere preaching the Word." s 8: 4.) Must we wait until persecution ks out before we are unselfish enough to he claims of the heathen upon us? Alas, he consideration of a Government is not al, "What is best for the people governed?" "How may the revenue be increased?" and we find England guilty of forcing opium the Chinese, until hundreds of thousands he people have been ruined in soul and and family by the accursed drug; and berless wives and daughters have been sold a life of shame by their husbands and fathers, because the revenue of England gained some millions by this diabolical traffic! Political selfishness is murderous in its results. The same pleas of the need of revenue is supposed to justify the awful forcing of the liquor traffic on the formerly sober Hindoos, and the buying and selling of Hindoo girls for purposes of sin, because, as a nation, England is determined to have money at any cost. God turn her from her guilty national selfishness!

Politics are Governed by Selfishness.

Jesus came on earth, not only to save us from our sins by giving Himself a ransom for many, but also to be in His own life a witness against selfishness. "Christ pleased not Himself." (Rom. 15: 3). He never went hither or thither for His own pleasure; He did always those things which pleased God. (John 8: 29.) We never hear of Jesus saying, "I don't like this," or "I don't like that," or "I don't want to go here or there." He never considered Himself, but only His Father. In His birth He was unselfish, ranking amongst the poor. In His childhood He was unselfish, subject to His parents, although the Son of God. In the temple He was unselfish, for, while He was Himself the source of all knowledge, He heard the doctors, and asked questions, and, when His parents questioned Him as to why He had tarried behind in Jerusalem, He urged no selfish plea, but said: "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" (Luke 2: 49.) In His ministry we see that self-consideration had no place; He sought no ease; He would not receive honor from men; even when wearied with His journey, He found His refreshment in seeking the salvation of a woman who had rudely repulsed His request for a drop of water! Self-pity, retaliation, and all other marks of selfishness were as far from Jesus as darkness is from light. Even in Gethsemane, while dripping with the bloody sweat, He excused His disciples for sleeping. On the cross He thought of His enemies, and prayed for them, and in dying He commended His mother to His disciple.

There Was No Selfishness in Jesus.

In His teaching we see how continuously He exposes, and warns against selfishness. The main gist of the sermon on the mount is: "Be unselfish." The blessing is given not to the greedy and grasping, but the "poor in spirit," the "mourners," the "meek," the "peacemakers," etc. If we are "the light," or "the salt of the earth," it is for the good of others. No gift can be accepted on the altar while our brother has aught against us; and the summing up of Christ's edition of the law is: "I say unto you, That ye resist not evil." If any man smites thee, don't resist; takes away thy coat, don't resist; compels thee to go a mile, don't resist; asks of thee, don't resist. "Love your enemies," that you may do something more than the publicans, who only love those that love them. Don't seek credit for what you give, or how you pray, or when you fast. Don't be anxious about eating and drinking and clothing. You are here on earth as witnesses that you do not need to be devoted to your own interests like the ungodly. "Your Heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things."

Parables Directed Against Selfishness.

In His parables Jesus teaches the same lessons. He who sowed seed in stony places lost all through selfishness. He could not stand "persecution because of the Word." The seed among the thorns was fruitless because of selfish cares and selfish gains. The merchantman hid his treasure instead of letting others participate. The unmerciful servant forfeited his very forgiveness through his selfish dealing with his fellow-servant. The laborers who agreed with the householder for a penny a day, reaped the reward of their selfish bargaining, and saw that those who would trust the householder without looking after their own interests got the better of them. The friends who were invited to the marriage feast "made light of it," because they gave preference to their own selfish interests. The rich man who was perplexed what to do with his riches, was suddenly called into the presence of God to give an account of his useless, selfish life. The prodigal son went away from his aged father in heartless self-seeking, and it was only when he had reaped what he had sown that he turned back to his father's house. The elder brother had no heart for the wanderer when he did return, because he thought in his selfish heart that his younger brother was treated better than he. The unjust steward sacrificed his master's interests to his own, as many professed Christians do now by Discounting the Claims of God.

The rich man, "who was clothed in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day," found his way to hell, not because he had broken the commandments by thieving, killing, committing adultery, breaking the Sabbath, or worshipping idols, but because he had lived a selfish life. Instead of loving God with all his heart, and his neighbor as himself, he had loved himself with all his heart, and his neighbor a very great deal less than himself. And this respectable kind of rich man is to be found in every town and city of our land, perhaps of most lands; he is a very ordinary character on earth, but no man will ever meet him in heaven. Christ "died for us, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto Him which died for them, and rose again."

Of the ten lepers, nine were too selfish even to turn back and give glory to God for their healing. The unjust judge, who no doubt would serve the rich whose houses he might visit with the greatest alacrity, would not avenge a poor widow whom nobody knew or cared about, until, by her continued coming, she wearied him. The Pharisee carried his selfishness into his very prayers, and his religion consisted of exalting himself and despising others. The servant to whom the one pound was committed, selfishly hid it away where it was of no use to his lord or his fellow-men. This is how God sees men! This is no exaggeration; it is shewing him up as he is. It is the purpose of God to overturn this selfishness, and to conform us to the image of His Son. But He wants us to be fellow-workers with Him by recognizing this sin on which He lays His holy finger, and by trusting Him to cleanse, and conquer it. In the early days of the primitive church, when the Holy Ghost filled every believer, it was wonderfully absent from the disciples. It is an intense relief to turn from the exposure of selfishness in our Lord's parables to that simple description, "And the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul; neither said any of them that aught of the things which he possessed was his own; but they had all things common." (Acts 4: 32, 33.) Many look upon this as a utopian idea, but it is a Holy Ghost fact. Men have lived who refused to own their possessions; true Levites, who had no inheritance among their brethren, because the Lord was their part and their inheritance! Christ is the only cure for selfishness. When Christ fills a heart, it ceases to be selfish—every earthly possession, every moment of time, every opportunity, is only valued as it serves the purpose of Christ's Kingdom. Then, it is no longer the question, "What do I like? What would suit me? Which is the most convenient to me? But, What is best to please Jesus? This becomes the ruling principle of our lives, and then, as regards giving, it is never the residue which goes to the work of God—He gets the first and best of all, and we come in, like the sons and daughters of Aaron, to have our share with Him; all His, but we are blest in our partnership with Him. Infidelity, superstition, and all Satan's fortifications could never stand against an unselfish church.

A Sunlight Photograph of Man,

---

rs. Baxter sends this article as a suggestion to teachers se schools in which the choice of a subject for Septemis optional. The International Lesson is either a Reof the Quarter's Lessons—Temperance: Deut. 21: 18-r, Missionary Work: I Thess. 1: 1-10.

The Antichrist Babylon and the Coming of the Kingdom, by G. H. Pember, M. A. A new work of remarkable originality and power, written in a popular and simple style, yet showing much scholarly research, 171 pages; Price in cloth covers, 50 cents. For sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York.

AS A LITTLE CHILD.

"Except ye become as little children ye cannot enter the kingdom of heaven."

"As a little child, as a little child!
Then how can I enter in?
I am scarred, and hardened, and soul defiled,
With traces of sorrow and sin.
Can I turn backward the tide of years
And wake my dead youth at will?"
"Nay, but thou canst, with thy grief and thy fears, Creep into My arms and be still."

"I know that the lambs in the heavenly fold
Are sheltered and kept in Thy heart:
But I—I am old, and the gray from the gold
Has bidden all brightness depart.
The gladness of youth, the faith and the truth,
Lie withered or shrouded in dust."
"Thou'rt emptied at length of thy treacherous strength; Creep into My arms now—and trust."

"Is it true? can I share with the little ones there A child's happy rest on Thy breast?"
"Aye, the tenderest care will answer thy prayer,
My love is for thee as the rest.
It will quiet thy fears, will wipe away tears—
Thy murmurs shall soften to psalms,
Thy sorrows shall seem but a feverish dream,
In the rest—in the rest in My arms.

"Thus tenderly held, the heart that rebelled,
Shall cling to my hand, though it smite;
Shall find in My rod the love of its God,
My statutes its songs in the night.
And whiter than snow shall the stained life grow,
'Neath the touch of the love undefiled,
And the throngs of forgiven at the portals of heaven, Shall welcome one more little child."

—Mary Lowe Dickinson.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike) will be sent post-paid, for 10 cts., or 100 for 20 cts. Postage stamps taken.

Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

Imparts New Energy to the Brain, giving the feeling and sense of increased intellectual power.

Now that the rush of the summer work is somewhat over, we desire to call attention to some matters looking forward to profitable work for the fall months, and through the winter. Write to B. F. Johnson & Co., Publishers, 1,009 Main St., Richmond, Va., and they will show you how to do a grand work, which can be made a permanent thing.

The latest and best imperial Photographs of Dr. Talmage and Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, with their fac-simile autograph, and also imperial photograph of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, can be obtained from J. E. Jewett, 77 Bible House, New York. Sent postpaid for twenty-five cents each. Postage stamps taken.

MEXICO

Contributions in aid of Christian work in Mexico are most pressingly needed, and can be mailed to the address of

BISHOP H. C. RILEY,
Care of J. P. HEATH,
43 Bible House, New York.

TO OUR CHRISTIAN FRIENDS:

As there is a regular monthly expense in connection with the work a regular monthly income is needed to meet that expense. We, therefore, specially ask for regular monthly contributions in its behalf. If many will each send a little every month, or quarter, or whenever they can, it will do great good. Remember, every little helps.

H. CHAUNCEY RILEY.

AGENTS—Our Christmas Books (selling from 50 cents to $3.50) will pay you a larger profit than any others the next three months. One agent made a profit last year of $84.20 in two weeks; one reports an average profit of $7.00 a day from September till Christmas. All time not necessary. CASSELL & CO., B.B.S.D., 104 & 106 Fourth Ave., New York. 40 Dearborn St., Chicago.

To Our Fellow Christians

Who Are Forwarding Contributions in Aid of Christian Work in Mexico.

Bishop Riley requests me to inform the kind friends who are generously contributing in aid of Christian work in Mexico, that we have now over one hundred monthly subscribers who are forwarding contributions every month in its behalf. Bishop Riley sends to all who are contributing in aid of the work in Mexico his most sincere thanks for their timely gifts.

As there are, no doubt, many who would be glad to contribute something monthly in behalf of the cause of Christ in Mexico, but who feel that they cannot afford to give as much as one dollar a month, we venture the suggestion, that when possible the friends of the work should try and collect small contributions from such and forward the same with their own contributions to Bishop Riley, 43 Bible House, New York. For example, some friend of the work who is now forwarding one dollar a month, might induce ten others, to each give ten cents a month, and collect and forward the same with his own contribution. Another who now contributes one dollar a month, might induce four others to each give one cent a day, or thirty-one cents a month, and collect and forward the same with his own contribution monthly. Still a third who now contributes a dollar a month might induce two friends, to each give fifty cents a month, and collect and forward the same regularly with his own contribution.

If this plan could be adopted generally among the more than one hundred regular monthly subscribers to the work, we might soon be able to report to our friends that we had over two hundred dollars a month contributed regularly in behalf of the work in Mexico.

We remind our friends that to continue the work in Mexico effectively we most pressingly need a regular monthly income, as we have to meet a regular monthly expense.

A most precious Christian work has been commenced in Mexico, and we are doing what we can to continue it, by raising an income in its behalf. We earnestly appeal to our fellow Christians to aid us in this effort. There are one hundred and thirteen millions who speak the English language, and seventy-five millions who speak the Spanish or Portuguese languages. Among those who speak the English language, there are multitudes who know and love the pure gospel, and are doing what they can for the Master. Among those who speak the Spanish or the Portuguese languages, there are a few who know and love the pure gospel, and are faithfully working for our dear Master. Our Spanish-American society is working hard to raise an income to aid in building up a strong centre of Christian work in Mexico. The influence of that work has already extended into Spain and Cuba, and, we trust, will yet extend into South America. Fellow Christians, think of seventy-five millions who speak the Spanish or Portuguese languages, millions and millions, and millions of whom have never had a Bible in their hands!!! Help us! help us! to do Christian work in their midst.

Bishop Riley has been instrumental in having more than one hundred thousand copies of the Bible or New Testament circulated in Mexico. Many hundreds of children have been educated in Christian schools established by him. More than forty congregations have been gathered in the Republic of Mexico through his efforts. He has secured two magnificent stone churches in the City of Mexico where the Gospel has been preached for years. He has trained up a noble band of able preachers of the pure gospel. He has given nineteen years of his life and his fortune to aid in building up this great work, and he now appeals to his fellow Christians to contribute the monthly income needed to continue it effectively.

Dear friends, will you not only continue to contribute to this good work yourselves, but also encourage others to do the same. Some may not be able to contribute monthly but could do so occasionally. Occasional gifts are most thankfully received. Pray for the work, and that many may be moved to befriend it.

With best Chsistian wishes, I am your brother in Christ,

A. D. MAINE.

80c. to $2 per rod.

All sizes and widths. Sold by us or any dealer in this line of goods. FREIGHT PAID. Information free. Write The McMULLEN WOVEN WIRE FENCE CO.

N. Market and Ontario Sts., Chicago, Ill.

MORE MEN WANTED for local and traveling Salesmen. Good Pay. Address E. B. RICHARDSON & CO., Nurserymen, Geneva, N. Y.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED FOR MY STORY OF THE WAR
By Mary A. Livermore

Her own narrative of "Four Years' Personal Experience as Field and Hospital Nurse." It portrays the Womanly or "Heavenly" side of the War, its Lights and Shadows "as a woman saw them." Bright, Pure, and Good, full of "laughter and tears," of thrilling interest and touching pathos, it sells at sight to all. Splendid Steel-Plates, and famous old Battle-Flags richly colored in exact fac-simile. The "booming" book for Men and Women Agents. $100 to $200 a month made. ☞ Distance no hindrance, for we Pay Freights and give Extra Terms. Write for circulars to A. D. WORTHINGTON & CO., Hartford, Conn.

In all the world there is but one sure cure for the OPIUM Habit. The Dr. J. L. Stephens Remedy never fails, and no other treatment ever cures. We have cured more than 10,000 cases. No other treatment ever cured one case. NO PAY TILL CURED. Remember this, and write to the J. L. Stephens Co., Lebanon, Ohio.

TEAS LADIES Send at once for our new terms. THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO., 31 and 33 Vesey St., New York, N. Y.

CALIFORNIA BLANKETS

JAMES McCREERY & C

Have received the first s ment of their celebrated bra of Fine California Blank "Silverado," "Santo Ri "San Benito." They will placed on sale Monday, S 17, at the following prices:

	10-4	11-4	12-4	13-4
Silverado,	5.50	6.75	8.00	9.50
Santo Rita,	6.00	7.25	8.50	10.00
San Benito,	6.75	8.25	9.75	11.25

These goods have been trolled by us for many ye and are recommended their beauty and durabilit

JAMES McCREERY & C

Broadway and 11th St

New York.

SEATTLE The largest City in Was Territory. Population mercial center of PU Country. Coal, Iron, Timber and Agric Lands. Send for full information of One SE-AT-TLE. CHAS. H. KITT Seattle, Wash.

1,000 Agents Wanted to Sell 1 Copies National Hand Book of American Progress, E. O. HAVEN, LL.D., & others. 1492 to date. Six Vols in One. A non-partisan ref erence Cyclopædia, of History, Biography, Sta Politics, for School, Home and Office. Illustr pages, $2. E. B. TREAT, Pub. 771 B'w

THE BRYANT SCHOOL, RO L. I. 23 miles from N. Y., overlooking L. I. So Incorporated Academy for Boys. Ind sical, Commercial. Military organization u uate of U. S. M. A. (West Point. Building and general equipment unsurpassed. Apply Geo. Bruce Cortelyou, P

UNIVERSITY-PI FROM $180 TO $ FINEST PIANOS IN THE SOLD DIRECT TO FAMILIES the enormous expense of Sent with beautiful cov and book, for trial in yo home before you buy. Gua six years. Send for cata Marshal & Smith Piano Co., 255 E. 21st St.

AGENTS WANTED to sell "The Bible." Introd Bishop J. H. Vincent, D.D. The best sell handled by agents. Recommended by all c Address Cassell & Co., B.B.S.D., 104 and 1 Ave., New York; 40 Dearborn St., Chicago, I

$75.00 to $250.00 A MONTH can working for us. Ag ferred who can furnish a horse and give th time to the business. Spare moments may be employed also. A few vacancies in towns and F. Johnson & Co., Pub's, 1009 Main St., Rich

New Catalogue. Now I

BEFORE YOU BUY ANY BOOKS FOR

SUNDAY-SCHOOL LIBRA

Send to me for a full Catalogue of the cl best Sunday-School Books ever offered, and SPECIAL OFFER TO SUNDAY-SC Satisfaction guaranteed or money refunded.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Book 77 Bible House, New York.

Heaven: My Father's H
252 Pages. Cloth. Price 75 C

"Heaven.—I have seen nothing on the sub pleased me so much. The views are orth think ast. Some of them I do not remembe seen presented at all; and others are so w D., Mark Hopkins, Williams College, Mass.

"I like his way of approaching the subj book develops in a very pleasing manner thought peculiar and untouched by any of who have written on it."—Rev. Prof. Sam Yale College, Conn.

"Death, as seen from Mr. K.'s point of v natural event in the order of the Christian's stead of recoiling from inevitable destiny, we by this more familiar view to look upon the without fear, yea, with cheerfulness."—Rev. J Hackett, Newton Theological Seminary.

Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price.

J. E. JEWETT, 77 Bible House, Ne

LIVE COALS. By T. DeWitt Talmag $2.00. 25,000 copies alr Agents wanted everywhere. Liberal terms. no hindrance as all books are delivered free in Texas sold 38 in one day another in WILBUR B. KETCHAM, Publisher, 71 Bible Ho

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1888, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.

Vol. XI., No. 39. Office, 63 Bible House, N. Y. THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1888. Price, 3 Cents. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

PICTURE OF THE FATAL STEAMSHIP COLLISION OFF SABLE ISLAND.

SUPERFLUITIES A HINDERANCE. Dr. Talmage's Sermon last Sunday Morning.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

DANIEL'S VISION OF FOUR WILD BEASTS.

NOTABLE CONVERSIONS IN NEW YORK.

A RESCUE FROM THE STREETS.

A Remarkable Service in Madagascar, etc.

Gems from New Books: A Girl's Picture.—The Poison-Oak.—A Slave's Prayer.

PORTRAITS AND LIVES OF PROF. HENRY DRUMMOND AND THE LATE DR. MACKENZIE AND PROF. RICHARD A. PROCTOR.

CROSSING THE JORDAN. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

EDWARD WILSON'S RESTORATION (With Illustration).

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE. A New Serial Story by Rev. L. S. Keyser (Continued).

THE COMMISSION OF JOSHUA. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Fatal Collision Between the Thingvalla and the Geiser, off Sable Island, N. S.

THE FATAL STEAMSHIP COLLISION OF THE "THINGVALLA" AND THE "GEISER."

THE terrible maritime disaster, briefly reported in a previous number of this journal, and which is now portrayed in the picture on the first page, will long be sadly memorable in many a home on both sides of the Atlantic. It is now learned that when the Geiser sank under the terrible blow from the prow of the Thingvalla, no less than 118 persons lost their lives.

The Geiser was an iron screw-steamer of 2,831 gross tons, built at Copenhagen in 1881; and the Thingvalla, an iron screw-steamer of 2,524 gross tons, built at Copenhagen in 1874. Both steamers belong to the Thingvalla line, are owned in Copenhagen, and run between that port and New York. The Thingvalla was on her voyage from Copenhagen to New York, while the Geiser was proceeding eastward. The Geiser had ninety-three passengers and fifty-six crew, out of whom seventy-nine of the passengers and thirty-nine of the crew were drowned—one hundred and eighteen in all. She left New York for Copenhagen, Christiana, and Stettin on Saturday morning, August 11, and the vessel was off Sandy Hook by noon that day. The weather was fine, and by nightfall the vessel was hull down and speeding toward her destination.

Captain Muller did not leave the bridge for rest until Monday evening at eleven o'clock. The weather was at that time fair. Second Officer Jergensen was left in charge of the bridge, with instructions, the captain said, to wake him at twelve o'clock if nothing occurred in the meantime. This was done, and the captain, saying that at four he would take a sounding, went to sleep again. He knew no more, until he was awakened by a little before daybreak. It was during one of the dark moments before dawn that the two steamers approached each other, unknown to the officers on the bridges. The collision was only a matter of a few moments. The vessels were not running at full speed, but it did not need an experienced eye to tell what the crash would result in. The officers gave hurried orders, and the Geiser's helm was forced hard to starboard, and the Thingvalla's to port, while the engines were promptly reversed. It was afterward discovered that had these orders been reversed, the collision would not have occurred. If the Geiser had not reversed her engines, she would have shot safely across the Thingvalla's bows, while if the Thingvalla's helm had not been turned to port she would have just grazed the Geiser's side. This fact shows that there is urgent need for a better code of signals being adopted. The alarm had barely been given to the officers below, and they were not fairly awake, and nearly all the passengers and many of the crew were still fast asleep, when the prow of the Thingvalla,

The Crash of the Collision,

Towering High Above Her Sister Ship,

plunged into the starboard side of the Geiser with a terrific crash and a tremendous shock. The scenes that followed no pen can describe. There was a momentary stillness, and then the hoarse cries of men, mingled with the agonizing screams of women and the wails of children, were heard distinctly above the roaring wind. The inter-locked vessels separated in a few minutes, and the rift of light which betokened the breaking of day disclosed in a measure the damage done. In both steamers there was a huge hole. That of the Geiser was large enough to drive three elephants through abreast. It extended from below the water-line clean to the bulwarks and half-way across the beam. The forward cabin had been smashed like a paper-box, and it is believed that on board the Geiser a score or more or battered into insensibility. The bow of the Thingvalla was broken some distance below the deck, and torn open to the water-line, making a gap not less than 25 feet square. It made her bow look in the early morning light like the stern of a vessel with the rudder gone, and a big block of the hull chopped away. When the Thingvalla's bow was withdrawn by the reverse action of the wheel, one of the officers of the Geiser was discovered clinging to the chains.

Sleeping Passengers were Killed Outright,

Captain Moller, of the "Geiser,"

did his best to control the crew and clear away the life-boats and other life-saving apparatus, but there was so much excitement that he was only partly successful. The life-raft was launched, and there was a scramble to get to it. Many men leaped into the sea to reach it, and a few women and children were lowered to it in safety. There was such a rush for the life-boats that the seamen were hampered in their work, and in two cases at least the davits were broken at one end, and the boats became suspended and useless. A large number of the frantic persons had the presence of mind to find life-belts and put them on before jumping overboard. To the survivors and those on board the Thingvalla it seemed barely five minntes after the collision that the Geiser settled; and after rocking to and fro like a cradle, disappeared like a chip in the vortex of the Niagara whirlpool. The life-raft, with its human freight and many persons struggling in the water, was engulfed. The raft came to the surface, but there was no one on it.

Captain Moller was lying on a sofa when the alarm was given, and ran up on the bridge with his trousers in his hand. "I saw at once (he says) that the Geiser would go down, and shouted to the men on deck, 'Call all hands and get out the boats!' We instantly sent up rockets and burned lights. The first life-boat on the starboard side was launched. The man in charge, after lowering the tackle, lost his hold of the line, and her stern fell in the water, and she filled. The second boat was lowered, but the people were afraid to leap into her, as she was some feet away from the ship's side. I shouted to the men who were amidships to get the women and children into the boats first, and keeping cool and collected, while the wildest excitement prevailed among the terrified passengers. They came rushing up the companion-ladders pell-mell. I shouted to them to bring up life-belts, which were stowed in racks down the centre of the steerage, and could be picked up by any one with ease, even in the greatest hurry. They, however, were too much excited. There were over 700 of these belts in the ship, all within reach of the passengers. When I saw that they did not avail themselves of the belts, I threw down on the deck to them six life-belts kept on the bridge for the safety of the officers. The steamer settled very fast. I climbed on the bridge-rail and stood there. The ship gave a plunge, and I felt her go from under me like the whirlpool created by the displacement of the water. I felt myself drawn down by the suction, and was whirled round in the eddy, but did not lose consciousness. I was fully a minute under water, and when I came to the surface there were numbers of people and a large quantity of wreckage floating. I swam about for thirty-five minutes, when I was picked up by one of the Thingvalla's boats."

My Crew Behaved Admirably,

The Third Officer of the "Geiser,"

Jorgin D. Petersen, who was the officer on the watch when the terrible accident took place, tells a story. He says: "I had just come upon my watch on the bridge when the collision occurred. No sooner had I gone on the bridge when the crash came. I ran down on deck and tried to assist in making clear the first boat I came to. As soon as the boat got down to the water it capsized. Almost as soon as the collision occurred, the captain, who had been below in his berth, was on the bridge and in command. After the first boat capsized I went to assist the second boat to get clear of the vessel. Before I got to the boat a number of boatmen and passengers were trying to get it off. This also capsized when it got to the water. I ran forward on the deck and found some assistant engineers and firemen trying to get away the life-raft. At this moment the vessel began to sink with terrible rapidity, and the people were jumping overboard. There was nothing to stay on the steamer for now, and I jumped overboard, too. When I came to the surface there was no trace of the Geiser. I swam to an upturned boat, and after I had been clinging to it a little while, I heard some one shouting out. The semi-darkness prevented me from seeing who it was. I thought I recognized the captain's voice, and grabbed a life-belt. I threw it to him. He missed it. I grabbed another, and he missed this, too. He caught the third one, and then, with the aid of two oars that I found floating on the water, I assisted him to the upturned boat, and we all clung to it. As soon as the Thingvalla pulled out of the collision she began to assist in saving life. One of her boats came to us, but the captain said:

"No; Save Everybody Else First."

The captain was the last man to leave the sinking ship. He stayed upon the bridge until the ship went down, and when it did he went down with it. We were finally picked up by the Thingvalla. I should say that five, six, or seven minutes elapsed between the time of the collision and the time I jumped into the water.

The Officers of the "Thingvalla" after all the struggling creatures who were in sight had been picked up, and the condition of their own boat had been ascertained, ran up signals of distress, for they found that it would be hazardous, with their original load of 455 passengers, and with thirty-one persons from the Geiser, to make for port. At last

They Were Sighted by the "Wieland,"

The work of removing the passengers then began, and some hours were necessary to accomplish the task; as not only had the rescued people from the Geiser to be taken off, but, by the desire of the captain of the Thingvalla, the passengers of that vessel had also to be conveyed to New York. His ship's disabled condition, he said, made it dangerous for him to attempt to reach port with them. The Wieland had 113 cabin and 455 steerage passengers of her own, bound for New York from Hamburg, but Captain Albers, without hesitation, agreed to receive from the Thingvalla her 455 passengers, as well as fourteen passengers and seventeen sailors of the Geiser, bringing the Wieland's passenger list up to 1,054. The Thingvalla then slowly, and in momentary danger of sinking, turned around stern foremost to avoid the rush of water into the hole in her bows, and made for Halifax, N. S., where she arrived the next day. In an interview with a reporter, said: "Everything went well, until shortly after 4 o'clock on Tuesday morning. I was in bed. The second officer relieved the first officer at 4 o'clock and was in charge of the ship. Fifteen or twenty minutes past 4 o'clock I awakened by hearing him shout, 'Port the helm!' At the same moment I heard the signal ring, 'Reverse engines.' I jumped out of my birth and rushed on deck in my night-clothes. Just as I arrived there, a tremendous crash took place which made the Thingvalla quiver like a leaf in an autumn storm. We had cut a big steamer almost in two, striking her fair amidships. Our bow was under her mainmast.

Captain Laub, of the "Thingvalla"

"My first duty was to my own ship and passengers. I ran aft, ordered the boats to be ready for launching, and quieted my passengers as far as I could. Then I went forward to ascertain what damages we had sustained. Minutes seem like hours at such a crisis, and then again, half an hour seems to be but a minute. Therefore I cannot give you the exact time that elapsed during that thrilling time, but before I got on the bridge from ordering the boats ready the Thingvalla, whose engines were now going at full speed astern, had torn herself clear of the huge monster which hung on her bow. The lights on both steamers were burning and there was no fog. The day was just breaking and rain was falling.

"When I got on the bridge, after ordering the boats launched, I found there the second officer of the ship with which we had collided, and then I learned that she was our sister ship, the Geiser, of the same line. Our bows had cut into his stateroom, and as we tore out of the hole he climbed up our anchor chains and jumped aboard. Our crew and passengers behaved well under the trying circumstances.

"No human tongue can describe the scene when the Gieser went down. The last two minutes before that ill-fated vessel was swallowed up in the sea would baffle the imagination of Rider Haggard. It was a hundred times worse than the most thrilling romances of the sea that I have ever read. The wild shouts from the ill-fated people on the Geiser were deafening, and a wail of despair rang out upon the morning air that made my hair stand on end, and almost froze the blood in my veins. I can hear the mad shrieks of the drowning even now. This cry of frenzy from a hundred and fifty strong men and frail women lasted two minutes.

An Appalling Silence.

"Then an appalling silence prevailed. The silence was more awful than the never to be forgotten two minutes, if that were possible. The Geiser had been swallowed up. The suction of the vortex she created had engulfed everything within reach. Some of the crew say she broke n two before she foundered, but I doubt this. I :hink many of the passengers were mangled and xilled in their berths and probably never knew what struck them. Others, who were swept or umped overboard, were drawn down by the uction of rhe sinking vessel, became entangled vith the wreckage, and never rose to the surface.

"Many of those who were picked up were ound clinging to the keels of the Geiser's cap-ized boats. Others were floating on pieces of vreck. As soon as the Geiser sank, our three oats were out and picked up all that could be een floating—some thirty-one. These were aken on board, and the boats cruised around or two hours thereafter, but could find nothing ut the body of a woman, a steerage passenger, mong the débris.

"Some of the survivors had thrilling escapes. he third engineer had his arm broken during he collision. With the first and second engi-eers he got on a life-raft. Strange to say, the isabled man was saved, and the other two were rowned."

The boatswain of the Geiser caught hold of a oat when he came up. He helped the doctor nd two passengers upon the upturned boat, nd then feeling something clutch his ankle, nd fearing sharks, he jerked up his leg. It was woman's hand clutching his ankle, but the oor creature let go and sank. The boatswain dded that he still felt those fingers clutching im. Two people hung on to his oilcloth coat, ut one let go, and was lost.

Most of those on board the Geiser were north-estern farmers in well-to-do circumstances, ho, having formerly emigrated from Germany America, were returning to visit their native nd; some, it is said, intending to pay a visit the Copenhagen Exhibition.

A Strange Premonition.

The wife of Martin Seehuns, of Chicago, was ne of the passengers in the ill-fated steamship eiser. Mr. Seehuns burst into tears when the d news of his bereavement was made known him by a reporter. He was anxious to learn e particulars, and with tears still in his eyes ld the dramatic story which follows: "We ere married five years ago at Christiana, Nor-ay, her home," he said. "My wife's father is Lutheran minister of that city. Eight days ter the wedding we started for Chicago. She as going to visit her home for the first time nce then. She had a premonition that she ould not reach home, and talked of waiting ntil the next steamer. I insisted that she ould go on this to avoid the fall storms. I sh I had not. I dreamed last night the ves-l she was on had sunk. She was the best immer in the Christiana Natatorium, but I n't glean much hope from that, for a woman the ocean waves is but a feather.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Hearing Restored in Answer to Prayer.—Mr. D. Forbes related at a gospel service: "I knew a young lady who was very unwell, and to the grief of herself and her friends it was found that her illness was affecting her hearing, and at length she became entirely deaf. A Christian gentleman, fearing that she might die without again having the salvation of Christ pressed upon her, felt himself moved to wrestle with God that she might have her hearing restored. He prayed earnestly by the sick-bed for that object, then sat down to wait an answer. About fifteen minutes afterwards she asked that friend to tell her about Christ. 'You can hear, then?' he said, turning to her. She replied, 'Yes.' Her sense of hearing continued for three months, when she fell asleep in Jesus; for during that time she had used the sense that God had restored to drink in the precious truths of His salvation. Such is the power of God in answer to believing prayer."

Mother "as Bad as Maggie."—The Rev. Mr. Gullan says: "On one occasion I visited a young girl who had been converted to Christ at one of our meetings. Speaking to her mother of her I said, 'Do you see any difference in Maggie since her conversion?' 'Yes, indeed I do, sir,' she replied. 'She is not half so careful of me now. She used never to leave the house until it was neat and clean, and now she is not so careful as to how she leaves it; she must be out to this meeting and that meeting; I would rather have Maggie as she used to be.' Thus she prejudiced her mother against religion. Some time afterwards the mother also gave her heart to Jesus, and when next I visited her I inquired, 'Is Maggie improved now?' She looked up with a smile as she answered, 'I am just about the same as Maggie now. I find myself not so precise and fidgety as to how I leave things, that I may go and hear more of my dear Saviour's love.' Both made a mistake. They could have served God just as well cleaning the house as out at a gospel meeting. Probably the neighbors, seeing the untidy, dirty house, would be inclined to blame religion for it."

The Drowning Sailor's Cry.—A Christian sailor thus testifies: "The immediate cause of my conversion to Christ was a story I heard when by seeming accident I wandered into a Gospel meeting. It was an old sea-captain who was speaking, and he was relating the sad death of one who had served under him on board ship. The man was known to be the most reckless and wicked of the whole crew. No danger was too great for him to face, though the least prepared to meet God. A great storm overtook the vessel; for a time she battled bravely with the elements, but soon it became evident that she would sink. Their only hope was in the boats. This seaman got into one to assist in its being lowered, but through some accident it was not lowered properly, and the man precipitated into the seething sea, which was far too rough to admit of rescue being possible, or even attempted. They saw him strike out manfully for a few strokes, then, as the waves overwhelmed him, he threw up his hands and cried aloud, so as to be heard by all on board, 'Lord, save me for Jesus' sake.' That story took great hold of me, and by God's grace, it was the means of causing me also to come to Christ."

John's "Hurrah for Jesus!"—Mr. Fergueson relates: "There is a converted fisherman in the north of Scotland formerly known by the name of 'Drunken John,' and well he deserved the name. At night he was generally to be found in the saloon, from which he emerged at closing-time to reel home to his wretched dwelling and miserable wife. One night he left the saloon earlier than usual, and as he wandered homeward he came upon a large and well-lighted building. He stepped inside, and found himself in an evangelistic meeting. He mechanically sat down, and during the address he fell asleep. He awoke quite sober, and rose to go out; but a gentleman stopped him and conversed with him, the result being that before he left the place he had professed to accept Christ. The first words he said, when he arrived home, were, 'Wife, I am converted.' 'Drunk as usual,' she quietly remarked. 'Oh, Mary; if you do not believe it, come, let us pray, and thank God for His goodness.' His wife approached, and knelt beside her husband. But though he could swear, he could not pray. He knelt there for some time, unable to utter one word. At last, jumping to his feet and throwing his bonnet in the air, he exclaimed, 'Hurrah for Jesus!' That was his prayer, and God would understand it."

A Doctor's Appalling Condition.—"In 1874 I met a doctor who was in great concern about his soul, but he determined to shake off the impression. Passing down a street in the city one day, he suddenly came upon an open-air evangelistic meeting. He stopped and listened; a workingman was speaking, and though the tone of voice was not cultured, nor the speaker eloquent, the words were the words of God, and went home with power. Until that time he had not believed in conversion, but now he saw there was a real turning to God and trusting in Him, followed by an inward assurance of salvation. As the doctor himself has said: 'I would not tell any one what my thoughts were at that time. I felt the Holy Spirit working in me, but I refused to surrender, and resolved to put Christ from me!' In 1880 I again met this same gentleman. Talking of our former acquaintanceship and of his anxiety about his soul, I asked him if he had now found peace in Christ. 'No,' he replied, 'I have not. Often have I wished I could get the same impressions that I had many years ago, but they never returned. Then everything was so clear, and the road so open, but now the way seems shut, and I know it is too late. The day of mercy has passed for me. That was my last chance, and it is gone.' That man still lives, not able to give himself to Christ."

The Text at the Railway Station.—"A few years ago a young gentleman in London found himself suddenly put into possession of a large fortune, which like a prodigal he straightway began to waste in riotous living. He entered into all kinds of sin and dissipation, and not content with destroying his own soul, he set himself to ruin another. He had a female companion, upon whom in his generous moods he lavished all she could desire. One day, when he was from home he felt a desire for her company, and at once sent word for her to come to him. Obedient to his command, she at once set out, but when she arrived at the railway station, she found the train was not due for a few minutes. Walking into the waiting-room she carelessly glanced round, and on the wall she saw the text, 'God so loved the world,' etc. It was like a flash of light from the glory land right into her hard, wicked heart, revealing the love of God to her lost and degraded soul. Straight to the bookstall she went and demanded a Bible. Being asked what kind, she replied, 'It does not matter so long as it has that text, "God so loved the world," etc., in it.' The stall-keeper, who knew Christ himself, handed her a Bible, and carefully marked the text. All the way in the train she read eagerly, the Holy Spirit applying the word, and before she had completed her journey she had found forgiveness in Jesus Christ. 'O, Captain,' she cried, when she met him, 'I am saved! God has shown me His great love, and now our old life of sin must cease.' He offered her great wealth if she would but stay with him. 'No,' she answered, 'I will never meet you again until it is before the Great White Throne of Christ.' That lady is now one of the brightest Christian workers in London."

The Antichrist Babylon and the Coming of the Kingdom, by G. H. Pember, M. A. A new work of remarkable originality and power, written in a popular and simple style, yet showing much scholarly research, 171 pages; Price in cloth covers, 50 cents. For sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York.

SUPERFLUITIES A HINDERANCE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached last Sunday Morning, September 23, 1888.

"A man of great stature, whose fingers and toes were four and twenty, six on each hand, and six on each foot: and he also was the son of a giant. But when he defied Israel, Jonathan the son of Shimea, David's brother, slew him." 1 Chron. 20 : 6, 7.

Modern Instances of Superabundant Extremities—Neither Stature nor Digits Saved the Giant—The Work Done by Ordinary People—The Swamp Angel and the Peacemaker—The Value of Common Lawyers and Physicians—Superfluous Wealth—A King who Became a Porter—Financial Obesity—Peter Cooper's Remedy—Paulo-Post Future Benevolence—The Magnificent Ordinary Equipment—Gospel Handshaking—The Wonders of the Foot—Where to Walk—Three Women in Rivalry.

MALFORMATION photographed, and for what reason? Did not this passage slip in by mistake into the sacred Scriptures, as sometimes a paragraph utterly obnoxious to the editor gets into his newspaper during his absence? Is not this Scriptural errata? No, no; there is nothing haphazard about the Bible. This passage of Scripture was as certainly intended to be put in the Bible as the passage, "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth," or, "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son."

And I select it for my text to-day because it is charged with practical and tremendous meaning. By the people of God the Philistines had been conquered, with the exception of a few giants. The race of giants is mostly extinct, I am glad to say. There is except to enlarge the income of museums. But there were many of them in olden times. Goliath was, according to the Bible, eleven feet, four and a half inches high. Or, if you do not believe the Bible, the famous Pliny, a secular writer, declares that at Crete, by an earthquake, a monument was broken open, discovering the remains of a giant forty-six cubits long, or sixty-nine feet high. So, whether you prefer sacred or profane history, you must come to the conclusion that there were in those times cases of human altitude monstrous and appalling.

No Use for Giants Now

David had smashed the skull of one of these giants, but there were other giants that the Davidean wars had not yet subdued, and one of them stands in my text. He was not only of alpine stature, but had a surplus of digits. To the ordinary fingers was annexed an additional finger, and the foot had also a superfluous addendum. He had twenty-four terminations to hands and feet, where others have twenty. It was not the only instance of the kind. Tavernier, the learned writer, says that the Emperor of Java had a son endowed with the same number of extremities. Volcatius, the poet, had six fingers on each hand. Maupertuis in his celebrated letters, speaks of two families near Berlin, similarly equipped of hand and foot. All of which I can believe, for I have seen two cases of the same physical superabundance. But this giant of the text is in battle, and as David, the dwarf warrior, had despatched one giant, the brother of David slays this monster of my text, and there he lies after the battle in Gath,

A Dead Giant.

His stature did not save him, and his superfluous appendices of hand and foot did not save him. The probability was that in the battle his sixth finger on his hand made him clumsy in the use of his weapon, and his sixth toe crippled his gait. Behold the prostrate and malformed giant of the text: "A man great of stature, whose fingers and toes were four and twenty, six on each hand, and six on each foot: and he also was the son of a giant. But when he defied Israel, Jonathan, the son of Shimea, David's brother, slew him."

Behold how superfluities are a hinderance rather than a help! In all the battle at Gath that day there was not a man with ordinary hand and ordinary foot and ordinary stature that was not better off than this physical curiosity of my text. As physical size is apt to run in families, the probability is that this brother of David, who did the work, was of an abbreviated stature. A dwarf on the right side is stronger than a giant on the wrong side, and all the body and mind and estate and opportunity that you cannot use for God and the betterment of the world is a sixth finger and a sixth toe, and a terrific hinderance. The most of the good done in the world, and the most of

Those who Win the Battles

for the right, are ordinary people. Count the fingers of their right hand, and they have just five, no more and no less. One Doctor Duff among missionaries, but three thousand missionaries that would tell you they have only common endowment. One Florence Nightingale to nurse the sick in conspicuous places, but ten thousand women who are just as good nurses, though never heard of. The Swamp Angel was a big gun that during the war made a big noise, but muskets of ordinary calibre and shells of ordinary heft did the execution. President Tyler and his Cabinet go down the Potomac one day to experiment with the Peacemaker, a great iron gun that was to affright with its thunder foreign navies. The gunner touches it off, and it explodes, and leaves Cabinet Ministers dead on the deck, while at that time, all up and down our coasts, were cannon of ordinary bore, able to be the defence of the nation, and ready at the first touch to waken to duty. The curse of the world is big guns. After the politicians, who have made all the noise, go home hoarse from angry discussion on the evening of the first Monday in November, the next day the people, with the silent ballots, will settle everything, and settle it right; a million of the white slips of paper they drop making about as much noise as the fall of an apple-blossom.

Clear back in the country to-day there are mothers in plain apron, and shoes fashioned on a rough last by the shoemaker at the end of the lane, rocking babies that are to be the Martin Luthers and the Faradays and the Edisons and the Bismarcks and the Gladstones and the Washingtons and the George Whitefields of the future. The longer I live, the more

I Like Common Folks.

They do the world's work, bearing the world's burdens, weeping the world's sympathies, carrying the world's consolation. Among lawyers, we see rise up a Rufus Choate, or a William Wirt, or a Samuel L. Southand, but society would go to pieces to-morrow if there were not thousands of common lawyers to see that men and women get their rights. A Valentine Mott or a Willard Parker rises up eminent in the medical profession, but what an unlimited sweep would pneumonia and diphtheria and scarlet fever have in the world if it were not for ten thousand common doctors. The old physician in his gig, rolling up the lane of the farm-house, or riding on horseback, his medicines in the saddle-bags, arriving on the ninth day of the fever, and coming in to take hold of the pulse of the patient, while the family, pale with anxiety, are looking on and waiting for his decision in regard to the patient, and hearing him say, "Thank God, I have mastered the case; he is getting well!" excites in me an admiration quite equal to the mention of the names of the great metropolitan doctors, Pancoast or Gross or Joseph C. Hutchinson of the past, or the illustrious living men of the present.

Yet what do we see in all departments? People not satisfied with ordinary spheres of work and ordinary duties. Instead of trying to see what they can do with a hand of five fingers, they want six. Instead of usual endowment of twenty manual and pedal addenda, they want twenty-four. A certain amount of money for livelihood, and for the supply of those whom we leave behind us after we have departed this life, is important, for we have the best authority for saying, "He that provideth not for his own, and especially those of his own household, is worse than an infidel"; but the large and fabulous sums for which many struggle, if obtained, would be a hinderance rather than an advantage. The anxieties and annoyances of those whose can only be told by those who possess them. It will be a good thing when, through your industry and public prosperities, you can own the house in which you live. But suppose you own fifty houses, and you have all those rents to collect, and all those tenants to please. Suppose you have branched out in business successes until in almost every direction you have investments. The fire-bell rings at night, you rush up-stairs to look out of the window, to see if it is any of your mills. Epidemic of crime comes, and there are embezzlements and absconding in all directions, and you wonder whether any of your book-keepers will prove recreant. A panic strikes the financial world, and you are like a hen under a sky full of hawks, and trying with anxious cluck to get your overgrown chickens safely under wing. After a certain stage of success has been reached, you have to trust so many important things to others that you are apt to become the prey of others, and you are swindled and defrauded, and the anxiety you had on your brow when you were earning your first thousand dollars is not equal to the anxiety on your brow now that you have won your three hundred thousand.

Estates have Become Plethoric

The trouble with such a one is he is spread out like the unfortunate one in my text. You have more fingers and toes than you know what to do with. Twenty were useful, twenty-four is a hindering superfluity. Disraeli says that abdicated his throne and joined the people, and became a porter to carry burdens. And some one asked him why he did so, and he replied "Upon my honor, gentlemen, the load which I quit was by far heavier than the one you see me carry. The weightiest is but a straw, when compared to that world under which I labored. I have slept more in four nights than I have during all my reign. I begin to live and to be a king myself. Elect whom you choose. As for me, I am so well it would be madness to return to court."

A King of Poland

"Well," says somebody, "such overloaded persons ought to be pitied, for their worriments are real, and their insomnia and their nervous prostration are genuine." I reply that they could get rid of the bothersome surplus by giving it away. If a man has more houses than he can carry without vexation, let him drop a few of them. If his estate is so great he cannot manage it without getting nervous dyspepsia from having too much, let him divide up with those who have nervous dyspepsia because they cannot get enough. No! they guard their sixth finger with more care than they did the original five. They go limping with what they call gout, and know not that, like the giant of my text, they are lamed by a superfluous toe. A few of them by charities bleed themselves of their

Financial Obesity

and monetary plethora, but many of them hang on to the hindering superfluity till death, and then, as they are compelled to give the money up anyhow, in their last will and testament they generously give some of it to the Lord, expecting, no doubt, that He will feel very much obliged to them. Thank God that once in a while we have a Peter Cooper, who, owning an interest in the iron works at Trenton, said to Mr. Lester: "I do not feel quite easy about the amount we are making. Working under one of our patents, we have a monopoly which seems to be something wrong. Everybody has to come to us for it, and we are making money too fast." So they reduced the price, and this while our philanthropist was building Cooper Institute, which mothers a hundred institutes of kindness and mercy all over the land. But the world had to wait five thousand eight hundred years for Peter Cooper!

I am glad for the benevolent institutions to get a legacy from men who during their life were as stingy as death, but who in their last will and testament bestowed money on hospitals; missionary societies; but for such testators I have no respect. They would have taken every cent of it with them if they could, and bought up half of heaven and let it out at ruinous rent, or loaned the money to celestial citizens at two per cent. a month, and got a corner on harps and trumpets. They lived in this world fifty or sixty years in the presence of appalling suffering and want, and made no effort for their relief. The charities of such people are in and they are going to do them. The probability is that if such a one in his last will by a donation to benevolent societies tries to atone for his lifetime close-fistedness, the heirs-at-law will try to break the will by proving that the old man was senile or crazy, and the expense of the litigation will about leave in the lawyers' hands what was meant for the American Bible Society. O ye overweighted, successful business men, whether this sermon reach your ear or your eyes, let me say that if you are prostrated with anxieties about keeping or investing these tremendous fortunes, I can tell you how you can do more to get your health back and your spirits raised than by drinking gallons of bad-tasting water at Saratoga, Homburg, or Carlsbad—give to God, humanity, and the Bible ten per cent. of all your income, and it will make a new man of you, and from restless walking of the floor at night you shall have eight hours sleep, without the help of bromide of potassium, and from no appetite you will hardly be able to wait your regular meals, and your wan cheek will fill up, and when you die the blessings of those who put for you would have perished will bloom all over your grave.

"Paulo-Post Future" Tense,

Perhaps some of you will take this advice, but the most of you will not. And you will try to cure your swollen hand by getting on it more fingers, and your rheumatic foot by getting on it more toes, and there will be a sigh of relief when you are gone out of the world; and when over your remains the minister recites the words: "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord," persons who have keen appreciation of the ludicrous will hardly be able to keep their faces straight. But whether in that direction my words do good or not, I am anxious that all who have only be thankful for what they have and rightly employ it. I think you all have, figuratively as well as literally, fingers enough. Do not long for hindering superfluities. Standing in the presence of this fallen giant of my text, and in this post-mortem examination of him, let us learn how much better off we are with just the usual hand, the usual foot. You have thanked God for a thousand things, but I warrant you never thanked Him for those two implements of work and locomotion, that no one but the Infinite and Omnipotent God could have ever planned or made—the hand and the foot. Only that soldier or that mechanic who in a battle, or through machinery, has lost them knows anything about their value, and only the Christian scientist can have any appreciation of what divine masterpieces they are.

Ordinary Equipment

Sir Charles Bell, the English surgeon, on the battle-field of Waterloo, while engaged in amputations of the wounded, was so impressed with the wondrous construction of the human hand that when the Earl of Bridgewater gave forty thousand dollars for essays on the wisdom and goodness of God, and eight books were written, Sir Charles Bell wrote his entire book on the wisdom and goodness of God as displayed in the human hand. The twenty-seven bones in hand and wrist with cartilages and ligaments and plalanges of the fingers all made just ready to knit, to sew, to build up, to pull down, to weave, to write, to plow, to pound, to wheel, to battle, to give friendly salutation. The tips of its fingers are so many telegraph offices by reason of their sensitiveness of touch. The bridges, the tunnels, the cities of the whole earth are

The Victories of the Hand.

The hands are not dumb, but often speak as distinctly as the lips. With our hands we invite, we repel, we invoke, we entreat, we wring them in grief, or clap them in joy, or spread them abroad in benediction. The malformation of the giant's hand in the text glorifies the usual hand. Fashioned of God more exquisitely and wondrously than any human mechanicism that was ever contrived, I charge you use it for God, and the lifting of the world out of its moral predicament. Employ it in the sublime work of gospel handshaking. You can see the hand is just made for that. Four fingers just set right to touch your neighbor's hand on one side, and your thumb set so as to clench it on the other side. By all its bones and joints and muscles and cartilages and ligaments the voice of nature joins with the voice of God commanding you to shake hands. The custom is as old as the Bible, anyhow. Jehu said to Jehonadab: "Is thine heart right as my heart is with thine heart? If it be, give me thine hand." When hands join in Christian salutation a gospel electricity thrills across the palm from heart to heart, and from the shoulder of one to the shoulder of the other.

Shake Hands all Around.

With the timid and for their encouragement, shake hands. With the troubled and in warm-hearted sympathy, shake hands. With the young man just entering business, and discouraged at the small sales and the large expenses, shake hands. With the child who is new from God and started on unending journey, for which he needs to gather great supply of strength, and who can hardly reach up to you now, because you are so much taller, shake hands. Across cradles and dying beds and graves, shake hands. With your enemies, who have done all to defame and hurt you, but whom you can afford to forgive, shake hands. At the door of churches where people come in, and at the door of churches where people go out, shake hands. Let pulpit shake hands with pew, and Sabbath-day shake hands with week-day, and earth shake hands with heaven. Oh the strange, the mighty, the undefined, the mysterious, the eternal power of an honest handshaking! The difference between these times and the millennial times is that now some shake hands, but then all will shake hands, throne and foot-stool, across seas nation with nation, God and man, church militant and church triumphant.

Yea; the malformation of this fallen giant's foot glorifies

The Ordinary Foot,

for which I fear you have never once thanked God. The twenty-six bones of the foot are the admiration of the anatomist. The arch of the foot fashioned with a grace and a poise that Trajan's arch at Beneventum, or Constantine's arch at Rome, or Arch of Triumph at the end of Champs Elysées could not equal. Those arches stand where they were planted, but this arch of the foot is an adjustable arch, a yielding arch, a flying arch, and ready for movements innumerable. The human foot so fashioned as to enable man to stand upright as no other creature, and leave the hand that would otherwise have to help in balancing the body free for anything it chooses. The foot of the camel fashioned for the sand, the foot of the bird fashioned for the tree-branch, the foot of the hind fashioned for the slippery rock, the foot of the lion fashioned to rend its prey, the foot of the horse fashioned for the solid earth, but the foot of man made to cross the desert, or climb the tree, or scale the cliff, or walk the earth, or go anywhere he needs to go. With that divine triumph of anatomy in your possession

Where do You Walk?

In what path of righteousness or what path of sin have you set it down? Where have you left the mark of your footsteps? Amid the petrifactions in the rocks have been found the mark of the feet of birds and beasts of thousands of years ago. And God can trace out all the footsteps of your lifetime, and those you made fifty years ago are as plain as those made in the last soft weather, all of them petrified for the Judgment day. Oh, the foot! Give me the autobiography of your foot from the time you stepped out of the cradle until to-day, and I will tell your exact character now and what are your prospects for the world to come.

That there might be no doubt about the fact that both these pieces of divine mechanism, hand and foot, belong to Christ's service, both hands of Christ and both feet of Christ were spiked on the cross. Right through the arch of both His feet to the hollow of His instep went the iron of torture, and from the palm of His hand to the back of it, and there is not a muscle or nerve or bone among the twenty-seven bones of hand and wrist, or among the twenty-six bones of the foot, but it belongs to Him now and forever.

That is the most beautiful foot that goes about paths of greatest usefulness, and that the most beautiful hand that does the most to help others. I was reading of about the appearance of the hand. And the one reddened her hand with berries, and said the beautiful tinge made hers the most beautiful. And another put her hand in the mountain brook, and said, as the waters dripped off, that her hand was the most beautiful. And another plucked flowers off the bank, and under the bloom contended that her hand was the most attractive. Then a poor old woman appeared, and looking up in her decrepitude asked for alms. And a woman who had not taken part in the rivalry gave her alms. And all the women resolved to leave to this beggar the question as to which of all the hands present was the most attractive, and she said: "The most beautiful of them all is the one that gave relief to my necessities," and as she so said her wrinkles and rags and her decrepitude and her body disappeared, and in place thereof stood the Christ, who long ago said: "Inasmuch as ye did it to one of the least of these, ye did it to Me!" and who to purchase the service of our hand and foot here on earth or in resurrection state, had His own hand and foot lacerated.

Three Women in Rivalry

DR. KENNETH MACKENZIE.

(See Portrait on Page 620.)

THE young missionary physician whose portrait appears on this page died at Tientsin, China, on April 1, this year at the age of thirty-eight years. He was chief of the medical staff in the Missionary Hospital at that place, and was as highly distinguished for his faith and missionary zeal as for his surgical skill. He was one of the brilliant band of university men for whom the foreign mission cause is indebted under God to the labors of Mr. D. L. Moody. He heard the great evangelist in 1873, just as he was completing his studies in Edinburgh, for the medical profession, and was converted. He passed his university examinations in Edinburgh and London with honor, receiving his diploma, and then, instead of entering on a lucrative practice, offered himself as medical missionary.

His first work was done at Hankow, in connection with the Rev. Griffith John, whom he accompanied on some of his long journeys of preaching and healing. After four years there, he was called to Tientsin, where he remained until he died. A crisis occurred soon after Dr. Mackenzie's arrival, and a meeting of the medical staff was called to pray for help. Scarcely had the meeting broken up when a request for a foreign doctor came from the Viceroy, whose wife had been given up for death by native physicians. Dr. Mackenzie and Dr. Irwin treated her so successfully that she was completely restored to health, and the Viceroy in his gratitude undertook to defray regularly all the expenses of the hospital. After that the hospital work prospered and extended, and Dr. Mackenzie labored in it heart and soul. Early this year, however, he contracted a severe cold, which developed into pneumonia, and on April 1 he died, deeply regretted by all who knew him.

NOTABLE CONVERSIONS IN NEW YORK.

THE following incidents are related by Rev. John Boyd, who assisted in the personal work of the revival services during the recent visit of Rev. Thomas Harrison :

"I'm Coming, Mother."

One evening during the West Side meetings, a young man who came to the church was thrown, after the sermon, into a state of deep concern about his soul by the power of the Spirit. He lost his strength, his body becoming rigid and immovable as a statue, he was carried to a pew and laid down on the cushion by some of the officers of the church. After remaining in that apparently unconscious condition for about thirty minutes, he gradually opened his eyes, and gazing upward with rapt face, he said in a low, earnest, pathetic tone, "I'm coming, mother, I'm coming, mother." It appears that his mother, when on her death-bed, a year or so ago, called him and his brother to her bedside, imploring them to come to the Saviour and meet her in heaven. The other brother had been converted at Mr. Harrison's meeting the previous night, and when he went home with his glad heart and shining face, his testimony was believed, and the subject of these remarks came to the Central M. E. Church, where a vision of heaven, of the faithful mother and of the Lord Jesus Christ, resulted in his conviction, repentance, and salvation.

A Politician's Experience.

On Sunday afternoon, August 26, Mr. Harrison preached from text "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" The sermon was delivered with unusual convincing and convicting power. At the close, the ordinary invitation was given to sinners who wished to seek the Lord, to come to the altar. Several persons responded promptly, among whom was a gentleman of unusual intelligence, about sixty years of age. He came from the outer edge of the great congregation, deliberately walking down the central aisle. Every eye was fixed upon him. He knelt at the altar, in the straw, in front of the platform.

One of the workers from New York approached him and asked if he was there to seek God and the pardon of his sins. With great deliberation he replied, "I am." "To comply with the conditions you must give your heart to God, as He says to you, 'Son, give me thy heart.' Will you do that?" "I will; I think I understand the theory of salvation, but I want to realize the experience." "The first condition is that you give your heart to God. Having done that, He accepts it, and it is therefore His. Your next step is to accept the Lord Jesus Christ as your personal Saviour, and trust Him to save you now. Will you do that?" "I will." "Do you now trust Him?" After a long pause, he replied, "I do." "Jesus says: 'Whosoever cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out,' and on that word you are authorized to believe He receives and pardons you. Can you trust His word to save you now?" "I can." "Do you?" "I do." "Then He saves you. Are you conscious of that fact?" "I am." "Then He saves you now." "He does." "How do you know it?" "I am inwardly conscious of it." "Then praise Him, and go from here saying: 'I am the Lord's, and Jesus is my Saviour.'" "Now stand on your feet, thus witnessing that you are saved," which he did with beaming face.

At the 6:30 P. M. meeting he was introduced to the audience by the Presiding Elder, as Mr. Downing, ex-District-Attorney of Queens Co., and was requested to address the audience. He said: "I came to Mount Tabor on Saturday for recreation, with no thought of serious matters. I am past sixty years of age, and had many times been impressed with the thought that it was my duty to become a Christian, but had as often put it off. Under the searching sermon of this afternoon I felt that the time had arrived for decisive action, and I presented myself at this bench, seeking the pardon of my sins, and here God, for Christ's sake, has forgiven and accepted me. My past life has been wasted. My great regret is that I did not sooner take this step; and just here let me appeal to you in this audience who like myself may be putting off this important matter, to settle it this very night."

While the speaker was thus addressing the great audience, the marvellous change in the expression of his face was manifest to all. In the afternoon it was sad and gloomy, now it was illumined with Divine light.

Mr. Downing was District-Attorney of Queens Co., New York, for six successive terms.

A BACKSLIDER RESTORED.

IN a letter to Dr. Cullis, published in his Times of Refreshing, a Christian worker, writing from San Buena Ventura on July 16, says: While I am waiting in the depot here, I will try to write you a few lines. I have to wait nearly three hours. I came this morning to try to find a young man who left Santa Barbara yesterday morning in a very discouraged condition; he was converted three weeks ago and has had a most blessed experience, so triumphant and joyous; but on Saturday his employer abused him, and he was overcome with temper, and then the devil tried to tell him that the Lord had not been faithful to him or He would have kept him from anger, and he got terribly mixed up and left. He did not feel like seeing any of us, but I could not give him up, so I followed him, trusting the Lord to guide me to him, and He did. I met him on the street corner with some young men, and he was surprised to see me. I told him what I was here for, and he gladly went with me to the seashore, where we could have a quiet place for conversation and prayer; and he has returned in sweet trustfulness to the dear Lord, and is to return with me this evening. Do you wonder that I rode thirty miles this morning to find him, lest the adversary should get control of him?

A RESCUE FROM THE STREETS.

A remarkable instance of the power of God working through means apparently insignificant, is related among the reminiscences of the work under the late Dr. Stephen H. Tyng, Sr., when at St. George's, New York. A little, deformed girl, a sufferer from spinal complaint, was converted, and earnestly desired to do something for Christ. In her condition, poor, weak, and suffering, it seemed impossible, but the girl was in earnest about it, and she prayed and thought anxiously. At last she made an effort. She had a few tracts, and going into a side-street, near her home, she planted herself near a house which was given up to vice, and was frequented by notorious women of the more wealthy class.

Presently one of these women, beautiful and richly dressed, emerged and passed the spot where the deformed girl stood. Instantly with an earnest word a tract was placed in her hand. The handsome woman glanced at it, then at the poor, twisted, ill-clad girl, and her face flushed with anger. Some previous annoyance, or possibly the influence of liquor, rendered her less able to control herself, or her womanly feeling must have kept her from cruelty to one so weak and helpless. She raised her hand and struck the girl in the face, felling her to the ground, and then went on her way. It was a brutal act, but the poor girl thought of her Saviour's suffering and patience, and she was glad to suffer in His cause. She remained at her post until a late hour, giving away her tracts to all who came from that haunt of vice.

Night after night the little deformed creature was at her post praying silently for God's blessing, and giving her tracts to all who would accept them. Especially was she anxious that the woman who had struck her should have one, and whenever she saw her, the poor girl with gentle pleading face would hold out the silent messenger of the gospel. It was always rejected with derision, until one night under some unaccountable influence, possibly some reminiscence of other days, or under the direct power of the Holy Spirit, the woman yielded, and the persistent girl was rewarded by the acceptance of the tract; attached to it was an invitation to some gospel services Dr. Tyng was then holding. The woman asked the girl to show her where the services were held. She gladly did so, and the two strange companions, the one lovely in person and splendid in attire, but with her soul dwarfed and hideous by sin; and the other wretched and misshapen of body, but with her soul all-glorious by Christ's transforming power, went into the house of God together.

The vicious woman was that night in the strangely softened, sensitive condition into which such women sometimes fall in the reaction inevitable to artificial excitement, and in her receptive state the Spirit of God carried the gospel message with power to her heart. She went to the preacher at the close of the service and told her story, anxious that she, like the woman who was a sinner in the gospel story, might sit at Jesus' feet. She was assured of acceptance by the Saviour, and was soon rejoicing in the consciousness of pardon. A lady present offered her employment in her own household, and that night took her to her home, where she remained an efficient and faithful help.

A member of the family fell sick, and this rescued woman was installed as nurse. An astonishing gentleness and tenderness and patience, so markedly in contrast with her disposition before her conversion, had characterized her, and it was this which led to her being selected for attendance in the chamber of sickness. During that illness, the woman showed so remarkable an aptitude for the duties that all about her perceived that she had found her place in life. She was a born nurse, patient, vigilant, intelligent; and soon, under training, she became experienced.

During the terrible epidemic of yellow fever in Memphis, Tenn., among the records of heroic self-sacrifice there was one of a nurse from New York who had volunteered for duty. Her labors were incessant, her conduct fearless, her words of Christian appeal effective, and she was called an angel by the poor sufferers in that time of sickness and death, many of whom under her guidance were led to Christ. Her identity was disclosed under sad circumstances. Worn down by long labor and watching, she was seized with the fever, and from the first symptoms it was evident that one so exhausted could not recover. The dying woman so blessed in her labor, so gentle in her ministrations, so successful in alleviating pain and winning souls, was the vicious woman who years ago, in New York, had struck the deformed child for offering her a tract, and had been transformed by the grace of God. Her death is described by those who witnessed it, as one of the most joyful and triumphant that had been seen in the whole course of that awful scourge.

A NOTABLE SERVICE IN MADAGASCAR.

ON March 28 there was observed in the Memorial Church at Antananarivo, the thirty-ninth anniversary of the event which the church was built to commemorate. The large building was crowded to excess, the services lasting from three to four hours. The story relating to the early martyrdoms on the 28th of March, 1849, was rehearsed; how that on that day four Christians were burned alive, and fourteen were hurled from the summit of the precipice on which the Memorial Church is built. Many of the older Christians, including relatives of the martyrs, were seated on the platform and took part in the services. This commemoration of the faith and zeal of the early Christians will, it is believed, help much in stimulating the spiritual life of the present generation of the Malagasy. Various reports are sent of large meetings which have recently been held in different parts of Madagascar, indicating a quickened spiritual life on the part of the people. Yet in some sections of the great island the people are still unsupplied with missionaries, and are constantly calling for them. A native pastor said to a visiting missionary not long since: "We look across to yonder road [the main road from Antananarivo],and when we see a palanquin we have exclaimed for many a long year, 'The missionary has come at last!' But no." Pointing to his hair, he said: "When my hair was yet black and my teeth were sound, we were always looking out for the missionary, and now you see I am a gray-haired old man and many of my teeth are gone, and yet no missionary." But these people, though their longing is not gratified, still hold fast to their Christian faith, and are doing what they can to evangelize their neighbors.

DANIEL'S VISION OF THE FOUR WILD BEASTS.

By Rev. E. Guers.*

Their Rise—The Spirit of Their Rule—The Fourth Empire Founded—Its Reconstruction in a New Form—Its Ten Component Parts—Its Extent—The Little Horn Paramount—Identity With the Beast—Persecutes All Saints—His Malignity Concentrated on the Jews—His Judgment and Destruction.

THE four beasts rise from the "great sea," the name that Scripture gives to the Mediterranean, that sea entirely surrounded by countries composing the prophetical earth. The 2d chapter of Daniel characterizes the power with which the four empires would be invested; the seventh describes the use they would make of it; it represents and also marks the cause of their ruin. Four wild beasts! Admirably just emblem! for the empires they describe, the Chaldean, Persian, Grecian, and Roman, would make the same use of the power delegated to them that a wild beast makes of his strength. Woe to the people of God under their rule!

The Spirit of Their Rule,

The Chaldean, the Persian, and the Grecian have accomplished their time as empires (seven or eight centuries), but their life has not ended with their rule; their existence as nations must be prolonged indefinitely (ver. 12): "until a time, and an epoch," translates Perret; Osterwald translates, "during a certain time"; the original does not necessarily imply a precise and determined duration.

The Fourth Empire

is that which particularly concerns prophecy; the first three, if I may so use the term, are only present to introduce it. The Roman Empire founded by Augustus Cæsar included in its first form the inheritance of the empires which had preceded it. It continued their part and absorbed them. The emblem of chapter 2d, the statue, could hardly by its nature express what was wanted; but that of the seventh chapter expresses it admirably; in the fourth wild beast we find something of the three first—the lion, the bear, and the leopard (Comp. Dan. 7 with Rev. 13: 2.)

The fourth empire still exists in a prophetic point of view. At the beginning of this empire the Messiah appeared in the world. He will again return to earth to destroy it, and to re-establish in its place His glorious reign. The Roman Empire has crucified the Son of God, persecuted the Church, destroyed Jerusalem, dispersed Israel among the nations, but it has not terminated its career. Re-established under an entirely new form,

The Ten Kingdoms Reunited

under one chief, it will again make war against Christ, thus filling up the measure of its iniquities. The blasphemies and the persecutions of its last chief, the little horn, his judgment and his destruction, followed by the universal reign of the Messiah, such are the special subjects of the vision before us; it is the history of royalty, not of priesthood; of secular power concentrated at the end in the hands of a great blasphemer, and not of ecclesiastical power which God has delegated to none; this is the future, not the past of imperial Rome.

It is easy to convince ourselves of this. In truth have the same signification as the ten toes of the statue: they represent ten kingdoms; but as these kingdoms have not yet existed in the emblem of the statue, neither have they existed in that of the fourth beast. They are yet to come. It is a form which the empire, once compact, now broken in pieces, shall assume as soon as it is reconstructed. As in general this vision carries us on to that moment, the time of the last trial and last deliverance of the people of God; Israel has then returned to his own land, and the restored empire justifies in every point the emblem under which it here appears.

The Ten Horns of the Fourth Beast

That which proves better than anything that the emblem of the ten horns is not yet verified, is the duration assigned to the reign of the little horn. This reign will be terrible, but by a merciful compensation, its duration—at least that of the blasphematory and persecuting period, its last period—will be very short, for it will only be three and a half ordinary years; so soon as these three and a half years shall have elapsed, the beast will be judged, and the Millennium will commence. Prophecy could not explain more clearly that the fourth empire will be re-establisned towards the end of the present economy, and re-established for a very short time, and for a very odious work. Besides, this confirms the parallel passages (Rev. 13, etc.). To those persons whom of the Roman Empire surprises, we simply say, if, as we believe, it is written in the Word of God, it certainly will be accomplished, despite all improbabilities, and even all the impossibilities, our minds are pleased to see; and which of us dare say what may not take place in these days of rapid and wonderful changes, which astonish the wisest? Integrally restored at the decline of the nations, but divided then into ten kingdoms, the Roman monarchy, such as Augustus Cæsar founded it, will recover its ancient limits from the Euphrates to the Rhine, from the Atlas to the Danube, embracing thus in its vast circumference all the states and present kingdoms of Europe, Asia, and Africa whose shores are washed by the Mediterranean Sea, and uniting them under one rule.

This Future Reconstruction

Interrogated further, our vision of chapter 7 will explain itself best to us at the same time that it gives us sufficient glimpses of

The Political Future

of the re-established empire. Cast your eyes on that little horn which raises itself from among the ten horns (a horn is generally the emblem of power) concentrated in one individual (ver. 17 and 23). See how it rules over the ten others, and how it gives its distinctive character to the beast! It is all, it does all; it identifies itself with the beast, who is only its instrument; and in a measure it absorbs it, and, at the same time, little horn and beast, it can say, "La bête c'est moi" (Dan 7; Rev. 17 and 19); the ten horns it afterwards reduces to seven are completely subject to it.

Let us here beware, for what we have before us is not a beast, or a little horn (at this time they are one) who perishes after having lived a certain time, and ten horns which survive it; no, it is a beast or little horn, and ten horns which exist simultaneously. Let us not alter the emblem. It does not show us ten kingdoms which spring from the Roman beast and survive it, as the barbarous kingdoms of the Middle Ages issued formerly from the western part of the empire, and divided its spoils amongst themselves; on the contrary, they are ten kings, existing at the same time as the beast, and who give him their power (Dan. 7; Rev. 17: 12, 13) This surely has not yet been seen, but it will certainly be seen in the empire, once it is restored. Such is precisely the entirely new form under which it will present itself to us. Then empires and kingdoms, beasts and horns, emperor and kings, will exist simultaneously according to our emblem. The spectacle which the Roman Empire will offer at that time will be united under one common head (the little horn is always identified with the beast), under an imperial chief who will represent monarchy, who will in some manner sum it up in person, who will rule it as one man, and will be able to say, "La monarchie, c'est moi." Contemporaneous history has several times presented to us an anticipated image in the reign of a celebrated emperor. Not only will the Roman beast, and the ten horns, the supreme dictator and the ten kings, afterwards reduced to seven, exist together during the same period, but will perish under the same direct, immediate, unexpected, and terrible judgment of God.

A Vast Confederation of States

The Blasphemous Horn.

We have said that the little horn gives to the Roman beast its distinctive character. It is also principally on this horn that the gaze of the prophet Daniel is fixed, stupefied no doubt, as at a later period was he of Patmos (Rev. 17) at the sight of so much insolence and rebellion in man against his Creator. Clothed with dictatorial power, this little horn pronounces blasphemous words against heaven; he persecutes the saints, and presumes "to change times and laws." Times of feasts is the sense in the original, the feast days, the Levitical feasts returning at regular seasons, the Passover for example, Pentecost, and the Feast of Tabernacles. Here, then, we are

On Jewish Ground.

No doubt the little horn is then persecuting all the saints, it persecutes them throughout the empire, in Christendom as well as in Judea; but Palestine is especially the theatre of his tyrannical oppression. The children of Israel, at this time, have returned to their own land; their temple has been rebuilt in restored Jerusalem, their worship has recommenced there. The little horn carries on with rage his work of blasphemy and persecution during one thousand two hundred and sixty days. Then the Ancient of Days sits on His throne. The books are opened, and the judgment held. Remark here, God does not judge the dead, but the pagan nations, the people of the fourth empire, divided into ten kingdoms under Antichrist.

He Judges the Roman Beast,

the little horn, who perishes for having openly set himself up against God, against His word, His people, and His authority. The blow of Divine vengeance falls on the fourth beast, as it fell on the feet of the statue. God strikes it also in the same manner, that is to say, directly, immediately, and without employing any providential means. He consumes it utterly by the fire of His wrath. He simply took away the empire from the three preceding beasts, and left them life for a period His word does not determine, but He strikes this beast with a destroying judgment.

With the fourth beast, and in it, perishes all that remained of the three that preceded it, for in a certain manner these will revive in the Roman beast: this is why prophecy represents it as having in it something of the lion, the bear, and the leopard. (Rev. 13: 2.) As soon as the fourth beast is judged, God takes back the power confided for a time to the Gentiles, and invests it solemnly in the Son of Man and the saints. Not long ago Antichrist wore ten crowns (Dan. 7; Rev. 13), now all the diadems of this world adorn the glorious brow of Christ (Rev. 19: 12); the sovereignty of the world is given to the Son of Man. The vision of the seventh chapter has then the same end, the same final results as that of the second chapter. They both terminate in the Millennium.

* From his article in The Prophetic News for September; price six cents by mail. On sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York.

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION—1888.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled, "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting 75 cents. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering he study of that portion of the Word of God.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-Class Matter.

EVERY NUMBER CONTAINS:

The Portrait and Biography of some eminent person.
The Sermon Dr. Talmage preached the last Sunday morning.
An Exposition of Unfulfilled Prophecy.
A Summary of the Events of the Week, Notes of Religious and Temperance Movements, etc.
A Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, of London, from advance sheets sent by special arrangement.
Pictures of Missionary Life, etc., and Descriptive Articles.
An instalment of a Serial Story.
An Exposition of the International Sunday-School Lesson, by Mrs. M. Baxter.

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION, $1.50.

Single Copies, Price Three Cents, may be obtained by order of any Newsdealer.

NOTICE.

A concession in price will be made to subscribers desiring to introduce THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to ministers, evangelists, or personal friends. It will be mailed regularly every week to any address in the United States or Canada, from September 20 to the end of the year 1888, for twenty-five cents. Address The Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

CURRENT EVENTS.

An Attempt was Made in the Senate Last week to withdraw from the hasty action recently taken on the Chinese immigrant question. The fact that China had not decided to reject the treaty, having been communicated to the Senate by the President, completely changed the situation. If the Chinese Government ratified the treaty there would, it was admitted, be no need of legislation. Besides which, the enactment of a law while the treaty was under consideration appeared undignified. A motion to reconsider the vote was therefore made, but on Sept. 17, it was rejected by a vote of twenty to twenty-one. The majority was composed of fifteen Republicans and six Democrats; the minority, of fourteen Democrats and six Republicans. Among the latter were Senators Edmunds, Evarts, and Sherman. It is remarkable that three Republican statesmen so prominent and influential as they, should have failed to carry their colleagues with them, on a question so vitally affecting the national honor.

The Assessment of Federal Office-Holders for campaign purposes, which has always been a sore subject with the party which happened to be in opposition, will this year be watched more jealously than usual, on account of the pledges Mr. Cleveland gave during the campaign of 1884. In order that office-holders may have a perfect knowledge of their position, the National Civil Service Reform League is about to issue a circular addressed to all the more important departments and offices, explaining clearly and explicitly what may and what may not be done under the civil-service law. The action is wise, but the League is doubtless aware that the assessment will be levied and paid as usual, and will simply supply the office-holder with a standard by which to judge himself and the conduct of his party.

The Relations Between the United States and Great Britain and Canada were the subject of an important speech made by Senator Sherman on September 18. The Senator, who took a prominent part in securing the rejection of the treaty, moved that during the recess the Foreign Affairs Committee inquire into the subject, and report at the next session the best way to promote friendly commercial and political intercourse between these Governments; that the Committee have power to sit during the recess, and its expenses be paid out of the public purse. Mr. Sherman contended that the retaliation proposed in the President's message does not concern the fisheries, and transcends in importance the grievances undertaken to be redressed by it. He said that the time had come when the people of the United States and of Canada should take a broader view of their relations to each other than had been hitherto practicable. The whole history of the two countries had been a continuous warning that they could not remain at peace with each other except by political as well as commercial union. But the way to union was not by unfriendly legislation, but by friendly overtures. Still more plainly, he said, no greater good could be accomplished than by a wise and peaceful policy to unite Canada and the United States under one common government, carefully preserving to each its own local autonomy. This is a much larger question than that of the Fisheries, and probably there has been no time when Canada was less disposed to regard the project favorably. In the meantime Mr. Sherman, who doubtless in this case represents his colleagues, is opposed to granting the President the retaliatory power he has asked for.

The Effort to Induce the Sioux to Assent to the sale of part of their lands has evidently been closely watched by the Government and the people. Charges have been freely made that the Commissioners have tried, through the agencies and the police, to force the Indians to agree. A protest was made in the House against such a proceeding, and the attention of the Secretary of the Interior was called to the conduct of the Commission. Mr. Vilas has, it is now reported, matured a plan for obtaining an expression of the real views of the Indians, and particularly of the objections of those of them who do not like the plan proposed. This plan is said to involve a visit of Sioux chiefs to Washington, where it is thought that away from tribal influence the chiefs may be brought to see that the Government proposal is advantageous to the Indians, and may consent to its realization.

Over a Thousand Deaths were Caused by the cyclone in Cuba on September 4, mentioned in these columns two weeks ago. The facts were not fully ascertained until last week, owing to the utter destruction of the telegraphic system. A Havana journal says: "At Cardenas alone property was destroyed or damaged to the extent of $1,000,000, and the deaths amounted to over one hundred. The vortex of the cyclone entered the island near Sagua, crossing between Havana and Batabano, and through Consolacion del Sur, leaving Cuba for Vera Cruz. A peculiarity of this cyclone was its southward tendency. At the port of Batabano nine sailors were drowned by the foundering of the Spanish gunboat Lealtad. Trees were torn up, roofs torn off, and the violence of the hurricane was great. The schooner Suarez, which had made the port the previous day, was completely wrecked, and several of the crew were lost. The Captain-General of the island organized a board of relief and placed $20,000 at its disposal.

The Increased Number of Yellow Fever victims at Jacksonville, Fla., last week, which resulted from the unfavorable weather, has called out the sympathy and practical beneficence of the country. Besides the large gifts from various cities, Mr. Edmunds proposed and the Senate adopted a resolution, appropriating $100,000 for the relief of the stricken city. There is evidently urgent need for this and for all the private gifts that can be obtained; for not only has hospital work on an extensive scale to be carried on, but food must be distributed to large numbers, whom the total suspension of business has thrown out of employment. Tuesday was the worst day in the history of the epidemic. The number of new cases rose to 156, and the deaths to twenty. This is an appalling record, when it is remembered that the city is more than half depopulated. On Wednesday there were 130 new cases and fourteen deaths. On Thursday, 131 new cases and fifteen deaths. On that day the numbers given out showed that since the outbreak of the scourge there had been 1,464 persons seized with the disease, and a total of 185 deaths. This is about thirteen per cent., which is worse than in some former visitations, but not so bad as at Memphis, in 1879, where the rate reached thirty-two per cent. The Red Cross Society, with Miss Clara Barton at its head, is doing its utmost for the relief of the sufferers, and many physicians have heroically gone to the relief of the city doctors, who are quite worn out. An ominous feature was the extent in the affected area last week. Gainesville, Fernandina, and Ocala each had cases, and there was a panic which promised to scatter the seeds of disease still more widely. At Decatur, Ala., also, suspicious cases were reported, and large numbers of people fled. Four cases were detected at Jackson, Miss. They were all residents who have not been out of the city for months. On the news reaching other southern cities, the quarantine against Jacksonville was extended to Jackson.

The Commission to Try the Charges Against Mr. Parnell and other Irish leaders held a preliminary meeting on September 17. Its main business was to formulate an issue between the Times and the Nationalists. The judges insisted on having direct charges and specifications made. After considerable wrangling between counsel, the articles in the Times on "Parnellism and Crime" were put in, and the shorthand notes of the counsel in the O'Donnell trial. These were taken as the charges to be investigated. Application was made, on behalf of Mr. Parnell, for an order compelling the Times to produce the letters which it boasted of having, connecting Mr. Parnell with the Phœnix Park murders. The lawyers representing the newspaper, firmly resisted the application, as the Times was pledged to keep the source of its information secret. It is hinted that the information was obtained from traitors in the Nationalist camp, whose lives would be in peril if their identity were disclosed. The judges took time to consider the question of what documents it would be right to require the Times to produce. They granted an order for the production of the bank-books of the League. The Commission then adjourned to October 22.

Confirmation of the Report of the Murder of Major Barttelot has been received. He was shot on July 19 by his Manyema carriers. The head Arab and his men thereupon ran off to Stanley Falls, where Jamieson was making arrangements with Tippoo Tib for the organization of an expedition. The news of the murder of Major Barttelot has given rise to speculation regarding the fate of Henry M. Stanley himself. The London newspapers are unanimously of the opinion that Major Barttelot was betrayed by Tippoo Tib, who organized the native portion of the expedition, and the question is asked, "Why may not Stanley have been also the victim of his treachery?" The opinion of explorers is, however, less hostile to Tippoo Tib, and they incline to attribute Major Barttelot's death to his own recklessness in the choice of carriers. Tippoo Tib conceived a dislike to the Major, and showed a disposition to hinder instead of facilitating him. It would appear that Major Barttelot himself determined to have Manyema carriers, though warned that they were treacherous. On Friday news was received in Brussels that Prof. Jamieson, who was about to lead an expedition in search of Stanley, had died suddenly of African fever at Bangalas, on the Congo, on August 17.

The Seceders from the Liberal Party in England were in consultation in Bradford, last week. Especial prominence was given to Mr. Chamberlain, who appears to have succeeded in superseding Lord Hartington in the leadership. Mr. Chamberlain hailed the union of the Unionists with the Conservatives as the coming national party. He said he did not see why Irishmen should not have local government, though experience showed that, whether in Dublin, New York, or Boston, Irish government was always inefficient and corrupt. Once he had thought that the Liberals would reunite upon a feasible policy, but now the schism in the party was widening daily. The alliance between the Liberal Unionists and Tories depended upon placing principles above party interests.

Contributions to the Fund For Supplying colored ministers in the South with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have been received since our last acknowledgement to the amount of $10. They are from Warren, N. H., $5; Mt. Jackson, Va., $1; Parsons, Kan, $2; Bachelor, Mich., $1; Elliott, Iowa, $1. We sincerely thank our friends who have thus responded to our appeal on behalf of these ministers. We are now enabled to add ten more names to the list. It would give us great pleasure to add many more. If those ministers who have so pathetically presented their claims and write so strongly of the benefits they have derived from it in the past, will pray in faith, God will surely incline the hearts of His people to give them the help they need for their work.

An Important Religious Concession has Been obtained from Turkey by Mr. Straus, the United States Minister to the Porte. Mr. Straus, who is now about to return to Constantinople from his visit to Washington, made an argument to the Sultan, shortly before coming home, in support of the application of the American Bible Society, for permission to print New Testament and Biblical tracts in the Turkish language. The privilege had been denied by the Minister of Public Instruction. Word has been received that the desired permission has now been granted by the Porte, and the American Bible Society has already formally expressed its thanks to Minister Straus. The British Bible Society and similar organizations of other countries will unquestionably receive the same courtesy at the hands of the Porte, and Mr. Straus will be entitled to their thanks.

A Death from the Prick of a Pin is Reported from Lancaster, Penn. Among the fifteen hundred persons who attended the funeral of Mennonite Bishop Heer, on August 29, was a gentleman who married the granddaughter of the Bishop. He noticed a pimple on one of his fingers while listening to the funeral sermon, and he pricked it with a pin. Before the funeral was over he became so ill that he had to be taken home. His hand and arm were swollen to twice their natural size by the time he reached there. The swelling spread over his entire body, and he died on September 3, in great agony. He was only thirty-three years old, but he had, through his own efforts, acquired a large fortune, and by hard study had become a classical scholar. It appeared a very trivial cause to produce so fatal a result, but the man's blood must have been in a condition to render contact with the pin poisonous. It is so with some indulgences. Many a man has been ruined for time and eternity by a glass of intoxicating liquor which another might have drunk without harm, but which in him raised a demon he was powerless to subdue. (Rom. 14:2, 13.)

A Mysterious Bequest has Been Made to a young mechanic of New Haven, Conn., as reported in a press despatch from that city. It states that four years ago the mechanic, who was then a cook on board a vessel belonging to Messrs. Staples & Philips, of Taunton, Mass., was at Newport for a day, waiting for the boat to sail. As he walked on the sands, he saw a young lady fall out of a rowboat about fifty yards from shore. Though the water was very rough, the young man swam out to her rescue, and brought her safely to land, though he came near losing his life in doing so. An elderly gentleman who was on the beach when the rescued girl was brought in, said he was her father, and overwhelmed the young man who had saved her with thanks, gave him a thousand dollars, and took his name and address, that he might further recompence him. The old man stipulated, however, that his own name should be kept a secret. Two weeks ago the young man received a request from a firm of lawyers in New York that he would call at their office. He did so, and was informed that his aged Newport acquaintance was dead, and had left him fifteen thousand dollars, on certain conditions, which were disclosed after the legatee had given his promise never to reveal them. The young man took time for consideration, and now states that he shall not accept the legacy on the conditions attached. His decision surprises those who esteem money as the greatest good. In this life men are apt to think a man foolish who will not sacrifice his principles when it is necessary, to make a fortune. In the next life it will be found that those who made the sacrifice were the fools. (Mark 8:36.)

A Fatal Fortune was Inherited Recently by a business man, in Boston. He carried on a lucrative plumbing business, and employed a dozen men. He was noted for his industry, frugality, and close attention to business. Six months ago, through the death of a relative, he unexpectedly came into possession of a fortune. The money completely turned his head. He became careless, idle, and dissipated. Finally, he left Boston with a large sum of money in his pocket, and let no one know whither he was going. Search was made for him, but he was not found. The police were notified, and they made inquiries in that and other cities, but without success. On September 15, news of him was received from Philadelphia. He had been found on a stoop in a back street, early that morning, with a bullet-hole in his head. He was still conscious, and tried to conceal the fact that he had intentionally shot himself. Later, however, when informed that he had but a few hours to live, he told his story. He said that since leaving Boston, he had been drinking continually, and squandering his money. When at last he sobered up in Philadelphia, he had not a cent in his possession. He was so overcome with remorse that he shot himself there and then. But for the sudden acquisition of wealth he might now have been living and happy. This is not the first time by many that the riches for which so many pine and toil have proved a fatal possession. (1 Tim. 6:9.)

An Inventor has been Disappointed in the results of many years of thought and labor. On September 14 a curious vessel, which attracted considerable attention among shipowners and sailors, was moored in the East River at the foot of Gouveneur Street, New York. It was guaranteed by the inventor to be non-sinkable. Its main feature, is that the fore and aft compartments are air-tight, and are fitted with valves to admit or eject water for ballast. These can be regulated by the captain at will, so as to render the vessel, whether laden or empty of freight, just the right height above water. Many visited the craft and took much interest in the ingenious contrivances of its construction. The next morning, however, it was nowhere to be seen. It had sunk in the night and lay on the river's bed. Wreckers were summoned and the craft was raised. It was then found that the valves connecting one of the ballast compartments with the water were out of order and had filled the compartment during the night. The weight being all on one side, the craft had capsized and gone to the bottom. Happily none of the crew had proved their confidence in the invention by remaining on board all night, or some lives might have been lost. It is much to be wished that the devices which moral and spiritual philosophers have invented for the development and salvation of mankind similarly involved no fatalities when they fail. Many souls have been lost by putting faith in human guarantees—papal and others—rather than in God's way of Salvation. (Eccles. 7:29.)

Imprisonment in a Bank Safe for Fifteen hours nearly proved fatal to a young man in Philadelphia, last week. On September 17, several young people were in a vault under the Keystone National Bank, on Chestnut Street, looking at the huge safes constructed for the safe keeping of bullion and valuable property. One of the young men entered a safe, which was as large as a moderate-sized room. Immediately a companion playfully swung to the huge door, and the spring-latch caught. There was then a general alarm, for none of the party could open the door. The bank officials were summoned, but they could do nothing, for the safe was under repairs and there was no knob on the outside to withdraw the bolts. A number of workmen labored with bars and chisels to pry the door open, but succeeded only in getting it open about an inch. This, however, admitted some air, and it was considered safe to leave the young man in his strange prison for the night. An expert from the safe-maker's was telegraphed for, and at 8 o'clock next morning he arrived, and with a pair of long pliers he managed to draw the bolts and release the prisoner. The young man was badly frightened, but not much the worse. He said he suffered considerably, until the one-inch aperture gave him some fresh air. The joy of the young man who had thoughtlessly closed the door was as great, when release came, as that of the victim. He had found, as many do who get others into difficulties, that it is easier to do mischief than to undo it. There are some cases in which the evil is irretrievable, but God will avenge the victim's misery on the wrongdoer. (Prov. 28:10.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Fulton Street Daily Prayer-Meeting celebrated its thirty-first anniversary on Monday last.

Philip Phillips, the Singing Pilgrim, has gone to Europe. He will hold services in England during the next few months.

By the will of the late Henry Winkley, of Philadelphia, who died August 9, the Young Men's Christian Association in that city receives $20,000.

The bicentenary of the death of John Bunyan has been celebrated at Bedford, and many Americans joined in a pilgrimage to his tomb in Bunhill Fields, London.

Cardinal Lavigerie has obtained the consent of the King of the Belgians to make use of an armed force to stop slave caravans passing between Stanley Falls and Lake Tanganyika.

Major Whittle, of Chicago, has set out for an evangelistic tour in Ireland. He goes first to Belfast. The profound Irish prejudice against England gives an American a peculiar advantage over an English evangelist.

Mr. H. W. Brown, the evangelist, is holding meetings in Plainwell, Mich., this month, and will spend his time in that State till November, when he goes to Leavenworth, Kan., spending the rest of the winter in that State.

Mr. Henry Varley has just held some most successful services at Torquay. On Sunday, September 9, he commenced a series of meetings in the Victoria Hall, Sunderland. He and his family will sail for Australia, October 4, where he expects to remain a few years.

A Presbyterian contemporary states that over fifty Presbyterian ministers in the United States and Canada were at one time Roman Catholic priests. Quite a number of converted priests are now Methodist ministers and members of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

At the recent camp-meeting at Douglas, Mass., a man who rose to ask for prayers, and was converted, gave evidence of his sincerity by confessing that he had recently escaped from the penitentiary, and by going and surrendering himself to serve out his term.

Miss Florence Nightingale, the famous hospital nurse, is now a confirmed invalid, and is a patient at St. Thomas Hospital, London. Her services during the Crimean War injured her spine, and she has never recovered from the effects. She is sixty-nine years old.

One of the measures adopted by the World's Convention of Young Men's Christian Associations in Stockholm was the employment of a college secretary to visit all the institutions of learning in heathen lands, and then organize branches of the associations among the students. Mr. L. D. Wishard, of New York, was appointed.

The Mormon "Apostle," George Q. Cannon, has surrendered himself to the United States Marshal. Cannon was a former delegate to Congress from Utah, and virtual head of the Mormon church for years. He pleaded guilty to two indictments of having too many wives, and was sentenced to seventy-five days' imprisonment, and a fine of $200 on the first indictment, and to one hundred days' imprisonment and $250 fine on the second.

Col. Robert Ingersoll, the notorious infidel, who has until this year been a prominent speaker in the Presidential canvass, will not be invited to speak in New York State this year. The Republican candidate for Governor is firmly opposed to availing himself of his services. In Minnesota, where he was to speak, there is also a protest. The Christian public of St. Paul has notified the Republican Committee that he will not be welcome to them.

Very Liberal Terms are Offered to any Person canvassing for subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Sample copies will be sent, postage paid, on application from any one desiring to undertake the work. Ministers and others will find it easy to obtain subscriptions. Send postal card for terms, and state number of sample copies required. Address The Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

CROSSING THE JORDAN.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Then Joshua commanded the officers of the people, saying, Pass through the host, and command the people, saying, Prepare you victuals; for within three days ye shall pass over this Jordan, to go in to possess the land, which the Lord your God giveth you to possess it." Josh. I : 10, 11.

A Marvellous Event—An Established Type of Christian Death—A Lady's Sudden Death—The Notice Given to the Israelites—I. Its Tenor—Preparation Ordered—The Proper Food—Purification Needed—Safety Assured—Possession Promised—II. The Sequel of the Notice—Special Faith Imparted—Guidance Afforded—Dying Before Christ Comes—A Christian's Needless Fears—The Quick Passage—A Memorial Set Up—Preaching in Heaven.

THE story of the passage of the Jordan might instructively be used in many ways. It was a very wonderful event. It occurred on the tenth day of the first month, on the same day of the year as the passage of the Red Sea. Of that glorious miracle it was the fortieth anniversary, and you may very properly join the dividing of the Red Sea to that of the Jordan, for so the Holy Spirit has done in the one hundred and fourteenth Psalm: "The sea saw it, and fled: Jordan was driven back."

I am going to use the passage of the Jordan as our forefathers employed it, as a type of

Our Passage Out of this World

into the place appointed for our rest. Canaan is only measurably a type of that better land, for the Canaanite was still in the land, and Israel had to fight many a battle to obtain possession of the country. In our more perfect Canaan there are no enemies to encounter, no sins to struggle with, and no powers of darkness to conquer. Still, I think the type, if imperfect, has been so long established in the Christian church, and has yielded so much of edification to godly people, that I may safely use it.

The Israelites, before they crossed the Jordan, had notice given them. The officers went through the host with the message, "Prepare you victuals; for within three days ye shall pass over this Jordan." The Lord often favors His people with notice that the time of their departure is at hand. Mr. Bunyan describes the pilgrims as tarrying on the shore of that river which parted them from the celestial country until a post came to one and another, announcing that the silver cord must be loosed and the golden bowl be broken. Father Honest, and Mr. Ready-to-halt, and Christian, and the rest of them, received each one a call from the hill-country, and passed over the black water to the golden strand, where the shining ones stood to meet them. A few Sunday evenings ago, when I was unable to preach to you, my beloved and esteemed friend, Mr. Newman Hall, most generously occupied this pulpit, and his sermon touched upon heaven and the joyous entrance of the saints into the immortal state. One of our sisters was greatly rejoiced by that sermon. She went home, and in going into her bedroom she fell down and entered in a second into rest. Possibly that sermon was to her a stray note from the harps of angels to call her home. We, too, may have such or we may have months of waiting. What matters? Let the angelic convoy appear when our best Beloved shall see fit: it shall be no question of preference with us whether the Master shall call us to-day, to-morrow, or in twenty years. When God's children have their candle lighted for them, and they know that it is time to go up-stairs, they feel glad to end their pilgrimage, and rest in Jesus. We are all of us much nearer home than we think. It will be greatly wise to talk with our last hours, and to anticipate that time when the message shall come, "Within three days ye shall pass over this Jordan."

A Speedy Summons;

I. First, observe

The Tenor of the Notice.

Notice that there are three leading words in it: 'prepare," "pass over," "possess." "Prepare you victuals; for within three days ye shall pass over this Jordan, to go in to possess the land." The first word that came to them was, "Prepare." Be in journeying order. The soldier carries his rations with him when he has to make a quick march: "Prepare you victuals." Children of God, be ready to go from this world. Let not your roots strike deep into this earthly soil, for you must in due time be transplanted; and the more root-hold you get to this world, the worse it will be for you. Hold everything with a loose hand. The soldier in a foreign land must not settle down, and begin to gather surroundings about him which would naturalize him in the country.

He is an Alien, tarrying till his prince shall call him back to the home country. You cannot be in exile long. Keep in marching order; be prepared at a moment's notice to start on your way.

But inasmuch as He said, "Prepare you victuals," did he not mean, "Begin to feed on food of that sort upon which you are henceforth to live"? I wish that professing Christians were more cautious about what they feed on. I am afraid that some professors, if they hear a sermon, are satisfied, whatever the sort may be. They do not care what the doctrine may be, if a clever man talks prettily, and gratifies their ear. Some people can eat sawdust, and make a meal of shadows. I could almost wish it were true of them, that they could drink any deadly thing, and it should not hurt them; for assuredly they do drink very deadly things when they go to the tavern of modern thought. But I would say to you this morning, feed on Christ, feed on spiritual food, feed on the pure truth of God's Word, and feed your souls on nothing else.

But then he said also, "Sanctify yourselves." If we knew we were should we not wish to put our hearts, our thoughts, our families, into a better state? I remember a sister, by no means superstitious, who, when she came to die, was very earnest that all her linen, and everything about her body, should be white and clean; and I somewhat sympathized in her feeling, because I knew that it was only the outward expression of her inward desire to be purely arrayed as to her spirit. Since we may die suddenly, let us purify ourselves of all filthiness of the flesh and of the spirit. Let us pray our Lord to wash us again; and, as our dear brother prayed just now, "may the dust of our last day's march be taken from our feet!"

To Die in Three Days,

The next word was, "Pass over this Jordan." They were not called to linger on the brink, nor to sit with their feet in the stream, but to cross over it. Israel had been forty years in the wilderness, and surely that was long enough. Some of you have been fifty, sixty, seventy, perhaps eighty years in the desert; but when the summons shall come, you will have no more marchings over the burning sand, and no more fear of the fiery serpents and scorpions. "Within three days ye shall pass over this Jordan" will put an end to the wilderness trampings. He liveth long that liveth well. He who hath served his God with all his heart will not wish to linger a moment after his life-work is done. You are not called to linger on the bed of sickness for ages, but to pass over to your rest.

Our text reads like a promise—"Within three days ye shall pass over this Jordan." Some of them might have said, "How?" They saw no apparent means—no bridge, no pontoons, no ferry-boat. Ah! but says Joshua, "Within three days ye shall pass over this Jordan": and

The Word was True.

Do you say, "I do not see how I am to be helped to die?" The Lord will give dying grace in dying moments. He comes in when the need is pressing. Those who have wrestled earnestly in life shall march off triumphantly in death. It is yours to obey, it is His to provide. Sometimes you are so foolish as to try your hand at providing, and then you neglect the obeying, and as a consequence you fail both in the providing and the obeying. Mind your own business, and the Lord will perform His word.

Somebody might have said, "We cannot pass over Jordan, for the torrent is furious, and the river is unusually swollen." In the spring, at the time of barley harvest, Jordan overflows all its banks, and becomes a river which only the very strongest of David's heroes could ford. So some child of God might say, "But in dying is darker than that of any other believer. I shall suffer more pain, more depression, more poverty; and thus to me Jordan overfloweth all its banks." Yes, yes; but still you shall go over it, for the Lord hath said it, and none of His words shall fail. You shall cross the swollen torrent, and smile at your own fears.

My Prospect

The third word was 'possess." They were to pass the river to possess the land which God had given them. We possess nothing here. Those goods which we think we possess melt away like an icicle from a hot hand. But we have on the other side of Jordan treasures worth owning. There was in Palestine a portion of land for each man of Israel: so is there in heaven a heritage appointed for each one of the Lord's people. You have to go over Jordan, but you are not going away from home, you are returning to your Father's house. You are not going to a land of toil and poverty, sorrow and death; you are going to be for ever with the Lord, where no evil can reach you. If, then, the message should come to your ear to-day, "Within three days thou shalt pass over this Jordan," say to yourself, "It is well, for I shall behold the face of Him I love, and meet with those who are redeemed by His blood."

II. I want you now to observe

The Sequel of the Notice, or what followed upon the summons. I shall try to show what will follow to you who are in Christ. When you receive your notice to depart, what will happen to you? The first thing that happened to Israel was this: a singular faith was bestowed. I can hardly believe that the people under Joshua were the children of those unbelieving Jews whose carcases fell in the wilderness; for throughout the early chapters of Joshua it is recorded that they believed Joshua, whatever he said to them. He had strange and strong things to utter, but they did not doubt or demur. What pleases me most is that when he spoke to the Reubenites, and told them what they had to do, they said, "Whosoever he be that doth rebel against thy commandment, and will not hearken unto thy words in all that thou commandest him, he shall be put to death: only be strong and of a good courage."

Think of that! They took upon themselves to encourage Joshua, saying,

"Only be Strong and of a good courage." They admonished the bravest of captains—even they who were but of the rank and file. Some of God's very poor and tried people are occasionally so full of faith and courage that they try to cheer up their minister. I like to see them thus returning the compliment, for it shows that they are in a happy condition themselves. I do not know what change death itself makes in the soul; but I believe that a little before death a wonderful advance is often made by the believer. The man of God matures at a marvellous rate; even as these Israelites, who had been so prone to murmur, were now filled with a unanimity of faith which is perfectly amazing. May God thus brace up our faith when the time comes!

Next, note that the people had with them

A Conquering Leader.

Joshua was at their head, to encourage and direct them. When you and I shall pass over Jordan we shall have Jesus with us. If our Joshua should seem to leave us, it will be on the flowery hill-side, or in the gardens of delight; but He will not even appear to do so when the dark waters flow at our feet, and we are called upon to pass through the stream. Blessed be our Lord Jesus Christ, He never forgets His own. He is always with us, but He is most clearly so when our last trouble is upon us. He is gone away into the hill-country, to make ready the house where shall shortly be at home; but He will surely ne again, and receive us unto Himself, that ere He is, there we may be also. Therefore, not afraid, for Jesus is with you.

But what next? The Israelites had a clear dance afforded them. Read the fourth verse he third chapter. The ark of the covenant the Lord went before them, and a distance ; set between them and the priests bearing ark, so that they might show reverence to it, might clearly see it as their guide. Thus Joshua to them, "When ye see the ark of covenant of the Lord your God, and the sts the Levites bearing it, then ye shall reve from your place, and go after it. Yet re shall be a space between you and it, about thousand cubits by measure: come not r unto it, that ye may know the way by which must go: for ye have not passed this way etofore."

You have been through many experiences, but die will be a new one. You have traversed ain roads more than once or twice, but

This Road is New to You, can only be trodden once. Once for all, you st cross this Jordan, therefore the divine sence shall go before you, and show you the y. The Lord will surely direct your steps.

not begin saying to youself, "What shall I in sickness?" You will be guided by Him o bore our sorrows and infirmities. Some ldren of God are always delighted at the idea t Christ may come, and that they shall er die. I would be delighted if the Lord uld come at once; but as to dying or not dy-
I do not care a jot. I think that of the two, night be preferable to die, because those who will have a kind of fellowship with Christ in death which will not be experienced by se who never sleep in the tomb. They that alive and remain till

His Coming

I miss the privilege of passing through the ab as the Saviour did, though even they must changed. Brethren, we traverse a road which known the feet of the Crucified. Where uld the dying members rest but with their ng Head?

Nor did the forerunner quit the scene, for the ine presence remained. The priests went on they came to the river-bed, and descended hollow, going on the very centre of it. There y stopped till all the host had passed over.
ur after hour the priests remained with the y burden on their shoulders: they stood firm dry ground in the midst of Jordan. Jesus
l go before you as your great High Priest, ir propitiation and your covenant; and He l abide with you in the last solemn article til you are safe landed on the shore of the d of promise.

n consequence of the priests going down into e river, the stream was dried up. Suppose, en you die, the Jordan should turn out to be

No River at All.

hat if you should go over dry-shod? Why uld it not be so? It has often been the case th the Lord's chosen. Many make a joyful it. A sister used to be much troubled about ing; she knew where she was going, but she aded the passage. She died in her sleep, d in all probability never knew when she ssed from the one state to the other till she nd herself among the angels. Death is a 's prick to many.

Then notice, the people were very quick in ossing. Death is short work. According to e tenth verse of the fourth chapter, we read:
And the people hasted and passed over."
ey did not hurry because they were afraid;
t they hasted because they were many, and uld fain be over before the sun went down.
course it would take a considerable time th so vast a number to cross; but they were moving on in an orderly and rapid manner.
ter all, what is the act of death? "What!"
ies one, "is there not a terrible amount of in connected with death?" I answer—No!
is life that has the pain; death is the finis of all pain. You blame death for a disease of which he is the cure. You imagine a thing called death, which does not really exist. In the twinkling of an eye we shall be up and away!

"One gentle sigh, the fetter breaks;
We scarce can say, 'He's gone,'
Before the ransomed spirit takes Its mansion near the throne."

Therefore, because you will haste to pass over, you need not be alarmed at so short a trial, which will actually turn out to be no trial at all.

We read in the ninth verse of the fourth chapter, that the Israelites in traversing the Jordan left a memorial behind. Before they had quite passed out of the river-bed, a number of chosen men looked out twelve of the great masses of rock which lay in the botton of the river, and piled them on end upon each other, to remain as a perpetual memorial that Israel had been there. You also will bear your testimony in departing: you will set up your memorial for your children after you, and they shall say, "Our father died in sure and certain hope of being with Jesus." Perhaps some unconverted ones will be saved, after you are dead and gone, by your last testimony. Even if your death-bed should not be so bright as some, even its clouds may not be without their effect.

A Fearful Death Blessed.

A holy man had prayed much for his boys and girls, but never saw them converted, and this, with the troubles which grew out of their waywardness, made his last hours to be sadly clouded. For this cause he was sorely troubled, for he feared that it would confirm his sons in their unbelief. But mark how the Lord wrought! They buried their father, and when they were met together, the eldest son turned to his brothers and remarked upon the sorrows which had weighed down their father at the last. "Brothers," said he, "if our father, who was so good a man, was so troubled in death, what will become of us when we die?" This most reasonable remark was the means of the conversion of the brothers. I would like to die in the dark, if it would bring all my people to the Saviour.

One thing more: they also raised a memorial on the other shore. Twelve men took from the river twelve stones, and bore them on their shoulders before the ark. Can you not see them with their loads, and the ark coming up after them from the river-bed? They piled these twelve stones upon each other in Canaan. You and I, when we get to heaven, shall take our memorials with us, and pile them up. We will make known to angels and principalities and powers the manifold wisdom and goodness of God to us in life and death. I hope to begin to preach before long, not to this little congregation of six thousand, but to countless multitudes of the redeemed in heaven. Myriads of how God helped a sinner to declare his love. You will stand with your groups about you, and shining ones will linger to hear of your salvation, your trials, your joys, and your achievements, or, rather, of what the Lord has wrought for you and by you; and so God will be glorified, and the other side of Jordan will be adorned with memorials to the grace of God.

Angels will Come to Hear

You will have to turn this subject over in your meditations: I have only been able to give you the rough outline of a sermon. Read the whole narrative, and may God bless it to you!

But, dear friends, suppose you are not the people of God. You will have to die, all the same. One of these times

You Will Have to Pass over the torrent. What a different lot will be yours! You will have to leave your possessions behind. A sage said to a worldling, when he looked over his beautiful gardens, "These are the things that make it hard to die." You will have to leave everything which you call your own here; and you have no possessions over yonder. You have no Joshua to be your leader, no priest to be your forerunner, no God in covenant to hold the ground for you: you have, in fact, nothing to overcome the bitterness of death. The water-floods will carry you away. Dare you to take the dreadful plunge? Mark how the black current rushes down to that dreadful sea of death! Are you resolved to be swept down to that place of desolation? The Lord have mercy upon you before you are drifted into the abode of the accursed! "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved; for he that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved." So saith the Lord Jesus.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

A GIRL'S PICTURE.*

THERE is not one whom God does not seek to arouse to a consciousness of higher things, and some are feeling unsatisfied because they have them not. They sit with hearts empty as she sat in a picture I saw lately, entitled, "Love's Labor Lost." A beautiful young girl, whose childhood is swiftly passing away, sits clasping her knees as she gazes with the strange far-away look of one lost in thought. The puppets and pleasures that have contented her till now can satisfy her no longer. The basket of toys is untouched, the efforts of the girl-attendants to amuse her are unheeded; the singers and musicians entering the room do not receive a single glance, and the pet fawn is wondering that no caress is given to her now. The girl has been aroused to something more—higher and better—than these, and if you have had an inward awakening nothing will satisfy you but Christ, for in the flush of your girlhood or in the dignity of your womanhood, He still says, "If any one thirst, let him come unto Me and drink. Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst."

Instruction From a Novice.

It is said that Hannibal, one of the ablest generals of ancient or modern times, once heard an address delivered upon the art of war, and was asked afterward what he thought of it. With his usual rugged abruptness he replied, "Well, I've heard many an old poltroon, but I never heard such a poltroon as this, for he is talking about war when he knows nothing about it." That is the spirit in which counsels would naturally be received from one whom Paul calls a novice (1 Tim. 3: 6); but when they come from one who has lived near God, and done brave and successful service, the wise man will listen and obey with reverence and promptitude.

The Poison-Oak.

In Colorado there grows a shrub known popularly as the Poison-Oak, which is regarded with horror by the inhabitants. Some people are completely prostrated by merely breathing near it, and a scratch from one of its prickly leaves will produce boils or sores which are extremely difficult to cure; though others, curiously enough, seem uninjured by it: just as I have known some stricken down by erysipelas, who have merely sat in a room where arnica and water stood unperceived in a saucer, while others may freely apply it as a healing lotion. We do not know why the virus is harmful to one and harmless to another, and none of our scientists are able to explain the secret or to foretell, without experiment, who will be harmed and who will not. But the fact is unquestionable; and in the higher sphere the phenomenon repeat itself in the observed influence of a sceptical tone in society, which leaves one unscathed, but prostrates another under the bane of infidelity. Yet out of this, good will come, however little we foresee it, just as from the fatal poison-oak is gained the Rhus toxicodendron, which, used aright, has cured many a hurt and sprain. Watching against the insidious influence of unbelief, let us hold fast our confidence, as the apostles did who dared to speak with authority, and to this end let us put up their prayer, "Lord, increase our faith!"

A Slave's Prayer.

Many a heathen slave-owner has been rebuked

* From Paul's "Ideal Church and People." A popular commentary, with a series of forty sermonettes on the First Epistle to Timothy. By Rev. Alfred Rowland, LL. B. Pp. 287. Price $1.50. Published by E. B. Treat, 771 Broadway, New York.

Prof. Henry Drummond.

The Late Prof. Richard Proctor.

The Late Dr. Mackenzie. (See page 613.)

by the saintly lives of Christian slaves, and probably the hearts of many were touched through the prayers of those they despised. We have read of a slave who was caught praying by her master, and cruelly beaten for her pains. Stripped and tied fast to the post, as the blood-stained whip ceased for a moment to fall on her quivering flesh, she was asked if she would give over praying. "No, massa, never," was the answer; "I will serve you, but I must serve God." Again the lashes rained down on her bleeding back; but when once more they ceased, the voice of the follower of Jesus was heard praying, "O Lord, forgive poor massa, and bress him!" Suddenly the whip fell from his hand; stricken with the finger of God, he broke down in penitence. The prayer was answered—the godless master was saved through the faithfulness of the slave he had despised. We may be sure that more than one such convert was rejoiced over by angels centuries ago, in homes where Paul's message was heeded.

PROF. HENRY DRUMMOND.

THE author of "Natural Law in the Spiritual World" is by this time well known to American Christians. His extensive tour this year has made him personally acquainted with many whose study of his famous work had prepared them to meet a remarkable man. His earnestness, his intensity and directness, as well as the close friendly relation in which he stands to Mr. D. L. Moody, assured for him a cordial welcome from Christian workers in all the cities he has visited.

Professor Drummond is about forty years of age. He is a Scotchman, and was educated at a school in Stirling and at Edinburgh University. He also took a course of study at Tubingen, in Germany. He devoted himself with ardor to the study of natural science, and became so famous for his profound knowledge of it that in 1878 he was appointed lecturer, and afterward professor, of the subject in Free Church College, Glasgow. His reputation became world-wide in 1883, when he planned and executed a geological and botanical survey in Central Africa.

Professor Drummond, in 1873, became a conspicuous figure in religious circles by a remarkable address he delivered before the New College Theological Society on Spiritual Diagnosis. In that address he contended that an indispensable part of a successful minister's work was individual dealing with souls; that in a few minutes' conversation with a young man the discovery might be made of his individual need, and the proper teaching applied, while the preacher who limited his efforts to the pulpit might never reach that particular soul. The address caused a deep impression on the religious public, and led to good results. In the same year, Messrs. Moody and Sankey visited Scotland, and Mr. Moody was introduced to young Drummond. The evangelist at once recognized his value, and invited him to accompany him in his evangelistic tour to work among the hearers. Professor Drummond accepted, and he and Mr. Moody have ever since been warmly attached friends.

PROF. RICHARD A. PROCTOR.

THE eminent astronomer whose death from yellow fever in New York on September 12 was briefly mentioned in these columns last week, was well known in most of our large cities. He had a remarkable genius for presenting scientific facts in popular language, and for arousing an interest in science in persons indisposed to dry study. In 1873, and again in 1875, he made a lecture-tour through the United States, speaking on Astronomy before large audiences, imparting information in a most brilliant and entertaining manner, and encouraging young people to pursue the study for themselves. Another tie binding him to this country was made in 1881 when he married Miss Sallie D. Crowley, of St. Joseph, Mo. For some time afterward he resided in that city, and contemplated making it his permanent home. Later, however, he paid a visit to Florida, where he was enthusiastically received, and an offer was made him by the State to build an observatory for his use. This offer he accepted, and in April of last year he removed to Oaklands, near Orange Lake, Fla., where he finally fixed his abode.

Richard A. Proctor was born in England on March 23, 1837. He was, therefore, only fifty-one years old when he died. As a boy he was a most indefatigable student, and by the time he was fourteen he had worked his way to the head of a large academy over boys considerably older than himself. He hoped then to have gone to college, but an expensive lawsuit which followed the death of his father, about that time, prevented his widowed mother giving him that privilege. Young Proctor obtained employment in a bank, but after three years in that occupation his mother inherited a small fortune. The young man then had his wish, and was received as a student at St. John's College, Cambridge, from which institution he graduated in 1860, when he was twenty-three years old.

Public attention was first attracted to his remarkable astronomical knowledge in 1863, when he published an essay on Double Stars. This was followed by a more ambitious work on Saturn and its System. Since that time his life has been full of work. His popular lectures alone would have kept most men busy, but Mr. Proctor was an enthusiast in his study, and he wanted all the world to share in its delights. He produced book after book, and each received a warm welcome. Among his best-known works are: The "Gnomonic Star Atlas," "Constellation Seasons," "Sun Views of the Earth," "Half Hours with the Telescope," "Half-Hours with the Stars," "Other Worlds than Ours," and "Myths and Marvels of Astronomy."

EDWARD WILSON'S RESTORATION.

(See Illustration on page 621.)

IN the inner office of a large wholesale business house a merchant was busy balancing the day's accounts, assisted by his nephew, who acted as his confidential clerk. There was no more upright or conscientious man among the merchants of that city than Mr. Armstrong. A Christian man, too, whose religion did not end in church membership. Edward and Lucy Wilson were two orphans, the children of Mr. Armstrong's sister, whose death had been the most severe affliction the merchant had known. Lucy was just completing her education at a college, and Edward was now his uncle's trusted clerk.

Before the balancing was quite completed, Mr. Armstrong was called into the outer office. Returning quickly, he said to his nephew, "Go on as far as you can, Edward, and then wait for me. The cashier of the bank wishes to see me. I expect I shall not be long away."

The young man started and turned pale, but he hid his confusion by stooping to pick up some papers he had let fall in his agitation, and his uncle hurried away. Scarcely was Mr. Armstrong clear of the premises when Edward put on his hat and went out. He turned into a broker's office on the same block and called one of the clerks, a showily dressed young man, a few year older than himself.

"The game is up," Edward whispered; "my uncle has just been sent for to the bank."

"How much is the cheque for?" asked his friend.

"Two hundred and fifty," said Edward. "You had one hundred, you know, and I wanted one hundred and fifty for my own affair."

"Have you paid it all away?"

"No; but I promised to do so to-night."

"Well, that's lucky. I wish it had been more but get away with that. I know old Armstrong He'll never forgive; and he's such a conscien cious kind of man, with his notions about hi duty to society, that he is likely enough to hav you arrested. If you take my advice you wil ake the next train west, and ide yourself till you can find ome new opening."

"I must see my sister first," aid Edward. "I could not go ithout wishing her good- ye. How I wish I had never ritten my uncle's name to hat cheque! It was your ault, but I ought to have known better than to yield o you."

"That plea won't help you much, if Armstrong cuts up ough. You'd better get away ow, and lose no time about our sister. You can write o her."

Edward hurried away, sorrow and shame burdening his heart. He was resolved to see his sister, in spite of his friend's advice. He knew of a poor boarding-house within sight of the college where she was, and he went there. He secured a room, from the window of which he could see the door by which all the students came out, and he placed himself there to watch for Lucy. He was afraid to go to the college and ask for her, as he had been accustomed to do. Scarcely an hour had passed before he was startled by seeing his uncle enter that door. He drew back carefully out of sight, but still watching intently for the merchant's reappearance. His gaze being fixed on the door, he did not see that Lucy herself was passing on the opposite side of the street, nor did he notice her until she also went into the college.

Lucy Wilson's Interview with Her Uncle.

A few minutes later he saw Lucy at an open window, talking earnestly with Mr. Armstrong. The merchant had evidently told her the shameful story, and Lucy was pleading with him. Though Edward had no hope of her success, he knew he could have no better advocate. Presently the merchant came out, and then Edward, after watching him carefully out of sight, sent a note over to Lucy, asking her to come to him. In a few minutes she was at his side.

"Oh, Edward," she said, "what have you done?"

Tears were in her eyes and in her voice, and her brother's eyes fell before her reproachful gaze. He told her his wretched story, not attempting to defend himself, but clearly showing how he had been led into crime by his bad acquaintances. "I am going away, Lucy; but I could not go without seeing you. I am broken-hearted. I wish I had died before doing such a wicked thing."

Lucy looked at him keenly, and saw that he was not exaggerating. "Are you really sorry, Edward?" she asked.

"Sorry!" he said; "that is no name for it; I hate, I loathe myself."

"Then," said Lucy. "I can promise you forgiveness. Only a few minutes ago our uncle went away from me. He thought you would come to me, and he commissioned me to tell you that if you were really repentant he would forgive you for his sister's—our mother's—sake. Oh, Edward! it was a shame to wrong so good a man."

"Lucy! Lucy! is it true?" asked Edward, almost beside himself with joy.

"Yes, it is quite true; I could scarcely believe it myself; but he promised with his own lips, and I will go with you now to him, if you will come, and we will thank him together."

Edward felt that the meeting with his uncle would be less painful with his sister, and he accordingly accepted her offer. They went together, and he was overcome by his uncle's magnanimity. "It is for your mother's sake," said Mr. Armstrong. Years afterward, when Edward was seeking salvation, and he was told that God, for Christ's sake, would pardon him and receive him as a son, Mr. Armstrong's words recurred to his mind, and he had no difficulty in understanding the way of salvation.

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. L. S. Keyser.

(Continued from page 606.)

Duped.

THE reading of the letter which Belle Havelock had concocted and Duneman had sent, was to Madeline Winters a double revelation. It convinced her that Hadley Madelling was a deceiver, and it also revealed to her the depth of affection she had unconsciously conceived for him. She suffered bitterly, and after a first amazed perusal she flung herself on her bed and wept bitterly. Then she rose as if after a nightmare, and read it a second time.

The letter was signed Mabel R. Richerson, and purported to be a reply to one received from Madelling. The writer thanked him for his frequent, long, and brilliant letters, expressed her pride in his college triumphs, in the manner of one whose personal interest was natural only toward a lover, and then openly referred to their betrothal as to an event of long standing. She gave him news of the neighborhood with accurate and minute local coloring, and dwelt on the pleasure with which she looked forward to his vacation, when they could resume their old walks and blissful companionship. The real sting of the letter which rankled in Madeline's breast was in the concluding paragraph, in which the writer admitted that when Madelling went to the college her jealous disposition made her tremble lest his love should be transferred to some fellow-student, and she rejoiced that he was still true to her, in spite of the pursuit of the girl, whose eagerness to secure him had put his life and her own in peril on the railroad bridge. "I agree with you, dear Hadley," she wrote, "as to the indelicacy of her placing herself in your way and following you in your rambles, and as to her recent ruses; but I have perfect confidence in your fidelity, and I am sure you will not be caught by her blandishments."

And this was the man, thought Madeline, who had been making love to her only a few hours ago! What must he have written to this Mabel Richerson to elicit such a reply as this? So he thought she had been pursuing him, and he had thought her indelicate and had expressed that opinion to this girl! Self-reproach, indignation, chagrin, had their way for a time, and even Belle Havelock herself must have been moved to pity, could she have seen how her plot had tortured the innocent girl.

What should she do? The spirit of that "wisdom which is from above, which is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated," had so long ruled her life that even now its voice could not be hushed. Did not the Scripture in many places deprecate a harsh and precipitant judgment? She would not condemn Hadley rashly. There might be some blunder. Perhaps, he could explain. At any rate, she would hold her verdict in abeyance for a few days until she had investigated the mystery that hung over him. Since Hadley had made a proposal of marriage to her, she felt that she was justified in taking such steps as would either disprove or confirm his guilt. As an initiative to her investigations she determined to write to the author of the letter which she had just read. Although it was past midnight, she seated herself at her writing-desk and penned the following brief missive:

"DEAR MISS RICHERSON: Word has come to me that you and Mr. H. C. Madelling have been engaged for a number of years, and that this relation still exists between you. You will greatly oblige a friend if you will write me whether these rumors are true or not. Rest assured that any confidence you may repose in me shall not be betrayed. Your friend,

"MADELINE WINTERS."

There was no strategy in this Christian girl. It seemed to her that a direct appeal to Mr. Madelling's fiancée, if that was the relation in which Miss Richerson stood to him, would be the surest avenue to the truth. Little could the unsuspecting girl imagine that the same brain which had devised the plot had also foreseen that this test would be applied, and had provided for it. Madeline's letter on its arrival at Banesville recalled to the accommodating postmaster his fascinating visitor, and he at once fulfilled his promise of forwarding it to her. Belle Havelock smiled triumphantly when she received it, and promptly penned a suitable reply, and sent it to her friend, the hostess of the Banesville hotel, to be mailed from the Banesville post-office to Miss Winters.

Another test which Madeline devised was an indirect examination of Madelling himself. She resolved to find out as delicately as she could from him something about this Miss Richerson at the first opportunity.

The following day, which was Sunday, was one of the most trying of her life. A dull headache distressed her, but it was nothing compared to the anguish of her heart. One who had not schooled herself to faithfulness in the performance of religious duty would have found an excuse for remaining away from church at such a time; but Madeline felt that the atmosphere of worship might soothe her grief, and, of course, she must obey the voice of duty. It was difficult to concentrate her mind on the services, for she seemed like one in a dream.

When Hadley saw that morning in church how pale she was, he was almost frightened. Had her long drive made her ill? He was filled with vague misgivings, and could scarcely wait for the long hours of Sabbath afternoon to drag themselves away, until the time should come to call upon the girl and conduct her to the evening services, as he had arranged to do.

The death-like pallor was still on her face when she met him at the door, but to all his anxious inquiries she replied truthfully—it was impossible for her to prevaricate—that she had received news through the mail when she came home on the previous evening that had made her very sad. Some time she would perhaps tell him what it was, but for the present he must rest content with this indefinite explanation. Hadley saw that it was useless to press her further.

Her religious principles were sorely put to the test that night. How could she go with another woman's betrothed husband to church? Yet she did not dare to decline to go with him, and go herself, as he was not yet proven to be a mere adventurer. To stay at home was contrary to her principles. At last she gained the victory over herself, and they went to the services. As she listened to Mr. Mardont's earnest words, she was glad that she had come, for she felt that the sermon was a special message to her requirements, and her agony was somewhat alleviated. She could trust God, even if man proved treacherous.

It was when they sat together in the parlor that evening that the opportunity came to obtain more light on the disclosures that distressed her. With an adroitness that was alien to her natural disposition, she led him to speak of his past life and old home. Then she made some inquiries about his neighbors. Her dismay can better be imagined than described when he mentioned the name of Richardson first of all in the catalogue he gave of his old home-friends.

"That is quite a familiar name to me," she said, presently. "Did Mr. Richerson have any—children—young people—in his family?" And she looked at him with a glow in her eyes that she could not hide.

Neither of them noticed the difference in syllabication which they used in pronouncing the name. Her eyes gleamed so, as she looked at him, that he flushed—a perfectly natural consequence when it is remembered that he loved her with the whole power of his affection; but she immediately construed it into an evidence of guilt.

"Yes, he had a daughter, whose name was Mabel," Hadley answered.

Madeline's heart sank. "As she lived so near your home, I suppose you were schoolmates?"

"Oh yes, we were thrown together a great deal," he answered, in a straightforward way. "Mabel was a pretty girl, and I can remember that in my boyish way I admired her, and she seemed to reciprocate my esteem for her."

All this seemed confirmatory of the information contained in the letter. His additional remark seemed to be another witness subpœnaed against him.

"Mabel was quite an intelligent girl, too," he continued. "In fact, she graduated from the Banesville Academy at the same time I did. She is a good composer, and writes a very creditable essay and a delightful letter."

There was no room to doubt his guilt. She "writes a delightful letter." How would he know this if he had not had some epistolary communication with her? As the evidences of his duplicity accumulated, the girl's lips became ashen.

"Miss Winters, you are not well," said Hadley, with deep concern. "It is not right for me to detain you any longer, though I am loath to leave you so soon. If you need my services at any time, I am at your command. Have I not at least a partial right to help you? But what am I saying? I know that you are not ready to answer me this evening." And there was an imploring expression in his eye.

"No," she replied, with quivering lips; "you must give me a few days yet. Good-night."

The days passed wearily for Madeline. One evening, toward the latter part of the week, a letter came to her through the mail, bearing on the envelope the Banesville post-mark, and written in the same hand in which the one that had criminated young Madelling had been written. In the seclusion of her room she opened the letter and read:

"MY DEAR MISS WINTERS: Your letter of inquiry just received. It becomes me to speak modestly of my relations with Mr. Madelling; but as you seem to be kindly disposed, I do not mind telling you that we are engaged. Almost four years ago the plight was made, before he went to college, and it has never been broken. In my happiness I feel the impulse to write more; but I must remember that what is pure felicity to me may seem mere sentimentality to others. Hoping that my answer is satisfactory, I remain, Your friend,

"MABEL R. RICHERSON."

The last item of proof needed to fasten guilt upon Hadley Madelling was now obtained, and Madeline's resolution was quickly made. That very day she sat down and penned him a note, and sent it to the post-office. It contained her answer to the important proposal he had made nearly a week prior.

When Hadley Madelling said with perfect simplicity that Mabel Richardson was a delightful letter-writer, he little imagined the effect his words would have upon the girl to whom he spoke. Had he had the faintest suspicion of the plot that was thickening around him, he would have quickly added that a friend of his had kept up a correspondence with Mabel for some time, and had allowed him to read several of her tersely written letters. Madeline's last words depressed him. That warmth of manner that had characterized her treatment of him on the evening before was now absent, and he became fearful lest her answer would be unfavorable.

Nor was his anxiety allayed when he saw that her dejected mood continued through the week. In the class-rooms she scarcely seemed herself. More than once was she so preoccupied with her own thoughts that she did not notice the questions addressed to her by the professor until they were repeated. All this boded ill for his love-suit, he feared.

On Saturday afternoon George Dane returned from the office with a letter for Hadley. At once the latter recognized Miss Winters's chirography on the envelope. Why had she written? He could not conjecture. Leaning against his book-case, he opened and read the following letter:

"MR. H. C. MADELLING: There are some things that it is less embarrassing to say by letter than by word. My answer to the important proposal you made a few days ago is of that character. After mature consideration I find that, for various reasons which I cannot explain, I am forced to give you a negative reply. Pray let our lives run henceforth in separate channels, as it would only stir bitter memories and regrets for us to meet as we have done in the past. Should you be tempted to seek an explanation, I beseech you not to yield to the temptation.

"Your friend,

"MADELINE WINTERS."

A heavy groan broke from the young man as he read the letter, and he almost reeled to the floor, while his face became as white as the winding-sheet of snow that enwrapped the earth. It seemed as if an avalanche of crushed hopes had suddenly been hurled upon his soul.

"What is it, what is it, Hadley?" cried George, springing forward to support his stricken friend. "Hadley, what has happened? You are as pale as death!"

"Miss Winters has—" began Hadley. And then, unable to say more, he put his arms about George's neck and leaned his head heavily upon his shoulder, groaning aloud, with a nameless, unutterable agony, while his whole frame trembled like a breeze-shaken leaf. George gently conducted him to a chair and seated him in it.

"Brace up, old fellow!" he said, trying to speak cheerily. "Don't give way in this style. Show that you are a brave man, as you are. Oh, don't give up so!" cried George, taking the pale face of his room-mate between his hands and holding up his head. "O Hadley, I almost wish I could pray for you! Such grief needs an omnipotent support."

"Pray!" muttered Hadley, somewhat aroused by his friend's earnest entreaties. "Don't talk to me about prayer, or God, or angel, or heaven. I cannot believe in them now. To-day and henceforth I am an avowed, an uncompromising, atheist. What have I done that my life should be crushed in this fashion? I tell you this world is ruled by caprice. There is no good in life. It is full of blighted hopes and disappointments, and it cannot be that it is directed by a God of love."

Such is invariably the effect of affliction upon those who are "without hope and without God in the world." While it purifies and sweetens and mellows the life of the true believer, it drives the sceptic into deeper hostility against God and the moral order of things.

The disappointed young man was also exposed to another peril. An atheist may have moral principles, but they lack a unifying bond; they lie separate and unconnected in his being, without sufficient adherence to constitute a consistent code of life. Hence one by one these principles are easily dissevered and cast aside. That such was the result in Hadley's case was brought to light later in the day.

Until evening George remained with him in his room, doing his utmost to soothe and assuage his anguish. When night came some duty called George away for an hour, and when he returned he found that his friend had gone. He waited an hour in great uneasiness, not knowing to what rashness Hadley might be driven in his desperation, and was on the point of going in search of him, when he heard an uncertain foot-fall upon the stairway. It did not sound like his friend's quick, firm step, and George was wondering who it might be. In a few moments the door was thrown violently open, and on the threshold stood Hadley Madelling, with flushed face and blood-shot eyes, the very embodiment of inebriety. Then he started reeling across the room. George sprang to him to save him from falling, and recognized the fumes of liquor on the staggering man's breath.

It was with the greatest difficulty that George restrained his intoxicated friend from becoming hilarious, and thus attracting attention to his disgraceful condition. Carefully bolting the door, George applied himself to the unpleasant task of curbing Hadley's imbecile merriment. His troubles were evidently drowned for the moment, and he could even ridicule his infatuation. He would talk and declaim, raising his voice in his efforts to keep his pompous words from running into each other. At last George managed to get him undressed and into bed, where he fell into the heavy sleep of the drunken, to wake next morning with a head splitting from his first debauch, and a spirit burdened with sorrow and shame. It was not difficult for Dane to extract a promise then from Hadley that he would never again touch a drop of intoxicating liquor. The promise was given and faithfully kept.

(To be Continued.)

THE COMMISSION OF JOSHUA.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for October 7, Josh. 1: 1-9. Golden Text, Eph. 6: 14.

Joshua's Antecedents—His Call—Moses' Petition for a Divinely Appointed Successor—Joshua's Training—The Marvellous School of Intimacy with Moses—The Law Giving Place to the Deliverer—Personal Entrance Upon the Land Necessary—The Promise Reiterated—The Secret of Power—The Self-Immolation of the Leaders—The Treble Strength Imparted.

THE name Joshua is the same as Jesus; it means Saviour or Deliverer. We first hear of Joshua as the general in command when the Amalekites were smitten (Ex. 17: 23), and afterwards as Moses' minister when he went up into the mount of God. (Ex. 24: 13.) We are not told that Joshua was with him during the wondrous forty days and forty nights of his communing with God in the mountain, but when he came down again, Joshua accompanied him. Probably he had remained in some lower part of the mountain, ready for the descent of Moses, and had, therefore, neither knowledge of nor part in the idolatry of the golden calf. (Ex. 32: 17.) Joshua was one of the two spies who testified faithfully for God when their ten companions "brought up an evil report of the land," and they survived the forty years' wandering in the wilderness (Num. 14: 6, 30, 38), according to the promise of God.

The Call of Joshua

is mentioned in the course of Moses' rehearsal of the dealings of God with His people. "The Lord was angry with me for your sakes, saying, Thou also shalt not go in thither [unto the Land]. But Joshua, the Son of Nun, which standeth before thee, he shall go in thither: encourage him; for he shall cause Israel to inherit it." (Deut. 1: 37, 38.) But there is a clearer and more definite account of it in the book of Numbers. God had commanded Moses to get up into Mount Abarim, to view the land of Israel before he was gathered to his people as his brother Aaron was gathered; because, on account of this unbelief at the water of Meribah, neither he nor Aaron was permitted an entrance into the land of Canaan. And Moses did not plead for longer life, nor did he ask God to turn from His purpose, as he had done when God spoke of destroying His people. Moses' petition was characteristic of his whole life—he was in every sense a living sacrifice for the people—"Let the Lord, the God of the spirits of all flesh," he said, "set a man over the congregation, which may go out before them, and which may go in before them, and which may lead them out, and which may bring them in; that the congregation of the Lord be not as sheep which have no shepherd." (Num. 27: 16, 17.) Oh that spiritual teachers now were like Moses! He asked nothing, desired nothing, for himself; like Paul, like the Lord Himself, he laid down his life daily for the brethren.

"And the Lord said unto Moses, Take thee Joshua the son of Nun, a man in whom is the Spirit, and lay thine hand upon him; and set him before Eleazar the priest, and before all the congregation; and give him a charge in their sight. And thou shalt put some of thine honor upon him, that all the congregation of the children of Israel may be obedient. And he shall stand before Eleazar the priest, who shall ask counsel for him after the judgment of Urim before the Lord: at his word shall they go out, and at his word they shall come in, both he and all the children of Israel with him, even all the congregation." And then Moses laid hands on him in public, before all the congregation, and "gave him a charge." Thus was Joshua called to his work. There was nothing mysterious or secret about it, all the congregation knew as well as Joshua himself what God required of him.

Joshua's Training.

His forty years of service as Moses' minister must have been the best school possible for the responsible life he was to live. He had learned of Moses to carry everything to God, and to prove how truly God understood all that was trusted to Him. He had learned to trust God not only with his own concerns, but with those of others. It was a marvellous school; perhaps no other man ever had such a training. God commanded Moses to "encourage him" (Deut. 1: 36), and to bid him "be strong and of a good courage," because God would be with him. (Deut. 31: 23.) These latter were probably the last words Moses ever uttered to Joshua, and they were his life's motto. But Joshua had had the advantage of seeing what it meant for God to be with a man. He had seen how God could, for the fulfilling of His Word to His people, alter the course of things in nature—make a path through the sea, rain bread from heaven, make the rock give water, hold Moses in life forty days and forty nights without any food, and he knew that "I will be with thee" meant that nothing was impossible.

That wondrous day of Moses' death was over; it was a kind of summing up of his whole marvellous life; and now God speaks directly to Joshua. "Now after the death of Moses, the servant of the Lord, it came to pass that the Lord spake unto Joshua the son of Nun, Moses' minister, saying, Moses My servant is dead; now, therefore, arise, go over this Jordan, thou and all this people, unto the land which I do give to them, even to the children of Israel. Every place that the sole of your foot shall tread upon,

That have I given You,

as I said unto Moses." This is a wonderful type of the life of conquest and victory to which God calls us. Unless Moses (the law) is dead, we have no power to arise and take possession. While we are under the spirit of bondage, "I must do this," "I ought to do the other," "God expects such and such things of me," and our spirit frets under the constant pressure to attempt impossibilities, and we have no power to arise and take possession of the land. But when Joshua takes the place of Moses, then victory takes the place of bondage, the groanings cease, for "the battle is the Lord's," and what we cannot do, He undertakes to do for us, and in us. Oh what a relief it is to know that Christ in us is the fulfilling of the law, that, as He takes possession of us, He sets up His own law in our hearts, and writes it there, making it come natural to our new or Christ-nature to do, and to love the will of God, which our own nature so rebels against! There are those who struggled with their own wills, or affections, or desires, and vainly attempted to control them, but when the whole conflict was handed over to Jesus, how surely He undertook and conquered! Now instead of the sad "I wish I could, but I can't," there is the joyous song, "Jesus saves me now; Jesus prevails"; and the experience whenever I put down my foot upon the promises of my God, then I claim and have possession. But as the foot must touch the soil, stand on it, and let it bear our weight, so with every promise of God. "We which have believed do enter into rest" (Heb. 4: 3); we are not afraid to rest our weight on to the promises of God, to step out upon them as Peter stepped out upon the water. Joshua and the children of Israel they could not receive possession by word of mouth; they must come into personal contact with it, they must have to do with the land, that it might be theirs. And we too must have to do with God, in every promise, for soul or body, in order that He may fulfil that promise to us.

Could not Claim the Land by Proxy,

This promise made to Joshua, had before been made to Moses, and God reiterates to Joshua what He had told Moses of the extent of the land. And then, repeating to Joshua His promise made to Moses (Deut. 7: 24), "Thus shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life," He adds, "As I was with Moses, so I will be with thee: I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee."

But would it not be presumptuous for an ordinary Christian to take such promises to himself? Were not Moses and Joshua, Elijah and Daniel, etc., extraordinary men? James tells us that Elijah at least was "a man of like passions as we are." (James 5: 17.) Moses did not esteem himself anything remarkable. That which made their lives so wonderful, was that they were small enough in their own eyes to give God room to work. It was not they who were wonderful; it was He: and if we were less conceited and self-sufficient, He would work mightily in our lives too. It stands to reason that if God is really on our side in any single thing, man counts for nothing, and cannot stand before us. What is man to God, any way? But I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee" is no promise that faith shall not be tried; Joshua's faith was sorely tried again and again. It was no pledge that, come what may, Joshua should be kept involuntarily from ever doing wrong. He was but ready to his hand, at every moment, was the Almighty God as his Strength and his guarantee of victory. If he acted independently of God, he would fail, despite all his past experience and so it proved at Ai, and in the affair of the Gideonites. If he was humble enough to seek and act upon God's direction, all would go well; so it proved with him, and so it will ever prove with us.

As Liable to Sin as any other Man,

"Be strong and of a good courage." When God says, "Be strong," He creates the strength of His Word. A naturally timid man to whom God says, "Be strong," can be as strong and stronger than one who is naturally courageous, so that we need never be discouraged or brought to a stand-still because of what we are. The question is always, "What can God make of me?"

In these connections Joshua was told to "be strong and of a good courage." First in connection with his vocation as regarded the people, "Unto this people shalt thou divide for an inheritance the land which I sware unto their fathers to give them." Secondly in connection with his vocation as regarded God, "That thou mayest observe to do according to all the law, which Moses My servant commanded thee." Thirdly, because of God's provision for sustaining him. "The Lord thy God is with thee whithersoever thou goest." In the first place, Joshua could not stand alone—as leader of the people, he must lead or mislead them; hesitation or wavering on his part might turn them aside from the Lord, as had been the cases with regard to Aaron and the golden calf. But God knew that it would need courage to keep the law; and so it does to this day, especially in points which have been overlooked by the church of Christ for years. To stand with God against the world is an easy thing, but to stand with God against the misconceptions of dearly loved and honored Christian teachers requires a courage which nothing can give but the consciousness that the Lord is with us. It is clearly the mind of God that His Word shall be the main teaching and matter of His workers. "This book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth; but thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is therein." Let us take the last words home to our hearts. "Have not I commanded thee? Be strong and of a good courage; be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed; for the Lord thy God is with thee whithersoever thou goest."

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman (London), edited by the Rev. M. Baxter, may be had from the office of this journal, 63 Bible House, New York; price six cents, including postage. Annual subscription, seventy cents. The following articles, among others, are contained in the number for September:

The Nineteenth Century in the Light of Prophecy.
The Signs of the Coming of the Son of Man.
A Sermon on Christ's Second Coming.
Daniel's Seventh Chapter: The Four Wild Beasts.
Only One "Abomination of Desolation."
The Fulfilment of Prophecy. By Frederick S. Gervis.
The Children of Light. By H. Meymott.
The Millennium Far from a Perfect State.
Graven Images: What the Bible Says About Them.
The Seven Trumpets Explained in their past Year-day Historical Fulfilment.
Passing Events Viewed from a Prophetic Standpoint.

TRUST.

I cannot see with my short human sight,
Why God should lead this way or that for me;
I only know He saith: "Child, follow me;"
But I can trust.

I know not why my path should be at times
So straightly hedged, so strangely barred before;
I only know God could keep wide the door;
But I can trust.

I find no answer, often, when beset
With questions fierce and subtle on my way,
And often have but strength to faintly pray;
But I can trust.

I often wonder, as with trembling hand
I cast the seed along the furrowed ground,
If ripened fruit for God will there be found;
But I can trust.

I cannot know why suddenly the storm
Should rage so fiercely round me in its wrath,
But this I know, God watches all my path;
And I can trust.

I may not draw aside the mystic veil
That hides the unknown future from my sight,
Nor know if for me waits the dark or light;
But I can trust.

I have no power to look across the tide,
To know, while here, the land beyond the river;
But this I know, I shall be God's forever!
So I can trust.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike), will be sent post-paid, for 10 cts., or 100 for 20 cts. Postage stamps taken.

For Nervous Debility

Use Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

Dr. A. M. BILBY, Mitchell, Dak., says: "I have used it in a number of cases of nervous debility, with very good results."

Young men who need business experience, and at the same time to increase their cash on hand, will find it greatly to their interest to confer with B. F. Johnson & Co., Richmond, Va.

BEAUTIFUL WINTER FLOWERS.

For only 10 cts. we will send free by mail 3 Elegant New Bulbs for winter blooming, or 7, all different, for 20 cts. Every one is a gem of rare beauty and sure to bloom well in small pots during winter. When ordering ask for our Fall Catalogue of Bulbs (Free) with directions for culture, &c., if you do not already possess it.

OUR FALL CATALOGUE

Of Hardy Bulbs and Plants for winter and early spring blooming, is now ready, and is the most elegant and complete catalogue of the sort ever issued in the world. In it is offered, with directions for culture, the best Hyacinths, Tulips, Crocus, Narcissus, Lilies, Calochortus, Ornithogalum, Iris, Fritellia, Freesias, Alliums, and a score of other new and rare winter and spring blooming Bulbs, besides many new and rare Fruits, including the Ever-bearing Tree Blackberry and Raspberry. This catalogue will be sent free to any who send us an order, or who will send one after receiving it. Among the special offers it contains are 12 Crocus for 15c., 12 Double or Single Tulips for 40c., 12 Hyacinths for 75c., the Great Chinese Sacred Lily, 50c., 30 beautiful winter blooming Bulbs, $1.00, &c. Any one can have gay flowers in the house during winter, or in the garden as soon as snow melts, at small cost. Our Catalogue tells all about them. Address

JOHN LEWIS CHILDS, Floral Park, N.Y.

AGENTS—Our Christmas Books (selling from 50 cents to $3.50) will pay you a larger profit than any others the next three months. One agent made a profit last year of $84 20 in two weeks; one reports an average profit of $7.00 a day from September till Christmas. All time not necessary. CASSELL & CO., B.B.S.D., 104 & 106 Fourth Ave., New York. 40 Dearborn St., Chicago.

MEXICO

Contributions in aid of Christian work in Mexico are most pressingly needed, and can be mailed to the address of

BISHOP H. C. RILEY,
Care of J. P. HEATH
43 Bible House, New York.

UNIVERSITY ORGANS.—They Lead the World.—$55 to $500. Sold Direct to Families. No Middlemen. Solid Walnut 5 Octaves-Double Couplers. Guaranteed for Six Years and sent, with Stool and Book, for TRIAL IN YOUR OWN HOME BEFORE YOU BUY. ESTABLISHED 1859. $35
MARCHAL & SMITH,
285 East 21st Street, New York.

In all the world there is but one sure cure for the OPIUM Habit. The Dr. J. L. Stephens Remedy never fails, and no other treatment ever cures. We have cured more than 10,000 cases. No other treatment ever cured one case. NO PAY TILL CURED. Remember this, and write to the J. L. Stephens Co., Lebanon, Ohio.

AGENTS WANTED to sell "The Child's Bible." Introduction by Bishop J. H. Vincent, D.D. The best selling book handled by agents. Recommended by all clergymen. Address Cassell & Co., B.B.S.D., 104 and 108 Fourth Ave., New York; 40 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

$75.00 to $250.00 A MONTH can be made working for us. Agents preferred who can furnish a horse and give their whole time to the business. Spare moments may be profitably employed also. A few vacancies in towns and cities. B. F. Johnson & Co., Pub's, 1009 Main St., Richmond, Va.

TEAS LADIES Send at once for our new terms. THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO., 31 and 33 Vesey St., New York, N. Y.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED

MY STORY OF THE WI

By Mary A. Livermo

Her own narrative of "Four Years' Personal Experience as Field and Hospital Nurse." It portrays Womanly or "Heavenly" side of the War, its Light Shadows "as a woman saw them." Bright, Pure, and full of "laughter and tears," of thrilling interest and tou pathos, it sells at sight to all. Splendid Steel-Plates famous old Battle-Flags richly colored in exact ac The "booming" book for Men and Women Agents. $ $200 a month made. ☞ Distance no hindran we Pay Freights and give Extra Terms. Write for circ
A. D. WORTHINGTON & CO., Hartford, Co

For Gas

BAILEY'S COMPOUND Light-spreading Silver-Plated CORRUGATED GLASS REFLECTORS

A wonderful invention for Lighting Churches, Halls, etc. Handsome designs. Satisfaction guaranteed. Catalogue and price list free.
Bailey Reflector Co.
113 Wood st. Pittsburgh, Pa.

WANTED at once, a representative or Woman, in every until Dec. 25th. Liberal All time not necessary. Give references.
R. H. Woodward & Co., Baltimore

FEATHERS. The finest live white geese ers in the country, 75 cts. Hair Mattresses made over for $2.50. H. PICK 11 Nassau Street, Brooklyn, New York.

1,000 Agents Wanted to Sell 10

Copies National Hand Book of American Progress,
E. O. HAVEN, LL.D., & others,
1492 to date. Six Vols in One. A non-partisan reference Cyclopædia, of History, Biography, Statis Politics, for School, Home and Office. Illustrate pages, $2. E. B. TREAT, Pub. 771 B'wa

PRINTING PRESSES
Book of Type, 5c. CIRCULAR
Amateur Printers' JOSEPH WAT
Guide Book, 15c. 19 Murray St.
☞ Samples of Scrap Pictures and Cards, 10 cents.

For Nervous Debility

Use Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

Dr. A. M. BILBY, Mitchell, Dak., says: "I have used it in a number of cases of nervous debility, with very good results."

Young men who need business experience, and at the same time to increase their cash on hand, will find it greatly to their interest to confer with B. F. Johnson & Co., Richmond, Va.

THE MARCH OF PROGRESS!
OUR LATEST IMPROVEMEN

"Competition is the life of trade," and if you have not seen our improved $3 made for the FALL TRADE OF 1888, you cannot imagine how lively trade is, or how hai competitors have to work to keep within sight of us.

Ask your retailer for the James Means' $3 Shoe, or the James Means' $4 Shoe, according to your ne

Positively none genuine unless having our name and price stamped plainly on the Your retailer will supply you with shoes so stamped if you insist upon his doing so; if you insist, some retailers will coax you into buying inferior shoes upon which they make a larger

JAMES MEANS' $3 SHOE,

UNEXCELLED IN STYLE, UNEQUALLED IN DURABILITY AND PERFECTION OF FIT

JAMES MEANS' $4 SHOE

CANNOT FAIL TO SATISFY THE MOST FASTIDIOUS.

Such has been the recent progress in our branch of industry that we are no to affirm that the JAMES MEANS' $4 SHOE is in every respect equal to the which only a few years ago were retailed at eight or ten dollars. If you will tr pair you will be convinced that we do not exaggerate.

Ours are the original $3 and $4 Shoes, and those who imitate our of business are unable to compete with us in quality of factory products

In our lines we are the largest manufacturers in the United States

Shoes from our celebrated factory are sold by wide-awake retailers in all parts of the cou

We will place them easily within your reach state or territory, if you will invest one cer postal card and write to us, men this paper.

Ask also for the James Means' $2 Shoe for Boys.

JAMES MEANS & CO.,
41 Lincoln Street, - - Boston, Mass.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1888, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.

Vol. XI., No. 40. Office, 63 Bible House. N. Y. THURSDAY, OCTOBER 4, 1888. Price, 3 Cents. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

THE BICENTENARY OF JOHN BUNYAN'S DEATH—HIS PORTRAIT AND LIFE.

THE NEBULAR EQUIPAGE. Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A DEMONIAC AT A CAMP-MEETING.

THE ANGEL'S MESSAGE TO DANIEL. By G. H. Pember, M. A.

PORTRAIT OF MR. W. JENNINGS DEMOREST.

THE CONQUERING WEAPON. A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

Gems from New Books: Home of the Tarantula, etc.

Rev. W. F. ReQua's Work Among the Indians—Mr. Muller in New Zealand—A Buddhist's Idols.

PICTURE OF THE NEW MEMORIAL OVER JOHN BUNYAN'S TOMB.

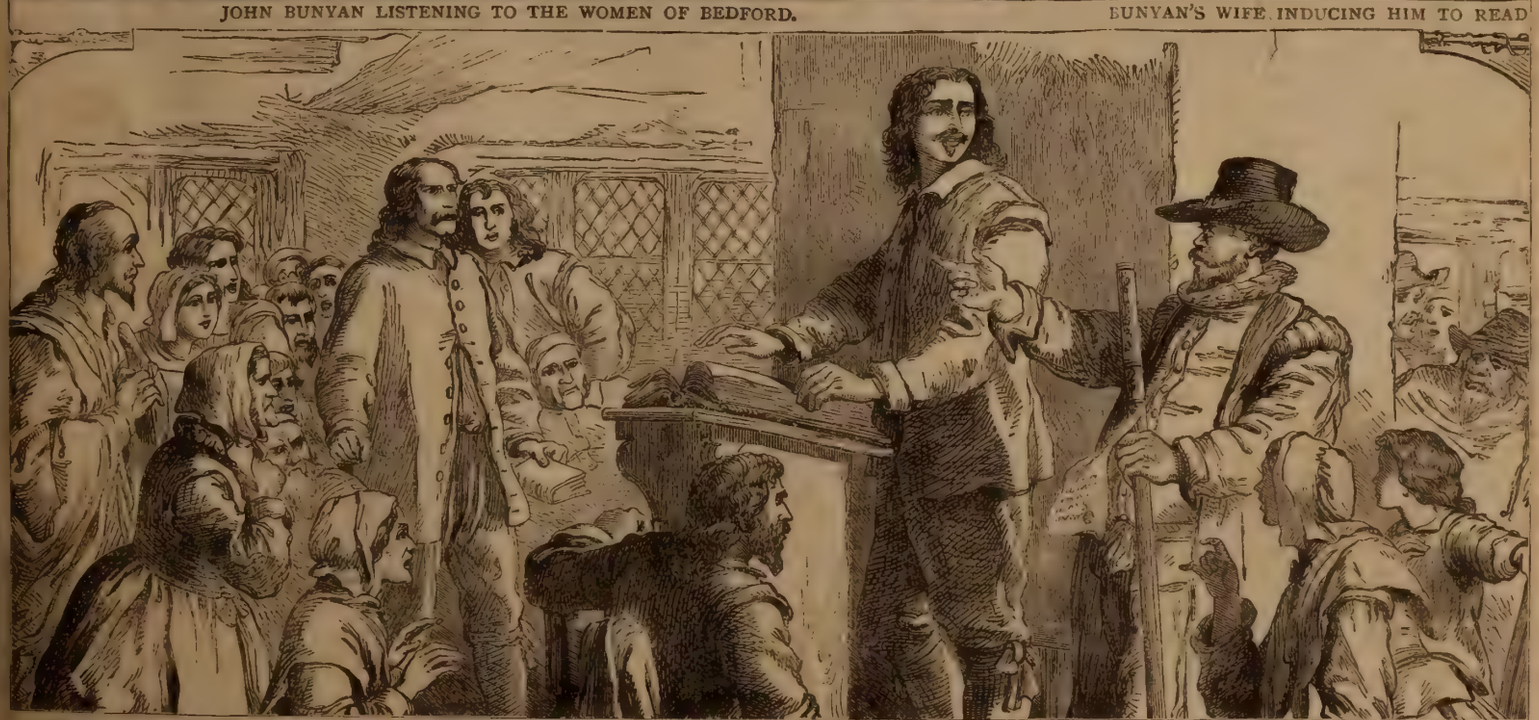
AN ARTIST'S DIFFICULTY. (With Illustration.)

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE. A New Serial Story by Rev. L. S. Keyser. (Continued.)

CROSSING THE JORDAN. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

JOHN BUNYAN LISTENING TO THE WOMEN OF BEDFORD.

BUNYAN'S WIFE INDUCING HIM TO READ



JOHN BUNYAN, THE AUTHOR OF "THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS"—SCENES IN HIS LIFE.

JOHN BUNYAN.

Author of the "Pilgrim's Progress."

His Bicentenary this Year—The Influence of the Puritans—Bunyan's Birth and Early Life—His Childhood's Dreams—Military Service—Early Marriage—Recklessness and Profanity—An Impressive Sermon—A Struggle on a Sunday Ball-ground—Meeting With the Pious Women—Conversion—Begins to Preach—Arrested and Committed to Prison—Twelve Years in Jail—The "Pilgrim's Progress" Written in His Cell—His Release—Last Journey and Death.

AMONG the anniversaries recently celebrated, not one had larger claim on the religious world than that which has just taken place of the Bicentenary of the Death of John Bunyan. What the English-speaking race owes, here and the world over, to the author of the "Pilgrim's Progress" can never be estimated. It is the fashion of modern culture to sneer at Puritanism, but the philosophers who despise it have to admit that their schools have never produced any book which has so won the admiration of cultured and uneducated alike, and held it for so long a period as the work of the Puritan tinker. Moreover, it has also to be admitted that the Puritanism was not concealed in the book, but was the very essence of it. The "Pilgrim's Progress" is in every home to this day; the children read it and love it before they understand its theology; the experienced Christian finds new beauties in it as he goes on his own pilgrimage, and even the cultured unbeliever is overcome with admiration as he recognizes in it the one perfect allegory in the language, a masterpiece of genius in a line in which so many have ventured and failed. We are in danger of forgetting while men are holding it up to public scorn and are idolizing the toleration which Puritanism was too conscientious to give, and which in our day is becoming only another name for religious indifference. It may be well, therefore, if this celebration of the Bunyan bicentenary leads us to look back two centuries and see what manner of man this was whose book has lived and kept its hold on the people, while works of his learned contemporaries have sunk into oblivion.

What America Owes to Puritanism,

John Bunyan was born in the year 1628, at Elstow, a village about a mile from Bedford, England, and died in 1688, shortly before the landing of England's greatest king, William III. In his wonderful autobiography, entitled "Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners," Bunyan tells us that he was the son of a very poor man. "My father's house," he says, "being of that rank that is meanest and most despised of all the families in the land." But the lowly parents of John Bunyan had the advantage of living near an excellent free school, established by a philanthropist, where their boy was taught to read and write, which was all the instruction he ever received. Bunyan has left us which shows us that even at an early age his imagination was unusually strong and active, and was deeply saturated with the Puritan doctrines, then gaining a hold over the poorer classes in England, and reaching higher into the ranks of the more thoughtful of the aristocracy. He was haunted by dreams and visions, in which evil spirits in monstrous forms appeared to him, threatening to drag him to the pit; or the day of judgment, with its flaming heavens and trump of terror seemed come; or Tophet disclosed its jaws beside him, belching out horrors, while a circle of fire began to close around him; and at nine or ten years of age grave and troubled thoughts beyond his years agitated and perplexed him. He represents himself as a wicked child, but there is no evidence that his propensities were worse than might be expected in a child in his circumstances. Still there is no doubt that he was a bold, reckless boy; the wilfulness of his character being apparently left without restraint, save the occasional whispers by which conscience stirred his apprehensions and appealed to his fears. "Yea," he says, "I was also then so overcome with despair of life and heaven, that I often wished either that there had been no hell, or that I had been a devil, supposing that they were only tormentors; that if it must needs be that I went thither, I might rather be a tormentor than be tormented myself."

A Description of his Childhood,

He Became a Tinker,

like his father, when his brief school-days were over, and there is evidence that he was an adept in the trade. From mending the pots and kettles of the neighbors, he must have advanced to a larger business, if we may judge from the list of articles which he made over to his wife some years later, when in danger of arrest for preaching. It is certain, however, that for some five or six years he made little progress in financial position, but worked in his father's shop at the ordinary labor. It was an exciting time. The civil wars between King Charles I. and his Parliament were raging, and England was rent asunder by religious and political divisions of the most stirring nature. Bunyan, though only seventeen years old, was drawn for the army. So little importance did he attach to any event outside of religion, that he omits to tell us on which side he was enrolled. Incidental allusions, however, conclusively show that it was on the King's side that he was called to serve. All that is known of his military life is that he was present at the siege of Leicester in 1645. It is probable that it was while he was in the army that he gathered illustrations for his "Holy War," finding in Cavalier troops and Roundhead officers models for the mystic warriors who figure in the annals of beleaguered Mansoul. The troop in which he served was evidently soon disbanded, and Bunyan returned to his tinker's work at Elstow much as he had left it. He was fond of athletic sports, and seems to have been a jovial, reckless youth, addicted to profane language, but never drunken or unchaste.

His Early Marriage,

which occurred soon after his return, was probably not opposed by his friends, who may have thought it would steady him. The girl whom he chose was a poor orphan, whose deceased parents had been "counted godly." She was as poor as himself, her only dowry being two books. "This woman and I," Bunyan writes, "though we came together as poor as poor might be, not having so much household stuff as a dish or spoon betwixt us both, yet this she had for her part, 'The Plain Man's Pathway to Heaven,' and 'The Practice of Piety,' which her father had left her when he died." These books proved to be treasures above all price to the poor tinker. Moreover, his wife was a devout Churchwoman, and she led her boy-husband, then only nineteen, from the Sunday games on Elstow Green to the parish church, to which she was in the habit of going morning and evening; and when the evening service was concluded, the youthful pair would return to their humble cottage and read together until darkness closed, and obliged them to shut the volume.

But the strong imagination and eager unsatisfied intellect of Bunyan yearned for some greater excitement than the calm, reverent services of the Church of England. He went back to the village green to join in the Sunday games of ball, and was not sensible of the evil and danger of sin. One Sunday the clergyman preached which greatly impressed his singular parishioner, who says he was set "thinking and believing that he made that sermon on purpose to show me my evil doing, and so went home with a great burden on my spirit." Having partaken, however, of his Sunday dinner, the impression wore off, and he joined the revellers on the village green with accustomed energy and delight. "The same day, as I was in the midst of a game of tip-cat," he says, "and having struck it one blow, just as I was about to strike it a second time a voice did suddenly dart from heaven into my soul," which uttered the words that come to every thoughtful man of every creed at some time in his life, and which place before him the alternative from which he cannot escape: "Wilt thou leave thy sins and go to heaven, or

A Sermon on Sabbath-Breaking,

Have Thy Sins and go to Hell?"

"At this I was put to an exceeding maze; wherefore, leaving my cat upon the ground, I looked up to heaven, and was as if I had, with the eyes of my understanding, seen the Lord Jesus looking down upon me, and as if He did severely threaten me with some grievous punishment." The effect of this singular experience was a fit of despair, as "it was now too late for me to look after heaven, for Christ would not forgive me nor pardon my transgression"; and he resolved that as he must be lost, to enjoy at least the present as far as it was possible. He returned desperately to his sport again, and from that day relapsed into the sins he had for a time abandoned, using habitually such profane and blasphemous language, that a woman, "though she was a very loose and ungodly wretch," actually reproved him for it, saying that his words made her tremble, and that he would ruin all the youths in the village. He was struck with a conviction of his fearful wickedness, and turned away silent and ashamed. From that day he strove hard to break himself of his sinful habit, and tried to speak without oaths and curses.

One day he met with a pious man who "talked pleasantly" to him "of the Scriptures and of religion." He procured a Bible, but read only the historical books, avoiding, as was natural, the Epistles of Paul. He set the Commandments before him as his way to heaven, and for a year lived a reformed life externally. He was looked upon as a prodigy of piety. His neighbors, who had been shocked by his daring wickedness, were much pleased with the change, and Bunyan, ever eager for the sympathy of others, rejoiced greatly in their esteem and commendations; yet was inwardly conscious that they were not fully deserved; "for," he writes, "had I then died, my state had been fearful."

Four Pious Women

whom, while engaged in his work in a street in Bedford, Bunyan overheard talking of religion, were the first means used of God to put the young man in the way of salvation. The women were sitting knitting and spinning at the door in the sun, and talking about the things of God. (See Illustration on first page.) "Being now willing to hear their discourse," he relates, "I drew near, for I was now a brisk talker in matters of religion; but they were far above my reach. Their talk was about a new birth, the work of God in their hearts, as also how they were convinced of their miserable state by nature. They talked how God had visited their souls with His love in the Lord Jesus, and with what words and promises they had been refreshed, comforted, and supported against the temptations of the devil. They also discoursed of their own wretchedness of heart, and of their unbelief; and did condemn, slight, and abhor their own righteousness as filthy and insufficient to do them any good.

Full of the new train of thought which the conversation of these pious women had awakened, Bunyan sought their company again and again; he told them of his condition, and was by them introduced to their pastor, John Gifford, a Baptist preacher, and who in all probability is the Evangelist in the "Pilgrim's Progress." At this time he underwent severe spiritual trials and fiery temptations, but the record is too long and too elaborate to be given here. A detailed account of them is given in his "Grace Abounding," and "The Jerusalem Sinner Saved." At length he lighted on a tattered copy of Luther's "Commentary on the Galatians," which afforded him great support and comfort. It seemed to him, he said, as if it had been written out of his own heart; and he ever afterwards prized the work of the Reformer next to the Bible itself. A vivid scene (depicted in illustration No. 2) flashes out upon us in his autobiography. It is that of Bunyan and his wife in conversation about an expression like a revelation from heaven. "Wife," said ne, "is there such a Scripture as, 'I must go to Jesus?' She replied, "I cannot tell;" therefore Bunyan stood musing, to see if he could remember it. In the course of a few minutes, he recalled what is written in the twelfth chapter of Hebrews: "Ye are come to Mount Zion . . to God, the Judge of all, and to the spirits of just men made perfect, and to Jesus the Mediator of the New Testament, and to the blood of sprinkling." Then with joy he told his wife, "Oh now I know, I know!" He writes, "That night was a good night to me; I have had but few better. All my former darkness had fled away, and the blessed things of heaven were set in my view."

Being now able to confess Christ as his Saviour, he was baptized by Mr. Gifford, and enrolled in the membership of the church. This took place in the same year as that in which Oliver Cromwell became Lord Protector, 1653, Bunyan himself being about twenty-five years of age. Two years afterwards he was and attained marvellous popularity. His friend Charles Doe says: "When Mr. Bunyan preached in London, if there were but one day's notice given, there would be more people come together to hear him preach than the meeting-house would hold. I have been to hear him preach to about 1,200 at a morning-lecture by seven o'clock on a working-day, in the dark winter time. I also computed about 3,000 that came to hear him one Lord's day at London, at a town's-end meeting-house (in Southwark) so that half had to go back again for want of room, and himself at a back door had to be pulled almost over the people to to his pulpit."

Chosen to Become a Preacher

A heavy grief fell on Bunyan in the year 1658. He lost his beloved wife, who left four young children to his care. Some little time afterwards he gave them a stepmother as well chosen as his first wife had been. The restoration of Charles II., after Cromwell's death, brought trouble on Bunyan and his fellow-Nonconformists. They were forbidden to meet for Divine worship, or for preaching, under pain of being stripped of their property, consigned to a gaol, and doomed to all kinds of indignities. Preachers were exposed to especial danger. At length, on November 12, 166c, only five months after the Restoration, Bunyan became one of the sufferers. He was about to preach at Samsell, a hamlet near Harlington, Bedfordshire, when he was interrupted and by a constable. (See Illustration No. 3.) He was not taken by surprise. He had had timely warning of his danger, but had disdained to shrink from that which he considered his duty, from fear of death or imprisonment. The next day he was committed to Bedford gaol by Mr. Justice Wingate, where he lay like a captive eagle for twelve long years.

Arrested for Preaching

Bunyan's wife made most persevering efforts to obtain her husband's liberation. She appealed to the House of Lords, to the Judges of Assize, and to the excellent Chief Justice Hale himself, who gave her his pity, but as Bunyan would not give his promise to abstain from preaching if released, even Hale could do nothing for him, and probably thought that he was better in prison than running the risk of getting transported for open defiance of the King. In the "den," as he called the cell of Bedford gaol, Bunyan wrote the first part of the most delightful of the prison books that have been the gift of sanctified captive genius to the world. It is worth noticing, and is certainly very remarkable, that the visions which haunted Bunyan's mind during his thraldom were of a brighter character than those which had belonged to his free, wandering life. The quiet of the gaol seems to have disciplined and calmed his imagination. Still his sufferings were considerable.

"The Pilgrim's Progress,"

His Release

from prison came in the year 1672, and was due not to the King's sympathy, but his desire to relieve the Roman Catholics of their disabilities. He could not show favor to them alone of the numerous sects which were opposed to the Church of England, He, therefore, had to make common cause with the Roman Catholics and other denominations. Bunyan consequently was released with other preachers of divers sects, and at once recommenced his work. We learn from Doe's narrative that he became pastor of the congregation in Bedford shortly before his liberation from gaol. "The pastor of the Bedford congregation died, and, after some years, vacancy, John Bunyan, though a prisoner, was by the Church called to the pastoral office, December 12, 1671," and by the connivance of the local authorities he had been let out of prison to preach, returning to his cell at night. The remainder of his life was passed in happy and uneventful labor for the Master.

During the last year of his life, Bunyan is said to have published six volumes of his writings (he was the author of no fewer than sixty different works), and, at length, worn out with sufferings, premature age, and abundant labors, the day of his dissolution drew near. His last act was a labor of Christian love. A young gentleman, a neighbor of his, having, in some way or other, offended his father, who was dying, was much troubled in mind on that account, and also because he had learned that it was his father's intention to disinherit him. He, therefore, earnestly desired Mr. Bunyan to go and plead with his offended parent, and prepare his mind to receive and forgive him. He readily undertook the mission; and so, riding to Reading, he there used such pressing arguments that the father was mollified, and was soon completely reconciled to his son. Proceeding from Reading to London on horseback, he was overtaken by a heavy shower of rain, and was wet through. On arriving at the house of his friend, Mr. Strudwick, a grocer on Snow Hill, he felt ill and depressed. He had only strength to preach once. Two days later he was seized with fever, and in ten days he was dead. His last words were, "Take me, for I come to Thee."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

An Aged Man's Dying Testimony.—Mr. Stewart remarks: "I was recently at the deathbed of an old man, who was so weak that he could not even raise his head, yet he wanted to leave his testimony for Christ. Making a very feeble sign with his hand which I knew meant to come near to him, I did so. I bent my ear close to his mouth, and he whispered to me, 'Tell everyone that it is only, trust Jesus. If it had been required that I must do anything to save myself, I should not have been able to do it, but I can trust Jesus, and am saved. Blessed be His name!' After this simple testimony he passed away with a smile upon his lips."

Working Inside a Cylinder.—"In the Construction of a railway bridge over the Forth, a number of cylinders were being sunk in sections, the one on top of the other. Sometimes they did not fit, and in that case a composition, consisting mostly of iron turnings, was filled in, and this being wetted it expanded and filled the crevices. A number of the cylinders were up, and most of the work had been done by one man. One dull, hazy day, heavy with oppressive heat, this man, who was engaged as usual, was observed to become overpowered with some mysterious influence. A companion descended by a windlass to help him, and managed to prop him up in the bucket; and soon he was pulled into the fresh air, where he quickly recovered. But his deliverer was in turn overpowered, and, falling back into a pool at the bottom of the cylinder, was drowned. One of the engineers descended to examine, first putting a rope about his body. It was well he did so, for he, too, was rendered insensible. There was no actively injurious gas at the foot of the cylinder, but the composition in its rapid oxidation took the greater part of the oxygen from the air, and left only that part which cannot support life. Does this not illustrate how the careless Christian, who would not go where there is active sin, but too often goes heedlessly where the name of God is never mentioned, where there is no continual current of grace to sustain the soul, falls, becomes insensible, and unless some higher power takes hold of him, he is lost for ever?"

A Drunken Pugilist Won.—An Open-Air evangelist said: "At one of the tent meetings there was a man who entered rather the worse for drink. As he behaved ill the preacher had him ejected. He retired to the neighboring saloon and told how he had been treated at the tent. A man well known in all that district as a pugilist and a very great drunkard was present and heard the first man's complaints. 'I will go up to the tent myself,' said he, 'and see whether he'll turn me out.' He went in, fully intending to create a disturbance; but he was interested by what he heard and waited to hear more. He listened with ever-increasing interest and wonder to the end of the meeting, having no longer any desire to make a disturbance. He came again the next night, and it was soon clear that the Holy Spirit was working in his heart. He never missed a meeting; he gave up the drink; he yielded his heart to the Lord. It was impossible that such a remarkable work of grace should not become known. It was notorious in the district, and many people came from miles round to hear a man whose preaching had changed even such a fellow as the pugilist."

The Preaching He Couldn't Stand.—The same devoted worker observes: "At Draycott a man who had been a great drinker came to the meeting, as he said, 'to see what an evangelist was like.' He attended for a few nights, and then said to a friend at the close of one of the services, 'I sha'n't come again; I can't stand this preaching. It's too straight for me.' He kept away some nights, and then he was with us once more. This night he resisted the pleadings of God's grace no longer, but yielded himself to Christ. 'And now,' said he, 'I must sign the pledge.' The following Sunday I was visiting a few sick people, and found myself near this man's house. I thought I would take the opportunity to call on him. As I entered I found all the family gathered around him reading the Bible. I expressed my pleasure at finding him thus employed. 'Ah!' said he, 'I am a new man now, and I am going to have new rules in my house. I used to spend my Sunday afternoon in drink. Now I must spend it in a better way.' It has been my pleasure to see him twice since that time, and I have had the joy of seeing that he is adorning the doctrine which he professes."

A Deadly Opiate of Satan's.—Mr. Ross said; "I had a friend who was very much interested in the use and abuse of opium. In order to judge more correctly of its nature he frequently experimented upon himself. I remember on one occasion he took an overdose, which nearly proved fatal. His friends saw the danger in which he was, and at once procured a doctor, who, after examining his patient, shook his head and said, 'No, I fear he will not live; but the only chance is for two of you to take him by the arms and drag him up and down the room the whole night, and if he can be kept awake until morning, by that time the influence of the drug will to a great extent have passed off.' His friends only needed the hint, and throughout all that long night they relieved each other at their work of mercy, but never for one minute letting their half-conscious patient be at rest. As the daylight began to creep in at the window, they were rewarded by their friend being restored to them. How many sinners seem to have fallen asleep under that devilish opiate, 'Go thy ways for this time; when I have a convenient season I will call for thee.' It seems to lull them to sleep, and the longer they sleep the more difficult it is to awaken them. Let us who are their friends give them no rest until we have brought them from under the influence of that falsely soothing and soul-losing delusion."

THE NEBULAR EQUIPAGE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday Morning, September 30, 1888.

"Who maketh the clouds His chariot." Ps. 104 : 3.

Man Encouraged to Look Up—The Grandeur of Cloudland—A Favorite Bible Simile—The Ancient Chariot—The Cloud Monsters—Modern Royal Chariots—God's Morning-Cloud Chariot—Light Giving—His Evening-Cloud Chariot—Its Call to Prayer—The Black Night Cloud Chariot—Never Turns Aside—What It Has Crushed—Halted by Prayer—Its Two Wheels of Justice and Mercy—The King Himself Drives—A Captain's Prayer on Lake Erie—Notable Historical Deliverances—Clouds that Touch the Earth—Momentous Cloud Rides—The Judgment Chariot.

BRUTES are constructed so as to look down. Those earthly creatures that have wings, when they rise from the earth still look down, and the eagle searches for mice in the grass, and the raven for carcasses in the field. Man alone is made to look up. To induce him to look up, God makes the sky a picture-gallery, a Dusseldorf, a Louvre, a Luxembourg, a Vatican, that eclipses all that German or French or Italian art ever accomplished. But God has failed to attract the attention of most of us by

The Scenery of the Sky.

We go into raptures over flowers in the soil, but have little or no appreciation of the "morning-glories" that bloom on the wall of the sky at sunrise, or the dahlias in the clouds at sunset. We are in ecstasies over a gobelin tapestry or a bridal veil of rare fabric, or a snowbank of exquisite curve, but see not at all, or see without emotion, the bridal veils of mist that cover the face of the Catskills, or the swaying upholstery around the couch of the dying day, or the snowbanks of vapor piled up in the heavens.

My text bids us lift our chin three or four inches and open the two telescopes which under the forehead are put on swivel easily turned upward, and see that the clouds are not merely uninteresting signs of wet or dry weather, but that they are embroidered canopies of shade, that they are the conservatories of the sky, that they are thrones of pomp, that they are crystalline bars, that they are paintings in water color, that they are the angels of the mist, that they are great cathedrals of light with broad aisles for angelic feet to walk through and bow at altars of amber and alabaster, that they are the mothers of the dew, that they are ladders for ascending and descending glories, Cotopaxis of belching flame, Niagaras of color, that they are the masterpieces of the Lord God Almighty. The clouds are and the sacred writers have made much use of them. After the Deluge God hung on a cloud in concentric bands the colors of the spectrum, saying: "I do set my bow in the cloud." As a mountain is sometimes entirely hidden by the vapors, so, says God, "I have blotted out as a thick cloud thy transgressions." David measures the divine goodness, and found it so high he apostrophized: "Thy faithfulness reacheth unto the clouds." As sometimes there are thousands of fleeces of vapor scurrying across the heavens, so, says Isaiah, will be the converts in the millennium "as clouds and as doves." As in the wet season no sooner does the sky clear than there comes another obscuration, so, says Solomon, one ache or ailment of old folks has no more than gone than another pain comes "as clouds return after the rain."

A Favorite Bible Simile,

A column of illumined cloud led the Israelites across the wilderness. In the book of Job, Elihu, watching the clouds, could not understand why they did not fall, or why they did not all roll together, the laws of evaporation and condensation then not being understood, and he cries out: "Dost thou know the balancing of the clouds?" When I read my text it suggests to me that the clouds are the Creator's equipage, and their whirling masses are the wheels, and the tongue of the cloud is the pole of the celestial vehicle, and the winds are the harnessed steeds, and God is the Royal occupant and driver "who maketh the clouds His chariot."

To understand the Psalmist's meaning in the text, you must know that the chariot of old was sometimes a sculptured brilliancy, made out of ivory, sometimes of solid silver, and rolled on two wheels, which were fastened to the axle by stout pins, and the awful defeat of Œnomaus by Pelops was caused by the fact that a traitorous charioteer had inserted a linch-pin of wax instead of a linch-pin of iron. All of the six hundred chariots of Pharaoh lost their linch-pins in the Red Sea, for the Bible says: "The Lord took off their wheels." Look at the long flash of Solomon's fourteen hundred chariots, and the thirty thousand chariots of the Philistines.

If you have ever visited the buildings where a king or queen keeps the

Coaches of State,

as I have, you know that kings and queens have great varieties of turnout. The keeper tells you: "This is the state carriage, and used only on great occasions." "This is the coronation carriage, and in it the king rode on the day he took the throne." "In this the queen went to open Parliament." "This is the coach in which the Czar and the Sultan rode on the occasion of their visit." All costly and tessellated and enriched and emblazoned are they, and when the driver takes the reins of the ten white horses in his hands, and amid mounted troops, and bands in full force sounding the national air, the splendor starts, and rolls on under arches entwined with banners, and amid the huzza of hundreds of thousands of spectators, the scene is memorable. But my text puts all such occasions into insignificance, as it represents the King of the Universe coming to the door of His palace, and the gilded vapors of the heavens rolling up to His feet, and He, stepping in and taking the reins of the galloping winds in His hand, starts in triumphal ride under the arches of sapphire, and over the atmospheric highways of opal and chrysolite, the clouds His chariot.

My hearers, do not think that God belittles Himself when He takes such conveyance. Do you know that the clouds are among the most in the whole universe? Do you know that they are flying lakes and rivers and oceans? God waved His hand over them and said: "Come up higher!" and they obeyed the mandate. That cloud, instead of being, as it seems, a small gathering of vapor a few yards wide and high, is really seven or eight miles across, and is a mountain, from its base to its top, fifteen thousand feet, eighteen thousand feet, twenty thousand feet, and cut through with ravines five thousand feet deep. No, David did not make a fragile or unworthy representation of God in the text, when he spoke of the clouds as His chariot. But as I suggested in the case of an earthly king, He has His morning-cloud chariot and His evening-cloud chariot — the cloud chariot in which He rode down to Sinai to open the law, and the cloud chariot in which He rode down to Tabor to honor the gospel, and the cloud chariot in which He will come to judgment. When He rides out in

Wondrous and Majestic Things

His Morning Chariot

at this season, about 6 o'clock, he puts golden coronets on the dome of cities, and silvers the rivers, and out of the dew makes a diamond ring for the fingers of every grass blade, and bids good cheer to invalids who in the night said: "Would God it were morning!" From this morning-cloud chariot He distributes light—light for the earth and light for the heavens, light for the land and light for the sea, great bars of it, great wreathes of it, great columns of it, a world full of it. Hail Him in worship as every morning He drives out in His chariot of morning cloud, and cry with David: "My voice shalt thou hear in the morning, in the morning will I direct my prayer unto thee and look up." I rejoice in these Scripture ejaculations: "Joy cometh in the morning." "My soul waiteth for thee more than they that watch for the morning." "If I take the wing of the morning." "The eyelids of the morning." "The morning cometh." "Who is she that looketh forth as the morning." "His going forth is prepared as the morning." "As the morning spread on the mountains." "That thou shouldest visit him every morning." What a mighty thing the King throws from His chariot when He throws us the morning! Yea; He has

His Evening-Cloud Chariot.

It is made out of the saffron and the gold and the purple and the orange and the vermilion and upshot flame of the sunset. That is the place where the splendors that have marched through the day, having ended the procession, throw down their torches and set the heavens on fire. That is the only hour of the day when the atmosphere is clear enough to let us see the wall of the heavenly city with its twelve manner of precious stones, from foundation of jasper to middle strata of sardius and on up to the coping of amethyst. At that hour, without any of Elisha's supernatural vision, we see horses of fire, and chariots of fire, and banners of fire, and ships of fire, and cities of fire, seas of fire, and it seems as if the last conflagration had begun and there is a world on fire. When God makes these clouds His chariot let us all kneel. Another day past, what have we done with it? Another day dead, and this is its gorgeous catafalque. Now is the time for what David called the "evening sacrifice," or Daniel called the "evening oblation."

Oh! oh! what a chariot made out of evening cloud! Have you hung over the taffrail on the ocean and seen this cloudy vehicle roll over the pavements of a calm summer sea, the wheels dripping with the magnificence? Have you from the top of Ben Lomond or the Cordilleras or the Berkshire hills seen the day pillowed for the night, and yet had no aspiration of praise and homage? Oh, what a rich God we have that He can put on one evening sky pictures that excel Michael Angelo's "Last Judgment," and Ghirlandjo's "Adoration of the Magi," and whole galleries of Madonnas, and for only an hour, and then throw them away, and the next evening put on the same sky something that excels all that the Raphaels and the Titians and the Rembrandts and the Corregios and the Leonardo da Vincis ever executed, and then draw a curtain of mist over them never again to be exhibited! How rich God must be to have a new chariot of clouds every evening!

But the Bible tells us that our King also has

His Black Chariot.

"Clouds and darkness," we are told, "are round about him." That chariot is cloven out of night, and that night is trouble. When He rides forth in that black chariot, pestilence and earthquake and famine and hurricane and woe attend Him. Then let the earth tremble. Then let nations pray. Again and again He has ridden forth in that chariot of black clouds, across England and France and Italy and Russia and America, and over all nations. That which men took for the sound of cannonading at Sebastopol, at Sedan, at Gettysburg, at Tel-el-Kebir, at Bunker Hill, were only the rumblings of the black chariot of the Almighty. Aye, it is the chariot of storm-cloud armed with thunder-bolts, and neither man nor angel nor devil nor earth nor hell nor heaven can resist Him. On those boulevards of blue,

This Chariot Never Turns out for anything. Aye, no one else drives there. Under one wheel of that chariot, Babylon was crushed, and Baalbeck fell dead, and the Roman Empire was prostrated, and Atlantis, a whole continent that once connected Europe with America, sank clear out of sight, so that the longest anchor of ocean steamer cannot touch the top of its highest mountains. The throne of the Cæsars was less than a pebble under the right wheel of this chariot, and the Austrian despotism less than a snowflake under the left wheel. And over destroyed worlds on worlds that chariot has rolled without a jar or jolt. This black chariot of war-cloud rolled up to the northwest of Europe in 1812, and four hundred thousand men marched to take Moscow, but that chariot of clouds rolled back, and only twenty-five thousand out of the four hundred thousand troops lived to return. No great snow-storm like that had ever before or has ever since visited Russia.

Aye, the chariot of the Lord is irresistible. There is only one thing that can halt or turn any of His chariots, and that is prayer. Again and again it has stopped it, wheeled it around, and the chariot of black clouds, under that sanctified human breath, has blossomed into such brightness and color that men and angels had to veil their faces from its brightness. Mark you, the ancient chariot which David uses as a symbol in my text, had only two wheels, and that was that they might turn quickly, two wheels taking less than half the time to turn than four wheels would have taken. And our Lord's chariot has only two wheels, and that means instant reversal, and instant help, and instant deliverance. While the combined forces of the universe in battle array could not stop His black chariot a second, or diverge it an inch, the driver of that chariot says: "Call upon me in the day of trouble, and I will deliver thee." "While they are yet speaking, I will hear."

Two-wheeled Chariot,

one wheel justice, and the other wheel mercy. Aye, they are swift wheels. A cloud, whether it belongs to the cirrhus, the clouds that float the highest; or belongs to the stratus, the central ranges; or to the cumulus, the lowest ranges—seems to move slowly along the sky if it moves at all. But many of the clouds go at a speed that a vestibule-limited lightning express train would seem lethargic, so swift is the chariot of our God; yea, swifter than the storm, swifter than the light. Yet a child ten years old has been known to reach up, and with the hand of prayer take the courser of that chariot by the bit and slow it up, or stop it, or turn it aside, or turn it back. The boy Samuel stopped it. Elijah stopped it. Hezekiah stopped it. Daniel stopped it. Joshua stopped it. Esther stopped it. Ruth stopped it. Hannah stopped it. Mary stopped it. My father stopped it. My mother stopped it. My sister stopped it. We have in our Sabbath-schools children who again and again and again have stopped it.

Notice that these old-time chariots, which my text uses for symbol, had what we would call a high dash-board at the front, but were open behind. And the king would stand at the dash-board and drive with his own hands. And I am glad that He, whose chariot the clouds are,

Drives Himself.

He does not let natural law drive, for natural law is deaf. He does not let fate drive, for fate is merciless. But our Father King drives Himself, and He puts His loving hand on the reins of the flying coursers, and He has a loving ear open to the cry of all who want to catch His attention. Oh, I am so glad that my Father drives, and never drives too fast, and never drives too slow, and never drives off the precipice, and that He controls by a bit that never breaks, the wildest and most raging circumstances. I heard of a ship captain who put out with his vessel with a large number of passengers from Buffalo, on Lake Erie, very early in the season and while there was much ice. When they were well out, the captain saw, to his horror, that the ice was closing in on him from all sides, and he saw no way out from destruction and death. He called into the cabin the passengers, and all the crew that could be spared from their posts, and told them that the ship must be lost unless God interposed, and although he was not a Christian man, he said: "Let us pray," and they all knelt

Asking God to Come for their deliverance. They went back to the deck, and the man at the wheel shouted: "All right, cap'n, it's blowing nor' by nor'west, now." While the prayer was going on in the cabin the wind changed and blew the ice out of the way. The mate asked: "Shall I put on more sail, cap'n?" "No!" responded the captain. "Don't touch her. Some one else is managing this ship." Oh, men and women, shut in all sides by icy troubles and misfortunes, in earnest prayer put all your affairs in the hands of God. You will come out all right. Some one else is Managing the Ship!

It did not merely happen so that when Leyden was besieged, and the Duke of Alva felt sure of his triumph, suddenly the wind turned, and the swollen waters compelled him to stop the siege, and the city was saved. God that night drove along the coast of the Netherlands in a black chariot of storm-cloud. It did not merely happen so that Luther rose from the place where he was sitting just in time to keep from being crushed by a stone that the instant after fell on the very spot. Had he not escaped where would have been the Reformation? It did not merely happen so that Columbus was saved from drowning by an oar that was floating on the waters. Otherwise, who would have unveiled America? It did not merely happen so that when George Washington was in Brooklyn a great fog settled down over all the place where this church stands, and over all this end of Long Island, and that under that fog he and his army escaped from the clutches of Generals Howe and Clinton. In a chariot of mist and cloud the God of American Independence rode along here.

On that pillow of consolation I put down my head to sleep at night. On that solid foundation I build when I see this nation in political paroxysm every four years, not because they care two cents about whether it is high tariff, or low tariff, or no tariff at all, but only whether the Democrats or the Republicans shall have the salaried offices. Yea, when European nations are holding their breath, wondering whether Russia or Germany will launch a war that will incarnadine a continent, I fall back on the Faith that my Father Drives.

Yea, I cast this as an anchor, and plant this as a column of strength, and lift this as a telescope, and build this as a fortress, and propose without any perturbation to launch upon an unknown future triumphant in the fact that my Father drives. Yes, He drives very near. I know that many of the clouds you see in summer are far off, the bases of some of them five miles above the earth. High on the highest peaks of the Andes, travellers have seen clouds far higher than where they were standing. Gay Lussac, after he had risen in a balloon twenty-three thousand feet, saw clouds above him.

But there are clouds that touch the earth and discharge their rain; and, though the clouds out of which God's chariot is made may sometimes be far away, often they are close by, and they touch our shoulders, and our homes, and they touch us all over. I have read of in two different chariots of clouds, and of another that He will take. One day, in a chariot of clouds that were a mingling of fog and smoke and fire, God drove down to the top of a terrible crag fifteen hundred feet high, now called Jebel-Musa, then called Mount Sinai, and He stepped out of His chariot among the split shelvings of rock. The mountain shook as with an ague, and there were ten volleys of thunder, each of the ten emphasizing a tremendous "Thou shalt," or "Thou shalt not." Then the Lord resumed His chariot of cloud and drove up the hills of heaven. They were dark and portentous clouds that made that chariot at the giving of the law. But one day He took another ride, and this time down to Mount Tabor; the clouds out of which His chariot was made, bright clouds, roseate clouds, illumined clouds, and music rained from all of them, and the music was a mingling of carol and chant and triumphal march: "This is My beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." Transfiguration chariot!

Two Rides that the Lord Took

"Oh," say hundreds of you, "I wish I could have seen those chariots—the black one that brought the Lord to Jebel-Musa, at the giving of the law, and he white one that brought Him down to Tabor!" Never mind, you will see something grander than that, and it will be a mightier mingling of the sombre and the radiant, and the pomp of it will be such that the chariots in which Trajan and Diocletian and Zenobia and Cæsar and Alexander and all the conquerors of all the ages rode will be unworthy of mention; and what stirs me the most is, that when He comes in that chariot of cloud and goes back, He will ask you and me to ride with Him both ways. How do I know that will be made out of clouds? Revelation 1:7: "Behold He cometh with clouds." Oh, He will not then ride through the heavens alone as He does now. He is going to bring along with Him escort of ten full regiments. Inspiration says: "Behold the Lord cometh with ten thousand of His saints." But these figures simply mean that there will be a great throng. And as we shall probably, through the atonement of Christ, be in heaven before that, I hope that we can come down in that escort of chariot. Christ in the centre chariot, but chariots before Him to clear the way, and chariots behind Him, and chariots on either side of Him. Perhaps the prophets and patriarchs of the old dispensation may ride ahead, each one charioted—Abraham and Moses and Ezekiel and David and Joshua, who foretold His first coming. On either side of the central chariot apostles and martyrs, who, in the same or approximate centuries suffered for Him—Paul, Stephen and Ignatius and Polycarp and Justin Martyr, and multitudes who went up in chariot of fire, now coming in chariot of cloud, while in the rear of the central chariot shall be the multitudes of later days and of our own time, who have tried to serve the Lord—ourselves, I hope, among them. "Behold the Lord cometh, with ten thousand of His saints."

The Judgment Chariot

Yes; although all unworthy of such companionship, we want to come with Him on that day to see the last of this old world which was once our residence. Coming through the skies, myriads of chariots rolling on and rolling down. By that time

How Changed this World will Be!

Its deserts all flowers, its rocks all mossed and lichened, its poor-houses all palaces, its sorrows all joys, its sins all virtues, and in the same pasture-field lion and calf, and on the same perch hawk and dove. Now the chariots of cloud strike the earth, filling all the valleys and covering all the mountain-sides, and halting in all the cemeteries and graveyards, and over the waters deep, where the dead sleep in coral sarcophagus. A loud blast of the Resurrection, trumpet is given, and the bodies of the dead rise and join the spirits from which they have long been separated. Then Christ our King, rising in the centre chariot of cloud, with his scarred hands waves the signal, and the chariots wheel and come into line for glorious ascent. Drive on! Drive up! Chariots of cloud ahead of the King, chariots of cloud on either side of the King, chariots of clouds following the King. Upward and apast starry hosts, and through immensities, and across infinitudes, higher, higher, higher, unto the gates, the shining gates. Lift up your heads, ye Everlasting Gates! for Him who maketh the clouds His chariot, and who, through uplifting grace, invites us to mount and ride with Him!

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman (London), edited by the Rev. M. Baxter, may be had from the office of this journal, 63 Bible House, New York; price six cents, including postage. Annual subscription, seventy cents. The following articles, among others, are contained in the number for September:

The Nineteenth Century in the Light of Prophecy.
The Signs of the Coming of the Son of Man.
A Sermon on Christ's Second Coming.
Daniel's Seventh Chapter: The Four Wild Beasts.
Only One "Abomination of Desolation."
The Fulfilment of Prophecy. By Frederick S. Gervis.
The Children of Light. By H. Meymott.
The Millennium Far from a Perfect State.
Graven Images: What the Bible Says About Them.
The Seven Trumpets Explained in their past Year-day Historical Fulfilment.
Passing Events Viewed from a Prophetic Standpoint.

A DEMONIAC AT A CAMP-MEETING.

An incident which, we believe, has never been published, was recently described in a New York pulpit by a clergyman who witnessed it. He states that, five years ago, he attended a camp-meeting about forty miles west of Chicago. An unusual solemnity pervaded the assembly, and the preachers were filled with the Spirit and with power. One sermon especially moved the crowd which listened to it. The preacher was a young man of remarkable mental gifts, whose handsome features and ready wit had once made him a favorite in worldly society.

After the service a large number of anxious seekers after salvation gathered near the platform, and the preacher went from one to another, answering questions and quoting God's promises to the repentant sinner. He came to one lady, richly dressed and of singularly attractive countenance. She whispered something to him, and the servant of God started back in horror, as if a snake had darted upon him. "Madam," he said, "God will surely send you to perdition!" and then he moved quickly away. The lady was a Norwegian, who a short time before had connected herself with a Methodist congregation in Chicago. The preacher's sermon had been lost upon her, but his appearance had kindled in her wicked heart lustful passions, to which she had long been a slave. The preacher's solemn reply to her abominable suggestion made her quail, and she rose and hurriedly left the meeting.

Shortly before the gathering separated, the woman returned, her face a never-to-be-forgotten embodiment of terror. It was ghastly in its pallor, and in the strange, unearthly light, that blazed in her staring eyeballs.

"What Was it He Said?"

she cried. "Oh, it is true! Hell yawns to receive me! I am lost! lost!" Kind Christian ladies gathered around the agitated woman, and attempted to make her understand that God's mercy in Christ was unbounded, and that the blood of Jesus cleansed from all sin. But the woman's agony was not relieved. Her cries continued, and, as if the very powers of the evil one already held her, she shook with appalling distress. One and another of the preachers came, and realized that in such a case human speech was vain. Only God Himself could relieve the agony of conviction which His Spirit had awakened. All knelt in prayer, the horror-stricken woman in the centre of a circle of pleading Christians. It was about 7 o'clock in the evening, and the scene drew a crowd of sympathetic spectators. Not for long, however. The horror of the struggle sent them away, overcome. It was as if Satan himself held possession of the woman and refused to depart. Spasmodically, as though struggling against a power trying to compel silence, she uttered and self-accusations. She said that she was a woman living on vice, that she was an inmate of a well-known disorderly house in Chicago. Her prey had been men of high character, and she had frequented churches to get acquainted with them, had fascinated them, got them in her power, and then blackmailed them. Was it possible such a sin could be forgiven? But there was worse. Some awful crime struggled for confession. A terrible conflict was going on. The woman's face was distorted, and perspiration and tears rendered her comely features repulsive as she knelt on the ground, now almost prostrate, now raising herself and sitting back on her heels and bending wild, distracted eyes on those who were telling her of Christ and pardon. "I must tell!" she cried, in agony. Then the faces of all around her were blanched as she told how that she had a child, that it became an intolerable burden to her, and how, finally, she and another woman had taken the babe to the lake one night and had drowned it. She bent forward as she revealed her awful secret, her eyes fixed on the ground. More than four hours had passed since she first knelt there, and her mental suffering had been so fierce and protracted that strong men had broken down in witnessing it, and it seemed as if the woman must die in the struggle. It was

Fearful Confessions

A Strange, Weird Scene.

All around nature lay calm, beautiful, peaceful in the still midnight of the country. There was a dark background of forest trees, and away, undulating under the placid light of the moon, the wide plain clad in summer verdure. But there was no corresponding calm in the group of anxious, sympathizing, compassionate men and women, watching the conflict of the human being who, so long the slave and instrument of Satan, working his will, ever bringing new and noble victims to his prison-house, was struggling to break from his power, and to serve him no more. The spectators thought of that scene in the gospels (Mark 9 : 26), when the spirit rent the demoniac sore, "and he was as one dead, insomuch that many said he is dead."

Piercing screams rent the air after the woman had uttered the last appalling confession. She declared that she saw the abode of the lost open before her, that Satan was dragging her down to torment there, and besought those near her to hold, to save her. Their powerlessness seemed to be borne in upon her mind, and looking up to the deep summer sky above her, she cried out in piteous entreaty:

"O Jesus, Save Me!"

It was scarcely a human face that she raised to heaven. The agony of the conflict, the fierce passion with which it had been waged within her, had distorted her features until the countenance was tigerish, almost devilish, in its ferocity and desperation. Only for a minute was that face seen. As when the Master said to the storm-tossed sea, "Peace be still, and there was a great calm," so over that upturned face came a heavenly peace. The passion, the terror, the despair, faded out of it, and in their place came the sweetest, softest, most placid expression of rest in Christ. The conflict, which had continued from 7 o'clock until after midnight, was at an end. The victory was won. Satan was cast out, and his poor victim, weak and exhausted, but full of joy unspeakable, was resting in the arms of her Deliverer.

Among the successful Christian workers in Chicago, there is not one now so much used of God in rescuing the fallen and despairing, as the woman thus delivered on that camp-meeting ground five years ago. In the haunts of vice, in the prisons, and in the dens of infamy of the city, she points men and women to Christ and tells them of His power to deliver. "Her sins, which were many, are forgiven, and she loves much."

REV. W. F. RE QUA'S WORK.

In an encouraging, cheerful letter about his work, received last week, Mr. Re Qua informs us that he has received an invitation from a chief of the Sac and Fox Indians to visit the tribe and hold meetings. The Indian who forwarded the invitation said that if the time could be fixed, word would be sent to all scattered members of the tribe, and a large number would gladly attend. This is a door unexpectedly opened to Mr. Re Qua of which he will not be slow to avail himself.

At the time of writing, he and his devoted wife were setting out in their wagon, with tent and baggage, to hold meetings sixty miles away. The call there stated that no missionaries had been there, and that the prospect of good meetings was bright. Mr. Re Qua earnestly desires the prayers of our readers that these meetings may be blessed of God to the the conversion of many benighted souls.

Consecrated Corn

is one of the sources from which this self-denying missionary and his wife derive help in their home in the Indian Territory. They live from day to day with no regular income; but God, in whom they trust, alone knows their needs, and has hitherto never suffered them to want. Among the cheering letters which have reached them is one from a good brother at Eau Claire, Wis., who says that he earnestly desires the spread of the gospel among the Indians, who, living in the midst of a Christian nation, ought not now to be in a condition of heathenism. As he cannot himself preach the gospel to them he feels it his duty to help those who are doing so. He has, therefore, set apart a field of corn, the produce of which will be always devoted to the support of Mr. Re Qua's work. He authorizes the missionary also to purchase on the installment plan the portable organ of which he has been so long in need, and promises to remit the payments regularly. This is an encouragement to the missionary in his work. Hardship and toil he expected when he entered upon it, and he has found them in abundance; but God has raised him up many friends whose gifts and sympathy have greatly helped him. His address is, Rev. W. F. Re Qua, McAlister, Ind. Ter.

MR. GEORGE MULLER IN NEW ZEALAND.

A private letter from Auckland, dated July 16, 1888, gives incidentally intelligence of the movements of this venerable servant of God, now eighty-three years old. In the course of his letter the writer says: "Since I last wrote we have had a long visit from dear Mr. Müller. The Lord's people generally have benefited much from his ministrations. He was particularly happy in the choice of his subjects; this has tended greatly to confirm the tottering faith of some in Auckland, especially on points like 'the larger hope,' 'conditional immortality,' and other forms of error, which have been rife here of late. He spoke out also in no uncertain sound upon the doctrine of 'the higher Christian life,' which you will remember had been taken up so enthusiastically by some here. Mr. Müller put it upon a firm Scriptural basis, but I do not know if he reached that particular section of the community. At his meetings in the City Hall every school of thought was represented. One could see Jews, sceptics, and, indeed, all classes of the people, both religious and irreligious. A prominent Christian gentleman told me how greatly he had benefited, and how deeply grateful he was to dear Mr. Müller for his help. Our mutual friend, Rev. ——, also got a lift, although he was away from Auckland the greater part of the time. Mr. Müller is now in Sydney, and proceeds thence via Melbourne and Colombo to Burmah."

AN AGED BUDDHIST'S IDOLS.

In a recent letter from Miss Reuter, of the China Inland Mission, who is stationed at Honchau, she relates the following story of the conversion of an aged Buddhist: An elderly gentleman, named Ce'ien, has been several times to the open-air meetings, and listened very attentively. Yesterday he really gave testimony before the people, telling them how true this our doctrine was. This morning he came to see the native pastor Hsi, because he wanted to believe in Jesus, who would save him from hell. He wished to see us, so Pastor Hsi led him in. He told us his story. He has been in six provinces of China, has heard the gospel doctrine in Shanghai, T'ai-yuen and P'ing-yang. Being in business in Shan-tung, he had heard the doctrine there also. In Tung-chau he fell ill with fever, when some Christians saved his life, which he could never forget. When we came to Honchau his hope was to hear of the doctrine, but outsiders prevented him, saying he was an old man and we young, and also that we did not receive poor people. Well, we began some out-door meetings, and he attended them. As Mr. Hsi, spoke, he said, his words sank deep into my heart. He has come again and again, and got so convinced of the truth that he dared not put up idols on New Year's Day. He had been a zealous worshipper of Buddha for eighteen years. I asked him what his opinion was about the worship of idols, if it was a sin. He said, I know they are all false, and whenever you like to come to my home we will take them all down. I want to walk in the light. He is fifty-eight years of age.

He has told that his wife's hands were very much swollen one day, since he became a Chris tian, and that he taught her to pray, and they both together asked God to heal her, and that she was healed. He himself was unwell, and could not sleep, but, after praying, he was all right. Some women came in, and, after some conversation, he took down his paper idols and his ancestral tablets, and burned them. As we were talking, he said, I have got something more here, and lifting a door to a shrine, I saw two dressed dolls sitting inside. That's my father and my mother, he said; I will bring them also and burn them! I had to promise the women to come again and teach them more. As we knelt to pray, the old man asked God to help him to break off his opium-smoking, and forgive him his sins. Leaving his house, we were almost forced into another, so anxious were the people to learn of Christ.

THE ANGEL'S MESSAGE TO DANIEL.

By Geo. H. Pember, M. A.*

A Crisis in Jewish History—Daniel's Perplexity—His Recourse to Prayer and Fasting—An Angel Sent to Explain—He Reveals the Period of Testing—Sixty-nine Weeks of Years—Then the Prince to Appear—The Exact Fulfilment—Prophetic Time Suspended—The Seventieth Week Yet Future.

In the fourth year of the reign of Jehoiakim, just before Nebuchadnezzar came to Jerusalem for the first time, God foretold the impending trouble by the mouth of Jeremiah, and also set His limit to it. Judah should be a desolation, and should serve the king of Babylon seventy years; at the close of which time Babylon should be punished, and the land of the Chaldeans destroyed. (Jer. 25: 8–14.) The prophet did not, however, add anything respecting the restoration of his countrymen.

But shortly after the departure of the second band of captives—Jehoiachin and those who were taken with him—the false prophet Hananiah declared that within the space of two years the Lord would break the yoke of Nebuchadnezzar from off the neck of all nations, and bring back to Jerusalem the vessels of the Lord's house which had been carried away to Babylon. (Jer. 28: 10–17.) The same strain was taken up among the captives by Ahab, the son of Kolaiah, and Zedekiah, the son of Maaseiah: the hope of the exiles was raised, and many of them contemplated an immediate return to Judea.

But this was forbidden by a letter from Jeremiah, who directed them to settle in Babylonia, since God would have them to do so until the end of the seventy years, and would then visit them, and permit them to return to their own country. (Jer. 29: 4–11.) Apparently the people obeyed and remained where they were.

At last, however, the empire of the Chaldeans fell, and in the first year of the reign of Darius the Mede, Daniel, who had been promoted to the place of prime minister, became perplexed and anxious, probably from A Twofold Cause.

He had carefully studied the prophecies of Jeremiah, and found that permission had been given to return to Jerusalem within two years from that time; for it was then about the sixty-ninth year of the captivity. Yet when he considered the disposition of his people, he saw that their exile had not led them back to God, that they were not chastened and humbled by affliction, and were, therefore, by no means in a condition to receive mercy at the hand of the Lord.

And again, he was well aware that there would be a gathering of all Israel from the nations among which they had been scattered, when the Messiah would rule over them in their own country; and he seems to have looked upon this grand restoration as identical with the return at the end of the Seventy Years. Hence a great perplexity; for he knew by former revelations that four Gentile empires must run their course before the sovereignty could be transferred to Israel. And as yet only one of these had fallen; there were still three to fulfil their destiny, and the last of them must pass through three phases; while for all these great events there remained but a little more than one year!

Such seems to have been Daniel's perplexity, and he was quite unable to solve the enigma. His procedure was, however, characteristic. The difficulty in regard to the empires he left, not doubting that God would find a way to accomplish His own purpose; but remembering that, in the terrible prediction of Moses respecting the captivity (Levit. 26: 40–46), confession is mentioned as that which will cause the Lord to return to His people, he set his face unto the Lord God, to seek by prayer and supplication, with fasting and sackcloth and ashes, and made humble confession for himself and his people, earnestly entreating the Lord to turn away His anger and fury from them and from Jerusalem.

An answer was speedily vouchsafed to the prophet. While he was yet speaking, his prayer was interrupted by a gentle touch, and looking round, he saw the man Gabriel, who had interpreted his previous vision, again standing near him. This heavenly messenger had been despatched from the Throne to assure the greatly beloved one that his petition had been heard, and should ultimately be granted. Thus the prayer of the prophet opened a channel of blessing and called forth of the Seventy Weeks, upon which all other prophecy appears to hinge, and without a clear knowledge of which it seems vain to attempt to understand anything.

The Great Revelation

The meaning of the angel seems to be—The seventy years of probation will not suffice; nay, after them must come seven times seventy other years. The passage is literally "seventy sevens." The word week is retained because we have no exact equivalent for the Hebrew original, which signifies a period of seven, but does not decide whether the seven are hours, days, months, years, or any other measure of time. That point must always be determined by the context; and in the present passage periods of seven years each are doubtless intended, because Daniel's mind is dwelling on the years of Jeremiah.

The four hundred and ninety years of God's pleading with His people were to produce six results: (1) To shut up the transgression; (2) To seal up sins; (3) To cover iniquity; (4) To bring in everlasting righteousness; (5) To seal up vision and prophet; (6) To anoint a Holy of Holies. Such, then, will be the results of God's dealing with the Jews, at the close of the Four Hundred and Ninety Years.

The appointed time for

The Commencement

of these four hundred and ninety years would be the going forth of a command to restore and build Jerusalem. From this date until the appearance of an Anointed One, who should also be a Prince—that is a Royal Priest—Seven weeks, and sixty and two weeks were to elapse; or in other words, there should be forty-nine and four hundred and thirty-four or four hundred and eighty-three years between the edict and the coming of Messiah as a Prince.

The Anointed One, who should also be a Prince can be none other than the Lord Jesus. But at what period of our Lord's life can He be said to have presented Himself as Priest and King? Not at His birth: for He was then only known as the carpenter's son. Not during the greater part of His ministry: for, although He was anointed by the Spirit, and quickly revealed Himself as the great Priest by teaching the people, by cleansing lepers, and by forgiving sins, He, nevertheless, would not put Himself forward as King. On the contrary, He forbade His disciples to disclose His real nature; and when the crowd, excited to enthusiasm by His wonderous words and works, would have set the crown upon His head, He refused.

But at His entry into Jerusalem, four days before His death, His manner changed, and He suffered the whole multitude which followed Him to break forth into the cry;—"Blessed be the King that cometh in the name of the Lord." And when the Pharisees urged Him to rebuke His disciples, He replied;—"I tell you that, if these should hold their peace, the stones would immediately cry out." In other words, He chose at that time to have Himself openly proclaimed King, and Matthew informs us that He did so to fulfil the prophecy of Zechariah: "Tell ye the daughter of Zion, Behold, thy King cometh unto thee, meek, and sitting upon an ass, and a colt the foal of an ass." This prophecy reveals the significance of the event, and shows us that the day indicated was that of the appearing of Messiah as the Prince.

Thus, then, the commencing-point of the Four Hundred and Ninety Years was the promulgation of the edict in the month of Nisan of the twentieth year of the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus; and the Four Hundred and Eighty-third Year ended on the tenth day of the month Nisan, when Christ entered Jerusalem as the King of the daughter of Zion. Both starting-point and goal are so clearly indicated in Scripture that, as believers, we have no need to trouble ourselves with the uncertainties of human computation, but may at once assume that the interval was exactly four hundred and eighty-three years.

At this point it seems there is a gap separating the sixty-ninth from the Four Hundred and Eighty-third Year from the last Seven. For God had given up the sinful nation which rejected His Son: His covenant was suspended, so that they were no longer His people: and, consequently, the course of the Four Hundred and Ninety Years had ceased to run on.

The Seventieth Week—

We thus find that there has now been for more than eighteen hundred years an entire cessation of God's dealing with the Jews as a nation. A great gap extends from Messiah the Prince to the false prince that shall come; from the good Shepherd, Whom the flock abhorred and rejected, to the idol shepherd, whom the majority of them will follow to their own destruction; from Him Who came in His Father's name, to that other, who shall come in his own name.

And during the interval between the true Messiah and the false, Hebrew prophecy is almost entirely in abeyance, and there remain in present operation only one or two fearful utterances which stretch, as it were, here and there across the whole width of the chasm. The knowledge of this fact is indispensable to a right understanding of prophecy; for events connected with the two great but now widely separated eras are often mentioned together, even in the same sentence. Nor is there any confusion in such an arrangement: for had the Jews received Christ at His first coming, John the Baptist would have been Elijah to them, the last Seven Years would have followed immediately, and then the kingdom would have been restored to Israel. But the unbelief of the Jews separated those things which might have been joined together, and, consequently, the marvellous events of the last Week have not yet begun to take place.

* From the third edition of his invaluable work entitled "The Great Prophecies Concerning the Jews, the Gentiles, and the Church of God." It is written in a most popular and eloquent style, and describes the impending fulfilment of Revelation and Daniel, and is illustrated by a colored chart. 458 pages. For sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York. Price, including postage, $1.

New Edition of Rev. M. Baxter's Pamphlets.

THREE PAMPHLETS IN ONE

1. Coming Wars from 1888 to 1891, and Translation of 144,000 living Christians on March 5, 1896, before the 3½ years' persecution by Napoleon, etc.

2. Twenty Predictions about Coming Wars, by Twenty Learned Expositors.

3. End of this Age by the Descent of Christ in Passover Week, April, 1901, being 45 years from the Crimean War Treaty of Peace in Passover Week, April, 1856, and 2,345 years from Passover Week, April, B. C. 444-5, as shown by Daniel's Dates.

The Three Pamphlets in an Illuminated Cover, 144 Pages, postage included,

Price Twenty Cents.

For sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-Class Matter.

EVERY NUMBER CONTAINS:

The Portrait and Biography of some eminent person.
The Sermon Dr. Talmage preached the last Sunday morning.
An Exposition of Unfulfilled Prophecy.
A Summary of the Events of the Week, Notes of Religious and Temperance Movements, etc.
A Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, of London, from advance sheets sent by special arrangement.
Pictures of Missionary Life, etc., and Descriptive Articles.
An instalment of a Serial Story.
An Exposition of the International Sunday-School Lesson, by Mrs. M. Baxter.

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION, $1.50.

Single Copies, Price Three Cents, may be obtained by order of any Newsdealer.

NOTICE.

A concession in price will be made to subscribers desiring to introduce THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to ministers, evangelists, or personal friends. It will be mailed regularly every week to any address in the United States or Canada, from September 20 to the end of the year 1888, for twenty-five cents. Address The Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Senate Substitute for the Mills Tariff Bill has at length been reported by the subcommittee to the full committee on Finance. Mr. Allison, Mr. Aldrich, and Mr. Jones of Nevada, are credited with having done the bulk of the work upon it. The reduction which its provisions would effect is estimated at sixty-five millions. The additions to the free list are principally chemicals, with a few raw materials, such as manila, sisal grass, and jute. The largest item of the total reduction is fifty per cent. in the sugar duties. Next to this, and nearly as large an amount, is due to an entire repeal of the tobacco tax. The Republicans, however, are not united on this provision of the bill, and if it is not changed in committee, an effort to modify it will be made in the Senate. A number of Senators believe that cigars, cigarettes, and cheroots should not be left untaxed. The sub-committee itself is not certain that the whole tobacco tax should be repealed, although it is so provided in the bill as it stands. The next largest item of reduction is from $5,000,000 to $6,000,000, taken off by putting alcohol for use in the fine arts on the free list. The duty on higher grades of wool is increased one cent per pound. That on tin plates, which it was expected would be raised, has not been changed. The bill may undergo changes before it reaches the Senate, as an effort is to be made to have it perfectly satisfactory to every Republican Senator before it is reported, in order to avoid discussion in the Senate. At present it would not have the cordial support of the whole party.

A Slight Improvement in the Reports from the yellow fever district was noted last week. There was but little decrease in the figures from Jacksonville, Fla., each day, but the cases were of a milder type, and a more hopeful feeling was said to prevail. Each day, however, there were more than a hundred new cases, and on Tuesday the number reached 143. There were only four deaths on that day however, and the highest number on any day of the week was ten. The reports at the close of the week showed that about 2,500 cases in all had been under treatment, and the total number of deaths under 250. Liberal contributions flow into the city from all quarters. They are distributed with as much care as possible, but it is found that many families who really need help do not get it, through their reluctance to push their way through a greedy crowd which besieges the relief bureau. Reporters describe the city as greatly changed. Business is suspended, and an intense stillness prevails, as if it were a city of the dead. The Marine Hospital corps has gone to the relief of the local physicians by taking charge of the principal hospital, and several army surgeons have volunteered for service there. The panic at Decatur, Ala., and Jackson, Miss., has considerably abated, though large numbers quitted the city and have not returned. No new cases are reported in either place. At Ocala, Gainesville, and Fernandina the sick are recovering, and the new cases are of a mild type.

The Nomination of Mr. John H. Oberly as Commissioner of Indian Affairs was sent to the Senate last week by the President. Mr. Oberly held the office of Superintendent of Indian Schools before entering the Civil Service Commission, and it is reported that his experience led him to take a deep personal interest in the solution of the Indian problem. His nomination will, therefore, be personally gratifying to himself, as it will give him opportunities for applying principles to the Indian difficulty which thought and experience have led him to adopt. What these principles are the public do not know, but we may sincerely hope that he will be wisely guided. The Indians have suffered so long from mismanagement, and blunders of many kinds, that a truly intelligent and just policy is sorely needed by the much-injured race. Mr. Oberly's place on the Civil Service Commission will not easily be filled. The man needed for it should be in hearty sympathy with the law, with faith in its usefulness. Such a man it will be difficult to find in the ranks of the class from among which office-holders are usually chosen.

A Decisive Lesson to Mormon Agents was administered last week by the Collector of the Port, in New York. The steamship Wisconsin, which arrived on September 25, had among her passengers fifteen little girls, whose ages ranged from four to twelve years, who were in charge of two Mormon elders. They had no money, and only two of them had friends in this country. In that case the friend was a grandmother, and there was no evidence that she was able to support them. Beside the little girls were a man and his wife, with two sons of weak intellect, and two girls. The man had thirty-one dollars in all, and was fifty-five years of age. They were all going through to Utah, and admitted that they did not know who defrayed the expenses of their passage to this country. The superintendent communicated the facts to the Collector, who promptly ordered the owners of the Wisconsin to take the whole party back to England. It may be hoped that the lesson will not be lost upon the Mormons, who of late have grown bold and reckless in evading the law.

The Publication of Extracts from the Diary of the late Emperor of Germany has caused much excitement in the Empire and throughout Europe. Prince Bismarck declares the extracts inaccurate, and has asked the Emperor's permission to prosecute the firm which published them. There are, however, many circumstances which tend to prove the extracts authentic. It is believed that they were given to the press by Baron Roggenbach, the Baden statesman, who was an intimate friend of the late Emperor and was frequently with him during his illness at San Remo. One of the important disclosures made in the diary is the Emperor Frederick's assertion that during the negotiations at Versailles it was proposed to proclaim as King of France Leopold II., King of the Belgians. M. Thiers said he would favor the scheme if it implied a union of Belgium and France. The diary does not state the reason for the abandonment of the proposal, but the French people will accurately surmise that Prince Bismarck's project to create a Franco-Belgian monarchy implied the disruption of France into several States, and the acquisition by Belgium of the northern provinces. Many interesting incidents are related which throw light on the late Emperor's personal character. Among them is a conversation with a French colonel, a prisoner, who had said, "We have lost everything." Frederick replied: "You are wrong in saying that. You have not lost everything; having fought like brave soldiers, you have not lost your honor." It would appear from the diary that the Emperor, had he lived, would have kept his pledges to the Liberals, who consented to let the unification of Germany take precedence over the development of constitutional liberty.

Marshal Bazaine, the Famous French General died in Madrid on September 23. The general was in exile. During the Franco German war of 1870, he took refuge in Metz, where he was surrounded by the German forces under Prince Frederick Charles. After a siege of seven weeks he surrendered with 180,000 men. His countrymen not unreasonably thought that with a little courage and skill Bazaine might, with so large a force, and with so impregnable a fortress as Metz for his base, have fought his way through. After the conclusion of peace, he was charged with treason, tried by court-martial and condemned to death. President MacMahon commuted the sentence to twenty years' imprisonment. After a few months confinement the general succeeded in making his escape. He went to England, and subsequently to Spain, where he spent the last four years of his life. Bazaine was seventy-seven years of age. It was he who conducted the French expedition to Mexico, and placed Maximilian on the throne.

Turkey and Greece are Disturbed Over a fishery difficulty resembling the Canadian trouble. Turkey has seized a vessel which was fishing for sponges in the Ægean Sea under the Greek flag. Greece promptly demanded reparation, which Turkey has refused. Now Greece has ordered her fleet to get up a hostile demonstration among the islands where the Greek flag had been insulted, and to seize upon the first opportunity of capturing something worth taking. The Greek navy is no powerful fleet, but the fact of the little nation so boldly bidding defiance to Turkey, leads European diplomats to infer that she has the promise of help from Germany, if affairs reach a crisis.

Anxiety About the Fate of Mr. Henry M. Stanley continues unabated. Some slight encouragement to hope for his safety is however afforded by Farran, who was formerly Mr. Stanley's interpreter. He returned to Europe last week, and he confirms the rumors of Major Barttelot's imperious disposition, which may have led to his murder. This it may be hoped was really the cause, as, if he died through the treachery of Tippoo Tib, it is probable that the same treachery may have been fatal to Stanley. Farran left Aruwhimi on account of illness, three days before Major Barttelot started on his fatal journey. He tells many stories of Barttelot's hot temper and the brutality shown by him to the natives, and says he expected that Barttelot would be killed. Stanley, he says, insisted upon the natives being kindly treated. The acts of brutality began soon after Stanley left. Farran believes that Stanley reached Emin Pasha, but he admits that the anxiety felt concerning the explorer is justified. Tippoo Tib, he says, hated Barttelot and, therefore, obstructed the progress of the expedition. King Leopold will send Lieutenant Becker to the Congo to organize a strong expedition to search for Stanley.

A Remarkable Illustration of the Evils of the sweating system has come to light in England. In the course of the Parliamentary inquiry into the causes of pauperism, it was disclosed that even the contractors who supply the Queen and her household are guilty of grinding the faces of their employes. It was shown that the magnificent embroidery of her Majesty's carriage cushions had been worked by a cripple, living in a garret and paid barely sufficient to keep off starvation.

Very Liberal Terms are Offered to any Person canvassing for subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Sample copies will be sent, postage paid, on application from any one desiring to undertake the work. Ministers and others will find it easy to obtain subscriptions. Send postal card for terms, and state number of sample copies required. Address The Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

The Rev. A. B. Simpson Announces that the fth annual Convention for Christian Truth, ife, and Work, and Divine Healing will be eld October 7 to 15, in Standard Hall, on Broadway and Forty-second Street, New York. The first sessions will be given to teachings conected with spiritual life, followed on Thursday nd Friday by the subject of Divine Healing. aturday and the closing Sabbath will be deoted to the great theme of practical consecraion, with special reference to Christian Work nd Missions. The last Monday forenoon will e spent in parting greetings and testimonies. The subject of the Lord's Coming will be also ully presented. Several missionaries are exected to go out from this meeting to Africa, ndia, and China. Delegates and others intending to attend the Convention may obtain particulars as to board, etc., by communicating with Rev. A. E. Funk, No. 254 West Fifty-fifth treet, New York. The Rev. A. B. Simpson's ongregation will occupy Standard Hall on Sunlays until the new church building on Eighth Avenue and Forty-fourth Street is ready for use. t is to cost, including site, $178,000, and will inlude a College Home and a new Berachah Home.

The Government Indian Training-School at Carlisle, Pa., has sent out this year about eventy-five children who have spent five or nore years at this institution. They were sent o their homes, though many would have preerred to remain in the East. Some went to Montana, some to Idaho, others to Arizona, New Mexico, Indian Territory, Nebraska, and Dakota, representing fifteen different Indian gencies. This party of Indian youth is beeved by the teachers to be the brightest rowd of boys and girls ever sent out by this chool. So much confidence was placed in hem that they were allowed to return to their Western homes without an escort, something ever before done in the history of the school. The party consisted of thirty-five large boys, ix small ones, and twenty-one girls.

Prize Suits for Convicts have been Introducd in the Michigan State Penitentiary. A new Warden took charge of the Institution a few months ago, and had the convicts clad in the ideous striped clothing used in New York and ther States. The object of the regulation was o identify the convicts about the prison, and o make them so conspicuous that if they escaped they would be easily recognized and recapured. The change was bitterly resented by the onvicts, but they were obliged to submit. Recently, however, they prepared and presented petition to the prison authorities, proposing a ew system of merit. They asked that any nan who signed a written pledge of good beavior, promising to obey the prison regula ions in letter and spirit, and kept his pledge or six months, should be entitled to wear the ld plain gray suit until he forfeited it by misonduct. Their petition was granted, and the hange in the behavior of the prisoners has een very marked. About eighty per cent. of ne convicts signed the pledge, and are earnestly ying to win the right to wear the coveted suits. Happily for the sinner, he does not have to go hrough such a period of probation before he is othed with the robe of Christ's righteousness. He obtains that, not by merit, but by the free ift of God, and with it the power of the new fe. (Rom. 4 :4. 5.)

A Method of Exterminating Yellow Fever icrobes is said to have been discovered by Mr. dison, the electrician. A New York daily ournal states that during the past three weeks Mr. Edison has given his exclusive attention to xperiments suggested by the terrible visitation Jacksonville, Fla. His object was to discover me cheap and effective way of lowering the mperature of an infected house to a degree in hich the microbe could not live, and also at he same time to get rid of the moisture which velops the microbe. He stated to a reporter e results he has reached. He found that gasone causes an evaporation that destroys the ater in vegetable and organic matter, and the microbe must belong to one of the two kingdoms. Caustic soda has the same effect on wet earth. Rhigolene he found effective in reducing the temperature. Mr. Edison states that on applying rhigoline to a coat in a temperature of eighty-two degrees, it fell to twenty-three degrees in fifteen minutes. The cost of the three articles is less than a cent a pound. Mr. Edison thinks that by coating a house with gosoline, or, in extreme cases, with rhigoline, it would be perfectly disinfected, and that the passage of the microbes would be stopped by sprinkling all roads with caustic soda used in a street sprinkler. A small town like Decatur, Ala., could be disinfected by this process for less than $5,000. The principle on which the remedy is based is that the deadly microbes cannot exist where there is neither heat nor moisture. By eliminating these, the germs could have no power. It is so in the spiritual world. When the soul is completely given up to God, and self utterly dead, temptation and sin lose their power, and perish of inanition. (1 John 5: 18.)

A Baby was Carried off by an Eagle in Kansas on September 22. A farmer living near the Cimarron River went to work in the morning, leaving his babe aged two months in charge of a little girl. When he returned for the mid-day meal, he found the girl in a distracted state, crying bitterly. She said that she took the babe into the garden, and having to return to the house for a minute, she left it there. As she was returning she heard a cry, and saw "the child flying away." The farmer knew at once that an eagle had visited his home and carried away his child. He sent around to his neighbors, and a search party was organized. In about an hour the discharge of a gun attracted attention to one point. The searchers hurried thither and found one of the party struggling with a large eagle, which he was trying to kill with the butt-end of his gun, while the bird was using wings and talons vigorously. The eagle was soon lamed by the new-comers and fluttered away to a bush. It was followed and the child was found there; but it was dead and horribly lacerated. The catastrophe will doubtless lead to dwellers in that locality being careful not to expose their children to that peril. It is much to be wished that such watchfulness resulted from the attacks of the great enemy of souls. Parents who see the children of others become his prey, often neglect the only means of protecting their own offspring. (Prov. 22 : 6.)

A Bridal Trip in a Balloon was Taken by a young couple at Providence, R. I., on September 27. The State fair was being held in the Narragansett Park grounds, and an immense concourse of people were present. In the course of the afternoon the news that a wedding was about to take place drew the throng to a spot where a large balloon was tethered. The crowd found the bride and bridegroom in the basket attached to the balloon, and the Rev. E. D. Hall, a Methodist minister, was present to conduct the marriage ceremony. After the words were spoken which made the couple man and wife, the guy ropes were cast off and the balloon rose rapidly and sailed away, the bride and bridegroom waving their farewells to their friends below. Nothing more was seen of them there that day, but at Easton, Mass., about six o'clock a very different scene was witnessed. In a cedar swamp near that place the balloon was being driven by the wind, dragging with it through mud and water the car containing the bridal party. It was carried nearly two miles, the occupants being obliged to cling to the ropes above the basket to keep themselves out of the mud. It was eventually stopped by some spectators, who seized a rope flung out from the balloon, and twisted it around a tree. The eccentricity recently displayed by so many young people in choosing the surroundings of the marriage ceremony implies a lack of appreciation of the solemnity of the occasion, which is confirmed by the records of the divorce courts. This couple especially, may learn from their experience that any exaltation they may attain at the wedding festivities is but temporary. They must return to the miry ways of the earth, when they will need something above them to cling to, to save them from defilement. It may be hoped that they will then be preserved by the only effectual support. (James 1 : 27.)

A Hungarian's Application for Naturalization was refused in Philadelphia last week. He presented himself in Judge Arnold's Court of Common Pleas, and presented his first papers, declaring his intentions. Testimony was given as to his having been in the country the prescribed time, and the applicant satisfactorily answered the questions put to him. The clerk was about to administer the oath of allegiance, when the applicant requested to be allowed to affirm. The judge asked on what ground he objected to take the oath, and the man said that he was an atheist, he "did not believe in a Deity of any kind." "Then I will not naturalize you," said the judge, who was at the moment signing the papers, and stopped abruptly. "We do not want infidels in this country," he continued; "we have more than enough of your kind already." The man retired discomfited, blasphemously expressing his disappointment and disgust. Unless he repents, and is pardoned through Christ, there will come another time when citizenship will be refused him. He will not be an infidel then, for he will have ocular proof that God is; but there will be no place in heaven for him. (Rev. 21 : 8.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Rev. Sam Small is running as candidate on the Prohibition ticket for State Senator from Atlanta. Ga.

The two Episcopal dioceses in Ohio will hold special conventions October 16, for the purpose of electing assistant bishops.

Bishop W. X. Ninde and Bishop Hurst, of the Methodist-Episcopal Church, are among the advocates of the Prohibition National Ticket this year.

A computation of the statistics of the internal revenue department shows that the people of this country spend annually more than $800,000,000 for liquor.

The Rhode Island Annual Convention on Divine Healing will be held in Providence on October 22. The meetings will convene in Rev. C. Ryder's Mission Hall.

A gift of $10,000 has been made by Mrs. M. A Crocker, of San Francisco, to the Young Women's Christian Association of that city, as a nucleus for a building fund.

Remarkably successful revival services are being held at Wellington, Kan., by Rev. H. H. Wells, D. D., formerly evangelist of the Presbyterian Synod of Missouri.

Dr. Wm. M Taylor, of the Broadway Tabernacle, New York has been elected President of the American Missionary Association, to succeed ex-Governor Washburn.

An Icelandic Lutheran Church has been organized in Winnipeg, Manitoba, and a building erected at a cost of $4,000. Winnipeg has two thousand citizens of Icelandic nationality.

A whole village in Brazil has accepted the Gospel, says a Chicago contemporary, through the instrumentality of a young business man, who invited a missionary to that place.

Mr. Harold Brown, of Newport, R. I., has just given $100,000 for the missionary work in the Episcopal Church. It will be used for the endowment of the missionary episcopate of the church.

In one of the cities of Massachusetts, recently, a middle-aged woman was borne to her last resting-place by four pall-bearers, each of whom she had been the means of rescuing from the clutch of strong drink.

The Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church has decided by a vote of 93 to 24 that the ordination of a woman as deacon is in harmony with the New Testament and the constitution of the Apostolic Church.

The success of the publication in Milan of an Italian translation of the Bible in one-cent numbers, has suggested to Ramon Molinas, of Barcelona, the issue of a Spanish translation in the same cheap form. The circulation of the Italian edition is now fifty thousand.

The China Inland Mission, in its annual report for the past year, sets down the number of its stations at 64 in fifteen provinces, with 65 out-stations, 110 chapels, 294 missionaries, 132 helpers, and 2,105 communicants. The number of persons baptized last year was 551. There are 66 organized churches.

The locust plague in Algeria is growing more serious. Sixty thousand laborers and 2,000 soldiers have been utterly unable to keep back the living tide, and the destructive "crickets" blacken the land from Setif to the borders of Tunis. They spread over a surface of about seventy miles, and advanced in black battalions several miles in breadth. The country is completely devastated.

THE CONQUERING WEAPON.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And they overcame him by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony; and they loved not their lives unto the death." Rev. 12:11.

The Characteristics of Satan—His Malignant Power—A Formidable Opponent—Yet Has Been Overcome—I. What Weapon was Used—The Blood of the Lamb Signifying Christ's Death—And Substitution—II. How to Use It—Not for Ornament—Not to Quiet Conscience—To Subdue Sin—The Battle-field in the Heavenlies—The Accuser Vanquished—The Way of Access to God Opened—The Battle-field on Earth—Power to Move Men—The Need of the Time.

WHEREVER evil appears, it is to be fought with by the children of God in the name of Jesus, and in the power of the Holy Ghost. When evil appeared in an angel, straightway there was war in heaven. Evil in mortal men is to be striven against by all regenerate men. If sin comes to us in the form of an angel of light, we must still war with it. If it comes with all manner of deceivableness of unrighteousness, we must not parley for a single moment, but begin the battle forthwith, if indeed we belong to the armies of the Lord. Evil is at its very worst in Satan himself: with him we fight. He is no mean adversary. The evil spirits which are under his control are, any one of them, terrible foes; but when Satan himself personally attacks a Christian, any one of us will be hard put to it.

When this dragon blocks our road, we shall need heavenly aid to force our passage.

A Pitched Battle with Apollyon

may not often occur; but when it does, you will know it painfully: you will record it in your diary as one of the darkest days you have ever lived; and you will eternally praise your God, when you overcome him. Satan is the enemy, the enemy of enemies. That prayer of our Lord's, which we usually render, "Deliver us from evil," has the special significance of "Deliver us from the evil one"; because he is the chief embodiment of evil, and in him evil is intensified, and has come to its highest strength.

In this chapter the devil is called the "great red dragon." He is great in capacity, intelligence, energy, and experience. Whether or not he was the chief of all angels before he fell I do not know. Some have thought that he was such, and that when he heard that a man was to sit upon the throne of God, out of very jealousy he rebelled against the Most High. This also is conjecture. But we do know that he was and is an exceedingly great spirit as compared with us. He is a being great in evil: the prince of darkness, having the power of death. Satan is though he is not a mythical one. We can never doubt his existence if we have once come into conflict with him; yet he is to us all the more real because so mysterious. As a dragon he is full of cunning and ferocity. In him force is allied with craft; and if he cannot achieve his purpose at once by power, he waits his time. He deludes, he deceives; in fact, he is said to deceive the whole world. To this cunning he adds great speed, so that he is quick to assail at any moment, darting down upon us like a hawk upon a poor chick. He is not everywhere present; but it is hard to say where he is not. He cannot be omnipresent; but yet, by that majestic craft of his, he so manages his armies of fallen ones that, like a great general, he superintends the whole field of battle, and seems present at every point. No door can shut him out, no height of piety can rise beyond his reach. He meets us in all our weaknesses, and assails us from every point of the compass. He comes upon us unaware, and gives us wounds which are not easily healed.

A Mysterious Personage

But yet, dear friends, powerful as this infernal spirit certainly must be, his power is defeated when we are resolved never to be at peace with him. According to the text it is said of the saints, "They overcame him." We are never to rest until it is said of us also, "They overcame him." He is a foeman worthy of your steel. Our text brings before us a very important subject for consideration: What is the conquering weapon? With what sword did they fight who have overcome the great red dragon? Listen! "They overcame him by the blood of the Lamb." Secondly, how do we use that weapon? We do as they did who overcame "by the word of their testimony."

I. First, what is this conquering weapon?

They Overcame Him

by "the blood of the Lamb." The blood of the Lamb signifies, first, the death of the Son of God. The sufferings of Jesus Christ might be set forth by some other figure, but His death on the cross requires the mention of blood. Our Lord was not only bruised and smitten, but He was put to death. That death was the grand fact which is set forth by the words "the blood of the Lamb." The moderns cry, "Why not preach more about His life, and less about His death?" I reply, Preach His life as much as you will, but never apart from His death; for it is by His blood that we are redeemed. "We preach Christ." Complete the sentence. "We preach Christ crucified," says the apostle. Ah, yes! there is the point. It is the death of the Son of God which is the conquering weapon. Had He not poured forth His soul unto death, even to the death of the cross—had He not been numbered with the transgressors, and put to a death of shame—we should have had no weapon with which to overcome the dragon prince.

Next, by "the blood of the Lamb" we understand our Lord's death as a substitutionary sacrifice. Let us be very clear here. It is not said that they overcame the arch-enemy by the blood of Jesus, or the blood of Christ, but by the blood of the Lamb; and the words are expressly chosen because, under the figure of a lamb we have set before us a sacrifice. The blood of Jesus Christ, shed because of His courage for the truth, or out of pure philanthropy, or out of self-denial, conveys no special gospel to men, and has no peculiar power about it. Truly it is an example worthy to beget martyrs; but it is not the way of salvation for guilty men. You must make it known that "the chastisement of our peace was upon Him," and that "the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all," or you have not declared the meaning of the blood. Here is

The Hope of Men.

Furthermore, I understand by the expression, "The blood of the Lamb," that our Lord's death was effective in taking away of sin. When John the Baptist first pointed to Jesus, he said, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." Our Lord Jesus has actually taken away sin by His death. Beloved, we are sure that He had offered an acceptable and effectual propitiation when He said, "It is finished." Christ crucified, Christ the sacrifice for sin, Christ the effectual redeemer of men, we will proclaim everywhere, and thus put to rout the powers of darkness.

II. I have shown you the sword; I now come in the second place, to speak to the question,

How do we Use It?

"They overcame him by the blood of the Lamb." When a man gets a sword, you cannot be quite certain how he will use it. A gentleman has purchased a very expensive sword with a golden hilt and an elaborate scabbard; he hangs it up in his hall, and exhibits it to his friends. Occasionally he draws it out from the sheath, and he says. "Feel how keen is the edge!" The precious blood of Jesus is not meant for us merely to admire and exhibit. We must not be content to talk about it, and extol it, and do nothing with it; but we are to use it in the great crusade against unholiness and unrighteousness, till it is said of us, "They overcame him by the blood of the Lamb." This precious blood is to be used for overcoming, and consequently for holy warfare. We dishonor it if we do not use it to that end.

Some, I fear, use the precious blood of Christ only as a quietus to their consciences. They say to themselves, "He made atonement for sin, therefore let me take my rest." This is doing a grievous wrong to the great sacrifice. A man who wants the blood of Jesus for nothing but the mean and selfish reason that, after having been forgiven through it he may say, "Soul, take thine ease; eat, drink, and be merry: hear sermons, enjoy the hope of eternal felicity, and do nothing"—such a man blasphemes the precious blood, and makes it an unholy thing. We are to use the glorious mystery of atoning blood as our chief means of overcoming sin and Satan: its power is for holiness. Oh, my brothers, to some of us atonement by blood is our battle-axe and weapon of war, by which we conquer in our struggle for purity and godliness—a struggle in which we have continued now these many years. By the atoning blood we withstand corruption within and temptation without. This is that weapon which nothing can resist.

The Battle-field.

Let me show you your battle-field. First, you are to regard Satan this day as being already literally and truly overcome through the death of the Lord Jesus. Satan is already a vanquished enemy. By faith grasp your Lord's victory as your own, since He triumphed in your nature and on your behalf. The victory was the victory of all who are in Christ. He is the representative seed of the woman, and you who are of that seed and are in Christ actually and experimentally, you then and there overcame the devil by the blood of the Lamb. Can you get a hold of this truth? Come, my soul, thou hast conquered Satan by thy Lord's victory! Wilt thou not be brave enough to fight a vanquished foe, and trample down the enemy whom thy Lord has already thrust down? Thou needst not be afraid, but say, "Thanks be to God which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

This day I would have you overcome Satan in the heavenlies in another sense: you must Overcome Him as the Accuser.

At times you hear in your heart a voice arousing memory and startling conscience; a voice which seems in heaven to be a remembrance of your guilt. Hark to that deep, croaking voice boding evil! Satan is urging before the throne of justice all your former sins. Things which you had forgotten he cunningly revives. He knows your secret sins, for he had a hand in most of them. He knows the resistance which you offered to the gospel, and the way in which you stifled conscience. He knows the sins of darkness, the crimes of the inner chambers of imagery. Since you have been a Christian he has marked your wickedness, and asked, in fierce sarcastic tones, "Is this a child of God?"

The foul fiend tells out the wanderings of our hearts, the deadness of our desires in prayer, the filthy thoughts that dropped into our minds when we have been at worship. Alas! we have to confess that we have even tolerated doubts as to eternal verities, and suspicions of the love and faithfulness of God. When the accuser is about his evil business, he does not have to look far for matter of accusation, nor for facts to support it. Do these accusations stagger you? Now is your opportunity for overcoming through the blood of the Lamb. When the accuser has said his say, and aggravated all your transgressions, be not ashamed to step forward and say, "But I have an advocate as well as an accuser: O Jesus, my Saviour, speak for me!" When He speaks, what does He plead but His own blood? "For all these sins I have made atonement," says He; "all these iniquities were laid on Me in the day of the Lord's anger, and have taken them away." Where is the accuser now? That dragon voice is silenced by the blood of the Lamb.

Still further, the believer will have need to overcome the enemy in the heavenly places in reference to access to God. It may happen that when we are most intent upon communing with God, the adversary hinders us. You seem and the enemy triumphs over you. You feel very near the world, and very near the flesh, and very near the devil: but you mourn your misery le distance from God. You are like a child 10 cannot reach his father's door because a ack dog barks at him from the door. What is e way of access? If the foul fiend will not ove out of the way,

Shut Out From God,

Can We Force Our Passage?

/ what weapon can we drive away the adver-ry so as to come to God? Is it not written at we are made nigh by the blood? Is there ot a new and living way consecrated for us?
ave we not boldness to enter into the holiest the blood of Jesus? The dog of hell knows e dread name which makes him lie down: we ust confront him with the authority, and ecially with the atonement of the Lamb of od. He will rage and rave all the more if we nd Moses to him; for he derives his power om our breaches of the law, and we cannot tence him unless we bring to him the Lord ho has kept the law, and made it honorable.
You must first overcome in the heavenly aces before the throne; and when you have en thus triumphant with God in prayer, you ill have grace to go forth to service and to deat evil among your fellow-men. How often ave I personally found that the battle must st be fought above!

We Must Overcome

order to service. Satan would hinder our get-ng supplies of grace wherewith to overcome im; but with the blood-mark on our foot we n go anywhere; with the blood-mark on our and we dare take anything. Having access ith confidence, we also take with freedom hatsoever we need, and thus we are provided gainst all necessities, and armed against all as-ults through the atoning sacrifice. This is the ountain of supply, and the shield of security.

We overcome the great enemy by laying hold pon the all-sufficiency of God, when we really el the power of the precious blood of Christ.
hus, being victorious in the heavenlies, we ome down to the pulpit or to the Sunday-chool class made strong in the Lord and in the ower of His might. Spiritual power of a holy ind rests upon us to overcome the spiritual ower of an evil kind which is exerted by Satan, ne world, and the flesh. The Lord scatters the ower of the enemy, and breaks the spell which olds men captive. Through the blood of the amb we become masters of the situation, and he weakest among us is able to work wonders.

It is time that I now showed you how this ame fight is carried on on earth. Amongst nen in these

Lower Places of Conflict

aints overcome through the blood of the Lamb y their testimony to that blood. Every believer s to bear witness to the atoning sacrifice and is power to save. He is to tell out the doctrine; ne is to emphasize it by earnest faith in it; and ne is to support it and prove it by his experience of the effect of it. You cannot all speak from he pulpit, but you can all speak for Jesus as opportunity is given you. You can bear witness o the power of the blood of Jesus in your own oul. If you do this, you will overcome men in many ways. First, you will arouse them out of apathy. This age is more indifferent to true religion than almost any other. It is alive enough to error, but to the old faith it turns a deaf ear. Yet I have noticed persons captivated by the truth of substitution, who would not listen to anything else. Try that story when attention flags. It has a fascination about it.
The marvellous history of the Son of God, who loved His enemies, and died for them—this will arrest them.

We also overcome men in this way, by softening rebellious hearts. Men stand out against the law of God, and defy the vengeance of God;
but the love of God in Christ Jesus disarms them. The Holy Spirit causes men to yield through the softening influence of the cross.
A bleeding Saviour makes men throw down their weapons of rebellion. "If He loves me so," they say, "I cannot do other than love Him in return." We overcome men's obduracy by the blood, shed for the remission of sins.

How wonderfully this same blood of the Lamb overcomes despair. Have you never seen a man shut up in the iron cage? It has been my painful duty to talk with several of such prisoners. I have seen the captive shake the iron bars, but he could not break them, or break from them. He has implored us to set him free by some means; but we have been powerless.
Glory be to God, the blood is a universal solvent, and it has dissolved the iron-bars of despair, until the poor captive conscience has been able to escape. How sweet for the desponding to sing—

"I do believe, I will believe,
That Jesus died for me!"

Believing that, all doubts and fears and despairs fly away, and the man is at ease.

There is nothing, indeed, dear friends, which the blood of the Lamb will not overcome; for

It Overcomes Vice,

and every form of sin. The world is foul with evil, like a stable which has long been the lair of filthy creatures. What can cleanse it? What but this matchless stream? Satan makes sin seem pleasurable, but the cross reveals its bitterness. If Jesus died because of sin, men begin to see that sin must be a murderous thing.
Even when sin was but imputed to the Saviour, it made Him pour out His soul unto death; it must, then, be a hideous evil to those who are actually and personally guilty of it. If God's rod made Christ sweat great drops of blood, what will His axe do when He executes the capital sentiment upon impenitent men! Yes, we overcome the deadly sweetness and pleasurableness of sin by the blood of the Lamb.

Consecrated Energy.

But I must close with this. It is not merely by testimony that we use this potent truth. We must support that testimony by our zeal and energy. We need concentrated, consecrated energy; for it is written, "They loved not their lives unto the death." We shall not overcome Satan if we are fine gentlemen, fond of ease and honor. As long as Christian people must needs enjoy the world, the devil will suffer little at their hands. They that overcame the world in the old days were humble men and women, generally poor, always despised, who were never ashamed of Christ, who only lived to tell of His love, and died by tens of thousands rather than cease to bear testimony to the blood of the Lamb. They overcame by their heroism; their intense devotion to the cause secured the victory. Their lives to them were as nothing when compared with the honor of their Lord.

Brethren, if we are to win great victories we must have greater courage. Some of you hardly dare speak about the blood of Christ in any but the most godly company; and scarcely there.
You are very retiring. You love yourselves too much to get into trouble through your religion.
Surely you cannot be of that noble band that love not their own lives unto the death! Many dare not hold the old doctrine nowadays because they would be thought narrow and bigoted, and this would be too galling. They call us old fools. It is very likely we are; but we are not ashamed to be

Fools for Christ's Sake, and the truth's sake. We believe in the blood of the Lamb, despite the discoveries of science.

We shall never give up the doctrine of atoning sacrifice to please modern culture. Oh to be at a white heat! Oh to flame with zeal for Jesus!
O my brethren, hold you to the old faith, and say, "As for the respect of men, I can readily forfeit it; but as for the truth of God, that I can never give up" This is the day for men to be men; for, alas! the most are soft, molluscous creatures. Now we need backbones as well as heads. To believe the truth concerning the Lamb of God, and truly to believe it, this is the essential of an overcoming life. Oh for courage, constancy, fixedness, self-denial, willingness to be made nothing of for Christ! God give us to be faithful witnesses to the blood of the Lamb in the midst of this ungodly world!

As for those of you who are not saved, does not this subject give you a hint? Your hope lies in the blood of the Lamb. The atoning sacrifice, which is our glory, is your salvation.
Trust in Him whom God has set forth to be the propitiation for sin. Begin with this, and you are saved. Every good and holy thing which goes with salvation will follow after; but now, this morning, I pray you accept a present salvation through the blood of the Lamb. "He that believeth in Him hath everlasting life."

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

THE HOME OF THE TARANTULA.*

TARANTULAS live in warm countries, and the further south we go the larger and more poisonous we find them. Our small spiders only use their poison to kill their prey; but the large ones of the Tropics will strike people as well as insects with their fangs, which sting severely, and sometimes even cause the victim's death.
So the tarantulas are to be feared, and we may be glad the huge creature is not a neighbor of ours. But if they are dangerous and horribly ugly too, with their eight great hairy legs, often long enough to cover a dinner-plate when spread out, they certainly are interesting creatures.
Those that live in the warmer parts of our own country are not nearly so large or deadly, and if you ever see one of their houses you will almost forget the owner of it was a little goblin you would not have cared to call upon when at home.

This is the way the tarantula makes a home:
instead of spinning an ordinary web, she first digs a tunnel straight into the ground; and when it is large enough, lines it with a web so smooth and soft that it feels like the finest silk.
Here is a comfortable home, but you may be sure the spider has no intention of leaving it open for the public to walk in; no, indeed, she must have a front door. So she makes a nice little round door out of earth and sticky web, lines the under side with silk, and fits it exactly to the hole, fastening it with the neatest little hinge, made also of web. Nothing can be prettier than one of these silk-lined tunnels, with the closely fitting door, that opens and shuts so easily. The spider lives inside this comfortable dwelling, which is several inches deep; and if any one tries to pull her front door open, she will hold it down from inside with all her might.
What is more wonderful, she will sometimes make a branch tunnel, opening into the first by another little door, and run in there if she does not succeed in keeping intruders out of her main hall.

As the outside of the front-door is rough, and possibly covered with turf, nobody would know, when it is closed, that the spider's house is any where near, as the ground looks the same all about; but sometimes it may be found wide open. It is then that the spider ventures forth; and opening her door, which she ties back by a few threads, lest it fall shut again by its own weight, she spins a web all around the mouth of the hole, and goes in again. She does not go in far, but just stands on the threshold waiting for prey, and catches the moths and night-beetles that blunder into the net; just as our own more familiar spiders in the grass spin their webs and dart at their prey from the tunnels they have made. But before morning the tarantula clears away the web and the remains of her supper, that no trace of it shall linger in the neighborhood and betray her whereabouts, and going into her house again, shuts the door and enjoys the seclusion of her safe silk-lined walls.

The Katydid's Music.

Where do they keep their instruments? Look at the hard plates on the katydid's wing covers, close to the body, and behold the secret of its noisy disputes. Did you never see one of these little green-coated creatures, that fill the August evenings with their never-ending discussions?

* From "Little People," by Stella Louise Hook. An excellent little work for young folks, introducing them to the world of natural wonders lying around them, and showing the wonderful wisdom of God in the construction of the tiny bodies of insects in the meadows, woods, and waters. 228 pages, with illustrations. Price $1.50. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, 745 Broadway, New York.

Mr. W. Jennings Demorest.

The New Memorial Over John Bunyan's Grave.

You have often heard them, for they are by no means rare; yet they look so much like the green leaves behind which they hide, that it is not strange you have often passed very near them without seeing them.

The katydid is a slender insect, with a soft, green body, long green legs, large thin wing-covers, that look like leaves, and two very long thread-like feelers. He lives a happy life up in the branches, or in some sheltering vine, protected by the cool leaves, stepping from twig to twig on his long legs, and sometimes spreading his green wings to fly into the shady depths of another tree, when he is tired of the first. All day he rests in the shade of broad leaves that rustle in the summer-breeze, with the birds for neighbors and, perhaps, a few squirrels; but there are not many enemies to molest him, and he passes the long August day peacefully in his cool green tent. Then when darkness falls and the moths come out, katydid comes out too, and begins to assert his opinion. I say his, for Mrs. Katydid never joins in her lord's arguments. She has no plates on her wings, and whether she has any opinion as to whether katy did it or not, she has no voice in the matter.

MR. W. JENNINGS DEMOREST.

THE reception tendered on September 24, by the leaders of the Prohibition party in New York, to Mr. Demorest on his return from Europe, was an unequivocal expression of the esteem in which he is held by the large body of his fellow-citizens, who are laboring, according to their lights, for the suppression of the most formidable foe of our national welfare.

Mr. Demorest is a native of New York City. He was born June 10, 1822, and is therefore now sixty-six years of age. His parents were well-known members of the Methodist-Episcopal Church, and it was his own earnest desire to become a minister of that church. Circumstances, however, prevented the young man realizing his cherished wish, and he reluctantly, but with a distinct recognition of duty, entered into business pursuits. His success was phenomenal. He showed a remarkable inventive genius, combined with rare business sagacity. He succeeded in applying electricity as a motor to the sewing machine, and took out a large number of patents for inventions, which gave employment to a large number of hands. Successful purchases of real estate and the founding of several popular trade journals further added to his wealth, until now Mr. Demorest is possessed of a large fortune.

The acquisition of money, however, by no means monopolized Mr. Demorest's time and attention. Various philanthropic enterprises enlisted his sympathy, and to these he devoted money and labor. At one time he was one of the visitors of the Society for the Improvement of the Condition of the Poor, was President of the State Temperance Society, a Manager of the National Temperance Society, and also one of the trustees of the Hospital for Women. For many years he was an active teacher in the Sabbath-school, and was a member of the choir in the old Tabernacle Church on Broadway. But it has been to the Prohibition cause that Mr. Demorest has devoted his chief attention of late years. He became so thoroughly absorbed in its interests, that he turned the management of his business over to his sons, in order to give to Prohibition all his time and energies. He has also been a large contributor to the funds. It was mainly through his munificence that Prohibition speakers were able to visit the South and expound the principles of the movement. In 1885 Mr. Demorest was nominated for Lieut.-Governor of New York, and ran nearly a thousand votes ahead of his ticket.

JOHN BUNYAN'S TOMB.

(See Illustration.)

THE body of the great Puritan preacher and writer, whose portrait and life appear on other pages of this journal, was, like his Master, laid, after his death, in another man's tomb. When seized with the fatal illness which resulted from his long ride in the rain in his journey as a peacemaker, he was at the house of a friend in London. This friend was Mr. John Strudwick, a prosperous grocer belonging to the Baptist community, and a great admirer of Bunyan. When the illness terminated fatally, Mr. Strudwick appears to have extended his hospitality permanently to the body of his dead friend. Bunyan was buried in Mr. Strudwick's tomb in "the Dissenter's Burial Ground" of Bunhill fields. Twelve other persons were subsequently interred in the same grave, whose names were inscribed on the headstone, with this brief record of Bunyan: "Mr. John Bunyan, Author of the 'Pilgrim's Progress.' Ob. August, 1688. Æt. 60." As time passed the inscription grew almost undecipherable, and it was several times refreshed. Latterly, however, the headstone itself was falling into decay, and it was also felt that some more worthy monument of the great writer ought to be raised to his memory. A movement was organized to raise funds for the purpose, and the result is the beautiful memorial represented in the illustration. On the top is a recumbent figure of Bunyan; at the foot is a tablet bearing the original inscription, and on the sides two bas-reliefs, the one representing Christian toiling up the h with his burden on his back, and the oth Christian with his burden rolling off at the sig of the cross.

AN ARTIST'S DIFFICULTY.

(See Illustration on page 637.)

A CITY clergyman was walking slowly throu a lovely country district one summer mornir when, having climbed a little knoll shaded wi trees, he sat down to rest. He was eviden recovering from illness, for his tall frame w shrunken, his steps slow and uncertain, and l face intensely pale. He drew in, with evide relish, long breaths of the clear, pure air, so freshing to one whose past few years had be spent in ministering to the spiritual health o people living for the greater part in rear te ments and noisome courts.

As the clergyman mused, he became co scious of a new feature in the landscape. Wh he sat down to rest, not a human being was sight, but now there was a girlish figure co fortably settled on a grassy bank, with an arti pad and a paint box before her. Sketching v not going on very briskly, for now and ag the pencil ceased its motion, and the girl v lost in thought. Might not here be an opp tunity for service? the clergyman asked hims At any rate he would see. He was soon at girl's side, chatting sociably with her, and fi ing her frank and open in manner. She naiv admitted that she ought not to be spending morning as she was doing. She had promi her elder sister to take a class in a miss school for the morning; but the children w troublesome, teaching was irksome, and temptation to go out in the lovely summer and sketch was irresistible. "I find," she s with a sigh, "that to be good and do one's d is much more difficult for me than it seem be with other people."

"You are fond of sketching, I suppos asked the clergyman.

"Yes; there is nothing I like so much."

"Yet you do not appear to have made m progress this morning," glancing at the pad

"No; and that is a strange thing that zles me. Violet is responsible for a wasted m ing. I did no good in the school, and I done no good here. I suppose my conscie reproaches me. I cannot give my mind to sketch as I generally do. Perhaps I am laz

"No," said the clergyman, "I think not. other reason is the more natural explanat The consciousness of neglected duty is very to rob our usual enjoyments of their grati tion. If you had taught the class, and have come out to sketch, you would prob ve enjoyed it more an usual."

"Then you think I being punished for glect of duty."
"Oh, I would not that. It is only a ural law that works
is all. After a time, ou were to make a ctice of neglecting
y, you would exience no discom-
t. Conscience is very pertinacious.
seldom continues trouble any one
o does not listen
it."
"But that would be very bad state to into, would it
?"
The clergyman lled sadly. "I can nk of none more ible," he said.
But how is one to right when one es so much not to it? Now, my sis-
Violet seems to oy doing disagree-e things. I believe
e takes pleasure teaching those y, noisy children,
. I have known

The Young Artist's Sketching Interrupted.

to be quite happy in staying away from the est pleasure expedition to nurse some poor, old woman who had no claim upon her. I not understand it; I know I could never oy such things. I might bring myself to do s a penance, but I should never like it."
Ah!" said the clergyman," that is no new iculty. It has puzzled wise people since the ld began. The best men have always been ng to learn how to make the higher nature reme over the lower. We all have the two ures, and the lower never will take its subinate place without a struggle. It is more ce and brutal, and generally stronger. Some e tried letting it have its way, and pacifying higher nature for deposing it, by penances money payments, but that is a cowardly out of the difficulty. Some of the great then philosophers did better, but their success not great. The only eal solution that ever eeded was given by a poor Oriental peas-, very much despised in his day, and very h misunderstood; but he had the secret.
taught that happiness was not to be sought n end; that self, with all its desires and joys, t be ignored, annihilated in fact, and that the right and the good and the true would upreme, and all lower pleasures would be-ie tasteless."
But would not that be very difficult?" ask-he girl, sadly.
Yes, he recognized that, and met that dif-lty with a remedy. There is a power that es for righteousness, he declared, and that er may be had by those who desire its help.
an ally on the right side in the conflict. In , it fights the battle alone, if the person who called in its help is only faithful in alleice to it."
Oh, I wish I had it!" said the girl, "I am veak, and I am always trying to be good, failing."
That is all that you need at the outset, my
d. You will find other needs as you go on; the sincere desire is the first thing. The er is the Holy Spirit. Read your New Tes-ent, and you will find that Jesus distinctly rts that God gives the Holy Spirit to those ask Him."
I will ask Him," said the girl.
Do; your nature will be transformed. It is the secret of the grandest lives the world has ever seen, and when you have proved it, tell it to all you know."

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. L. S. Keyser.

(Continued from page 622.)

Joyless Days.

DURING the remainder of the session Hadley's studies were carried on in a rather desultory and perfunctory manner, and it was only by virtue of his superior native ability that he was able to maintain his position at the head of the class. He had comparatively little zest for his work, and still less exultation in his triumphs.

Every day he met Miss Winters, but he never spoke to her. With careful studiousness he ignored her, although at times he glanced at her stealthily, and was surprised and pained at the pallor of her beautiful face.

No change came in that session. The short spring vacation had come and gone, and Hadley and George had entered upon their last session of college life. The spring opened gloriously, bringing with it its resurrection of life and beauty. Under the magic wand of the opening season some of Hadley's old physical exhilaration was returning, and almost every Saturday found him making long expeditions into the country, collecting data in regard to the local fauna and flora. In many of these excursions he was accompanied by his friend Dane. He also found in Belle Havelock a ready sympathizer with all his naturalistic researches. Very often she rendered him invaluable assistance in classifying the results of a day's collection, frequently astonishing him with her extensive knowledge of science.

Madeline Winters held steadily on her course, gaining one trophy after another in the college. Her leisure time was spent in self-improvement and in works of love in the town. A class of half-grown boys were becoming civilized under her wise and prayerful instruction at the Sabbath-school; and on Sabbath afternoons she was frequently seen in the houses of the poor, carrying light and cheer wherever she went. Very seldom did she appear in society with a male escort. Occasionally she would, by kindly sufferance, allow Duneman to accompany her to a lecture, but he made little progress in his suit, even though he had the field all to himself.

The season was advancing, as was evidenced by the increased warmth of the weather and the thickening foliage of orchard, grove, and forest, and nearly all the spring songsters had come back on their annual migratory visit, and were making the woods and fields vocal with their carols.

The prospect was so inviting to a half-dozen young men of the Senior class, who had a special predilection for out-door life, that a scheme was set on foot to make an excursion to a lovely spot several miles from town. The half-dozen young men referred to were members of the same fraternity, and included Hadley and George. Indeed, they were the main instigators of the plan. Each young gallant was to find a young lady to accompany him, the young ladies being expected to furnish the edibles for the picnic dinner on the grounds. A double team and a large carryall, with a driver, were to be hired for the occasion.

George Dane had so studiously avoided feminine society during his stay in college that he was sorely puzzled as to whom he should choose for a partner. A number of young ladies were suggested, but none of them passed muster. At last he said to Hadley, confidentially:

"There is only one girl whose society would be agreeable to me on the excursion."

"And who is she?" questioned Hadley.

"Miss Madeline Winters," returned George bluntly. And then seeing an expression of rigidity on Hadley's features, he added, reassuringly: "Oh, you needn't be jealous, my dear fellow. Neither she nor any other girl has been playing havoc with my affections, but I admire her for her mental gifts, and believe that her company would be more agreeable than any other. You will not ask her, shall you?"

"Not at all," replied Hadley. "I have already engaged the company of Belle Havelock." Then a rueful look came into Hadley's face. "Ask Miss Winters to go with us by all means; she will make an excellent foil, with her sweet, serious ways, to our gay crowd."

Accordingly a note was sent to Miss Winters, and in a short time an answer came accepting with thanks George's proposal, and the occasion was anticipated by Hadley with mingled dread and tremulous delight.

When the appointed gala-day arrived, the large open spring wagon, drawn by four horses, was filled with gay excursionists. Miss Winters was the last young lady to ascend the steps of the vehicle. As she appeared at the gate, accompanied by George Dane, a warm flush was visible on her fair oval cheeks, and it deepened in intensity when she had seated herself, and saw Miss Havelock by the side of young Madelling.

Soon the gayly caparisoned steeds had trotted out of town. The freedom of the country relaxed all the latent gayety of the picnicers. Their road wound like a broad white band along the flexures of the valleys, and about the steep hill-sides, every turn bringing new surprises to nature's loving eyes. In an occasional lull of the conversation and laughter, Hadley caught the roundelays of the grass-finch, or the cheery whistle of the oriole, and he resolved that when they reached the picnic-grounds, he would steal away from his companions awhile, for the purpose of making observations on the bird life of the locality.

As the excursionists were passing a cottage, a woman drew a bucket of water from a well below the house, and lifting the vessel to her head, she carried it with perfect ease up the hill. The performance was watched so intently by all that there was a brief pause of complete silence, and then Miss Winters remarked:

"How Oriental that appears! It reminds one of a real Bible scene."

"It is very like the pictures I used to see in the old family Bible when I was a small boy," answered George.

As the conversation was of a general character, Belle Havelock interlarded laughingly: "That was a good while ago, wasn't it, Mr. Dane? I fancy that you do not see many such pictures nowadays"; and there was a mocking smile on her face.

"I do not catch—I do not understand you," said George, looking a little puzzled.

"Obtuse!" laughed Hadley. "She means that you do not look into the Bible as often as you did once."

"Thank you for sharpening my dull faculties," George replied. "Your surmise is correct, Miss Havelock. I do not look into the old Book as often as I did in the days of my innocence."

"In the days of your crudeness and gullibility, you mean," said Belle, with a touch of sarcasm. "You have outgrown these defunct traditions and have come out into a wider field of thought."

"That is rather severe," put in Hadley.

"Not more so than such superstitions deserve," maintained Belle.

"I am inclined to think," said Madeline, in tones that were modulated with kindness, "that the childlike receptive spirit is the more healthful. No matter how much we grow, we are learners still, and we learn more the more docile we are."

"But we learn to discriminate between truth and error," said Belle. "The simple child who believes a ghost story, and in consequence is afraid to go to bed in the dark, pays the penalty of the credulous, childlike spirit. As he grows older he has more sense than to believe in ghosts, and if he has courage too, he refuses to believe in miracles. He fails to see in the Bible, evidence of Divine authorship."

"Yes, some do!" said Madeline, stirred up to polemical attitude by the attack of a sceptic of her own sex; "but the Book itself forewarned us that it would be so. 'The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned.'"

"Oh," said Belle, smiling, "you must not beg the question. That is too much the habit of believers. When the credibility of the Bible is in dispute, a quotation from its pages is not decisive, as it might be in a Methodist class-meeting."

"I did not quote the passage as a proof of inspiration," said Madeline, "I quoted it simply to show that the Bible foresaw such objections as yours, and explained their cause."

"A very inadequate explanation," Belle replied. "It is the part of reason to examine statements before it accepts them. The majority of Christians remind me of what I saw in an orchard near my old country home: a "yellow-hammer — more elegantly called the golden-winged woodpecker—had made a nest in the hollow hole of an apple-tree. I went to see the bird-domicile almost every day while the young birds were feathering, and whenever I made a slight noise about the tree, a half-dozen mouths in the nest were thrown open like little caves, ready to receive whatever was dropped into them, while an incessant chirping for more was kept up. Christians put me in mind of those callow young birds. They open their mouths and shut their eyes, and gulp down unquestioningly everything that their religious teachers see fit to pour down their throats." As this simile was delivered, a suppressed titter went around the wagon.

"Poor little birds!" exclaimed Miss Winters, compassionately, after a pause; "if they hadn't opened their mouths they would have starved to death."

For a moment there was dead silence until the company caught the point, and then a vociferous outburst of merriment, accompanied by a vigorous clapping of hands, ensued, while cries of "Good! good!" were interspersed. Belle joined as heartily as possible in the laugh against herself, but she felt piqued at the thrust in this fencing of words. During the remainder of the drive, no more theological discussions were obtruded into the conversation.

In a cool, umbrageous retreat on the bank of the river the young people spread the dinner, and a merry meal it was, with light persiflage and unrestrained hilarity. When the repast was finished, while the company was engaged in a post-prandial chat, Belle Havelock, feeling a desire to be even with Miss Winters for the defeat she had experienced earlier in the day, threw a pebble into the river, accompanying the action with the remark:

"I believe, Mr. Madelling, that you once took an unceremonious bath in this river several miles from here."

Every one in the company was silent for a moment. Madeline blushed painfully. Then Hadley broke the awkward silence by saying: "Yes, I performed an aquatic feat; but it was an involuntary undertaking."

"Oh, you were forced into it, were you?" said Belle, with a deep purpose. "Suppose one of us were to fall—accidently or on purpose—into the river to-day, do you suppose that you would have the gallantry to plunge into the awful tide and bring us out?" asked Belle, a little melodramatically.

"My heroism might fail; it would not be safe to put it to the test too often," said Hadley.

The girl for whom Belle's shaft was intended turned to George Dane and began to converse with him for the purpose of masking her wounded feelings. The jesting words that had fallen from Hadley's lips, though innocent enough in themselves, acquired a deep significance when collated with the letter that had been put into her hands a few months before. The conviction forced itself upon her that Hadley had intended to insult her by his remark, and her enjoyment for the rest of the day was destroyed.

The party soon separated into smaller groups, each treating the occasion in characteristic style. Hadley felt piqued at Belle for obtruding a disagreeable subject upon the company, especially in Madeline's presence, and in order to calm himself, he obeyed an impulse to stroll away into the woods that crowned a rocky bluff up the river a short distance. Obviously he had escaped unobserved. For an hour he was deeply engrossed in watching the performances of a rare warbler and a winter wren as they flitted among the twigs, and in noting the exquisite quality of their songs. Fearing that his prolonged absence might be regarded as an incivility, he started to retrace his steps. Near the edge of the woods, a pine-finch, whistling in a low bush, attracted his attention. As he had not yet secured a specimen of this species for his ornithological collection, he drew his pocket-rifle and brought down the gay vocalist. Its fall was followed by a cry of alarm from some one beyond the bush into which he had discharged the shot. Much excited, Hadley sprang forward, and stood face to face with Miss Winters. Her countenance was pale and bore a frightened expression.

"For mercy's sake! tell me, Miss Winters—have I hurt you?" gasped Hadley.

"Do not be alarmed," she said calmly. "Several of the shots whizzed close to me, but none of them hit me."

"What if I had shot you! Oh, horror! I can't bear to think of it!"

"But you did not," said the girl, reassuringly, "and so you need not distress yourself on account of an imaginary catastrophe."

"You and I seem to be fated to—to—meet under peculiar circumstances," he burst out.

"I suppose you will think that I followed you purposely to-day, as you seem to think I did the time you saved my life," she said, blushing crimson.

He opened his eyes in amazement, as she spoke. The real force of her words was lost upon him, not knowing anything of the circumstances that motived them, and he looked at her in a dazed way.

"Miss Winters, I protest that I never thought of such a thing. It is an unjust, an uncharitable imputation," he said angrily.

"Your conversation with Miss Havelock an hour ago seemed to imply as much."

"Oh, Miss Winters," cried Hadley, "I never dreamed that you would place that construction on our words. Nothing was farther from my thoughts, I assure you. It was an unpleasant theme to introduce, and I was vexed and mortified over it. In fact, I felt so piqued that I left the company awhile to regain my composure."

"That is just the reason I am here," said Madeline, the tears starting to her eyes.

"Why, you have been crying," exclaimed Hadley. "Did it wound you so deeply? Well, I am very sorry, but I hope that you will not blame me for it."

Impulsively he stepped closer to her, and a feeling of inexpressible tenderness filled his heart. The two stood on the rocky height looking into each other's eyes. At last he spoke impetuously.

"Why did I meet you here? It has opened the old wound afresh, though it was never healed. You have forbidden me to seek an explanation of my rejection, and yet your dear face whenever I see it, drives me to desperation."

She held up her hand imploringly.

"You do not wish me to speak, I see," he said, bitterly. "So be it, then. I must tear your image from my heart, but I curse the destiny that has crushed every hope of my life."

"You should not be so irreverent," she said.

"What can I do but curse it?" he broke out desperately. "When there is nothing but blind caprice to rule the world, there is nothing to revere."

"How can you speak so?" she said, in distressed tones. "It is appalling to hear your atheistic utterances. Do you not see that there is a community of feeling on the subject of religion between us? Your words make me very unhappy."

"Ah!" he muttered, a new light breaking upon him. "It is this religious superstition that has raised a barrier between you and me. It has brought me nothing but sorrow."

"It is your opposition to it that brings much grief into your life."

"Miss Winters," he said, imploringly, "I would do anything but sacrifice principle to win your love, if you—"

"No, no, do not say any more. It is best to drop the subject now." Then a moment's pang of jealousy prompted her to say: "You have another claim upon you, too. You are not dependent upon me for your joy. Let us go back to the party."

"Madeline," Hadley began excitedly, thinking that she referred to Belle Havelock, and having no clue to the Mabel Richerson episode which really was the basis of Madeline's reproach, "I swear to you that no other—"

Madeline's upraised hand checked what she imagined would be a perjury, and the opportunity for explanation was lost. Hadley shrugged his shoulders and obeyed the admonition of silence, and quietly the two descended the hill and joined their companions.

(To be Continued).

CROSSING THE JORDAN.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for October 14, Josh. 3:5-17. Golden Text, Isa. 43:2.

The Welcome Warning—The Wilderness to be Exchanged for a Home—The Work Required of the Cis-Jordanic Tribes—Unselfishness Expected—Work for the Church Before Resting—Spies Sent Out—The Three Days of Waiting—The Last Instructions—Sanctification Ordered—The People's Part—They Were to Follow the Ark—The Covenant a Pledge of Safety—The Procession Over the Bed of the River.

PREPARED by the direct command and promises of God, Joshua took up his vocation, and commanded the officers of the people, whom Moses had set over thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens (Ex. 18:25), to give orders to the people that they should prepare provision, for in three days' time they were to pass over Jordan. Oh what joy must the message have brought them! Not one of the whole company had ever known a home, with its joys and comforts. Some had left Egypt as little children, and others had been born in the wilderness, and knew only a wilderness life. And the two adults, Joshua and Caleb, who had grown up in the land of Egypt, had known only slavery, not a home, there. And now they were going home, every family was to have a dwelling-place,

Their Long Wanderings Were to End in Rest.

But there must be no selfishness among the people. The Reubenites, Gadites, and half the tribe of Manasseh had chosen their portion on the wilderness side of Jordan. But Joshua reminded them that they were bound to pass on before their brethren armed, leaving only their wives and children in the land of their possession until the Lord had given their brethren rest as He had given them. Even in the Old Testament, the lesson of unselfishness is taught; how much more is it our privilege, who live under the New Testament, to seek the salvation of others, and not to settle down upon our lees until India, China, Africa, and the heathen in our own land are evangelized! "He that gathereth not with Me, scattereth abroad. (Matt. 12:20.) These tribes acknowledged their obligation and the authority of Joshua, and promised to obey, saying, "All that thou commandest us we will do, and whithersoever thou sendest us we will go. According as we hearkened unto Moses in all things, so will we hearken unto thee: only the Lord thy God be with thee, as he was with Moses, . . . only be strong and of a good courage." It is a very usual thing that when the rulers or teachers of a people are changed, there is a great deal of ill feeling, jealousy, and prejudice. The new man is criticised and compared with his predecessor to his disadvantage, and received with coldness and distrust. But here is a man following another, and that man such a man as never lived before, and yet his successor is received without any ill feeling! Why? Because Joshua trusted God, and God upheld Joshua. The report of two men whom he sent as spies to Jericho was this, "Truly the Lord hath delivered into our hands all the land; for even all the inhabitants of the country do faint because of us." How different from the report of the ten spies! There seem to have been two periods of three days, one spent in making preparation, while the spies were in the land of Canaan, and another later, when the people were encamped by Jordan. "Joshua rose

Early in the Morning."

So did Abraham twice when he had important things to do—to cast out the bondwoman, and to sacrifice his Isaac on the altar. (Gen. 21:14; 22:3.) Jesus was wont to rise up early, sometimes "a great while before day," that He might commune with His Father. Few days are days which tell much for God when there has been no early hour of taking counsel with Him. "Joshua rose early in the morning; and they removed from Shittim, and came to Jordan, he and all the children of Israel, and lodged there before they passed over." They could see the land now every moment, just across the river, and what they saw was theirs, assured to them by the covenant promises of God. How long the three days must have seemed while they waited there! "And it came to pass after three days, that the officers went through the host, and they commanded the people" to pay attention to the ark of God, and to the priests which bore it, that they might follow in its track. But they must leave a space between it and them, that they might all see the direction which it took. From this we learn that the guidance which God gives us requires constant attention to Him. "For ye have not gone this way heretofore." It was indeed a new way; they were leaving behind for ever the old wilderness way of treading perpetually over the same ground, and they were going to pass on to continuous victory and assured possession. Many and many a child of God spends a lifetime in the wilderness, always trying, striving, struggling, to serve God, and to overcome sin and self; which results either in a hardened conscience and self-righteous spirit, or in a state of chronic depression. What is wrong? Simply this: that instead of entering into the land, accepting the true and gracious promises of God, and rejoicing in Him who gives us the victory and leads us into our possessions, these poor souls are still in the wilderness, attempting, by their own efforts, to do what can only be done by the hand of the Most High.

What man ever delivered himself from self? What man ever made himself humble, or produced in himself faith in the living God? It takes divine power to do these things, and when our Joshua (Jesus) leads us out of efforts into the blessed land of God's promises, and we claim them as ours, it is not inaction, not idleness, not supineness, but rest in the midst of labor, in the midst of sorrow, and in the midst of temptation, because God undertakes for all. "Joshua said unto the people, Sanctify yourselves; for to-morrow the Lord will do wonders among you." This was Joshua's testimony to God. It is our part to sanctify ourselves when we have first been sanctified by God. Before the law was given, Moses sanctified the people. (Ex. 19:10.) God says of His people now: "But ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified." (1 Cor. 6:11.) The Corinthians were "sanctified in Christ Jesus." (1 Cor. 1:1.) Peter wrote to those who were "elect . . . through sanctification of the Spirit." (1 Pet. 1:2.) Yet these very Corinthians are taught to cleanse themselves "from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit" (II Cor. 7:1), and this same Peter says, "Be ye holy, for I am holy." (1 Pet. 1:16.) Surely, here it meant a thorough abandonment to God, in preparation for the wonders God would work. Had there been such a sanctifying of themselves in the synagogues at Nazareth, it would not have been said, "And He did not many mighty works there because of their unbelief."

Rest Indeed,

Then Joshua commanded the priests, "and they took up the ark of the covenant, and went before the people. And the Lord said unto Joshua, This day will I begin to magnify thee in the sight of all Israel, that they may know that, as I was with Moses, so I will be with thee." God would never glorify Joshua to make him great in his own eyes, for that would have been to do him an incalculable injury. His greatness consisted in God's making common cause with him, and making him a worker together with Him (II Cor. 6:1), a chosen vessel to respond to the heart of God, understand and carry out His counsels, and be His interpreter.

What a Vocation!

And some who are called to a life such as this turn from its wondrous glory to live for the world and self! God directed Joshua to command the priests who bore the ark of the covenant of the Lord, when they came to the brink of Jordan that they should stand still in Jordan. And immediately afterwards Joshua speaks his first word direct to the people themselves. "Come hither, and hear the words of the Lord your God." One cannot but think of the "Come" of Jesus, so different from the thunders of the law. And Joshua was speaking no words of his own; he gave God's authority for what he said: "Hereby ye shall know that the living God is among you, and that He will without fail drive out from before you the Canaanites, etc. . . Behold the ark of the covenant of the Lord of all the earth passeth over before you into Jordan." That is to say, "Before a man of you can be drowned, the ark of God's covenant must be drowned; where He goes, you may go. Oh, it is

No Venture to Follow God.

Let us be only sure that our God is on before, and, whether it is into a fiery furnace, or to walk upon the waters of Genesaret, or inside a prison cell, or whether to work all day with those who despise God, we are perfectly safe with Him. But if we venture any step, even from room to room, in our own house, without Him, we are in danger. If we enter into a conversation, write a letter, make a purchase, or commence a work of any kind without the Lord's companionship, we are in danger.

"And it shall come to pass, as soon as the soles of the feet of the priests that bear the ark of the Lord, the Lord of all the earth, shall rest in the waters of Jordan, that the waters of Jordan shall be cut off from the waters that come down from above, and they shall stand upon an heap." Before God could work a miracle, the priests must take a step of faith; they must stand bearing the ark of the covenant in the very waters of the swollen river. ("For Jordan overfloweth all his banks all the time of harvest," the snows of Mount Lebanon melt in May and June, the harvest months in Palestine, and thus the river is swollen at that time). As kings and priests unto God, we who believe have the privilege of bearing the ark of the covenant of the Lord. Jordan means judgment, and it is our vocation to carry the promises of God right into the place where judgment overflows. Not only where our sins and shortcomings condemn us, but right out among the heathen who "sit in darkness in the shadow of death," may we carry the ark of the covenant, and most surely the moral and social judgment which lies upon heathen countries shall give way before the Word of the living God. It is for the leaders of the people to prove first that God is faithful. As the people moved forward with their little ones, their cattle, and their baggage-wagons, every man and woman in Israel would look up, and see the wondrous sight of the ever-increasing heap of water which came down from the source of the Jordan and then, on the other hand, the dry bed of the stream as the nether waters failed, and every one would acknowledge that had done this. The long procession passed through the bed of the river, and, as they slowly filed through, in their tribes and families, every one had to pass by the ark of the covenant of the Lord, and see in it God's guarantee of safety. Some think it a most dangerous proceeding to trust their spiritual state and health, without anxiety and without fear, into the hands of the living God, and they think they are taking too easy a way; but the ark of the covenant, the promise of God, is the warrant we have for entering into rest, and ceasing from our own works "as God did from His." But He will find us plenty of good work to do, which He hath "prepared for us to walk in," if we will only cease from the runnning uncertainly and the fighting as them that beat the air (1 Cor. 9:26), which has hindered God and lost our own time. He will not fail us, His word is true. "The priests that bore the ark of the covenant of the Lord stood firm on dry ground in the midst of Jordan, and all the Israelites passed over on dry ground, until all the people were passed clean over Jordan."

The Hand of a Present God

The Antichrist Babylon and the Coming of the Kingdom, by G. H. Pember, M. A. A new work of remarkable originality and power, written in a popular and simple style, yet showing much scholarly research, 171 pages; Price in cloth covers, 50 cents. For sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York.

'SOME TIME."

MRS. MAY RILEY SMITH.

Some time, when all life's lessons have been learned,
And sun and stars forevermore have set,
The things which our weak judgment here has spurned—
The things o'er which we grieved with lashes wet—
Will flash before us out of life's dark night,
As stars shine most in deeper tints of blue;
And we shall see how all God's plans were right,
And how what seemed reproof was love most true.

And we shall see, that, while we frown and sigh,
God's plans go on as best for you and me;
How, when we called He heeded not our cry,
Because His wisdom to the end could see:
And e'en as prudent parents disallow
Too much of sweet to craving babyhood,
So God, perhaps, is keeping from us now
Life's sweetest things, because it seemeth good.

And if, some time, commingled with life's wine,
We find the wormwood, and rebel and shrink,
Be sure a wiser hand than yours or mine
Pours out this potion for our lips to drink;
And if some friend we love is lying low,
Where human kisses cannot reach his face
Oh! do not blame the loving Father so,
But bear your sorrow with obedient grace.

And you shall shortly know that lengthened breath
Is not the sweetest gift God sends His friend,
And that sometimes the sable pall of death
Conceals the fairest boon His love can send.
If we could push ajar the gates of life,
And stand within, and all God's working's see,
We could interpret all this doubt and strife,
And for each mystery could find a key.

But not to-day. Then be content, poor heart!
God's plans, like lilies pure and white, unfold;
We must not tear the close-shut leaves apart;
Time will reveal the calyxes of gold.
And if, through patient toil we reach the land
Where tired feet, with sandals loosed, may rest,
When we shall clearly know and understand,
I think that we shall say that "God knew best."

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike), will be sent post-paid, for 10 cts., or 100 for 20 cts. Postage stamps taken.

Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

A Brain and Nerve Food, for lecturers, teachers, students, clergymen, lawyers, and brain-workers generally.

Smith (with smiling face)—What have you got the blues about?

Jones—Nothing to do. Times are dull.

Smith—Well, now, old fellow, I am glad I struck up with you. You sit right down and write to B. F. Johnson & Co., Publishers, of Richmond, Va., and they will put you in a way to make money faster than you ever did before. I was out of work, too, but began a little correspondence with them and now I am growing fat and rich. Too busy to talk longer now.

The latest and best imperial Photographs of Dr. Talmage and Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, with their fac-simile autograph, and also imperial photograph of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, can be obtained from J. E. Jewett, 77 Bible House, New York. Sent postpaid for twenty-five cents each. Postage stamps taken.

MEXICO

Contributions in aid of Christian work in Mexico are most pressingly needed, and can be mailed to the address of

BISHOP H. C. RILEY,
Care of J. P. HEATH,
43 Bible House, New York.

TO OUR CHRISTIAN FRIENDS:

As there is a regular monthly expense in connection with the work a regular monthly income is needed to meet that expense. We, therefore, specially ask for regular monthly contributions in its behalf. If many will each send a little every month, or quarter, or whenever they can, it will do great good. Remember, every little helps.

H. CHAUNCEY RILEY.

CABINET

containing Black Hills Ores of Gold, Silver, Copper, Lead, Tin, etc. 10 different specimens, good size. Will be an ornament to any parlor and very instructive. Price, prepaid, 50 cents, or 5 for $2.00.

F. A. Thole, Deadwood, Dak.

PRINCIPAL CHURCH BUILDING OF THE MEXICAN CHURCH OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST, CITY OF MEXICO.

BARGAINS IN GOLD WATCHES,

YOU CAN GET THIS WATCH FREE.

To introduce our SOLID GOLD and SOLID SILVER WATCHES and immense line of jewelry and secure agents at once, we make this Wonderful Offer. NOW OR NEVER IS YOUR CHANCE. To get the best and handsomest Watch ever offered. This Watch is entirely new. The cases are beautifully engraved, the same style and appearance as the cases of a $100 Watch, being made from fine quality Rolled Gold Plate. We guarantee them to stand the strongest acid test. The works are entirely new, nicely jeweled, lever movement. We guarantee it to keep excellent time and to give perfect satisfaction, or money cheerfully refunded. WE WARRANT EACH WATCH FOR A PERIOD OF FIVE YEARS. In carrying this beautiful Watch you will have the credit of owning a $100 Solid Gold Watch, and use it is just as desirable. We will send this beautiful Watch by registered mail post-paid for only $5.75, which you want to see the Watch before paying for it, send us $1.00 as a guarantee of good faith and we will send the Watch by express C.O.D. with privilege of examination at the express office, and if you do not find the Watch just as represented you need not take it. Every person sending the cash with order ($5.75) we will send a beautiful Gold Plated Chain free. Our only object in selling this Watch at such a ridiculously low price is to secure Agents for our Watches and Jewelry, as one Watch sold in a town is sure to sell many more for us. HOW YOU CAN GET THIS WATCH FREE. Get up a club and get four of your friends to send with you, sending us $23.00, (the price of four watches) and we will send you 5 Watches, thus giving you one watch absolutely free for your trouble. Any person can easily secure four subscribers in a single day or evening. Any Bank, Commercial Agency, Express Co., or the leading Newspapers of America will tell you of our absolute reliability. Send all money by Post-Office Money Order, Express Money Order, Bank Draft, Postal Note or Registered Letter. Order now. Our Catalogue sent free. The Domestic Mfg Co. Wallingford, Conn.

UNIVERSITY PIANOS
FROM $180 TO $1500.
FINEST PIANOS IN THE WORLD.
SOLD DIRECT TO FAMILIES, saving the enormous expenses of agents. Sent with beautiful cover, stool and book, for trial in your own home before you buy. Guaranteed six years. Send for catalogue to Marshal & Smith Piano Co., 285 E. 21st St., N. Y.

FEATHERS. The finest live white geese feathers in the country, 75 cts. per lb. Hair Mattresses made over for $2.50. H. PICKFORD, 11 Nassau Street, Brooklyn, New York.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED FOR MY STORY OF THE WAR
By Mary A. Livermore

Her own narrative of "Four Years' Personal Experience as Field and Hospital Nurse." It portrays the Womanly or "Heavenly" side of the War, its Lights and Shadows "as a woman saw them." Bright, Pure, and Good, full of "laughter and tears" of thrilling interest and touching pathos, it sells at sight to all. Splendid Steel-Plates, and famous old Battle-Flags richly colored in exact fac-simile. The "booming" book for Men and Women Agents. $100 to $200 a month made. ☞ Distance no hindrance, for we Pay Freights and give Extra Terms. Write for circulars to
A. D. WORTHINGTON & CO., Hartford, Conn.

Woolen Dress Good

JAMES McCREERY & CO

Are now offering the following lines of Dress Goods, Excellent Va at greatly reduced prices:

54-inch plain cloth, $1.00; worth $1.25.
54-inch plain cloth, $1.25; worth $1.50.
54-inch checks, 85cts.; worth $1.25.
54-inch checks, $1; worth $1.50.
54-inch mixtures, $1; worth $1.50.

Samples of these goods sent on plication, and orders carefully cuted.

James McCreery & C

Broadway, cor. Eleventh St., NEW YORK.

BUNYAN'S PILGRIM'S PROGRES

AND

THE HOLY WAR.

A New Large Type Edition, Illustra with Marginal Notes and Reference printed from new plates, and beauti bound in rich English muslin, with be edges and gilt back and side. This i complete edition of the Pilgrim's Pro The Holy War, and a Memoir of John yan, all bound in one volume of ove pages. Price, $1.50, sent postpaid to address on receipt of price.

J. E. JEWETT, 77 Bible House, N

Pertainin sons, Pla Things, v Bible St Concert I Prayer-M Topics, etc. Int by J. H cent, I pages. By mail, $2. Immensely popular. Al new book, BOW IN THE CLOUD, of Comfort, etc., by 200 Best Authors, $1. WOMEN'S HAND-BOOK. $2. Jus A lady wanted in every tow duce it. Quick Sales. Big Pay. A E. B. TREAT, Publisher, 771 Broadw

PRINTING PRES Book of Type, 5c. Amateur Printers' Guide Book, 15c. CIRCU JOSEPH W. 19 Murray Samples of Scrap Pictures and Cards, 10c

ON 30 DAYS' TRI THIS NE

ELASTIC TR Has a Pad different others, is cup shape, adjusting Ball in cent itself to all position body while the ball presses back the tines just as a does with the finger. With light pressur nia is held securely day and night, and a rad certain. It is easy, durable and cheap. Sent by mail Circulars free. EGGLESTON TRUSS CO., Chic

SEATTLE The largest City in Wa Territory. Population 20 mercial center of PUGE Country. Coal, Iron, Timber and Agr Lands. Send for full information of Qu SE-AT-TLE. CHAS. H. KIT Seattle, Was

AGENTS WANTED to sell "Th Bible." Intro Bishop J. H. Vincent, D.D. The best se handled by agents. Recommended by all Address Cassell & Co., B.B.S.D., 104 and Ave., New York; 40 Dearborn St., Chicago,

$75.00 to $250.00 A MONTH can working for us. A ferred who can furnish a horse and give t time to the business. Spare moments may b employed also. A few vacancies in towns an F. Johnson & Co., Pub's, 1009 Main St., Rich

In all the world there is but one OPIUM Habit. The Dr. J Remedy never f other treatment ever cured one case. NO PAY TILL CURED We have cured more than 10,000 cases. No oth this, and write to the J. L. Stephens Co., Lebe

MORE MEN WANTED for loc eling Good Pay. Address E. B. RICHARDSON & CO Nurserymen, Genev

TEAS LADIES Send at o our ne THE GREAT AMERICA 31 and 33 Vesey St., New Y

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1888, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington

Vol. XI., No. 41. Office, 63 Bible House. N. Y. THURSDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1888. Price, 3 Cents. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

PORTRAIT AND LIFE OF RAMON BETANCOURT AND PICTURE OF THE FAMOUS PERUVIAN RAILROAD BRIDGE.

THE THREE GREATEST THINGS TO DO. Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning.

THE SPANISH-SPEAKING NATIONS. By Bishop H. C. Riley.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

THE FIRST RESURRECTION. By J. Urquhart.

CURRENT EVENTS: The Republican Tariff Bill Introduced—The Yellow Fever Epidemic—Disasters on the Lakes—European Notes—An Explorer's Opinion about Stanley—A Ninety Thousand Dollar Lawsuit—A Fierce Struggle with a Dog—A Photograph of a Shadow.

ALL AT IT. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

A NIGHT AT THE FLORENCE MISSION.

THE NEW JERUSALEM. By the late P. H. Gosse.

A Deformed Child Cured—An Octogenarian's Conversion—A Consecrated Ten-Dollar Bill—A Despairing Wife.

Gems from New Books: The Magnetic Smile—Girls Dead at Heart—What a Lady Is, etc.

PICTURE OF MR. WILLIAM NOBLE'S SATURDAY NIGHT DEMONSTRATION.

A CASE FOR PATIENCE. (With Illustration.)

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE. A New Serial Story by Rev. L. S. Keyser. (Continued.)

THE STONES OF MEMORIAL. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Late Ramon Betancourt, The Cuban Evangelist—The Railroad Bridge in the Andes. (See page 652.)

RAMON BETANCOURT.

The Converted Cuban Desperado.

Precocious Diabolism—An Atrocity on a Horse—Attempted Murder—Flight and Sea Life—A Notorious Desperado—Takes Refuge in New York—A Pugilistic Victory—S range Religious Association—Hears of Spanish Evangelistic Services at Trinity Chapel—Plot to Kill the Preacher—His Conversion—Becomes an Evangelist—Set Upon by a Mexican Mob—An Indian Girl's Heroism—His Death.

One of the most remarkable instances in modern times of the power of God's grace to change the heart of the persecutor, and, as in the case of Saul of Tarsus, to use him for the promotion of the persecuted cause, is that of the devoted man who died recently in Brooklyn, N. Y., and whose portrait appears on the preceding page. A few years ago, Ramon Betancourt made his appearance in New York. He was a Cuban, but he had no home there or elsewhere, when he drifted to the great metropolis. The man had been

A Desperado From His Youth.

One incident which occurred when he was only twelve years old has been related to us, which reveals a depth of cruelty inconceivable in so young a child. He deliberately tortured and mutilated a horse with such fiendish atrocity that the details are too horrible for publication. The poor animal had to be killed to put it out of its agony. The punishment meeted out to him for this offence, instead of subduing his evil proclivities, stirred his passions to a murderous pitch. He was determined to revenge himself on the owner of the horse, who had caused his punishment. The young scamp actually set fire to the man's dwelling, fully expecting and intending that his enemy would be burned to death—a result very nearly achieved.

He found it conducive to his safety to absent himself from the locality after that feat, and during the next few years he led at first on shipboard, and afterward in the towns of Spanish America. There were few vices, if any, to which he was not addicted. Gambling and drinking when he had money, burglary and highway robbery when he had none, occupied his time. He was always the first to scent the development of the frequent revolutions in Spanish America, and to make his way to the locality, that he might be ready to take a share in the robbery and bloodshed which might be expected. His bull-dog courage, his powerful frame, and his uncontrolled ferocity made him the terror of any community he visited. The man must fight, and he took a demon's delight in offering taunts and provocations to the biggest and strongest man around, to exasperate him to fighting pitch, when Betancourt would prove himself the king of the company by administering punishment that would prevent any other man disputing his supremacy.

A Wild Life,

In New York,

on his arrival, he avoided prominence for a time. Recent troubles, in which he had been a leader, might involve extradition. For some weeks, therefore, Betancourt's presence in the city was not known, save to a few of the gambling fraternity. Even self-imposed restraint, however, could not be long maintained. Betancourt heard of a powerful Spanish-American, whose prowess and physical strength were vaunted in the Spanish colony of New York. Betancourt could not rest until he had fought that man. He succeeded at length, and his rival's prowess was sung no more.

It was a curious fact—one of those strange anomalies that human nature so often develops—that this desperate man was An Enthusiastic Roman Catholic.

Throughout his mad career he had somehow managed to maintain his adherence to his Church. How any kind of religious feeling could find soil in a nature so thoroughly given up to Satan, and so bent on deeds of violence, can scarcely be conceived. It is a fact, however, that wherever he might go, Betancourt sought out a Roman Catholic church, and scrupulously attended the services. At this time, Bishop Riley was holding services, and preaching in Spanish, in Trinity Chapel, near Madison Square. Betancourt heard of the services, and the fact of their being in his native language aroused his interest. He made inquiries about them, and found that they were Protestant services. The clergyman conducting them was, he was given to understand, undermining the power of the Roman Catholic Church, and was at the head of a movement for spreading the heretical Protestant faith in Mexico. Betancourt's ire was kindled. The two strong passions of his nature were stirred: to kill the enemy of his Church, and at the same time to make the American metropolis ring with seemed to him an achievement after his own heart. He made a reconnoissance of the building in the week, and thought out a plan of operations. By sitting near the middle aisle, he could move quietly from his seat, spring upon the preacher, kill him, and escape by a side door conveniently near the preacher's platform, before any of the audience could stop him. He exulted in the scheme, planned every minute detail, and purchased a long dagger-knife, good for cutting or stabbing, for the instrument.

A Deed of Unparalleled Daring,

Armed with this formidable weapon, Betancourt presented himself at the service and took the seat he had selected. All unconscious of his danger, Dr. Riley opened the service. Doubtless, led by the Holy Spirit, who knoweth all hearts, the Bishop chose for his subject the Conversion of Saul of Tarsus. He dwelt on the earnestness of the man, on his unquestionable sincerity, and on his perfectly assured conviction that his deeds of cruelty were not only justifiable, but meritorious. Taking the reverse side of the picture, Dr. Riley sketched the character of the persecuted people; described their gentleness, their love for each other and the world, their joy and happiness in their faith, which they longed to have others share, and pointed out how Saul's malignity was based on a misconception of their character and aims. Then came the picture of the revelation from Heaven to Saul on his way to Damascus; the persecutor's amazement at discovering that he had been wrong all along, and had been resisting God instead of serving Him.

Betancourt listened intently. He kept deferring the time for the execution of his plot. He even began to hesitate about carrying it out. The preacher seemed gentle, kindly, lovable, not by any means the fierce assailant of the Catholic Church. Rather, he seemed anxious for the good of humanity in general, and of Catholics in particular, desiring them to enter into an experience of higher happiness than they had attained. Finally, the preacher seemed, to Betancourt, to have an insight into his own heart. "The worst man in the audience," Dr. Riley declared, "no matter what his past, no matter what villany he might have in his heart at that moment, would receive a welcome from the loving Saviour if he applied for it. He who forgave Saul of Tarsus waited still with outstretched arms to receive any repentant sinner who sought Him."

Betancourt sat the sermon through, and at its close went to Dr. Riley and asked him if he could have a Spanish Testament. He received one, came again and again to the services, and at last became like a child in gentleness and humility, seeking the Saviour with all his heart. Before making a profession of his faith, he told the foregoing story, and showed the murderous weapon he had carried under his vest the first time he came to the service.

Anxiety for Work

soon manifested itself. He collected, by sheer personal influence, all his rough gambling friends in New York, almost forced them to meet, and then sent for Dr. Riley to come and preach to them. Soon he felt that he must go to Mexico. He went with little argumentative force, little theological knowledge, but with the story of his own conversion, to tell the people of the change in his own heart and life and to invite them to Christ. God blessed his work, and he was instrumental in many conversions. The chief difficulty, almost the only one, that Dr. Riley had with him was in restraining him in the bounds of prudence. He insisted on going to preach at places where certain death must have befallen him at the hands of the fanatical people. Once he evaded Dr. Riley's vigilance and went into a country district to preach. There he was set upon by a mob, who tried to stone him to death. As he lay on the ground, and stones were being brought to crush out his flickering life, a little Indian girl about twelve years old, who had heard him preach, flung herself upon him, and with her frail form protected his head from his assassins. (The portrait of this child, who became an inmate of one of Bishop Riley's schools, appeared last year in this journal, September 1, page 556.) Betancourt was carried away by some Protestant friends, and his wounds were dressed. He recovered, but the injuries he received accelerated a disease from which he was suffering, and compelled his retirement from active work. He returned to New York to end his days. A few weeks ago he passed away, rejoicing in Christ.

Wounded and Bleeding

Our readers are aware of the interest which The Christian Herald has taken in the noble, self-sacrificing endeavors of Bishop Riley to spread the knowledge of the Gospel in Mexico. It cannot do better service in presenting the claims of that enterprise on the Christians of the United States than by printing the following article:

THE SPANISH-SPEAKING NATIONS.

By Bishop H. C. Riley.

There are one hundred and thirteen millions (113,000,000) who speak English. There are seventy-five millions (75,000,000) who speak the Spanish or Portuguese languages. Among those who speak the English tongue there are multitudes who know and love the gospel. Among those who speak the Spanish or Portuguese there are, comparatively, only a few who know and love the gospel in its purity. There are where the Spanish language is spoken, namely, the Kingdom of Spain, and sixteen Spanish-American Republics. Nine of these Spanish-American Republics are in South America, five in Central America, and the remaining two are the West Indian Republic of Santo Domingo, and the Republic of Mexico. The Jews having been expelled from Spain in 1492, many of their number found their way from Europe to the Holy Land, carrying the Spanish language with them, and their descendants have continued to speak that language to this day, so that Spanish is generally spoken in Jerusalem.

Seventeen Distinct Nationalities,

Spain's former possessions in North and South America emancipated themselves from the political rule of the mother country, and became independant republics. Several of these Spanish-American nations have promulgated liberal constitutions, and decreed liberty of worship throughout their domains. There is now in Cuba, Mexico, and a large portion of Central and South America. These liberal movements in Mexico and South America have deeply influenced Spain. Many of the more educated in Spain, Mexico, and in other portions of the vast Spanish-American field, have, to a greater or less degree, separated themselves from the Roman Catholic Church. In the midst of those thus separated in Spain and Spanish-America, a few native Christians, who through the reading of the Holy Scriptures have learned to know and love the pure gospel, have gathered small congregations and faithfully preached the gospel in its purity. Several of these congregations in Spain have been gathered into a general church organization, so that there is now that maintains the faith in its purity and integrity in the ancient kingdom of Spain. In the Republic of Mexico, also, some congregations of tive Christians, in whose midst the pure gos- l has been faithfully preached for years, have en gathered into a Mexican church organiza- n, so that there are native churches, both in ain and in Mexico, that maintain the Chris- n faith in its primitive purity and integrity. iese faithful Spanish and Mexican churches ve, through their authorities, entered into of- ial communion with one another, and are no- working to extend the knowledge of the ith among their fellow-countrymen. Schools ve been established by these churches in ain and in Mexico, where hundreds of bright ys and girls have been carefully educated. me persons of much ability and power are to found among their clergy and leading laity. Most of those connected with these Christian mmunions in Spain and in Mexico have been thered from among the humble poor, who ve been the first to welcome and defend the re gospel in their native lands. To assist their ding workers with the funds needed to ena- e them to continue effectively their Christian ors, the gifts of the faithful in other lands are st pressingly needed. To aid in collecting e needed funds,

Liberty of Worship

A Native Spanish Church,

A Society has Been Organized,

th an office at 43 Bible House, New York, ere contributions can be sent, addressed to shop Riley, care of J. P. Heath. The society asking many to each give something monthly behalf of the work in Mexico.

There are many facts of deep interest con- cted with this work in Spain and Mexico. bly, faithfully, and bravely has that work been essed forward by native Christians, in spite great difficulties. God is with them, guiding d blessing their Christian labors. Many once nk in idolatry have been won through their strumentality to the truth, and have after- rds become the pure gospel. Some former Roman Cath- c ecclesiastics, both in Spain and in Mexico, ve, through the reading of the Holy Scriptures, rned to distinguish between the faith in its rity and the idolatry of Rome, and then by eir faithful labors have greatly aided in engthening these scriptural communions in ain and Mexico.

Faithful Preachers

Among those who have taken part in this rnest Christian work the names of Manuel guas and J. Babtista Cabrera, both of them mer Roman Catholic ecclesiastics, are great- respected. Manuel Aguas (whose portrait d life appeared in this journal on April 7, 87) did a noble work in Mexico, as first Bishop- ct of the Mexican Church of our Lord Jesus rist. He died some years since, rejoicing in Saviour; but the influence of his noble work ll lives in that neighboring land.

. B. Cabrera is now (in 1888) the first Bishop- ct of the Spanish church of which we have oken, and, by God's blessing, is doing a grand rk in Spain. We trust that the blessed in- ence of this Christian work in Spain and xico, may yet extend into the vast continent South America.

Please remember, that the Spanish language now spoken from Jerusalem to the Straits of agellan, near Cape Horn, in South America. the Spanish race with its growing influence n be induced to espouse the cause of a pure th, and to place themselves on the side of an en Bible, and the truth in its primitive purity, ey will become most noble allies in the Chris- n crusade to extend the knowledge of the spel throughout the world. Some who were ce embittered opponents of those who are aching the pure gospel in Spanish, have erwards learned to love the same gospel, and preach it themselves.

Already thirty-seven persons connected with e Mexican Church of our Lord Jesus Christ ve died the martyr's death in Mexico for their ristian faith and labors—murdered by the atical Romanists.

The Romanists in Mexico, who have not hes- ted to stain their hands with Christian blood, in their fanatical efforts to check the progress of the pure gospel in that Republic, have not been slow to use other means to try to gain their object. Efforts have often been made to starve our workers into silence, by trying to take away their means of livelihood. Our leading workers in Mexico, like a little army in a hostile field, need to be supplied from a friendly base of supplies. As this Mexican Christian communion has been gathered from among the humble poor, its leading workers have to look abroad for the aid needed to continue that work effectively. We earnestly ask our Christian friends to aid this precious Christian work in Mexico, by generously contributing in its behalf. Fellow-Christians, please remember that every little helps, and that you can mail your contributions in aid of this precious Christian work at any time directly to the following address:

Bishop H. C. Riley, Care J. P. Heath, Esq., 43 Bible House, New York.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

The German Baron's Æolian Harp.—Mr. Campbell remarks: "There was an old baron in Germany who had a series of wires stretched from the pinnacles of two towers in his castle. Often he would sit in his favorite seat and listen to the wind as it sighed through the wires, causing them to play like a harp. Sometimes the tone would be soft and low, then as the wind rose so did the music, until when a storm came the tone was wild and terrific, an orchestra worthy of the wind. God Himself is the Great Musician, producing in the soul sometimes softest, sweetest notes of love, and other times filling it with alarm because of the deep roar and mighty tumults of stormy trials and tempestuous griefs when 'deep calleth unto deep.'"

A Discharged Soldier's Arrest.—Mr. Lakin says: "I once saw a policeman roughly seize hold of a fine-looking man who was standing at ...street corner, and tell him he was arrested as a deserter. The man, when he heard the charge, instead of continuing to struggle, quickly drew from his pocket a piece of paper, and handed it to the policeman, saying, 'What do you say to that?' It was the man's discharge from the army. He had been a soldier, but was one no longer. The policeman could only beg his pardon, and release him. Satan makes many saints miserable by reminding them of their former sins, and telling them that such sins cannot be forgiven, that they are still soldiers in his army. Let them not be dismayed, but pull out their discharge, upon which is written, 'Thy sins, which are many, are all forgiven thee.' The law cannot arrest you, and you may go on your way rejoicing."

A Disgraced Merchant Prince.—"There Re-sided in Venice a merchant prince who, at first respected and beloved by all who knew him, had fallen under the fell influence of drink, which had dragged him lower and lower, until he was a constant source of disgrace to his two sons, who tried every means to reform him. They got his friends to reason with him, and spiritual men to advise him, but to no avail. At last they determined to make one last supreme effort to save their father. He had invited a large company to spend the evening with him in drinking. His sons being aware of this, went into the dining-room before the company arrived, and with a stick of phosphorus wrote upon the wall, in large-sized letters, in Italian, 'Prepare to meet thy God." The company arrived, and soon were in deep carousal; one by one they dropped under the table, or hung limply over the arm of their chairs. Time went on, the candles went out, the room became dark, and the words written with the phosphorous stood out distinctly. The host moved in his chair, and opened his eyes, which at once fell on the letters of fire. He gazed in astonishment. In a moment the sinfulness of his life appeared to him, and thinking he was about to die, he cried for mercy, pleaded with God for forgiveness, and asked to be kept from the power of strong drink; and he bore testimony years afterwards, that from that moment his chains dropped from him, and he was a free man. God uses many strange instrumentalities by which to call His children to Himself, and if we will not come by gentle wooing He sometimes leads us by fear of judgment."

A Full Forgiveness Granted.—Mr. H Thorne says: "I remember when I was in London, a man came to me at the end of one of my meetings and said, 'I am so glad I came in here to-night, for I feel that now I have some of my sins forgiven.' 'Some of them?' I repeated, in surprise. 'My dear fellow, do you think God deals with the sinner in that way, and forgives some of his sins and not others?' 'I thought so,' said the man. 'No, there is no such thing as half-and-half salvation,' I replied. 'If God would allow us to give up the most of our heart to Him and keep just one little corner with our favorite sins to ourselves, there would be many more professing Christians, but He must have the whole heart or none.' At my request we knelt, and there that man pleaded with God to forgive all his sins for Jesus' sake, and to take full control of his heart. As we rose to our feet he held out his hand to me saying, with a bright look, 'God has forgiven all my sins.' It is gloriously true: 'If we confess our sins He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and cleanse us from all unrighteousness.'"

A Rum-seller Asks to Take the Pledge.— Mr. Ralston remarks: "Not long ago, a well-dressed man came in to a meeting I was conducting and asked to have the pledge given to him. Some of us spoke to him, and found out that he was a seller of strong drink, but that which at the beginning had been his servant, to bring gold to his coffers, had assumed the mastery, and he was now the abject slave of intemperance, and it was to free himself from its thraldom that he wished to pledge himself to abstain. We pressed him to give up the traffic altogether. He replied that he would only be too glad to do so, but he had nothing else to which he could turn his hand. Then he added, very significantly, 'I have prayed God to smash up the whole trade, but while it lasts I cannot give it up.' Of course under the circumstances we refused to give him the pledge, and he went away disappointed. Oh, that such a trade, that ruins all with whom it comes in contact, should be legalized and allowed to flourish in a professedly Christian land—a trade which, while it brings money to its seller, so disgusts him that he is almost ready to give it up to escape from it."

Solemn Scenes during an Earthquake.—"Com-ing across the Atlantic Ocean lately, I met on board ship a young man from Charleston. He had been there when the earthquake took place a few years ago, and referring to the visitation he said, 'I never saw such a time as that. There were people everywhere on bended knees crying to God for mercy. When they felt the earth upheave, and saw the buildings tumble, they thought the end of the world had come. Years ago I left my mother in Scotland, and I never bent my knee to God until the earthquake came. Men who were gambling when the shock came dropped the cards from their hands, and some went away to pray. Men and women in the ballroom stopped in the midst of a wild dance, and hurriedly excusing themselves, went home to pray. 'That was a time of great awakening. The people felt in the mighty throes of nature the hand of an Almighty God. And that young man was not the only one by hundreds who date conversion to Christ from that place and time. But why wait for the arrival of a great danger before you seek mercy? Without time even to offer a prayer you may be cut off. Come just now, when all is calm and you have time, so that in the hour of danger you may rest secure on Christ your Saviour."

The Antichrist Babylon and the Coming o the Kingdom, by G. H. Pember, M. A. A new work of remarkable originality and power, written in a popular and simple style, yet showing much scholarly research, 171 pages; Price in cloth covers, 50 cents. For sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York.

THE THREE GREATEST THINGS TO DO.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday Morning, October 7, 1888.

"The people that do know their God, shall be strong and do exploits." Dan. 11 : 32.

The Deliverance of the Jews from Antiochus Epiphanes—Opportunities Rare for Earning Distinction—Three Great Exploits Possible—I. How a Man may be Saved—From a Felon's Life—From Bankruptcy—II. Opportunities to Save Women—A Girl's Lost Money Replaced—Men who Prey on Needy Women—A Woman in a New York Store—What a Woman is—How Women may be Helped—A Wealthy Man's Daughter Converted—III. Opportunities to Save a Child—A Mother's Estimate of a Child's Value—Where to Get the Strength for Exploits—A Brother Saved from a Shipwreck.

ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES, the old sinner, came down three times with his army to desolate the Jews, advancing one time with a hundred and two trained elephants swinging their trunks this way and that, and sixty-two thousand infantry, and six thousand cavalry troops, and they were driven back. Then, the second time, he advanced with seventy thousand armed men, and had been again defeated. But the third time he laid successful siege until the navy of Rome came in with the flash of their long banks of oars and demanded that the siege be lifted. And Antiochus Epiphanes said he wanted time to consult with his friends about it, and Popilius, one of the Roman embassadors, took a staff and made a circle on the ground around Antiochus Epiphanes, and compelled him to decide before he came out of that circle; whereupon he lifted the siege. Some of the Jews had submitted to the invader, but some of them resisted valorously, as did Eleazer when he had swine's flesh forced into his mouth, spit it out, although he knew he must die for it, and did die for it; and others, as my text says, did exploits.

An exploit I would define to be a heroic act, a brave feat, a great achievement. "Well," you say, "I admire such things, but there is no chance for me; mine is a sort of

A Hum-drum Life.

If I had an Antiochus Epiphanes to fight, I also could do exploits." You are right, so far as great wars are concerned. There will probably be no opportunity to distinguish yourself in battle. The most of the brigadier-generals of this country would never have been heard of had it not been for the war. General Grant would have remained in the useful work of tanning hides at Galena, and Stonewall Jackson would have continued the quiet college professor in Virginia. And whatever military talents you have will probably lie dormant forever.

Neither will you probably become a great inventor. Nineteen hundred and ninety-nine out of every two thousand inventions found in the Patent Office at Washington never yielded their authors enough money to pay for the expenses of securing the patent. So you will probably never be a Morse or an Edison or a Humphrey Davy or an Eli Whitney. There is not much probability that you will be the one out of the hundred that achieves extraordinary success in commercial or legal or medical or literary spheres. What then? Can you have no opportunity to do exploits? I am going to show that there are that are grand, thrilling, far-reaching, stupendous, and overwhelming. They are before you now. In one, if not all three of them, you may do exploits. The three greatest things on earth to do are to save a man, or save a woman, or save a child.

Three Opportunities Open

During the course of his life, almost every man gets into an exigency, is caught between two fires, is ground between two millstones, sits on the edge of some precipice, or in some other way comes near demolition. It may be a financial or a moral or a domestic or a social or a political exigency. You sometimes see it

In Court Rooms.

A young man has got into bad company and he has offended the law, and he is arraigned. All blushing and confused, he is in the presence of judge and jury and lawyers. He can be sent right on in the wrong direction. He is feeling disgraced, and he is almost desperate. Let the District-Attorney overhaul him as though he were an old offender; let the ablest attorneys at the bar refuse to say a word for him, because he cannot afford a considerable fee; let the judge give no opportunity for presenting the mitigating circumstances, hurry up the case, and hustle him up to Auburn or Sing Sing. If he live seventy years, for seventy years he will be a criminal, and each decade of his life will be blacker than its predecessor. In the interregnums of prison life he can get no work, and he is glad to break a window-glass, or blow up a safe, or play the highwayman, so as to get back again within the walls where he can get something to eat, and hide himself from the gaze of the world.

Why don't his father come and help him? His father is dead. Why don't his mother come and help him? She is dead. Where are all the ameliorating and salutary influences of society? They do not touch him. Why did not some one long ago in the case understand that there was an opportunity for the exploit which would be famous in heaven a quadrillion of years after the earth has become scattered ashes in the last whirlwind? Why did not the District-Attorney take that young man into his private office and say: "My son, I see that you are the victim of circumstances. This is your first crime. You are sorry. I will bring the person you wronged into your presence, and you will apologize and make all the reparation you can, and I will give you another chance." Or that young man is presented in the court room, and present, and the judge says: "Who is your counsel?" And he answers: "I have none." And the judge says: "Who will take this young man's case?" And there is a dead halt, and no one offers, and after a while the judge turns to some attorney, who never had a good case in all his life, and never will, and whose advocacy would be enough to secure the condemnation of innocence itself. And the professional incompetent crawls up beside the prisoner, helplessness to rescue despair, when there ought to be a struggle among all the best men of the profession as to who should have the honor of trying to help that unfortunate. How much would such an attorney have received as his fee for such an advocacy? Nothing in dollars, but much every way in a happy consciousness that would make his own life brighter, and his own dying pillow sweeter, and his own heaven happier—the consciousness that he had saved a man!

He has no Friends

So there are commercial exigencies. A very late spring obliterates the demand for spring overcoats and spring hats and spring apparel of all sorts. Hundreds of thousands of people say: "It seems we are going to have no spring, and we shall go straight out of winter into warm weather, and we can get along without the usual spring attire." Or there is no autumn weather, the heat plunging into the cold, and the usual clothing which is a compromise between summer and winter is not required. It makes a difference in the sale of millions and millions of dollars of goods, and some over-sanguine young merchant is caught with a vast amount of unsalable goods that never will be salable again, except at prices ruinously reduced.

That Young Merchant

with a somewhat limited capital is in a predicament. What shall the old merchants do as they see that young man in this awful crisis? Rub their hands and laugh and say: "Good for him. He might have known better. When he has been in business as long as we have, he will not load his shelves in that way. Ha! Ha! He will burst up before long. He had no business to open his store so near to ours anyhow." Sheriff's sale! Red flag in the window: "How much is bid for these out-of-the-fashion spring overcoats and spring hats, or fall clothing out of date? What do I hear in the way of a bid?" "Four dollars." "Absurd; I cannot take that bid of four dollars apiece. Why, these coats when first put upon the market were offered at fifteen dollars each, and now I am offered only four dollars. Is that all? Five dollars, do I hear? Going at that! Gone at five dollars," and he takes the whole lot.

The young merchant goes home that night and says to his wife: "Well, Mary, we will have to move out of this house and sell our piano. That old merchant that has had an evil eye on me ever since I started has bought out all that clothing, and he will have it rejuvenated, and next year put it on the market as new, while we will do well if we keep out of the poor-house.

The Young Man, Broken-spirited, goes to hard drinking. The young wife with her baby goes to her father's house, and not only is his store wiped out, but his home, his morals, and his prospects for two worlds—this and the next. And devils make a banquet of fire and fill their cups of gall, and drink deep to the health of the old merchant who swallowed up the young merchant who got stuck on spring goods and went down. That is one way, and some of you have tried it.

But there is another way. That young merchant who found that he had miscalculated in laying in too many goods of one kind, and been flung of the unusual season, is standing behind the counter, feeling very blue, and biting his finger-nails, or looking over his account-books, which read darker and worse every time he looks at them, and thinks how his young wife will have to be put in a plainer house than she ever expected to live in, or go to a third-rate boarding-house where they have tough liver and sour bread five mornings out of the seven. An old merchant comes in and says: "Well, Joe, this has been a hard season for young merchants, and this prolonged cool weather has put many in the doldrums, and I have been thinking of you a good deal of late, for just after I started in business I once got into the same scrape. Now if there is you out I will gladly do it. Better just put those goods out of sight for the present, and next season we will plan something about them. I will help you to some goods that you can sell for me on commission, and I will go down to one of the wholesale houses and tell them that I know you and will back you up, and if you want a few dollars to bridge over the present, I can let you have them. Be as economical as you can, keep a stiff upper lip, and remember that you have two friends, God and myself. Good morning!" The old merchant goes away, and the young man goes behind his desk, and the tears roll down his cheeks. It is the first time he has cried. Disaster made him mad at everything, and mad at man and mad at God. But this kindness melts him, and the tears seem to relieve his brain, and his spirits rise from ten below zero to eighty in the shade, and he comes out of the crisis.

Anything I can do to Help

About three years after, this young merchant goes into the old merchant's store and says: "Well, my old friend, I was this morning thinking over what you did for me three years ago. You helped me out of an awful crisis in my commercial history. I learned wisdom, and prosperity has come, and the pallor has gone out of my wife's cheeks, and the roses that were there when I courted her in her father's house have bloomed again, and my business is splendid, and I thought I ought to let you know that you saved a man!" In a short time after, the old merchant who had been a good while shaky in his limbs and had poor spells, is called to leave the world, and one morning after he had read the twenty-third Psalm about "The Lord is my Shepherd," he closes his eyes on this world, and an angel who had been for many years appointed to watch the old man's dwelling, cries upward the news that the patriarch's spirit is about descending. And the twelve angels who keep the twelve gates of heaven, unite in crying down this approaching spirit of the old man; "Come in and welcome, for it has been told all over these Celestial lands that you saved a man."

There sometimes come exigencies in the life of a woman. One morning about two years ago I saw in the newspaper that there was a young woman in New York, whose pocketbook containing thirty-seven dollars and thirty-three cents had been stolen, and she had been left without a farthing at the beginning of winter, in a strange city, and no work. And although she was a stranger, I did not allow the 9 o'clock nail to leave the lamp-post on our corner, without carrying the thirty-seven dollars and thirty-three cents; and the case was proved genuine. Now I have read all Shakspere's tragedies, and all Victor Hugo's tragedies, and all Alexander Smith's tragedies, but I never read a tragedy more thrilling than that case, and similar cases by the hundreds and thousands in all our large cities; young women and without work in these great maelstroms of metropolitan life. When such a case comes under your observation, how do you treat it? "Get out of my way, we have no room in our establishment for any more hands. I don't believe in women anyway, they are a lazy, idle, worthless set. John, please show this person out of the door." Or do you compliment her personal appearance, and say things to her which if any man said to your sister or daughter you would kill him on the spot? That is one way, and it is tried every day in these large cities, and many of those who advertise for female hands in factories, and for governesses in families, have proved themselves unfit to be in any place outside of hell.

Without Money and Without Home

But there is another way, and I saw it the other day in the Methodist Book Concern in New York, where a young woman applied for work and the gentleman in tone and manner said in substance: "My daughter, we employ women here, but I do not know of any vacant place in our department. You had better inquire at such and such a place, and I hope you will be successful in getting something to do." The embarrassed and humiliated woman seemed to give way to Christian confidence. She started out with a hopeful look that I think must have won for her a place in which to earn her bread. I rather think that considerate and Christian gentleman saved a woman. New York and Brooklyn ground up last year about thirty thousand young women, and would like to grind up about as many this year. Out of all that long procession of women who march on with no hope for this world or the next, battered and bruised and scoffed at, and flung off the precipice, not one but might have been saved for home and God and heaven. But good men and good women are not in that kind of business. Alas for that poor thing! nothing but the thread of that sewing-girl's needle held her, and the thread broke.

I have heard men tell in public discourse what a man is; but what is a woman? Until some one shall give a better definition, I will tell you

What a Woman Is.

Direct from God, a sacred and delicate gift, with affections so great that no measuring line short of that of the infinite God can tell their bound. Fashioned to refine and soothe and lift and irradiate home and society and the world. Of such value that no one can appreciate it, unless his mother lived long enough to let him understand it, or who in some great crisis of life, when all else failed him, had a wife to reinforce him with a faith in God that nothing could disturb. Speak out, ye cradles, and tell of the feet that rocked you and the anxious faces that hovered over you! Speak out, ye nurseries of all Christendom, and ye homes, whether desolate or still in full bloom with the faces of wife, mother, and daughter, and help me to define what woman is.

But as geographers tell us that the depths of the sea correspond with the heights of the mountains, I have to tell you that good womanhood is not higher up than bad womanhood is deep down. The grander the palace, the more awful the conflagration that destroys it. The grande the steamer Oregon, the more terrible her going down just off the coast. Now I should not wonder if you trembled a little with a sense of responsibility when I say that there is hardly a person in this house but may have An Opportunity to Save a Woman.

It may in your case be done by good advice, or by financial help, or by trying to bring to bear some one of a thousand Christian influences. You would not have to go far. If, for instance, you know among your acquaintances a young woman who is apt to appear on the streets about the hour when gentlemen return from business, and you find her responding to the smile of entire strangers, hogs that lift their hat, go to her and plainly tell her that nearly all the destroyed womanhood of the world began the downward path with that very behavior.

Or if, for instance, you find a woman in financial distress and breaking down in health and spirits trying to support her children, now that her husband is dead or an invalid, doing that very important and honorable work, but which is little appreciated, keeping a boarding-house, where all the guests, according as they pay small board, or propose, without paying any board at all, to decamp, are critical of everything and hard to please, busy yourselves in trying to get her more patrons, and tell her of divine sympathy. Yea, if you see a woman favored of fortune and with all kindly surroundings, finding in the hollow flatteries of the world her chief regalement, living for herself and for time as if there were no eternity, strive to bring her into the kingdom of God, as did the other day a Sabbath-school teacher, who was the means of

The Conversion of the Daughter of a man of immense wealth, and the daughter resolved to join the church, and she went home and said: "Father, I am going to join the church and I want you to come." "Oh, no," he said, "I never go to church." "Well," said the daughter, "if I were going to be married, would you not go to see me married?" And he said: "Oh, yes." "Well," said she, "this is of more importance than that." So he went, and has gone ever since, and loves to go. I do not know but that faithful Sabbath-school teacher not only saved a women, but saved a man. There may be in this audience, gathered from all parts of the world, the most cosmopolitan assembly in all the earth, there may be a man whose behavior toward womanhood has been perfidious. Repent! Stand up, thou masterpiece of sin and death, that I may charge you! As far as possible, make reparation. Do not boast that you have her in your power and that she cannot help herself. When that fine collar and cravat and that elegant suit of clothes comes off and your uncovered soul stands before God, you will be better off if you save that woman.

There is another exploit you can do, and that is

To Save a Child.

A child does not seem to amount to much. It is nearly a year old before it can walk at all. For the first year and a half it cannot speak a word. For the first ten years it would starve if it had to earn its own food. For the first fifteen years its opinion on any subject is absolutely valueless. And then there are so many of them. My! what lots of children! And some people have contempt for children. They are good for nothing but to wear out the carpets and break things and keep you awake nights crying. Well, your estimate of a child is quite different from that mother's estimate who lost her child this summer. They took it to the salt air of the seashore and to the tonic air of the mountains, but no help came, and the brief paragraph of its life is ended. Suppose that life could be restored by purchase, how much would that bereaved mother give? She would take all the jewels from her fingers and neck and bureau and put them down. And if told that that was not enough, she would take her house and make over the deed for it, and if that were not enough, she would call in all her investments, and put down all her mortgages and bonds, and if told that were not enough, she would say: "I have made over all my property, and if I can have that child back I will now pledge that I will toil with my own hands and carry with my own shoulders in any kind of hard work, and live in a cellar and die in a garret. Only give me back that lost darling!" I am glad that there are those who know something of

The Value of a Child.

Its possibilities are tremendous. What will those hands yet do? Where will those feet yet walk? Toward what destiny will that never-dying soul betake itself? Shall those lips be the throne of blasphemy or benediction? Come, chronologists, and calculate the decades on decades, the centuries on centuries, of its lifetime. Oh, to save a child! Am I not right in putting that among the great exploits?

But what are you going to do with those children who are worse off than if their father or mother had died the day they were born? There are tens of thousands of such. Their parentage was against them. Their name is against them. The structure of their skulls against them. Their nerves and muscles contaminated by the inebriety or dissoluteness of their parents; they are practically at their birth laid out on a plank in the middle of the Atlantic Ocean, in an equinoctial gale, and told to make for shore. What to do with them is the question often asked. There is another question quite as pertinent, and that is, what are they going to do with us? They will, ten or eleven years from now, have as many votes as the same number of well-born children, and they will hand this land over to anarchy and political damnation just as sure as we neglect them. Suppose we each one of us save a boy or save a girl. You can do it. Will you? I will.

How Shall We Get Ready for one or all of these three exploits? We shall make a dead failure if in our own strength we try to save a man or woman or child. But my text suggests where we are to get equipment. "The people that do know their God shall be strong, and do exploits." We must know Him through Jesus Christ in our own salvation and then we shall have His help in the salvation of others. And while you are saving strangers you may save some of your own kin. You think your brothers and sisters and children and grandchildren all safe, but they are not dead, and no one is safe till he is dead. On the English coast there was in the offing, and the cry was: "Man the lifeboat!" But Harry, the usual leader of the sailor's crew, was not to be found, and they went without him, and brought back all the shipwrecked people but one. By this time, Harry, the leader of the crew, appeared and said: "Why did you leave that one?" The answer was: "He could not help himself at all, and we could not get him into the boat." "Man the lifeboat!" shouted Harry, "and we will go for that one." "No," said his aged mother, standing by, "you must not go. I lost your father in a storm like this, and your brother Will went off six years ago, and I have not heard a word from Will since he left, and I don't know where he is, poor Will, and I cannot let you also go, for I am old and dependent on you." His reply was: "Mother, I must go and save that one man, and if I am lost, God will take care of you in your old days."

A Wild Storm, and a Wreck

The lifeboat put out, and after an awful struggle with the sea, they picked the poor fellow out of the rigging just in time to save his life, and started for the shore. And as they came within speaking distance, Harry cried out: "We saved him, and tell mother it was brother Will." Oh, yes, my friends, let us start out to save some one for time and for eternity, some man, some woman, some child. And who knows but it may, directly or indirectly, be the salvation of one of our own kindred, and that will be an exploit worthy of celebration when the world itself is shipwrecked, and the sun has gone out like a spark from a smitten anvil, and all the stars are dead!

A NIGHT AT FLORENCE MISSION.

THE work carried on at the famous institution in Bleecker Street, New York, has grown rapidly since the founder of it, Mr. Crittenden, consecrated the whole of his time and property to the Lord's service after the death of his beloved wife. On a recent evening, many valuable testimonies were given, from among which we select the following:

A Betrayed English Woman.

Much interest was felt in the testimony of a person who had just returned from England. On the voyage out, one of her fellow-passengers had confided in her, and told her so much of the Florence Mission and what she owed to it, that she determined to come and see it when she returned to New York, and to encourage the workers by reporting what she had seen and heard. She said that her fellow-passenger was a young lady of education and refinement. She was living in a happy home in England, when she was fascinated by a man, who betrayed her, and had persuaded her to escape disgrace among her friends by eloping with him to America. She fell ill in New York, her companion deserted her, and she was taken to a hospital. There she was visited by a lady who had been rescued and converted at the Florence Mission. The sick girl was very near death, and believing she could never recover, was induced to give herself to Christ. But to the astonishment of all, she recovered, and her Florence Mission friend took her to Bleecker Street, where she stayed some time, helping in the work and giving her testimony for Jesus. She wrote to her home, and learned that a welcome awaited her. She immediately set out for England repentant, but rejoicing. The lady who was her fellow-passenger, and who told the story last week, said that none were so active in Christian work on board as this rescued girl.

A Young Hebrew

gave a remarkable testimony for Christ. He said he was twenty-one years of age. One evening, when passing the Florence Mission, the sound of music and singing attracted him. He was passionately fond of music, and he entered the building to see what was going on. He sat down and listened. The Holy Spirit blessed the testimonies he heard and the appeals made, and he was deeply moved. Mrs. Lily Van Dun, who has been a most earnest worker at the mission, noticed his emotion, and seating herself near him, she told him of Jesus of Nazareth, and urged him to become a Christian. She prayed with him, and finding that there were strong obstacles to his conversion not to be easily overcome, she gained his promise to come again to the mission. He came, and finally admitted that his Jewish father was bitterly opposed to Christianity, and he dreaded the effect of his becoming a Christian. Soon afterward he was stricken with illness, and sent a note to the mission, asking for Mrs. Van Dun to visit him. She went, and had the joy of leading him to Christ. Standing up in the mission the other night, he spoke of his recovery from his sickness, declared himself on the Lord's side, and pledged himself to labor in the cause of his Saviour at any cost to himself and his fortune.

Two Rescued Girls

next told their story. It appeared that two wealthy New York men had found them given to frivolity, fond of dress, and disposed to flirtation, but otherwise virtuous, though without religious principle. They were dazzled by the brilliant promises of luxury, of jewels and magnificent dresses, which they might have by living with the men in New York, and at length yielded to their solicitation. To do the men justice, the promises had been kept. Money had been lavished upon them without stint. They had enjoyed every luxury that money could buy, and pleasure of all kinds had been afforded them. A carriage and ponies were provided for their use, and costly jewels were given to them. Florence Mission workers, however, heard of them, and visited them. They were led to see the awful iniquity of the life they were leading, and were brought to seek Christ for mercy. They quitted their luxurious home, gave up the wages of sin, renounced the gay clothing and the rich jewels that had been given to them, and declared their resolve to live henceforward for Christ, whatever of hardship or poverty it might involve.

AN OCTOGENARIAN'S CONVERSION.

AN interesting letter to the Church from the Rev. Hunter Corbett, D. D., who is laboring at So An in China, contains the following striking instance of filial love winning a soul for Christ: At one of our little churches in the country it was my privilege last month to baptize a widow eighty-three years of age. Ten years ago her youngest son became an earnest Christian, and has been growing in wisdom and grace continually. From the first this son has been deeply concerned for his mother's salvation. He not only prayed for her daily, but often asked the Christians to join him in prayer, and go with him to his home and plead with his mother. Her constant reply was, she was too old to learn a new religion. She would neither study nor come to the church, although only a few footsteps from her door. Last autumn she seemed to awaken as from a dream. She wondered what made the difference between her younger son and her two older ones, who many years ago went to Manchuria, and since then had done nothing for her support, but had repeatedly sent for their younger brother and wished him to desert her. She argued if it is Christianity which makes her son and his wife, also an earnest Christian, willing to labor diligently for her support, and show her every kindness in their power, then this truth must be priceless, even if there is no reward hereafter. She resolved to begin a new life. Since then she has been studying and praying with child-like faith and humility. The clear evidence she gave of having grasped the truth, and a fixed purpose to trust only in Jesus for salvation, filled every heart with joy. Her very features spoke of inward peace and joy. The careworn and anxious face of former years was so changed that even her heathen neighbors were filled with wonder. Her daughter, a bright and gifted woman, was baptized at the same time on profession of faith.

A CONSECRATED TEN-DOLLAR BILL.

A CLERGYMAN in New York who recently called at the office of this journal, has a ten-dollar bill with remarkable associations. It was given to him in Vesey Street on July 28 last to use in the Lord's work. Eight years ago, in the same place, he met an old friend whom he had not seen for many years, not, in fact, since they were young men enjoying themselves, not in the most profitable way, in New York. They had been employed in business houses in the city, but the clergyman's friend had inherited a considerable sum of money, and had given up his situation to attend to the investment of his fortune. When they met in 1880, they naturally inquired of each other as to the results of the years which had elapsed since they separated. The man who had inherited the fortune said that he had bought property, but had given too much for it. Other losses had compelled him to mortgage it heavily. It had stood unoccupied for some time, the interest on the mortgage was in arrears, and foreclosure was threatened. He could not sell the property, he had no funds, and was intensely miserable. He had been trying to get work but had failed. He had been promised employment in the shops of the Erie road, but on applying, one boss had sent him to another, until he was wearied out, and had come away disgusted. So despairing was he that, coming over the ferry that morning, he was strongly tempted to throw himself overboard.

The clergyman then related his history during the past years. He told how he had been brought to God and used in His service. Then, encouraging his friend, he said, "You must give yourself to Jesus—you and your wife. Do not think of the awful crime of suicide. Go to God for mercy, and all will come right." A time was appointed for special prayer together, and eventually both the man and his wife were saved. Prayer was offered about the money trouble also. On the same night, a messenger came to the despairing man, requesting him to call again at the Erie shops. He did so, and was taken on at five dollars a day to start with, and his immediate wants were thus relieved. The property, however, was still in danger of foreclosure, and prayer was offered about that. When the two friends met in Vesey Street, last July, the man joyfully produced a roll of bills. "The value of that property is going up fast," he said. "I have sold one lot, and I am coming out right." He initialled one ten-dollar bill and handed it to his friend. "That is part of the first-fruits," he said. "I want to give it to the Lord. He sent it in answer to prayer. I owe it all to Him."

A DEFORMED CHILD CURED.

IN an interesting report from Rev. G. Morris, which Mrs. M. Baxter publishes in Thy Healer,* is the following account of the recovery of a little child from one of the most painful and distressing maladies that can afflict a human being: I went down to the country ten months ago, there was in the house where I was staying, a dear little one three years old, who suffered with a curved spine—it was a sort of half-circle. The poor little thing could only stand a little while leaning against her mother's knee. The mother told me she was getting worse, and the local physician said she must be kept lying down, and an instrument made for her which she must wear. That seemed painful to me in the presence of the Lord; but I had not confidence then that the mother would be able to join me in receiving the blessing from the Lord. I prayed to the Lord, and asked Him what to do. Then I told her what I had in my mind, and said: "If you can be present with faith in the Lord that He will do the work, I would much prefer you should be present." She said she wished to be present. I said to her—for a day was not important—"I should much prefer if you would bring that child to me to-morrow morning, and meantime I will lay myself in an attitude of prayer before the Lord." Well, she brought the child. I, however, put both my hands round the dear child's back, with her clothes on, and the next morning, at the same hour, the little thing walked up two flights of stairs, and last Monday-week that little creature walked up to me at Speldhurst—a distance of about two miles—and back again. She is a beautiful witness for the Lord. She knows it is Jesus who healed her.

A DESPAIRING WIFE.

THE miseries that result from child marriages in India are never realized fully, save by the unhappy victims. One of these, evidently a well-educated girl, reveals some of the horrors in a sorrowful letter published in the Indian Witness of Calcutta. She says: "If you, sir, search Hindoo society, you will find thousands of girls situated as I am. Parents, as you and your readers know, have the arrangement of marriages. The chief contracting parties have not a word to say in the matter: unhappiness is not unfrequently the result. The powers placed in the hands of parents are often abused. It is all very well to say that these natural guardians of young people will so arrange for their future as to secure for them the largest amount of happiness possible in a world full of sorrow, change, and suffering. But people who argue in this way, forget that human nature is weak, and human motives are operated on by many injurious causes. Greed of gold is the chief source whence flow unhappy marriages. Take my case: I was sold by my avaricious parents and ill-educated brothers, for 100 rupees [abo

* Thy Healer and Faith Witness, a monthly Magazine edited by Mrs. M. Baxter, contains original articles on Holiness and Healing, Authentic Testimonies of Divine Healing, and Items of Intelligence from Heathen Lands where missionaries are laboring in faith, soliciting no help from man, but relying solely on God for support. Annual Subscription, 75 cents, may be sent to Manager of CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York.

50]—a paltry sum, indeed—to a miserable retch whose disease makes him a loathsome bject. I shrink from his very touch. His resence is irksome to me. I am often filled ith thoughts of self-destruction. If I may not me day rid myself of the burden of life by sting myself into some friendly tank or well, some of my equally unfortunate sisters do, y life must be weariness and a burden."

THE FIRST RESURRECTION.

By Rev. John Urquhart

WHAT is the Scripture doctrine regarding the rst Resurrection? The meaning of the words Rev. 20 : 4-6) is unmistakable. It is that the esurrection of all the dead is not simultaneous. here are favored ones who will rise first. These ill reign with Christ for a thousand years, and hen the thousand years close, the rest of the ead will be raised, the present mode of life upon e earth will be brought to an end, and there ill be a new heaven and a new earth (Rev. 21 : . But, explicit as these statements are, the octrine is so startling that we naturally inquire hether there is anything to show that they are

To be Taken Literally.

there anything said elsewhere in Scripture re-rding the first Resurrection? We have a simi- representation in Dan. 7 : 27: "And the ngdom and the dominion, and the greatness the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall given to the people of the saints of the Most igh: His kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, d all dominions shall serve and obey Him." nd the book closes with a promise which ap-ars to give to Daniel, himself, this very hope the first Resurrection: "Go thou thy way till e end be: for thou shalt rest, and shalt stand thy lot at the end of the days." (12 : 13.)

There are references to the same truth in sev-al passages of the New Testament. Paul says in Thess. 4 : 16, 17, that "the dead in Christ shall e first: then we who are alive and remain all be caught up together with them in the uds, to meet the Lord in the air: so shall we er be with the Lord." The Resurrection of e dead in Christ is here spoken of as d as taking place while the earthly life of the tions still continues. In 1 Cor. 15 : 23, 24, the surrection is described as having three stages epochs: "But every man in his own order: rist the firstfruits; afterward they that are rist's at His coming. Then cometh the end, en He shall have delivered up the kingdom God, even the Father."

An Event by Itself,

There is the resurrection of Christ, who, with erfect and complete humanity, with a body well as a spirit redeemed from death and the ve, has passed into the presence of God, the stfruits of that mighty harvest which will yet reaped from the fields of sin and death. That he first stage. The second is the resurrec-n of those that are Christ's at His coming. e third is what the Scripture names "the d," that is, the end of Christ's mediatorial rk, and of the period of grace—the time of last resurrection and of the eternal judg-nt, and the kingdom is given up to God.

We have another reference to the same hope Phil. 3 : 11. The Apostle explains the pur-se of his unceasing endeavor to reach still her heights in Christian life. He states it in se words, "If by any means I might attain to the Resurrection of the dead." What does mean? No man, bad or good, will be able escape the Resurrection, and if there is no arate and anterior resurrection of the Christ-e, the Apostle's words are pointless. But if understand him to look onward to his first urrection from the dead, everything is clear. desires to make sure of his being one with rist now, that he may be one with Christ then. et us ask now, what is those who will in this way be claimed by the n Redeemer as His own? They will share triumph. They will not be mere spectators His glory: they will be participators in it. "I saw thrones," says the Apostle, "and they sat upon them." "The kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High." (Dan. 7 : 27.) Who may tell the glory of that dominion, which is after the image of Christ's? What earthly dominion equals His now? Which, of all that men have ever known, has been so founded on the heart's deepest affections, which has so grasped the inmost thought, so swayed the deepest purposes, so purged the desire and imagination, and so moulded anew the soul of man? What beauties and noblenesses and glories have risen up in man's life under the rule of Jesus! What divine peace, what God-like joy and splendor have revealed His presence in the human heart!

The Glory Reserved

And if all this has marked His sway during this period of waiting, what shall we say of it when the kingdom is made His in very truth, and the earth is indeed the Lord's? What shall it be when hearts are His as they have never been His yet, when every opposing power has been swept away, when God's will and not man's shall be accomplished everywhere, when the earth shall be the place of fullness and joy God meant it to be, and every life shall attain to His ideal? If we could conceive and express the glory of that reign, we should be able to say what our glory will be. Incredible as it may appear, this is the future for us. We shall reign with Him, and hold the earth for God.

THE NEW JERUSALEM.

By P. H. Gosse.

Its Descent—Magnitude, Boundaries, and Inhabitants—Its Foundations—The Light of the City—The Gateways in the Walls—Intercommunication between Heaven and Earth.

IN Revelation 21 we read of a heavenly city, 16,000 furlongs, i.e., 1,500 square miles, which is to descend from God out of heaven, into our atmosphere at the Second Advent of Christ, and to be suspended over the earthly Jerusalem. No doubt the sudden coming into sight, from heavenly space, of a glittering object, unknown to astronomers, self-luminous, above the brightness of the sun, steadily approaching, till it enters our atmosphere, and comes into close proximity to this globe,

Transcends all Human Experience, and defies all natural philosophy. But the epoch is an epoch of miracle: the Almighty God is henceforth visibly interposing; and is not bound by natural laws, which He made, and which He can interrupt, or counteract, at His pleasure. The suspension of a non-rotating cubic mass, 1,500 miles every way, in our atmosphere or near it, composed of such materials as gold and gems, and inhabited by millions of human beings, in bodies, however ethereal, would surely so augment and throw out of bearing, the specific gravity of the earth, so alter its relations to the sun, to the moon, even to all the other planets, as to be inconceivable and impossible! Nay; I dare not say so. What compensations the "Upholder of all things" (Col. 1 : 17; Heb. 1 : 3) may make for the anticipated disturbances, I cannot conjecture. My business is with His Word. "Hath He spoken, and shall He not make it good?" I am sure He will; though how, I do not know.

What is described is a City, an aggregation of human dwellings; with walls, and gates, and

One Broad Street

(plateia), through which a river runs. How the many mansions are arranged inter se is not told; but the whole forms a perfect cube of 12,000 stadia in length and breadth and height. Suspended, with its centre over Jerusalem, its boundaries will reach to the shore of the Euxine northward; to Nubia and the middle of Arabia southward; to the Caspian and the Persian Gulf eastward; to Greece and the Sahara westward. If we consider London as covering 100 square miles, and containing 4,000,000 inhabitants (or a million to twenty-five square miles), then this Heavenly City, including 900,000 square miles, would contain 36,000,000,000; supposing it only a plane surface, like London; but immensely more as a cube. So that there will be plenty of room for

"The Redeemed to Walk There!"

I suppose this cube to face the earth cornerwise; to consist, indeed, of two pyramids, placed base to base, of which the upper will be the city-proper, and the lower will consist of twelve glorious foundations. These foundations are the most remarkable feature in the whole material structure; and they form its distinctive character; "the City that hath the foundations."

Each of these twelve foundations is one vast slab of precious stone; what we know only in minute atoms! but, even so, the most costly objects that earth produces. Each a slab of ninety miles in thickness, diminishing, in succession from 1,500 miles square (the first) to an inverted square pyramid of 150 miles' base (the twelfth). Imagine such immense slabs of jasper (probably diamond), sapphire, emerald, laid one over another, yet suffering no diminution of translucency; for the whole is said to be "clear as crystal." Imagine the light of the blazing Glory of God flashing down from the Throne, through these gemmeous foundations; the combined effect of the various hues producing an

Unimaginably Beautiful Radiance

to the beholders on earth; while all around there appear broad edges of diverse color, where each slab, in the increasing pyramid, overlaps its successor! To secure this extraordinary magnificence in the eyes of Israel below, is no doubt the object of this pyramidal arrangement of slabs, and of the suspension above the earth.

We know that, after the Resurrection, "they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars" (Dan. 12 : 3); that, when the Lord Jesus was transfigured "His face did shine as the sun, and His raiment was white as the light" (Matt. 17 : 2); and that, when He arrested Saul at Damascus, "a light from heaven, above the brightness of the sun at midday" (Acts 26 : 13) shone. Above all, "the Glory of God doth lighten this City, and the Lamb is the lamp thereof." What inconceivable intensity of brightness, then, will pervade every part of this pyramidal City, and flame down, softened and tinted by the clear but colored media, on the Sanctuary in the earthly Jerusalem, and worshippers beneath! The wall is pierced by which, as they are never closed, must be considered as magnificent portals to the main broad-streets, each surmounted by an enormous globe of purest pearly lustre and iridescence, inscribed with a name of one of the Tribes of Israel. These gates are 350 miles apart; and so, consequently, are the great broad-streets: so that we may suppose myriads of subordinate streets, sudividing the area of the City. And, besides these, other streets and terraces, rising on beauteous arches and on pillars, mansion above mansion, tier above tier, even to the very summit of the vast pyramid.

Three Gateways on Each Side,

What is the use of these open gates? No stranger will ever be admitted there: nor will the perfected Bride ever be augmented. Yet some intercommunication between the heavenly and the earthly seems implied. The glory and honor of the nations, and of their kings are brought to (eis) it; and this is said in connection with the ever-open gates. And the leaves of the Tree of Life are transmitted to the nations, till death is wholly done away. Perhaps there may be a grand stairway, like that of Jacob's vision, leading from every pearly portal to the earth below. And as an angel is stationed at each, these may still be ministering spirits to redeemed men of the earthly family.

An Invaluable Work on Prophecy by G. H. Pember, M. A., entitled "The Great Prophecies concerning the Jews the Gentiles, and the Church of God," is for sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York. It is written in a most popular and eloquent style, and describes the impending fulfilment of Revelation and Daniel, and is illustrated by a colored chart. 458 pages. Price, including postage, $1.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.
OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

EVERY NUMBER CONTAINS:

The Portrait and Biography of some eminent person.
The Sermon by Dr. Talmage preached the last Sunday morning.
An Exposition of Unfulfilled Prophecy.
A Summary of the Events of the Week, Notes of Religious and Temperance Movements, etc.
A Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, of London, from advance sheets sent by special arrangement.
Pictures of Missionary Life, etc., and Descriptive Articles.
An instalment of a Serial Story.
An Exposition of the International Sunday-School Lesson, by Mrs. M. Baxter.

SUBSCRIPTION, $1.50.
ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION.
Single Copies, Price Three Cents, may be obtained by order of any Newsdealer.

NOTICE.

A concession in price will be made to subscribers desiring to introduce THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to ministers, evangelists, or personal friends. It will be mailed regularly every week to any address in the United States or Canada, from September 20 to the end of the year 1888, for twenty-five cents. Address The Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President's Message Accompanying his signature of the Chinese exclusion bill, which was sent to Congress, on October 1, was doubtless an effort to place the legislative act in its most favorable aspect, for the benefit of other peoples as well as our own. Some such effort was evidently necessary, though the President must have found it somewhat difficult. His defence of the measure, and of his own part in ratifying it, is based on the contention that so long as the Chinese Government had not decided whether to accept or reject the treaty, the bill was to be regarded as merely a machinery, designed to give effect to the treaty and as contingent on its acceptance. But so soon as China rejected the treaty it became a defensive law, necessary to give this country the protection which was the object sought under the treaty. Mr. Cleveland holds that China had of her own free will proposed to establish a system of strict prohibition of the departure of her laborers for the United States, including such as had once been here and returned home. But the control of her Government over their movements was not complete, and it was recognized that the only effective exclusion must operate upon this side of the Pacific. It is also suggested that this mode of solving the difficulty will be more acceptable to the Chinese Government than the ratification of the treaty, as it relieves that Government of responsibility and saves it from complications with other nations.

The Republican Tariff Bill was Presented to the Senate on October 3. It is now claimed that it would effect a total reduction of nearly seventy-four millions, which is only some three millions less than the total reached by the Mills bill, for which it is offered as a substitute. It differs, however, from that measure in the method of effecting the reduction. While Mr. Mills placed raw wool on the free list, the Republican bill raises the duty on that article by a cent a pound. On the other hand, it sweeps away the sugar duties, now yielding $27,759,783, the tax on tobacco, of $24,371,460, and proposes to abolish the revenue on alcohol used in the arts, now producing about $7,000,000. The additions to the free list are estimated at $6,428,095, and the changes in the schedules generally, effect a reduction of $8,109,654. It must be remembered that in both measures the exact effect of a change in the revenue can only be accurately gauged in cases of total abolition, as it is likely that when the duty on any article is only decreased, the decrease may stimulate consumption, and so the total revenue from the duty at the lower rate may be as large as that from the higher rate. Those Democratic journals which represent the Randall wing of the party are urging Democrats to accept the new bill, pass it as the only practical solution of the problem, and send it to the President before the election in November. If the advice were to be taken, it would be one of the most remarkable and momentous political surprises in our history.

A Curious Interpretation of the Civil Service reform law appears to have been made by Gen. S. V. Benet, and it is not surprising that his political opponents brought it last week before Congress. Gen. Benet came to the conclusion that the object of the new law was to effect an equal division of the offices between the two political parties, and, therefore, that it was necessary, the Republicans having been so long in power, that now in employing or discharging employés of any or all grades in the Government arsenals and armories, other things being equal and qualifications satisfactory, Democrats be favored. This rule, as Gen. Benet was careful to explain, was intented to apply "to women and children as well as to men." The civil service commission is endeavoring to secure the application of the rules to the arsenals and armories. If it succeeds, the military officials will, like their civil brethren, discover that the law was not designed to discriminate between Democratic and Republican women and children, but simply and exclusively between efficient and non-efficient applicants for employment.

Distressing Reports of Disasters on the Lakes were received on October 2. On Lake Huron a wild storm raged throughout the night. One fatality was peculiarly sad. A steamtug which was towing six heavily laden barges, made her way with immense difficulty to the harbor of refuge at Sand Beach, but, just as she entered, the tow-line broke, and the six barges drifted out helplessly before the gale. On one of the barges were six men and a woman, and learning the fact, the life-saving crew went to their rescue. They succeeded in taking all the seven off the barge just as it was going to pieces. As it was impossible to return to the harbor in the storm and darkness, the brave fellows put their boat before the wind, and rowed untiringly the whole night through. About seven o'clock they sighted Port Sanilac, and steered their craft for that point. As they rounded the headland a tremendous wave struck the boat and capsized it. The life-saving crew and two of the men from the barge succeeded in swimming ashore, but the other four men and the woman were drowned. From other points news comes of wreck, but it is hoped no other lives were lost.

A Welcome Report of Abatement in the Yellow fever mortality was sent out from Jacksonville, Fla., last week. On Tuesday the gratifying record was made for the first time in many weeks, of no death from the scourge in the preceding twenty-four hours. On Thursday there was only one death. On that day, the figures for the entire epidemic stood at a total of 2,971 cases, and 271 deaths. The number of new cases each day of the week ranged from 75 to 100, but it was observed that they developed in houses previously infected. From this fact the encouraging inference was drawn that the infection was no longer in the air, but was localized. There is no reason, unhappily, at present, for any relaxation of the benevolent efforts for the relief of the sufferers. Now, and probably for a long time to come, many families must depend on outside benevolence. Both the families who stayed in the city, and those who went to the camps and, in some cases, even to the woods for refuge, have exhausted their resources, and will require help to enable them to live until business begins to resume its wonted course. There is ground for thankfulness that though the epidemic has been very severe, the proportion of deaths has been smaller than in some former visitations. This is doubtless due to the heroic fidelity to duty displayed by physicians, nurses, and kind Christian helpers. Among the interesting facts mentioned in connection with the scourge is the efficacy of a very simple remedy. It is stated that the eating of bananas, or the drinking of a decoction of them, frequently produces most beneficial results, especially in the earlier stage of the seizure.

An Extraordinary Series of Brutal Murders has appalled London. During a few weeks past seven women, belonging to the most vicious and degraded class in the city, have been put to death. All the crimes have evidently been committed by the same person. The murderer appears to act with no motive of robbery. He cuts his victim's throat and then horribly mutilates the body, taking away with him one and the same organ from the intestines. His work shows signs of a familiar acquaintance with the anatomy of the human body. A surgeon stated, however, at the inquest of one of the victims, that such knowledge might be possessed by a butcher, and was not necessarily proof that the criminal was a surgeon. The police are absolutely at fault, and though two murders were committed in the heart of London on Sept. 30, no clue to the murderer has been obtained.

The Publication of the Extracts from Emperor Frederick's diary continues to be a prominent subject of discussion throughout Europe. The proprietors of the journal in which they were published, being threatened with prosecution for contumacy, have informed the Government who it was that furnished them with the extracts. They stated that they had received them from Professor Geffcken, of Hamburg, who enjoyed the confidence of the late Emperor. Dr. Geffcken lived in London several years—as he had previously in Berlin—in the capacity of Hanseatic Minister Resident. He is a frequent contributor to English magazines on German politics. He was arrested at Hamburg on September 30. Hamburg being a free city, extradition proceedings were necessary, and his case has been remitted to the Supreme Court at Leipsic. Bismarck has developed a strong animosity against Geffcken, who he not unnaturally regards as an enemy to his fame, as the German people have learned from the diary that Bismarck had far less to do with achieving German unity than was popularly supposed. Still more bitter does he feel toward the late Emperor's widow, whom he unjustly suspects of prompting the publication.

In the Prevalent Anxiety as to Mr. H. M. Stanley, the interview with Lieut. Mason Schufeldt, of the U. S. Navy, published last week, affords welcome encouragement. Lieut. Schufeldt has been twice down the East African coast, three times to China, and twice around the world in opposite directions. He crossed Madagascar in 1884-5 with 500 men, only 154 finishing the journey, and escaped across the Mozambique Channel in an open boat. When asked his opinion of Stanley's present whereabouts, he said he was convinced that "the explorer may be following the Aruwimi River in the hope, as many travellers suppose, that that river has its rise in one of the great chain of African lakes; or he may have crossed that river and be travelling north to reach Wadelai. He had with him sufficient stores for a long isolation from outside aid. Generally speaking, the African races themselves are neither belligerent nor treacherous. Only when incited by some outside influence, the promises of reward on the part of the slave-dealers, or their threats, do they show marked hostility to the pure European. It is the terrible slave-trade, stretching its innumerable arms over the whole interior, that renders travel through the Continent so extremely hazardous to the foreigner. The Akka country in which Stanley is now supposed to be, is inhabited by a peaceful race, and unless they have been incited by the persuasions or threats of the slave-traders, I do not see any reason to believe that Stanley has met with a violent death."

Very Liberal Terms are Offered to any Person canvassing for subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Sample copies will be sent, postage paid, on application from any one desiring to undertake the work. Ministers and others will find it easy to obtain subscriptions. Send postal card for terms, and state number of sample copies required. Address The Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying Colored ministers in the South with this journal have been received since our last acknowledgement to the amount of $8. They are from: Seward, Me., $5; Orwigsburg, Pa., $1; Woodhaven, L. I., $2. One of the preachers who has been receiving THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during the past year through this fund, wrote last week: "I have been greatly blessed in reading its pages. I do hope it will be continued another year." Similar testimonies in large numbers come in. We earnestly pray that, the need being so urgent, and the preachers so anxious to have the benefit of the sermons and religious comment which the paper contains, God will incline His people to supply their wants.

Mission Potatoes Shipped to New York Last week were a practical proof of what children may do for a good cause. The consignment consisted of twelve sacks of potatoes, holding three bushels each. They were shipped to the Five Points Mission, from Richmond Hill, L. I. They were the yield of the Mission field, cultivated by the Sunday-school of the Union Congregational Church of that village. The children heard the cry for potatoes that went up from Five Points last fall, and decided upon this practical plan of charity in the hope that it might be generally followed. Police Inspector Steers, who knew of the scheme, and who used to do patrol duty at the Five Points in its worst days, sent a barrel of seed potatoes to the school. His two bushels and a half have grown to thirty-six bushels, and the yield would have been larger but for the fact that new ground had to be broken for the mission field.

Litigation Involving Ninety Thousand Dollars was initiated last week in New York. The defendants are ten Ferry and Railroad Companies. Last May the Legislature passed a law requiring every such company to post notices outside of each ferry house and on each boat, in plain view of passengers, stating the rates of ferriage. In case of any company posting a false list, or neglecting to comply with the law, it was to be subject to a fine of fifty dollars for each and every day of such neglect, and any person might collect the penalty by suing for it in the courts. A curious fact is that no notice of the law was sent to the Ferry Companies, and ten of them have neglected to comply with the law. Suit has been accordingly commenced by an enterprising citizen, and the Sheriff last week served each company with a notice. If the full penalty is enforced in each case, the total sum will be ninety thousand dollars. The fault of the Companies does not appear to have been one of defiance of law, but either ignorance of it or neglect. Evidently it is not safe for any citizen to be ignorant of the enactments of the Legislature of his State. Still more essential is it for every one to carefully study God's law, which is revealed in His Word. That study must lead to self-condemnation, but, also, to the discovery of the way provided for reconciliation with God. (Ps. 19:7-9.)

A Fierce Fight with a Dog over a Corpse Occurred in Salem, Mass., on October 1. In a house at South Salem Point, a well-to-do bachelor lived alone with a huge Newfoundland dog, who was his constant companion. For some unexplained cause the man grew much depressed, and finally committed suicide. He was missed from his usual haunts, and on Monday of last week the police visited his house, to find out what had become of him. There they found his dead body, guarded by his faithful dog. He growled as they approached his dead master, but was at length coaxed into allowing them to endeavor to resuscitate the man. When they discovered that he was really dead, they proceeded to remove the body, but the dog resisted. He bit two of the policemen severely, and stood over the body, his eyes burning and his teeth exposed, ready to attack the next who touched his dead master. The policemen retreated, and the dog fell to licking the dead face, and otherwise showing his love. It was clear that the body could not be removed while the dog lived, and, therefore, the policemen sadly and reluctantly shot the animal. Even after several wounds were inflicted, the dog still held his post, and not until he was quite dead did the men dare to touch the body. That a dog should manifest fidelity, even to the death, teaches a lesson to Christians, whom greed of gain or love of social distinction is often sufficient to tempt to forsake their Master. (Isa. 1:3, 4)

A Mistake as to a Honey Tree Caused Disappointment and terror to a farm-laborer near Hanover, Penn., recently. While at work near a wood, he heard a sound like bees humming, and finally located it in a hollow tree near by. Although he could see no bees going into or coming out of the tree, he was satisfied that he had found a honey tree, and he went to work at once to cut down the tree and secure the honey. Every stroke of his axe on the tree set the humming and buzzing going with renewed vigor. He had but a few inches to cut into the tree before the hollow place was reached. The axe had barely penetrated to the hollow, making a hole two or three inches in diameter, when he was horrified by the sight of the head of a huge rattlesnake protruding. The snake squirmed out of the hole, and before the man had recovered from his astonishment, other snakes followed, until the ground seemed alive with the venomous reptiles. The buzzing which the man had supposed was made by a swarm of wild bees was the noise made by the combined rattling of the snakes. They had evidently found the hollow tree a cosey place for them to winter in, and had settled themselves there with the coming of frosty nights. Unhappily, an analagous mistake is often made by young people about the pleasures of the world. They expect to get the honey of life from them, but they find trouble which is worse to deal with than serpents. (Prov 5:3, 4.)

A Man Unconsciously Took a Photograph of his own shadow in Oregon recently. An Oregon journal states that an amateur photographer, who accompanied the recent expedition to Crater Lake, taking views of charming bits of scenery, accomplished one thing which he did not look for—the photographing of his own shadow. He stood on Vidæ Cliff, 2,000 feet high, and had the camera pointed at the lake in the distance. Between the camera and its object, and about sixty feet away, was another cliff, which is shown in the photograph. The upper portion of it is of a light photographic color, while the lower part is jet black, and looks as if it had been painted with a brush. It is just above the jet-black streak that the shadow appears. The form of a man in the act of removing the cap of the camera to expose the plate is clearly shown. It was 5 o'clock in the evening when the photographer took the picture, and the sun was setting behind the romantic hills and cliffs. The permanent registration of so simple an act must be an object of interest to the operator, but how terrible would it be to many men to see accurately limned all the actions of their lives! Such a record exists in every case in which it has not been expunged by the cleansing blood of Christ. (Rev. 20:12.)

A Lover's Persistency under Discouragement has been rewarded in Boston, Mass. A journal of that city, in announcing a recent marriage, gives a suggestive account of the circumstances which led to it. It states that some years ago, the young man began paying attentions to the lady, but they were not cordially received. He continued calling upon her, however, and at length visited her regularly every Sunday evening. She did not wish to appear rude or inhospitable, but she was intensely weary of his visits, and in a polite and courteous manner tried to let him see the fact. But he was deaf to all hints, ignored all her slights, treated her coldness with unfailing good-humor, and regularly presented himself as sure as the day came round. At last she could bear it no longer, and as hints were lost upon him, she wrote him explicitly requesting him in future to discontinue his Sunday visits. To her amazement, he presented himself on the very night of receiving her letter, coolly observing that he had no objection to changing his day. His composure and evident determination not to be dismissed were too much for the lady's resolution. She doubted whether it was possible to shake him off, and ultimately yielded to his pleadings and married him. It is a pity that similar persistence is not more frequently displayed by those who are seeking for union with the Saviour. It never fails of success, and Jesus explicitly commended it. (Matt. 15: 22-28.)

Fire was Kindled by the Aid of Ice in a hotel at Washington, D. C., a few days ago. The Washington Star says that a group of smokers were chatting in the garden of one of the principal hotels when a gentleman, who had taken a fresh cigar, asked his companions for a match. None of them had the article, but one of them suggested that a lump of ice might be used to light the cigar. There was a general laugh at the suggestion, but the man was in earnest. After being jeered at, and made the butt of witticisms for some time, he quietly proceeded to prove his suggestion feasible. Taking a piece of clear ice about an inch thick from the water-cooler, he whittled the edges, and then held it between the palms of his hands until it took the shape of a convex disc or burning-glass. Holding it where it caught the sun's rays, he focussed them on the end of a cigar, and triumphantly held it out fully lighted for the inspection of the company. Many a cold, blighting affliction, from which nothing but sorrow seemed likely to come, has been similarly the medium of new fire to the Christian's faith and love by transmitting into his heart the beams of the Sun of Righteousness. (Heb. 12:11.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Mr. W. F. Bischoffe and Mr. Alfred Hart, are holding evangelistic meetings at Midland, Mich.

Dr. L. W. Munhall has been conducting a two weeks' series of meetings at the Y. M. C. A., Detroit, Mich.

A daily afternoon prayer-meeting has been established at the Plymouth Church, Minneapolis. Dr. Thwing is the pastor.

The next course of Crozer Lectures in Philadelphia will be delivered by Dr. Maclaren, the famous Baptist preacher, of Manchester, England.

The Rev. J. Edgar Johnson, whose theatre services in Philadelphia have been so signally blessed, reopens this month in the Continental Theatre.

Miss Clara Barton, President of the Red Cross Society, besides her personal labor, has given $1,000 out of her own pocket to the yellow fever sufferers.

The English Government has recently communicated with the Government of Canada, desiring information regarding the working of the restrictive laws there.

Mr. Petter, one of the founders of the great publishing house of Cassell, Petter & Galpin, has just died in England, at the age of 65. He was an earnest Christian.

The National Prison Association asks us to remind our readers that the day appointed as Prison Sunday, for special prayer for our criminal population, is October 21.

The Gospel Wagon workers in Washington, D. C., have had a most successful summer campaign. Multitudes in the neglected parts of the city have heard the Gospel gladly, and many have united with churches.

Mr. I. Ferris Lockwood will address the American Institute on November 1, on Force in its Relation to Theism. Meetings of the Institute will be held in its rooms, 4 Winthrop Place, New York, on the first Thursday of each month from now until June.

A persecution of Prohibitionists has been commenced in Merrimac, Wis. John E. Nozum, Chairman of the Prohibition party there, has had the front wheels of his carriage removed and thrown into the river. His barn, filled with hay and grain, was fired by incendiaries and burned to the ground. The loss was $2,000.

The National Woman's Christian Temperance Union will hold its fifteenth Annual Meeting October 19 to 23, in the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. Mrs. Mary T. Burt and Gen. Clinton B. Fisk will welcome the delegates. Among the speakers will be Bishop Fallows, Mrs. Mary A. Livermore, Miss Frances E. Willard, Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge, etc.

The Brooklyn Sunday-school teachers' classes will be held weekly through the winter. Dr. Meredith will expound the International lesson weekly at the Tompkins Avenue Congregational Church every Tuesday evening, and Mrs. Ostrander at the Y. M. C. A. building every Saturday afternoon at 3 o'clock for the primary teachers. In the same building, at 4.30 o'clock, ministers of various denominations will take their turn a month each.

ALL AT IT.

A New Sermon by Pastor CH.S purgeon.

"Therefore they that were scattered abroad went everywhere preaching the word. Then Philip went down to the city of Samaria, and preached Christ unto them." Acts 8: 4, 5.

"Then Philip opened his mouth, and began at the same scripture, and preached unto him Jesus." Acts 8: 35.

A Necessity for the Scattering of the Church—Persecution Sometimes Used to Effect It—The Object of the Scattering—I. The Universality of the Work of Evangelizing—The Apostles at Home—A Soldiers' Battle—A Fatal Military Policy—No Professional Distinctions—No Professional Exceptions—No Exclusion on Account of Sex—II. The Naturalness of It—Their Obligation Compelled—Their Spiritual Health Prompted—The Nearness of Christ's Coming—III. A Joyful Work—IV. The Supremacy of the Work—V. Its Specialty.

"THEY that were scattered abroad went everywhere preaching the word." God intended that His church should be scattered over the world. Jerusalem was at first the central point of Christianity. The church there was highly favored with its twelve apostles and a multitude of minor lights; and the tendency would have been to keep the centre strong. I have often heard the argument, "Do not have too many out-stations; keep up a strong central force." But God's plan was that the holy force should be distributed: the holy seed must be sown. To do this the Lord made use of of persecution. The disciples could not stay in Jerusalem: Saul made them run for their lives, or, if they did not, he shut them up in prison; and prisons in those days were so foul and noisome as to be the vestibules of the grave. One went this way, and one went the other way; and the faithful were scattered.

The Rough Hand

In every church where there is really the power of the Spirit of God, the Lord will cause it to be spread abroad, more or less. Just now we have little of that form of persecution which drives men from home. But godly people are scattered through the necessity of earning a livelihood. Sometimes we regret that certain young men should have to go to a distance; but should we regret it? We lament that certain families must migrate to the colonies. Does not the Lord by this means sow the good seed widely? The Lord's design is not the scattering in itself, but scattering for a purpose. He intended that, being scattered, the saints of Jerusalem should go everywhere preaching the Word. Upon this I am going to speak at this time.

I. I shall call your attention, first, to

The Universality of the Work

of evangelizing—of course I mean its universality among believers. "They that were scattered abroad went everywhere preaching the Word." They; that is, all the scattered. There does not appear to have been any exception. You thought it would have read, "Then the apostles went everywhere preaching the Word. They were just the people who did not go at all; for the twelve remained at headquarters as yet; but the rest went everywhere preaching the Word. Generals may have to stand still in the centre of the battle to direct the forces; but in this battle all the common soldiers marched to the fight. This was to be a soldiers' battle; and of that sort all the battles of the Cross ought to be.

Observe then, first, that in this there were no professional distinctions. We have among ourselves a distinction between ministers and others. But you are all to minister. There are many ministries of one form and another; and though God gives to His church apostles, teachers, pastors, evangelists, and the like, yet not by way of setting up a professional caste of men, who are to do the work for God while others sit still. I have aforetime used the following parable: In olden times a certain host had conquered wherever they went forward in one mass. But it came to pass that they thought themselves so exceeding strong that they said, "Let not every man go to war. Let us choose a few, and make this few into a select standing army." They picked out their champions, and sent them to the war. These continued the conflict with difficulty; many of them fell in the fight. No provinces were added to the kingdom, and things were at a standstill. They had followed a fatal policy. The true method was for the whole of them to march to battle. This is of Christianity—all Christian soldiers of the Cross, and all on active service. Every converted man is to teach what he knows; all those who have drunk of the living water are to become fountains out of which shall flow rivers of living water. We shall never get back to the grand old times of conquest until we get back to the old method of "all at it."

The True and Only Policy

Observe, next, that there were no professional exceptions. Philip is mentioned as going down to Samaria to preach; but Philip was originally set apart to attend to the distribution of the alms of the church. It is good for every man to attend to his own special office; but where that office ceases to be needful, let him get to that work which is common and constant. The time had come when there was no need for the deacon to sit in the vestry, for the poor people were all scattered. What does the deacon do? As the work to which he was appointed has come to an end, he keeps to the work for which every Christian is appointed, and he proclaims the gospel of Jesus Christ. No one of us, then, can be exempted from the work of spreading the gospel because we have some other work.

Observe that there were no educational or literary exceptions. It is thought nowadays that a man must not try to proclaim the gospel unless he has had a good education. To try and preach Christ, and yet to commit grammatical blunders, is looked upon as a grave offence. People are mightily offended at the idea of the gospel being properly preached by an uneducated man. This I believe to be a very injurious mistake. There is nothing whatsoever in the whole compass of Scripture to excuse any mouth from speaking for Jesus when the heart is really acquainted with His salvation. Has the gospel ever been spread to any extent by men of high literary power? Look through the whole line of history, and see if it is so. Have the men of splendid eloquence been remarkable for winning souls? I could quote names that stand first in the roll of oratory, which are low down in the roll of soul-winners.

Those Whom God has Most Honored have been men who, whatever their gifts, have consecrated them to God; and have earnestly declared the great truths of God's Word. Men who have been terribly in earnest, and have faithfully described man's ruin by sin, and God's remedy of grace—men who have warned sinners to escape from the wrath to come by believing in the Lord Jesus—these have been useful. If they had great gifts, they were no detriment to them; if they had few talents, this did not disqualify them. It has pleased God to use the base things of this world, and things that are despised, for the accomplishment of His great purposes of love. I say, then, to you, my dear friend, who unhappily may be lacking in education, do not therefore stay your testimony to our Lord. Rescue the perishing. What if you are not a great theologian! If you understand the plan of salvation you are sufficiently instructed to be a good witness for your Lord. Oh, that the Holy Spirit may make you such!

As there were no exceptions on account of educational defects, so were there on account of sex. Men and women were to spread abroad the knowledge of Jesus. We read that, "As for Saul, he made havoc of the church, entering into every house, and haling men and women committed them to prison. Therefore they that were scattered abroad" (and these must have been men and women) "went everywhere preaching the Word." There are many ways in which women can fittingly proclaim the Word of the Lord, and in some of these they can proclaim it more efficiently than men. There are minds that will be attracted by the tender, plaintive, winning manner in which the sister in Christ expresses herself. A Christian mother! What a minister is she to her family!

No Exclusions

You see, dear friends, how the Lord gave to all His people the holy work of making Jesus known to men. How well they carried it out! Within a hundred years after the death of our Lord, His name had been made known to all the known world. But I do not know how many years it will take to make Christ known at the rate of our present movement.

II. Secondly, having asked you to notice the universality of the work, will you please to notice

The Naturalness of It.

That word "therefore," at the commencement of the fourth verse, says a great deal to me. "Therefore they that were scattered abroad went everywhere preaching the word"—as if it followed, as a sort of natural consequence, that being scattered they went everywhere preaching the Word. They that were scattered might have said, "Clearly our duty is to hold our tongues; we have got into great trouble at Jerusalem because we preached Christ. We must now look to our own safety, and the comfort of our families; and in these foreign countries we had better live godly lives, and go to heaven on the sly, but we need not again expose ourselves to the dangers of persecution." They did not thus argue. It is not said, "Therefore they that were scattered abroad slunk away, and held their tongues." No, they never thought of that.

We do find that they even said, "This gospel of ours is evidently not in accord with

The Spirit of the Age.

The Scribes and Pharisees all differ largely from us, and we must endeavor to win them by altering our tone." They did not dream of cutting off the angles of truth, nor of inserting pleasant fragments of popular thought to please the powers that be; but they set forth "the Word" in its pure simplicity, and the Cross of Christ, which is an offence to so many. They never said, "The old gospel did very well when Jesus was here; but, you see, He has gone, and circumstances alter cases, and alter gospels, and we had better adapt our teaching to the period." They did not so, because of the fear of the Lord. They did not endeavor to mend the gospel, but they went everywhere proclaiming it. They preached the Word as they received it; they set forth the kingdom as their King had revealed it. Ah, dear friends! if you are true to the Lord Jesus Christ you have to spread the gospel somehow, and it must be the old, old gospel.

The principal reason for their constant proclamation of Jesus was, that they were in a fine state of spiritual health. They went everywhere preaching the Word when scattered abroad, because they had told it out when at home. You will never make a missionary of the person who does no good at home. If you do not seek souls in your own street, you will not do so in Hindostan. If you are of no use in Whitechapel, you will be of no use on the Congo. He that will not serve the Lord in the Sunday-school at home, will not win children to Christ in China. Distance lends no real enchantment to Christian service. You who do nothing now are not fit for the war, for you are in sad health. The Lord give you spiritual health and vigor, and then you will want no pressing, but you will cry at once, "Here am I; send me!" O my friends, go at once to your families, to your workshops, and declare the name of Jesus!

Surely also the times must have urged them onward, to go with hurried step as messengers for Christ; for Jerusalem was soon to be destroyed. This made them quick in their movements, that the last warning might come to all their countrymen. You know what the times are now! I am no prophet; but as we read, week by week, the appalling crimes that are chronicled by the press, if ever Christian men should be in earnest they should be in earnest now. All the signs of the times arouse us to look for the coming our Lord. No token tends to quiet us, but all awaken us. We must work at double quick te; and if any one among us has done nothing all, it is time for him, as a good servant, to ork and to watch, "for in such an hour as he inks not, the Son of man cometh."

III. Thirdly, carefully notice

The Joyfulness of the Work.

They were scattered abroad"; but as "they nt everywhere preaching the Word," the lamity became a blessing. Their work took e sting out of their banishment. The house-fe had to leave her comfortable little home, d tramp to a strange country; the man of siness had to sell his stock, and quit his posi-on. Those were hard times, beyond question. ncy that happening to us! What distress ould spread over this congregation if you had run for your lives! But then they said to emselves "It is all right; for as we live to read abroad the knowledge of Jesus, we shall this wherever we go. Our flight shall be a ission." This changed the aspect of affairs. ear friends, if your heart is set on a purpose, d there comes a crash which spoils your com-rt, you hardly lament it if it subserves your ief design in life. If you are possessed with e idea that you, as a Christian, must live only serve Christ, and to win souls, then anything ich happens, however painful, will be wel-med if it places you in a better position for ur holy life work. That is the better place in ich you can serve the Lord better.

Moreover, as they told the story, and it made eir own hearts glow with holy fire, their irits were refreshed, and their souls made ad. Jesus seemed still to be near them: yes, e was with them. They found the surest medy for their grief in His sacred fellowship: y, the grief itself became gladness. If you int to get rid of low spirits, preach the gospel. take Christ's yoke is to find rest unto your uls. If you are in the very dust, go and tell a eary one of salvation by Jesus: you will thus ise yourself, even if your message be rejected.

IV. Notice, fourthly,

The Supremacy of This Work.

They that were scattered abroad went every-here preaching the Word." I suppose they did mething for a living. I do not know what eir handicrafts might be; but each one had a lling, and followed it industriously. We are t told what they did. It is incidentally men-oned, further on in history, that the apostle aul made tents: but you never read anywhere the Bible that Paul went everywhere tent aking. He did make tents, but that was not s vocation; his business was to save souls. I onder how many Christian people here could ave their biographies condensed into this line, He lived to make Christ known." Might it t be said of one, he lived to open a shop, and en to open a second? or of another, he lived save a good deal of money, and take shares limited liability companies? or of a third, he ved to paint a great picture? or of a fourth, he as best known for his genial hospitality? Of any a minister it might be said—he lived to each splendid sermons, and to gain credit for ie oratory. What of all these? If it can be id of a man, "He lived to glorify Christ," en his life is a life. Every Christian man ght so to live. Oh that my memorial might : He preached Christ crucified"!

We note the supremacy of this work, not on- because it swallowed up all their trades, but hilip is a Jew, but he goes to Samaria. Philip, what made you go to Samaria? Jews ave no dealings with Samaritans." Brethren, hen it comes to preaching Christ we have ealings with everybody—Jews, Turks, infidels, annibals. The Jew goes to Samaria for Christ, nd the Samaritans accept the Messiah of the ews. Anon Philip is called down south to ourney along a desert way, and there he meets n Ethiopian, probably a black man. Ah well! hite men were not particularly anxious for the ompany of Ethiopians, but Philip gets up into his chariot, and rides with him. Black and white make a fine mixture when the book of the prophet Isaiah lies between them.

It Obliterated all Trace of Caste.

What is more, we shall not only be willing to work for the poor and fallen, but we shall work with them. You, a person of taste and culture, will join hands with the illiterate worker, and while you are half amused at his blunders, you will be charmed by his zeal. You will not despise him, but you may even feel humbled as you see how, with less knowledge than yourself, he often shows more spiritual wisdom and energy. You will take a brotherly pride in such a man. Caste is gone when Christ is come.

See, also, the supremacy of their purpose in the fact that they were willing to be at the beck and call of the Holy Spirit, and

To Go Anywhere.

Philip was getting on splendidly at Samaria, and the church grew under his care. Surely he ought to stop there; he is evidently the man for the place! But he does not stop there. Philip has a call, not to a larger church, but to the road through the desert, and away he goes to talk to one person. The genuine soul-winner has his inward directions, and he follows the guidance of the Spirit of God. Here, there, anywhere he goes, where the hope of conversions tempts him.

Note yet one thing more: the supremacy of this work was seen in the fact that these good people were quite willing to subside. Philip has done a great work at Samaria, but he sends for the apostles Peter and John to come down from Jerusalem. Some few earnest workers have been impatient of discipline, but the best of them are the most orderly people in the world. Some brethren are just as ready to obey church authority as if they were the least of all saints, instead of being the most successful of the brotherhood. It is not well when our Philips are too big to work in connection with the mother-church. I have never found them so. The idle are troublesome; the laborious are loving. Blessed is that man who knows how to subside. Oh, that there were thousands of workers of this kind willing to come to the front, and lead the way, and just as willing to step aside, if thereby the cause might advance!

V. Thus have I brought this matter before you, and I shall now beg you to observe

The Specialty of this Work.

I have shown you its universality, its naturalness, its joyfulness, and its supremacy; and now we will dwell upon its speciality. Philip is set before us as a specimen of those who were scattered abroad. A sample shows the whole. What did Philip make prominent? "Philip went down to the city of Samaria, and preached Christ unto them." That is all he had to preach, he preached the Messiah, the Anointed One, the Christ. But when Philip had to instruct an educated nobleman, did he dwell on the same subject as that which he brought before common Samaritans? Read the thirty-fifth verse. "Then Philip opened his mouth and began at the same scripture, and preached unto him Jesus." Here we have the same subject as before: to the Samaritans Christ, to the Ethiopian Jesus. See, then, what we have to do.

This is the old, old story. It is a very simple story, but the telling of it will save the people. Keep to that gospel. Many have lost faith in it. It is hoped that people will now be saved by new socialistic arrangements, by moral precepts, by amusements, by societies, and what not. Let the church of God be glad when anything is done which helps temperance, purity, freedom, and so forth; but her one business is to preach Christ. Stick to this, my brethren. If we will each one speak for our Lord, we shall see results that will perfectly astound us. If, during the next few months, this church would fully wake up, and if every member would feel, "I have something to do, and I must do it," we should then see a glorious harvest. If you will go after people at their houses, and give them your own personal testimony in loving earnestness, the Holy Spirit will bless you. Oh, may God arouse us to this! If the Lord will fill you with His Spirit, the opening of yonder front doors and your going out will be like the bursting of a bomb-shell in London. If you are all in earnest, your existence will be like the shining of the sun in the heavens. Oh, how I long that God may be glorified! For His truth's sake I have been "abundantly filled with reproach"; but I would gladly accept a seven-fold baptism of it so that His kingdom would come. May the Lord make bare His holy arm in the eyes of all the people! Amen, and Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

THE MAGNETIC SMILE.*

It is related in the life of the celebrated mathematician, William Hutton, that a respectable looking country-woman called upon him one day, anxious to speak with him. She told him, with an air of secrecy, that her husband behaved unkindly to her, and sought other company, frequently passing his evenings from home, which made her feel extremely unhappy; and knowing Mr. Hutton to be a wise man, she thought he might be able to tell her how she should manage to cure her husband. The case was a common one, and he thought he could prescribe for it without losing his reputation for wisdom. "The remedy is a simple one," said he, "but I have never known it fail. Always greet your husband with a smile." The woman expressed her thanks, dropped a curtesy, and went away. A few months afterward she waited on Mr. Hutton with a couple of fine fowls, which she begged him to accept. She told him, while tears of joy and gratitude glistened in her eyes, that she had followed his advice, and her husband was cured. He no longer sought the company of others, but treated her with constant love and kindness.

Girls Dead at Heart.

A physician lately remarked: "There is no study in human nature so difficult to me as a certain class of young girls. I spent a part of this summer with two specimens of this class, They had the usual amount of capacity for observing, understanding, and feeling. They had been educated at much cost to their parents; both were constant attendants at church. I saw nothing in their faces or bearing to show that they were imbecile. Their mother was an invalid nearing the grave. Nothing could be more touching than the patient, appealing gaze with which her eyes followed them, watching for some sign of affection; but they had eyes and thoughts for nothing but some gowns they were making. They were used to her love, to her illness—even to the thought of her death. I walked out with them through a great forest, under the solemn stars. They saw no beauty, no sublimity in them; they chatted incessantly of the new trimming on their bonnets. They were used to the meaning of the trees and stars. The only things, apparently, to which they were not used, were the changes in ribbons, puffs, and flounces. I went to church with them, and listened to the great Te Deum which has come down to us through the ages, and has lifted the hearts of countless worshippers to God. They nudged each other, while they sang it, to look at a beaded cloak in the next pew. We physicians now test the temperature of a patient's body, and if we find it below a certain degree, know that death is already in the heart. When I find so low a degree in the words, thoughts, and actions of a human body, I begin to fear that the soul within is dead beyond recall."

What a Lady is.

The word "lady" is derived from the Saxon word "hlæf," a loaf, and "digan," to serve, and means literally one who serves or dispenses bread to the family; as "Lord" means the supplier of bread. The two words reflect an arrangement of the Almighty which cannot be ignored by even the most advanced confounder of the respective duties of the sexes. The natural, healthy state of things is for the husband to supply the bread and other kinds of food, and for the wife to serve them out to the family in the most healthful and economical way possible. A young man was practical, and was making love on that basis. The girl was a little that way herself. "Can you cook?" he inquired. "Can you supply the food to be cooked?" she asked, in reply. It was a match.

* From "The Five Talents of Woman," a book for Girls and Women, by the Author of "How to be Happy, Though Married." This book is full of sound, practical advice to our sisters, married and single, on culture, behavior, home-influence, nursing the sick, study, recreation, etc. An excellent book to give to a daughter who wishes to be something more than a useless ornament in the world. 301 pages; price $1.25. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, 745 Broadway, New York.

Mr. William Noble's Saturday Night Demonstration in London.

Curing a Husband's Temper.

Lavater, the famous physiognomist, made the following entry in his journal: "The servant was sweeping my study, and overturned a bottle of ink which was standing on a shelf. She was much terrified. I called out, harshly, 'What a stupid creature you are! Have I not told you to be careful?' My wife, slowly and timidly, followed me up-stairs. Instead of being ashamed, my anger broke out anew. I took no notice of her, and ran to the table, lamenting and moaning as if the most important writings had been spoiled, though in reality the ink had touched nothing but a blank sheet and some blotting paper. The servant watched an opportunity to steal away, and my wife approached me with loving gentleness. 'My dear husband!' said she. I stared at her with vexation in my looks. She entranced me; I wanted to get out of her way. Her face rested on my cheek for a few moments. At last, with unspeakable tenderness, she said, 'You will hurt your health, my dear!' I now began to be ashamed; I was silent, and at last, began to weep. 'What a miserable slave to my temper I am,' I said. 'I cannot rid myself of the dominion of that sinful passion.' My wife replied, 'Consider, my dear, how many days and weeks pass away without your being overcome by anger. Let us pray together.' I knelt down beside her; and she prayed so maturely, so fervently, and so much to the purpose, that I thanked God sincerely for my wife."

MR. WILLIAM NOBLE IN LONDON.

(See Illustration.)

The many friends of Mr. Noble in this and other lands to which this journal goes, will be glad to have news of his work. The accompanying illustration will give them some idea of the scenes in which he is moving. It represents a Saturday-night demonstration as witnessed a few weeks ago by an American visitor.

It appears that it is Mr. Noble's custom on Saturday night when the streets are thronged with street peddlers' trucks, and workingmen spending their money (not always in the best way), to set out for a march round the district, accompanied by brass and drum-and-fife bands, with banners. Already this forward movement has created quite a stir in the district, and as the procession proceeds through the various streets, the greatest interest is exhibited. One special feature is the holding of open-air meetings en route. When a favorable spot is reached a halt is made, and a meeting held. On this way some half-dozen meetings are held during the evening, in order to reach the people in each section. The workers distribute themselves along the line of route, and spread literature amongst the people, and invite them to the various meetings which are held in Hoxton Hall on Sunday, and during the week.

An eye-witness, who accompanied Mr. Noble on a recent Saturday, thus writes: "The procession was led by a strong brass band, which at six o'clock set out from the Hall for a two hours' march. It passed right through streets of tenement houses, streets that were almost alleys, and into drowsy, dowdy-looking squares, where meetings were held. The earnest attention and absence of hostile remarks or opposition amongst the people listening was simply remarkable. There are certainly some factors of success which the Hoxton workers carry with them."

THE MOUNTAIN RAILROAD BRIDGE

(See Illustration on first page.)

To persons in the habit of thinking of South America as outside the borders of civilization, the picture of the stupendous engineering work on the first page will come as a revelation. The bridge is in the heart of the Andes, in Peru, and it is part of a railroad stretching right to the Pacific coast. Formerly the traveller was invited to cross from peak to peak on foot upon hanging bridges, which bent beneath his tread, and to which even the wind would give a lateral motion. Now he is carried up and across the dizzy heights on a railroad which is acknowledged to be the most daring engineering exploit in the world. The bridge depicted in the illustration is the crown and prodigy of the whole. Mr. Henry Meigs, who built it, is the well-known Californian contractor, whose commercial failure in that State some years ago was the cause of widespread suffering. He went to South America after the disaster, and there in the construction of this and other works amassed an immense fortune. He returned to California and though legally released from his debts, he sought out his creditors and paid nearly all of them in full with interest.

A CASE FOR PATIENCE.

(See Illustration on page 653.)

A field of ripe wheat, surrounded by hedges the banks of which are glowing with beautiful wild-flowers, does not greatly impress people who live where they see it every fall; but it is a glorious sight to the dwellers in a city, weary of the hot pavement, the dirty stones of the roadways, and the smells of the gutters. Such were Mrs. Carleton and her daughter Julia, who were boarding for a few weeks at a farm-house, only two hours ride from the city. The locality was chosen for the convenience of Mr. Carleton, whose business required his presence every day, and Mrs. Carleton declared that the country would be unendurable if her husband could not spend his evenings with her.

"Mamma, dear, you look weary," Julia said one morning when, after her late breakfast, Mrs. Carleton had tried a little embroidery, a little novel-reading, a little letter-writing, and finally, had thrown herself discontentedly on a garden seat on the piazza. "Do come with me around the next field; there are the loveliest flowers growing on the banks."

"What inexhaustible energy you have, Julia," said the mother, listlessly. "Well, I cannot stay here the whole time, and there is nothing to amuse one. Yes, I will go; it will pass the time."

"I will see if Minnie can go with us," said Julia, and she ran around to the rear of the house, where she knew she would find the farmer's daughter, who was glad to act as guide, to do anything else for the beautiful, brilliant city girl. Minnie returned with her, and the three strolled around the field gathering the lit floral gems. A delicate, melodious warble attracted Julia's attention presently, and she must needs clamber over the fence to catch a sight of the feathered songster. Minnie was arranging a bouquet for Mrs. Carleton, when the latter made an angry, impatient exclamation, and gave a nervous clutch to her skirts.

"That wretched brier! Look at it, how it clings!" and she tugged at her dress, in the last flounce of which the brier was entangled.

Minnie dropped her flowers immediately emove the offending thorn, ut not until a sound suggesive of rending told of the nischief that it would take ours to remedy.

"Wait a moment, mamma," aid Julia; "Minnie will soon ave you clear."

Mrs. Carleton looked ruefully at the rents, and asked ier daughter to remind her o get papa to take the lace o the city next morning for epairs. In the evening Mr. Carleton was duly instructed, he wreck was exhibited to iim, and he was told where t must be taken, and when he work ought to be finished.

"You must be making quite in explorer of your mamma, Julia," he said that night, as ie and his daughter walked out by moonlight while Mrs. Carleton dozed over her novel. "She must get an exploring suit for the country, or all ier pretty dresses will be ruined."

"Oh no, papa," said Julia, "we have not explored at all beyond sight of the house. A bramble caught mamma's dress in the next field, and she tugged at it before Minnie could disentangle it."

Mr. Carlton was silent a few minutes. Then he said quietly, as if to himself, "Patience is a great virtue. My daughter will find great need of it in her life," and the father laid his hands affectionately on the girl's shoulder. "The world is full of briers—entanglements of one kind and another, that cannot be escaped. Those who walk heedlessly get in contact with more of them than do others; but the most careful seldom wholly escape."

Mrs. Carleton's Patience Exhausted.

"Do you mean sins, papa?" Julia asked.

"Not just now, my dear, though the principle applies to them too. A person, through pure kindness, may become entangled in enterprises and associated with other persons, and so be led into difficulties and inconsistencies. Sometimes the discovery comes that one has been acting under a misconception of character or circumstances, and one is caught in the disagreeable position of either going on in the hope of saving reputation or of turning back and acknowledging errors, which is a painful thing to do. I have known men allied in business partnership, when a good, honest man has been held responsible for wicked conduct, which his partner had carried on in the name of the firm. I have known, too, a pure Christian girl discover before her marriage that her lover was godless, and had been pretending to be religious to help his suit. She has had to choose between keeping her promise to be married, or breaking it at the risk of being called a coquette, and the certainty of suffering to herself and general embarrassment."

"What ought one do in such cases, papa?"

"There are difficulties about laying down rules applicable to cases which vary in important details. Of course, severance is the main duty. We must not be partakers—you know the passage. But it is the manner of separation which is so distressing, and I have known the manner of doing it to be very injurious. There is one thing that has impressed me very much in a few cases in which I have been concerned. It seemed to me, at first, to be a coincidence, but I am beginning to think it is a law. I practice it, and recommend it. In a case of that kind, I lay it fully before God in prayer and determine to wait for light. And do you know, Julia, in every case in my experience I have never had to take action at all. God Himself has settled the whole thing and extricated me completely."

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. L. S. Keyser.

(Continued from page 638.)

Farewell to College.

THE remainder of Hadley's college days were days of dull pain. The best antidote to his troubles was the society of Belle Havelock. With a pertinacity and devotion worthy of a better girl, she gave herself up to the work of cheering and trying to win his affections. Piqued as she was by the knowledge that Hadley preferred Miss Winters to herself, still she swallowed her humiliation, and never allowed her devotion to him to flag for a single moment. She was always in sympathy with the disappointments and victories of his academical life; she read the books in which he was interested, and investigated the problems that perplexed him, so that he fell into the habit of exchanging many confidences with her. The web of sympathy was binding them daily into a nearer intimacy. When a spell of the "blues" attacked him, he was invariably seen making his way to the Havelock mansion, where he always received a cordial welcome.

There were times too when a consideration which would have been decisive with some men occurred to Hadley's mind. Though he was one of the most unworldly of men, he could not have visited so much at Belle Havelock's home without perceiving that her husband, whoever he might be, would have the advantage of a good start in life. How many years of drudgery that would save him in his ambitious career! How it would relieve him of the carking care that fills the mind, and prevents it climbing upward!

The final examination of the Senior class was over, and the honors were distributed. According to general expectations, the first honor was awarded to Hadley Madelling, and the second had to be shared equally between George Dane and Madeline Winters.

It is not necessary to describe the manner in which the interim until Commencement was spent. At last it was past, and that culminating period in the career of every young collegian had come all too soon—Commencement Day. The persons whose college careers we have watched acquitted themselves brilliantly in the delivery of their graduating speeches, as was to be expected of those whose whole course had been distinguished with honorable success. All the meetings incident to the week of Commencement in a thriving college had been held, and the sad, sad morning of separation from class-mates and teachers had dawned.

Before making his way to the depot, Hadley had gone to say good-bye to Belle at her home. The girl's face indicated that this parting meant more to her than words could tell. As for Hadley, he was sorry to leave her, for she had been a congenial and sympathetic friend to him, and, except in matters of religion, had always given him sage counsel.

"Miss Havelock," he said, sadly, "I feel this parting very much; you have been a kind and helpful friend to me."

The tears started to the girl's eyes, and she sobbed with a grief she could not repress. Drying her tears after awhile, and trying to control her feelings, she answered:

"You must excuse my weakness, Mr. Madelling. We have been together so much that it is natural for us to regret parting. I was just thinking what a strange compound life is. Our paths have run parallel for a while, and now they must diverge, and we shall become almost like strangers. Yes, I will tell you candidly that these separations from—from—old friends are very sad to me, and I shall miss you sorely—more than I can tell."

"I hope that we shall not become like strangers," he broke out, impulsively. Then he checked himself. He looked at her, and she seemed more beautiful than ever, with her tearful eyes and pale lips. Why not put his destiny in her hands? He could not hope to win Miss Winters, and this girl was more congenial in some respects than her rival in his affections. Then he looked about him at the richly furnished room. Here was every evidence of refinement and affluence, which were the very portals to the life he coveted. He had almost risen with the intention of taking her hand and asking her to be more than a friend to him, when an incident, apparently trifling in itself, occurred, which caused him to alter his resolution.

A butterfly had come into the room through an open door, and was fluttering to and fro from window to window, moving up and down the smooth panes of glass, in a vain endeavor to escape from its imprisonment.

"Ah!" thought Hadley, "how much easier it was for that golden insect to get into the room than it is to get out! Perhaps that is symbolical of the fate of the man who marries one woman while he loves another."

The time for his departure had come. Rising, he tenderly took her hand in his and looked into her eyes. She met his gaze at first with a firm look, but turned away to hide her tears.

"Good-bye, Belle, good-bye," he said, in fervent tones. "Will you permit me to write to you occasionally?"

As well as she could she consented to the proposed correspondence, and then returning the pressure of his grasp, she whispered, "Good-bye," and turned from him with a heart-broken sob. Had not the young man put the reins upon his sympathies, he would have clasped her in his arms and asked of her the boon she would have been only too ready to grant. Grasping his valise, he walked hastily from the room, and from temptation, and hurried toward the depot.

"After all my—my efforts to win him, he went away without telling me that he loved me!" cried the wretched girl he had left, flinging herself into a chair and giving herself up to a delirium of disappointment.

When Hadley reached the depot, it still lacked some minutes of train-time. Miss Winters, whose train left a few hours later, had come to say good-bye to her friends, and was standing apart from the remaing groups of students, as if lost in thought. The young man was sorely puzzled whether he should approach her or not. What a different emotion she aroused in him from that which he had felt for Belle. That was sympathy, this was love. Their parting would perhaps be final. Could he go away without bidding her good-bye, without one clasp of the hand? His pulses almost stood still. A cold dew broke out on his forehead. It was impossible to resist the impulse.

Miss Winters was looking at him, too, and not unkindly, he thought. He stepped up to her and extended his hand, into which she softly laid hers, looking him in the eyes. By an irresistible impulse he retained her hand in a firm pressure. It had been the furthest from his intentions to refer to their past unhappy relations, but suddenly his great disappointment came back upon him like an avalanche as he stood holding her hand, and a bitter accusation broke from his lips.

"Miss Winters," he said, in a husky whisper, "I never knew what agony meant until you—brought it upon me."

The girl trembled like a leaf before a tempest, her lips became white, and it was some moments before she could reply.

"Those are bitter words," she said, reproachfully. "Do you suppose that I caused you this sorrow purposely or capriciously? Do you think that I took the course I did without sufficient reason for doing so? Oh, Mr. Madelling, your grief is no more poignant than my own. I, too, can say that I was a stranger to anguish until I met—until within the last year." She halted, fearing that she had overstepped the bounds of propriety.

"Do you mean what you say?" he asked, looking at her earnestly, while a ray of hope broke into his mind. "Why do you cast me off, then? Miss Winters—Madeline—"

They stood facing each other, regardless of all their surroundings, forgetting the existence of any one but themselves. His persistency in professing his attachment to her disarmed her for a moment of her suspicions of his duplicity. It seemed impossible that this intense, earnest, honest face before her was only the mask of a hypocrite and adventurer. A feeling that there might have been some mistake crossed her mind. Then she thought of that terrible letter which first caused her to suspect him, and the evidences of his prior engagement appeared so conclusive that she again became distrustful. Another girl's life would be blighted if she should win the young man's affections. Mabel Richerson had a prior claim upon him. She had loved him longer than Madeline had. It would be wrong to decoy him from her. Madeline therefore replied, with inexpressible sadness.

"I think it best that we say no more about this distressing subject. We cannot change the unalterable. Providence has not designed that we should be more than friends."

"Is your decision irrevocable?" he groaned. Seeing that she was resolute, he continued: "Madeline, a cruel, relentless destiny keeps us apart. I cannot believe that a kind, benevolent Father has anything to do with our hopeless sorrow. But if you cannot be my wife, Madeline," he whispered, "I swear that I still love you, and I shall always love you—love you, and only you. Forgive me for giving expression to my hopeless passion; but it affords me relief to tell you at last of my undying love for you. Good-bye, Madeline!"

She said good-bye; and, in spite of herself, his protestations of love sounded like music to her heart. Again it seemed impossible that this man was the mendacious character she had suspected him to be. A feeling of uncertainty took possession of her. Shall she speak out boldly and tell him about the letter, so derogatory to his character, which had been placed in her hands? But it was too late—he had turned away.

Just then a poor blind man, led by a small boy, came upon the platform, begging for a few pennies. A pitiful expression was upon his face, which evoked Madeline's sympathy. Some of the young men turned away from the beggar, others laughed at him, and others tried their wits upon him. Madeline noticed that Duneman wheeled on his heel with a sneer. By and by the blind man approached Hadley.

"Boys, it's a downright shame to treat a poor man like this," Madeline heard him say. And he took from his pocket a number of pieces of silver and laid them upon the man's open palm, saying as he did so, "Chip in, boys, and help the poor man."

The generous act, performed at a time when his own heart was aching, touched Miss Winters's breast as nothing else in all her intercourse with the young man had done, for it indicated a nature full of kindly impulses. The example set by the honor-man of the college was speedily followed by his fellow-students, and the blind man received a sufficient amount to make his heart glad for many a day. He overwhelmed his benefactors with expressions of gratitude.

Hadley's impulsive generosity increased the uncertainty in Madeline Winters's mind. It could not be possible, she thought, that such a man should be guilty of a base deception. What a terrible mistake it would be if her suspicions of him were groundless after all! She almost started toward him to set her uncertainty at rest forever, by asking whether he was bound to another woman; but it was too late: the train just then wheeled into the depot, and there was a rush for the coaches; for, as it was probable that they would be crowded, everyone was anxious to secure a seat. Hadley leaped aboard the train, found a seat, and then leaned from the car-window not far from where Miss Winters stood. He saw Duneman bidding her good-bye, but he did not fail to notice the comparative coldness with which she returned his fervent farewill.

Then the train began its smooth, gliding movement out of the depot. Among all the voices that shouted, "Madelling, good-bye!" Hadley had ears for but one clear, silvery voice, which cried, "Good-bye, Mr. Madelling!" with a cadence of sadness. Among all the waving handkerchiefs, as he looked back, he saw but one. Madeline Winters! Oh, perverse fate! Could it be possible that he should never meet her again? A nameless terror rent his heart, rushing over it like the wild surges of a storm-tossed sea, pressing the tears into his eyes and many broken groans from his lips.

During his stay at home, Hadley was gloomy and listless. While he rejoiced at the meeting of old friends, and while his academical honors were a source of self-gratulation to him, yet his disappointed love weighed heavily upon his heart, making his life dark and hopeless; so that he was no longer the companionable young man that he once had been.

If he wished to accomplish anything in life, it would not do, as he saw plainly, to spend time in repining, and he therefore resolved to seek relief in work, which, he felt, would be a much wiser course than to abandon himself to misanthropic melancholy. Accordingly through the recommendations of his professors in his alma mater, seconded by the efforts of a relative, he secured an honorable and lucrative position in the public schools of a large inland city in a State farther west.

After a rest of about three months, he bade good-bye to his mother and the friends about his old home, and went to the scene of his new activities. He entered upon his work with all the zest his crushed and disappointed life could command.

In the city whose schools he had entered, an uncle of Hadley was the pastor of a flourishing church, at the services of which the young agnostic was a frequent attendant, more out of respect for his beloved relative than on account of any interest in the religious exercises. It had been the all-absorbing desire of his uncle that Hadley should enter the ministry, especially since the young man had manifested a desire to educate himself; but Hadley had lightly cast aside all these earnest exhortations with evasive excuses. Once, however, a short time prior to his graduation, he declared to his uncle the actual reason of his disinclination to enter the sacred office. His uncle had said:

"Hadley, if you will consent to study for the ministry, I will secure the funds necessary for your education," and a wistful expression was in the old man's eye.

Hadley laughed, at first half-evasively, and then replied, in serious tones: "My dear uncle, I thank you heartily for your interest in me; but I cannot accept your well-meant offer, because I do not and can not believe the Bible as you do, and I never could preach what I do not believe. That would be hypocrisy. As far as the funds you speak of are concerned, I need them and could put them to good use, but I cannot accept them upon the conditions you make."

"That settles it, then," said his uncle sadly, for he could not conceal his disappointment in his nephew. Then he added: "There is a way by which you might be convinced of the divine authenticity of the Bible."

But Hadley turned away, unwilling to hear more on a subject that was so distasteful to him. Yet the faithful old pastor had never relinquished hope of his nephew's conversion, and during the years that intervened he had at intervals referred in one way and another to the subject that lay upon his heart, and thus had kept it before the young man's mind. Perhaps Mr. Bidder's chief design in securing Hadley a situation in the schools of the city, was to bring him more directly under his influence, and if so, he was surely making use of the Christian strategy recommended by the Apostle Paul.

Many a sermon, after Hadley's entrance into the city, no doubt received a peculiar coloring from the fact that Mr. Bidder expected his nephew to be in his congregation. The young man was often in the preacher's mind as he sat in his study, preparing his discourses for the ensuing Sabbath, and although there was no open arraignment of infidelity in any of his sermons, there were much positive proving and vindicating of the claims of Christianity.

The efforts were well meant, but they had no success. Hadley liked his uncle, respected his earnestness, was grateful for his affection, but he entertained a very slight opinion of his mental calibre. "If he knew more, he would believe less," was his silent comment after listening to the good old man's sermons. True, the preacher was not a scholar; his opportunities had been small, and the Bible almost his only well-read book. Doubt of that he could never have had, or the proofs he cited would not have satisfied him. And he, too, begged and prayed and pleaded as if unbelief and doubt were sins perversely cherished, instead of iron barriers between the soul and faith. His uncle misunderstood him, and Hadley grew less and less regular in attendance on his ministry.

(To be Continued.)

THE STONES OF MEMORIAL.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for October 21. Josh. 4 : 10-24, Golden Text, Josh. 4 : 22.

The Holy Spirit as a Remembrancer—The Common Tendency to Remember Personal Suffering and Wrong—The Believer's Trials Associated with the Memory of Mercies—The Command as to the Twelve Stones—A National Memorial—Answers Provided for Children's Questions—Memorials in the Household—Memorials of Answered Prayers—The Passage Through Judgment—The Ark of the Covenant Accompanies the Believer in his Trial—The Rites of the Changed Life.

"BLESS the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me, bless His holy name. Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all His benefits." (Ps. 103 : 2.) It is part of the office of the Holy Ghost to bring to our remembrance all things whatsoever Jesus has said to us (John 14 : 26); and because He testifies of Christ, it is His office to remind us of all things which God has done for us. While self dominates our life, our memory is apt to be filled with all those things in the past through which we have suffered, or been wounded, or injured, and the remembrance of God's mercies is at a discount. How many people will remember every sickness which they have ever suffered, and with marvellous volubility they will describe all their symptoms, just as though they were passing through them to-day. Or they will recount some wrong which they have suffered at the hands of some fellow-creature, with all the feelings of bitterness which were aroused by it at the time, and up to this very day all is as vivid and distinct in their memories as though it were now happening. They for what happened forty years ago; they feel resentful to-day for what occurred when they were yet young. Because self is their very life, all its wrongs and all its sorrows and all its wounds are a present reality to them. But these same people fail to remember "all His benefits." Not seeing the hand of God, but only that of man, or of circumstances, in what happens from day to day, they do not recognize at the time, and they cannot remember afterwards, what God has done for them.

Pity Themselves To-day

Oh, how different with the child of God, who has recognized His hand in everything! "I will mention the loving kindnesses of the Lord, and the praises of the Lord according to all that the Lord hath bestowed on us." (Isa. 63 : 7.) The memory of the just is his memory of God; the memory of the sinner and of the selfish believer is his memory of that which touches himself. The child of faith remembers all the way which the Lord has led him, to humble him, and to prove him, and to know what was in his heart (Deut. 8 : 2), while the child of self remembers all the injuries, taunts, disappointments, losses, mortifications, and sufferings of his life. The child of faith, who gives his God credit for having a good intent in all that befalls him, has an eye open to, and a memory stored with, God's mercies. It is most noticeable how often God exhorts His people of old to remember His goodness toward them. In speaking of all God's past dealings with the people, Moses says, "Only take heed to thyself, and keep thy soul diligently, lest thou forget the things which thine eyes have seen, and lest they depart from thy heart all the days of thy life; but teach them, thy sons and thy sons' sons." "Thou shalt well remember what the Lord thy God did unto Pharaoh, and unto all Egypt." "Thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in the land of Egypt, and the Lord thy God redeemed thee." "That thou mayest remember the day when thou camest forth out of the land of Egypt all the days of thy life." (Deut. 4 : 9; 7 : 18; 15 : 15; 16 : 3.) David delighted to call the goodness of God to remembrance. "Remember His marvellous works that He hath done, His wonders, and the judgments of His mouth, . . . be ye mindful always of His covenant." (1 Chron. 16 : 12, 15.) "Forget not all His benefits" was his exhortation to his own soul. When he was tempted, as many have been, to depression, and to the sinful thought that God had forsaken him, he found that the remembrance of God's goodness brought him back into the sunshine. "I said, this is my infirmity, but I will remember the years of the right hand of the Most High. I will remember the works of the Lord: surely I will remember the wonders of old." (Ps. 77 : 10–17.)

It is no wonder, then, that when the children of Israel passed through the Jordan, God made special provision that His marvellous interposition on their behalf should be remembered. "When all the people clean passed over Jordan, the Lord spake unto Joshua, saying, Take you twelve men out of the people—out of every tribe a man—and command ye them, saying, Take you hence out of the midst of Jordan, out of the place where the priest's feet stood firm, twelve stones, and ye shall carry them over with you, and leave them in the lodging-place, where ye shall lodge this night." It was not one man, nor two, who were charged to remember the passage of the Jordan, it was a national deliverance, and only of it could be an adequate acknowledgment to God. For national sins there must be national humiliation and confession; for national mercies there must be national thanksgiving; and where such a national recognition of God is wanting, most surely national judgment will follow. "Then Joshua called the twelve men whom he had prepared (see Ch. 3 : 12) of the children of Israel, out of every tribe a man," and he gave them commandment to do as God had said, and added, "That this may be a sign among you, that when your children ask in time to come, saying, What mean ye by these stones? then ye shall answer them that the waters of Jordan were cut off before the ark of the covenant of the Lord; when it passed over Jordan, the waters of Jordan were cut off; and these stones shall be a memorial unto the children of Israel forever." Again and again we read in the Old Testament how God makes provision that the questions which naturally arise in the mind of a child shall be answered. But children do not ask questions about things which they never hear spoken of, or of which they see no sign. If parents are not occupied with the things of God, and if they neglect to teach them diligently unto their children, and to talk of them when they sit in their home, and when they walk by the way, and when they lie down, and when they rise up (Deut. 6 : 7), the probability will be that the children also will show no interest in the things of God. God would have our lives to be full of stones of memorial. In some houses we meet with memorials of travel, in some of family greatness, in some of the learning of the inhabitants, in some of the terrible way in which life is frittered away. But in some houses

A National Remembrance

Everything Speaks of Answered Prayer.

You take up an album, every photograph has a story; it is a stone of memorial; every little trifle, worth nothing in itself, is the gift of some soul which has found Jesus, or a memorial of some signal answer to prayer. God loves to see these memorials in the houses of His children. But there were also memorial stones for none but the eye of God to see—neither priests nor elders touched these; Joshua alone had to do with them; he set up twelve stones in the midst of Jordan, in the place where the feet of the priests which bare the ark of the covenant stood, "and they are there unto this day." Christ has His own unseen memorial of His death and suffering for us. Deep in the judgment which He bare for our sins, He has His memorial, the Jordan flows over it, no man sees it, but only the eye of Him who made His soul an offering for sin. But He keeps this memorial before God "unto this day."

While God spoke to Joshua, and Joshua to the people, the priests, bearing the ark of the covenant, stood still in Jordan, "and the people hasted and passed over"; the ark still stayed back the waters. The laws of nature were not suspended by some temporary strain. Until the Word of the Lord bid them return, they would continue to be held back in that piled up heap from which not so much as a drop of spray fell upon God's people! What a picture! Jordan means judgment. In Christ, the ark of the covenant, judgment unhurt, untouched. He was crucified, He bore our sentence, and so He stays back judgment from us; precious, glorious Redeemer! And again, as He dwells in our hearts by faith, He brings us to judge of ourselves and of circumstances with Him, and to go with Him into the Jordan which flows between us and the old wilderness of struggle, and between us and the old world life of Egypt. In Him we see fear and anxiety and self, in all its forms, judged as much as drunkenness, theft, impurity, and other outward sins; but in the very Jordan, in the very judgment, as soon as we are conscious of the sin, and judge it, we have the Deliverer discovering to us the sin, that He may deliver us.

We May Go Through

It was "when all the people were then passed over" Jordan, and not till then, "that the ark of God passed over, and the priests, in the presence of the people." Then it was that "the Lord spake unto Joshua, saying, Command the priests that bear the ark of the testimony, that they come up out of Jordan." He did so, and they began to move, but the waters remained until they had reached the shore. Then the pile of water began to flow down, and, little by little, it disappeared, and "the waters of Jordan returned unto their place, and flowed over all his banks as they did before." God will never command any of His children to walk in an impossible path without sending the ark of the covenant with them, "When He putteth forth His own sheep, He goeth before them, and the sheep follow Him." (John 10 : 4.) We need not inquire whether such and such a path is possible. All we need to know is this—Is it the will of God? All the rest is His responsibility.

Whenever a Man Honors God, God Honors Him.

Joshua set up the twelve memorial stones in Gilgal, commanding the people to tell their children how the Lord dried up the waters of Jordan before them as He had dried up the Red Sea, "that all the people of the earth may know the hand of the Lord, that it is mighty; that ye might fear the Lord your God for ever." Thus Joshua magnified God. "On that day the Lord magnified Joshua in the sight of all Israel; and they feared him as they feared Moses, all the days of his life." It was in Gilgal that the children of Israel who had been born in the wilderness were circumcised, and then brought into outward covenant with God. Under the Christian dispensation we are baptized, not circumcised. A circumcised Jew must do the law, and live by it. But baptism buries us, and it is no longer "Do," but "Believe" for salvation, not "Do, and thou shalt live," but, "Do the will of God because thou dost live." Another remarkable circumstance happened to them. They kept the passover four days after they passed over Jordan, and from that time the manna ceased, and they began to "eat of the old corn of the land . . . . the fruit of the land of Canaan"—the fruit of the Land of Promise, the fruit of the promises of God! Oh how blessed it is! He eats of it who continually takes God at His Word, and reckons that He cannot fail to accomplish what He has spoken; the Word does profit him because it is mixed with faith in him that hears it. (See Heb. 4 : 2.)

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION—1888.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled, "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting 75 cents. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God.

CHRIST'S LOVE.

There's a song of praise in my heart to-day,
And a gladness no words can tell,
As I think of the love that is holding me,
That never can change or fail.
Other love may grow cold, as the years roll by,
Other friends may forgetful be,
But Jesus never forgets His own
Through the years of eternity.

That love everlasting what tongue can express?
What heart can its strength understand?
A love that can reach to the depths of sin,
And seat us at His right hand.
He hath borne our sorrows, He hath known our griefs,
He hath suffered with us below;
And now from His throne He in pity looks down
To comfort all human woe.

Sorrows may gather about my path,
Kind friends may be borne from my side,
But the arms everlasting around me fold,
And still I in peace abide.
He hath promised me strength for the stormy days,
As well as for those that are bright—
He hath bidden me rest in His loving care
In the darkness as well as the light.

My footsteps may falter along the path,
And I may lie down to rest;
But nothing can sever me from His love—
In life or in death I am blest—
For He knoweth each grave where His loved ones sleep,
They are safe in His tender care;
And though I may pass through death's gloomy vale,
His love will surround me there.

As the living plant to the sunlight turns,
Unconscious of all beside,
So my heart would forget all its earth-born joys
In the love of the Crucified.
Oh, I cannot be satisfied until I shall see
The light of His beautiful face.
And hear the sweet welcome He hath for me—
Forgiven and saved by grace!

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike), will be sent post-paid, for 10 cts., or 100 for 20 cts. Postage stamps taken.

For Headache
Use Horsford's Acid Phosphate.
Dr. I. R. SANFORD, Sheffield, Mass., says; "Most excellent in derangements of the nervous system, such as headache and sleeplessness."

Farmers and others who have a little leisure time for the next few months will find it to their interest to write to B.F. Johnson & Co., Publishers of Richmond, Va. They offer great inducements to persons to work for them all or part of their time.

The latest and best imperial Photographs of Dr. Talmage and Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, with their fac-simile autograph, and also imperial photograph of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, can be obtained from J. E. Jewett, 77 Bible House, New York. Sent postpaid for twenty-five cents each. Postage stamps taken.

MEXICO

Contributions in aid of Christian work in Mexico are most pressingly needed, and can be mailed to the address of

BISHOP H. C. RILEY,
Care of J. P. HEATH,
43 Bible House, New York.

TO OUR CHRISTIAN FRIENDS:

As there is a regular monthly expense in connection with the work a regular monthly income is needed to meet that expense. We, therefore, specially ask for regular monthly contributions in its behalf. If many will each send a little every month, or quarter, or whenever they can, it will do great good. Remember, every little helps.

H. CLAY TRUMBULL.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED FOR MY STORY OF THE WAR
By Mary A. Livermore
Her own narrative of "Four Years' Personal Experience as Field and Hospital Nurse." It portrays the Womanly or "Heavenly" side of the War, its Lights and Shadows "as a woman saw them." Bright, Pure, and Good, full of "laughter and tears" of thrilling interest and touching pathos, it sells at sight to all. Splendid Steel-Plates, and famous old Battle-Flags richly colored in exact fac-simile. The "booming" book for Men and Women Agents $100 to $200 a month made. Distance no hindrance, for we Pay Freights and give Extra Terms. Write for circulars to A. D. WORTHINGTON & CO., Hartford, Conn.

Christian Work in Mexico.

Through the reading of the Holy Scriptures translated into Spanish some earnest souls in Mexico have, by God's blessing, been led to a clear knowledge of the Gospel. From their numbers able preachers of the Christian faith in its primitive purity have been raised up, around whom congregations have been gathered from among the humble poor, who have been the first to publicly welcome and defend the pure Gospel in Mexico. The members of these congregations, rich in faith, have worked earnestly and bravely for Christ and His truth among their fellow countrymen in that beautiful Southern portion of North America called Mexico. Schools have been established by them, in which large numbers of bright boys and girls have received a good secular education and have been carefully taught the Christian faith. From the children thus Branch of the Church of our Lord Jesus Christ, that maintains the faith in its purity and integrity, has been organized among these native Christians in the Republic of Mexico. The members of this Mexican Church of our Lord Jesus Christ, though gathered mostly from among the poor, are yet doing a most important Christian work. To continue that work, we need to pay a few leading workers small monthly salaries and also to defray some current expenses. To help to raise the needed funds two societies have been formed—one with an executive committee of ladies and the other with an executive committee of gentlemen—and we earnestly invite our fellow Christians to aid the work by contributing in its behalf. We are trying to secure monthly or quarterly contributions to meet the regular monthly expenses of the work. In order to continue and extend the work, we wish to raise seven hundred dollars a month by endeavoring to have seven hundred persons to each give on an average one dollar every month for this object, some giving more than a dollar a month and others giving less as they may be able and willing.

We earnestly invite all who will, to join us in this systematic effort in behalf of the cause of Christ in Mexico, by becoming monthly subscribers to this fund. We already have regular subscribers whose gifts amount monthly to over one hundred dollars, and a growing circle of friends who are forwarding us occasional donations.

This Mexican Church of our Lord Jesus Christ is a very effective instrumentality through which to do Christian work among the many millions on this Western Hemisphere who speak the Spanish language, comparatively few of whom have ever had a Bible in their hands. A beautiful church building has been secured in the City of Mexico as the centre of the activities of this Mexican Church of our Lord Jesus Christ. Through the workers connected with that centre more than forty congregations have been gathered from among the poor in different parts of the Republic of Mexico. We have some faithful and able preachers now in the field, but more young men need to be trained for the ministry. Multitudes of Protestant children in Mexico, some of them orphans, need to be educated. We make three requests of you, Christian reader: first, that you will, if possible, become a monthly or quarterly subscriber in behalf of this Christian work; second, that you will try and induce your friends to also contribute to it; third, that you will remember this precious work in Mexico in your prayers.

We most sincerely thank all who are already generously contributing to this Christian work for their timely and generous gifts, and we earnestly invite many others, to unite with us in aiding it by also becoming monthly subscribers in its behalf. Those who may not feel that they can give as much as a dollar a month are earnestly asked to give what they can, whenever they are able—EVERY LITTLE HELPS. Fellow Christian, if you will generously consent to contribute a dollar a month or more or less to the work, will you kindly inform me of the fact? Contributions either large or small can be mailed directly to my address as follows:

BISHOP H. C. RILEY, care of J. P. HEATH,
No. 43 Bible House, New York, U. S

"Florence Home Needle Work" is now ready. Contains pages with nearly 250 illustrations. The [illegible]rns are Damask Stitches, Tapestry and Ita[illegible] Embroidery, Drawn Work, Darning, Croche[illegible] teaches ladies how to make Soutache Silk Braid
for trimming [illegible] garments in latest fashion. Book mailed to any address on receipt of six cents.
NONOTUCK SILK CO., Florence, Mass.

AGENTS WANTED to sell "The Child's Bible." Introduction by Bishop J. H. Vincent, D.D. The best selling book handled by agents. Recommended by all clergymen. Address Cassell & Co., B.B.S.D., 104 and 108 Fourth Ave., New York; 40 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

MORE MEN WANTED for local and traveling Salesmen. Good Pay. Address
E. B. RICHARDSON & CO.,
Nurserymen, Geneva, N. Y.

In all the world there is but one OPIUM Habit. The Dr. J. L. Stephens Remedy never fails, and no other treatment ever cures. We have cured more than 10,000 cases. No other treatment ever cured one case. NO PAY TILL CURED. Remember this, and write to the J. L. Stephens Co., Lebanon, Ohio.

$75.00 to $250.00 A MONTH can be made working for us. Agents preferred who can furnish a horse and give their whole time to the business. Spare moments may be profitably employed also. A few vacancies in towns and cities. B. F. Johnson & Co., Pub's, 1009 Main St., Richmond, Va.

FURLEY & BUTTRU
English Health Clothing

JAMES McCREERY & C
have complete lines of this c brated English Underwear
white and colored merino, natural wool in weights s able to the season—for n women and children.
This underwear gives e satisfaction and is equal to manufactured.
Especial attention is calle
our "Fine Silk Underwear all weights; also to our ass ment of the celebrated
"OSTERODE HEALTH CLOTH offered at comparatively prices.
Orders by mail promptly
cuted.
JAMES McCREERY & C
Broadway and 11th St

PAPER 25c. OUR COUNTRY
The most powerful book of the Century on Ame
Now in its 125th thousand. Critics say "It stirs, quickens and makes the blood boil with pat and Christian vehemence." "A storehouse of info" "A great educator." "A revelation." "A Danie lon." Mailed, on receipt of price, by The BAKER & TAYLOR Co., 740 Broadwa

Pertain sons, P Things, Bible Concert Prayer-Topics, etc. I by J. cent, pages. By mail, $2. Immensely popular. new book, BOW IN THE CLOUD, of Comfort, etc., by 200 Best Authors, $1
WOMEN'S HAND-BOOK. $2. A lady wanted in every to duce it. Quick Sales. Big Pay.
E. B. TREAT, Publisher, 771 Broad

PRINTING Book of Type, 5c. Amateur Printers' Guide Book, 15c. Samples of Scrap Pictures and Cards, 10c
PRES CIRC JOSEPH W 19 Murra

BAILEY'S COMPOUND Light-spreading Silver-Plated CORRUGATED GLASS REFLECTORS
A wonderful invention for Lighting Churches, Halls, etc. Handsome designs. Satisfaction guaranteed. Catalogue and price list free.
Bailey Reflector Co.
113 Wood st. Pittsburgh, Pa.

UNIVERSITY ORGA
They Lead the World.—$55
Sold Direct to Families. No
Solid Walnut 5 Octaves Double Guaranteed for Six Years and se with Stool and Book, for TRIAL IN YO OWN HOME BEFORE YOU BUY. Es
1859. MARCHAL & SM
235 East 21st Street, N

WANTED at once, a represent or Woman, in eve until Dec. 25th. Libe
All time not necessary. Give references.
R. H. Woodward & Co., Baltim

FEATHERS. The finest live white ge ers in the country, 75 c Hair Mattresses made over for $2.50. Feath ed & renovated. Pickford, 11 Nassau St., Bro

TEAS LADIES Send at our new THE GREAT AMERICAN 31 and 33 Vesey St., New

IF YOU WANT ANY BOO
it makes no difference where you see them or by whom or where they are publishe send your orders to me and I will attend promptly, send all books to you prepaid, antes that they reach you safely. Posta received for fractional parts of a dollar.
J. E. JEWETT, 77 Bible House, N

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1883, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.

Vol. XI., No. 42. Office, 63 Bible House. N. Y. THURSDAY, OCTOBER 18. 1883. Price, 3 Cents. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

THE OPENING OF THE EXHIBITION AT MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA, AND PORTRAITS OF THE PRESIDENT AND ARCHITECT.

THE EPIDEMIC OF SUICIDE. Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

PROPHECY IN THE PENTATEUCH.

PORTRAIT OF DR. DWIGHT, PRESIDENT OF YALE COLLEGE.

A PHYSICIAN'S RESTORATION. (With Illust.)

A Japanese Murderer Forgiven—The Berachah Mission—Women Ransomed with Ivory—A Religion Collector—An Editor's Revenge—An Anxious Night in China.

CONVERSIONS AT SING SING CAMP-MEETING.

MILITARISM A PROPHETIC SIGN.

FURTHER AFIELD. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

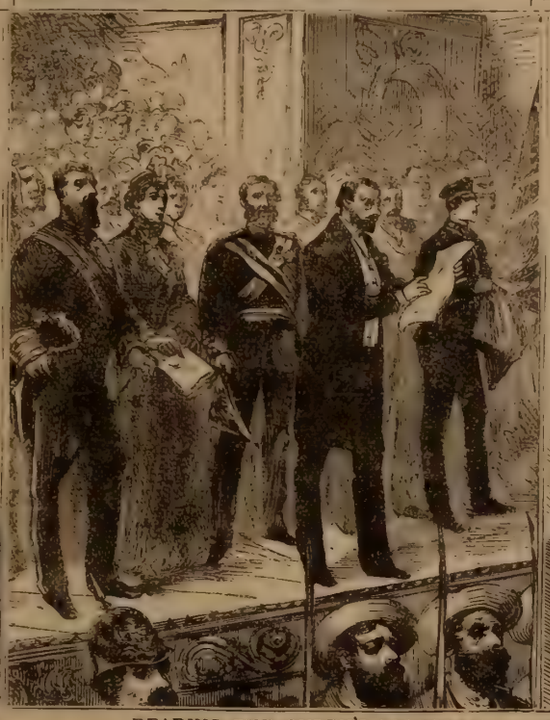
Gems from New Books: A Little Girl's Inquiry—A Hawaiian Mother's Lesson—A Child's Penetration.

PICTURE OF THE CATHEDRAL MOUNTAINS IN THE YOSEMITE.

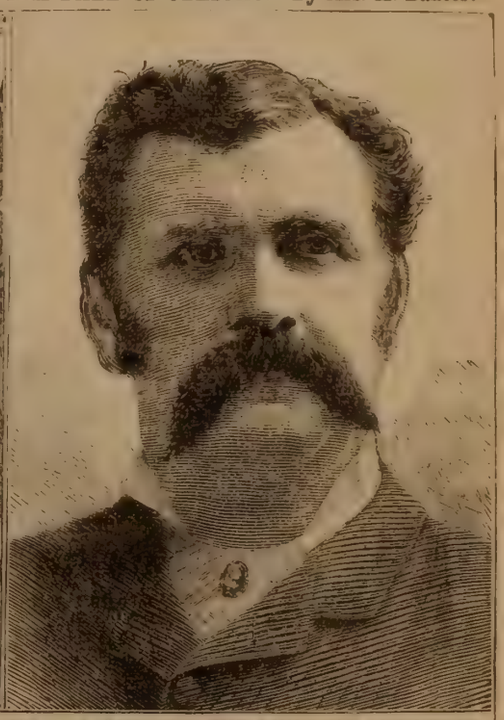
THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE. A New Serial Story by Rev. L. S. Keyser. (Continued.)

THE FALL OF JERICHO. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

SIR JAMES MACBAIN, PRESIDENT OF EXHIBITION.



READING THE QUEEN'S TELEGRAM.



MR. G. R. JOHNSON, THE BUILDING ARCHITECT.

Opening of Melbourne Exhibition—Procession of the Governors of Australia up the Grand Avenue of Nations.

THE INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION IN MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA.

The position occupied by the United States in the International Exhibition with which Melbourne is celebrating the centenary of New South Wales, will render welcome to our readers the pictures on the preceding page, representing the inaugural ceremony, with portraits of Sir James MacBain, the President of the Exhibition, and Mr. G. R. Johnson, the architect of the building. The immense labor involved in the undertaking is readily realized among ourselves, past experience being a guide. The Australians have spared neither time nor labor in making it a success. They have been aided by a Royal Commission in the Mother Country, over which the Prince of Wales presided, and which has made arrangements for exhibits from that and other countries. Apart from Great Britain and the Colonies, the countries officially represented are the United States, Germany, France, Austria-Hungary, Belgium, while Sweden and Norway, Turkey, Italy Spain, China, Japan, and Madagascar are privately exhibiting.

The Exhibition Buildings

occupy a picturesque sight in Carlton Gardens, and the area they cover is thirty-five and a half acres. The front of the building proper faces the south, and it has a very imposing effect upon the visitor. The architecture is a compromise between the French and Italian orders. The frontage of the main building runs 500 feet, and the main entrance is a vast archway between pavilion-crowned towers. The main hall is surmounted by a dome 220 feet in height, with a broad terrace and gold-crowned pavilion. The latter is a prominent object, and in the sunlight can be distinguished many miles down the bay. The Exhibition is intersected from north to south by the "Grand Avenue of Nations." In this Grand Avenue, a quarter of a mile long, passing down it from the north end, are the entrances to the courts, respectively, on the right hand side, of the United States of America, Germany, Austro-Hungary, Belgium, France, and Great Britain; on the left hand side, those of Canada, New Zealand, Queensland, South Australia, the large Court of Victoria, Tasmania, and New South Wales. Under the dome which covers the intersection of the Eastern and Western Avenues with the Grand Avenue of Nations is the entrance to the south end, where are the great hall, the fernery, the State reception-rooms, and the offices of the Exhibition Commissioners, with galleries, courts, and various departments specially ornamental or attractive.

Here, in the east gallery of the nave, above the concert-hall, is the German Trophy, which represents Germania congratulating Australia on the attainment of her centenary; and in the south gallery is the statue of Victory, which is a gift from the Germans to Victoria. The British, French, German, Belgian, and Victorian Art Galleries are in the balconies on the north and south sides of the nave, in this part of the buildings. Proceeding thence up the Grand Avenue of Nations, and passing the Courts of Great Britain and France on one hand, New South Wales and Victoria on the other, and several foreign and colonial courts, the visitor, approaching the north end, reaches that of Germany, and the United States Court next it. The entrance to the German Court is through an immense arch hung with rich draperies, which leads directly into a saloon filled with pianos, and these are continually being played.

The United States Court

is distinguished by the stars painted on columns, and by the name in large gold letters under the sidelights; its front is occupied by Singer's sewing machines, and Edison's phonographs attract much curiosity. In the machinery annex, at the north end, Great Britain, America, and Germany divide the space between them; the collection of British machinery is said to be the most important ever brought together. There is not very much ground outside the buildings, or anything worthy of note except two portable railways, and the inevitable "switch-back," now a popular amusement at all Exhibitions. As a well-furnished and well-ordered show of leading arts and industries European, American, and Australian, and of Colonial products, the Melbourne Exhibition is complete. Though occupying less space than the Philadelphian and Paris Exhibition buildings, the great edifice in which a world's civilization is displayed in Melbourne, is one of the most marked illustrations of the vast resources of the colony which is now doing its share in the celebration of the Australian centenary.

The Opening Ceremony, which took place on August 1, was in all respects a red-letter day in the local history, and citizens of Melbourne, which is the capital city of Victoria, turned out to do honor to the great occasion. The Governor of the colony, Sir Henry Brougham Loch, accompanied by Lady Loch, performed the ceremony. Invited guests, to the number of seven thousand, were present. Among them were viceregal parties from the other Australian colonies; military, naval, Church, and State dignitaries; judges of the supreme courts, and a host of the political rank-and-file. From early morning the points of vantage along which the procession of governors, with their escorts, were to pass, were covered with people; and towards noon, looking from the top of Collins Street, there were in sight over 150,000 well-dressed, prosperous-looking witnesses to Melbourne's greatness. Altogether, it is estimated that between 400,000 and 500,000 people turned out. From the far north of Queensland and the northern territory, from New South Wales, Tasmania, New Zealand, and from other lands, crowds had gathered.

The Whole Line of the Route, from Government House to the Exhibition building, was kept by military and naval guards, and as the viceregal parties passed along the streets, escorted by the local cavalry and mounted rifle corps, the people cheered enthusiastically. Guns were fired, announcing their departure from Government House, and the processions of fire-brigades and trade unionists and friendly societies were formed, and marched up from Spencer Street to the Exhibition grounds. In the procession there were over 14,000 members of friendly societies, with bands playing. The whole affair afforded

A Spectacle Not Easily Forgotten.

From every house flags fluttered, and people cheered and waved hats and handkerchiefs; thirty bands marched at regular intervals between the various societies, and the rich banners of the Orders, borne on vast lorries drawn by magnificent teams of horses, seemed to fill the music-burdened air with light and joyousness. The day was cold, and a little rain fell, but the enthusiasm of the great concourse of people was not to be damped, and as the various governors and other high officials descended from their carriages, there arose a vast roar of cheers which went echoing along the black line down and away to Prince's Bridge. Then the Exhibition gates were opened, and at the doors of the Grand Avenue of Nations a procession was formed, which marched into the great hall. Never before in Australia has such an array been seen. First were borne the royal colors, followed by the naval and military officers, British and foreign; then the Ceremonial Committee, the civic authorities, the judges, the executive commissioners, the Crown Ministers from the other colonies, the Speakers of the Australian Parliaments, and the governors of the various colonies, all of whom were cheered. As moved slowly up the Grand Avenue of Nations, the national anthems of America, Germany, Austria, and France were played by bands stationed in each of the courts named, and when the Grand Hall was reached, the British national anthem was sung, Mr. F. H. Cowen conducting. There the distinguished guests mounted a dais which had been erected in the great hall, and within view of the spectators in every part of the main building. In the western nave was the orchestra and a chorus, eight hundred strong, the lady singers all dressed in white, some with blue and others with cardinal sashes across their breasts. Over 30,000 people were assembled, and yet all was as quiet and orderly as could be desired. Looking up from the Avenue of Nations to the dais, the scene was one of grand impressiveness. Over the brilliant groups of statesmen, soldiers, governors, and dignitaries of the Church and Bench and the ladies, a great statue of Victory extending a wreath seemed as though about to crown, not the conquerors of men and the shedders of blood in the cause of kingly or national ambition, but the subduers of a great wilderness, the bearers of the flag of peace, the pioneers of civilization in a land which a hundred years ago was known only as a great dark land inshore, and which has grown from a community of rough pioneers into one of the commercial centres of the world.

The Magnificent Procession

At this stage of the ceremonies came the solution of a problem which had been a source of much perplexity and somewhat embittered controversy. The commissioners had very properly decided that the inauguration should include a prayer, but the question arose as to who should say the prayer. It was urged on the one hand that the Bishop of the English Church should officiate, as Victoria is part of the British Empire; on the other hand it was said that the head of the Roman Catholic Church, being an Archbishop, was entitled to precedence; another person asked why should not the Moderator of the Presbyterian Assembly be asked to pray. The controversy waxed warm, but ultimately it was decided that Sir James MacBain should read a prayer, which was to be written by the Anglican bishop and approved of by the heads of the other denominations. This was done, and it is a remarkable illustration of the fact that the three sects, though so antagonistic in operation, easily find a common ground when they come before the Mercy Seat to present their wants and praises. This was

The Prayer:

"Almighty God, the Father of all the families of the earth, who hast made of one blood all nations of men, and hast determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation, we humbly pray Thee to bless and hallow this our undertaking. The heaven, even the heavens, are Thine, but the earth hast Thou given to the children of men. And as Thou didst at the first bid them to multiply and replenish the earth, and subdue it, we give Thee hearty thanks that in Thy gracious Providence Thou didst guide our fathers to this exceeding good land—a land flowing with milk and honey—and hast so prospered us that the little one has become a thousand, and the small one a strong nation.

"And inasmuch as all knowledge of the resources of nature cometh from Thee, and all the skill of man is Thy gift, we thank Thee for the discoveries and applications of science whereby we are enabled to meet together in this place from distant regions of the globe. O Lord! our God, we acknowledge that all the treasure of human industry and art cometh from Thy hand, and is all Thine own. We humbly lay it at Thy feet, beseeching Thee to grant that it may advance the interests of trade and commerce, that it may encourage useful learning, and promote unity, peace, and concord throughout the world. Hasten the time, we pray Thee, when men shall not learn war any more; and when the nations shall only provoke one another to such good works as will ennoble and benefit mankind.

"And now, O Gracious God! as we have begun this enterprise in dependence on Thy goodness, and with prayer for Thy blessing, so we entreat Thee to look favorably upon it even to the end. Protect this building, and those who shall assemble within its walls, from all harm and accident. Let no disaster befall the precious stores contained in it. Let not the hope of its promoters be disappointed. But establish Thou, O God! the work of our hands upon us; yea, the work of our hands establish Thou it. And to Thee will we ascribe all praise and glory, in the name of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen."

The prayer having been said, the "Old Hundredth" was sung by the choir, and the grand old hymn of praise could scarcely have been heard to better advantage. It had a very marked effect on the vast audience, some strong men being moved to tears as the great tones filled the building, awakening memories sacred, beautiful, and full of grace, after which Mr. Cowen's "Hymn of Thanksgiving" was most effectively rendered.

The Conclusion of the Ceremony came when a gold master-key to all locks in the building was handed to the governor, who thereupon gave the signal for hoisting the national colors, and, amid the thunders of the guns from the batteries and the ships in the harbor, declared the exhibition open. 'A telegram was loyally despatched to Queen Victoria, announcing the event, and subsequently (as shown in the illustration between the portaits on the first page) the Governor read to the assembled people their monarch's condescending reply, congratulating them on the success which had already been achieved, and wishing them greater prosperity in the future.

AN ANXIOUS NIGHT IN CHINA.

In a letter to the China Inland Mission Miss Miles, who is one of the missionaries of the society now laboring at Ta-ning, says: "We have had our first communion service at Ta-ning. I am sure our Father must have rejoiced to see the little band lately reclaimed from heathenism, remembering the death of the Lord Jesus. There were eleven, besides us foreigners. Yesterday, Miss Scott and I went outside the city and burnt three idol shrines in one house Our hearts were full as we sang, 'Praise God, from whom all blessings flow,' and watched the hideous things burn to ashes. 'Thanks be unto God, who always leadeth us in triumph'—we can thankfully say that we are being led in triumph in Ta-ning. Last Friday at midnight an ox was sacrificed at the city temple in honor of Confucius, and all the scholars were expected to assemble and join in the idolatrous rites. For some weeks back we have had two bright young students coming to hear the gospel, and one of them destroyed the idols in his house. They told us they did not mean to go to the sacrifice; would we pray for them? They were quite prepared to be beaten, knowing how much the Mandarin here dislikes foreigners, and all who have to do with them. After going to bed, I lay awake thinking of these two men, and asking God to protect them; several crackers had been fired off, and soon a great bang sounded, and re-echoed through the hills. A few minutes after, these two men who were in the kitchen with our servants, sang 'Onward go,' and then after prayer, they all sang again, this time 'Follow, follow, I will follow Jesus.' Since then, we have heard that the Mandarin is afraid to ill-treat them on account of higher authorities."

Volume X, of the Christian Herald, Containing the numbers for 1887, with complete index, bound in cloth, may be had from this office; price, $2.50, including postage. A few volumes of 1884, and 1885 are also for sale.

New Edition of Rev. M. Baxter's Pamphlets.

THREE PAMPHLETS IN ONE

1. Coming Wars from 1888 to 1891, and Translation of 144,000 living Christians on March 5, 1896, before the 3½ years' persecution by Napoleon, etc.

2. Twenty Predictions about Coming Wars, by Twenty Learned Expositors.

3. End of this Age by the Descent of Christ in Pass over Week, April, 1901, being 45 years from the Crimean War Treaty of Peace in Passover Week, April, 1856, and 2,345 years from Passover Week, April, B. C. 444-5, as shown by Daniel's Dates.

The Three Pamphlets in an Illuminated Cover, 144 Pages, postage included,

Price Twenty Cents.

For sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Memorable Ride Across a Bridge.—The Rev. M. McCaul observes: "I once rode with a gentleman over a bridge in Canada. As we were passing across, he suddenly stopped, and turning toward me, exclaimed, 'Man, this is an awful place! Some years ago I was coming over this bridge with a farmer and his wife, and when in the very middle, the horse took fright and swerved, throwing the man and woman clean over the bridge. Down, down they sank, until crash they came upon yon rock, and were mutilated almost beyond recognition. Do you know,' he continued, 'I never pass this place without remembering that fearful moment—a moment in which I felt very near to God, and standing helpless before Him, I offered my heartfelt thanks for deliverance. From that moment I was a converted man.' There is nothing like danger for making one feel his need of Christ, and it is only when in great peril that men truly feel their own insignificance and His power."

Objecting to Close Quarters.—The Same Minister observes: "A few nights ago I was visiting a family in which both the husband and wife had been in the habit formerly of coming to our Gospel meeting, but for a considerable time had not put in an appearance. Talking to the woman, I seriously asked her why she had stopped attending our meeting. 'Well, sir,' she replied, 'I did not like the way your workers, as you call them, do at your meeting. They will never let one go to the meeting, and rise quietly and go home again; they must run after one, and ask if your soul is saved.' 'And what is better,' I answered, 'than to say your soul is at peace with God, if it be so, and if not, to set about securing the blessing?' 'Ah! that is true enough,' was the reply; 'but if you say your soul is not saved, they will not let you go till they try to persuade you to come to Christ, and though I mean to do so some day, I am not going to do it just yet.' Many people, like this woman, object to being personally dealt with at a meeting. You may speak to them, according to their idea, about almost anything except salvation."

They All Had "A Bit of the Pig."—The Rev. Mr. Pugh says: "An Irishman was one day apprehended on a charge of stealing a pig. He was brought up for trial, but it was noticed that as soon as he had scrutinized the features of the twelve jurymen who were trying his case, that a look of comfortable contentment settled upon his face. The case proceeded. The lawyers pleaded for and against him. The case was beginning to look very bad for the man, yet still he maintained the same complacent look. All the evidence was finished; the jury retired, but soon returned. Amidst profound silence the question was asked, 'Guilty or not guilty?' And to the surprise of all but the prisoner, the answer was given, 'Not guilty.' The prisoner was dismissed. One of his friends meeting him outside shortly afterwards, said, 'Well, Pat, I was surprised. However did they let you off?' 'As soon as I saw the jury,' replied Pat, I knew I was all right, for every one of them had a bit of the pig.' I think this story illustrates to some extent why we cannot get any truly efficient restrictive measure passed in reference to the drink traffic. Too many of the members of our legislatures have a hand in it themselves. They have all had a bit of the pig."

"Call Him Victor, Frank."—Mr. Holness says: A friend of mine told me the following incident, he having visited the lady mentioned: Mrs. W. was a young wife and mother; her babe was but seven days old when she was called upon to leave this world. For a month prior to her departure, her confidence in Christ had been unshaken, and she knew whom she had believed. But a short time before her death the tempter came, and tried to undermine her faith and trust in Jesus. He suggested to her money, dress, pleasure, health, etc., and promised her all these things if she would give up her Saviour. It was a terrible conflict; she was young, and there was much on earth that she could cling to. A profuse perspiration bedewed her, and her heart throbbed painfully with the agony of the strife. But she conquered; by the grace of God she was victorious. She steadfastly refused all the overtures of Satan, and the cloud passed away from her heart, and left her rejoicing in the radiance of her Saviour's love. And now she asked the nurse to fetch her baby. It was brought to her. She kissed the child, then turning to her husband, said, "Frank, call him Victor, for I have just obtained the victory through the blood." And then she passed peacefully into the presence of her Lord. Happy mother, thus to be able to surrender all for Jesus, and find in Him her all in all.

A Prodigal Caught at the Corner.—One of the band of workers says: "About seven years ago I wandered away from my parents, and came to this great city, going about the streets singing the songs of sin for the devil, obtaining a coin here and there. One Sunday night, about four years ago, I came out of one of those saloons on the Dials and heard a band of open-air workers singing at the corner. I stopped and listened, and the words uttered struck me to the heart. They were saying that perhaps some of us in the crowd had praying mothers. I knew I had a praying mother away down in the country. After the speaking they sang another hymn, and it was, 'Where is my wandering boy to-night?' I had a look at myself and thought, 'Can it be possible that my mother loves me still? No, there is no one cares for me.' And at the close of the open-air meeting the friends invited us to go into the Mission Hall, and something seemed to say, 'Go in.' But I said, 'No, I will not go in to-night with these people, I will go the other way.' I walked along Earl Street, but as I went I thought, 'Can I get in without those people seeing me?' I came back and crept inside, as I thought, unnoticed. At the close of the meeting they had a prayer-meeting, and Miss Ling came down the room and asked me, 'Do you love the Lord?' This led to further conversation, but it was three weeks before I could quite make up my mind to accept Christ, and I thought then it was time I found something better to do than sing in the streets."

A Sceptic's Dying Confession.—I Witnessed a young man's conversion who was a sceptic for some years of his short life, but who found out the falseness of all human reasonings before he died. While he lived I saw but little of him, but when he was dying he sent for me to come and see him. I went to his bedroom with his father; and as I gazed upon his face, I was startled for a moment to see the ravages of disease. He was far gone in consumption; his eyes were bright, his cheeks flushed, and his voice was low. I took his hand and sat by his side. He held my hand for some time, and then said: "It has been all dark with me, all dark, but it is brighter now. I think I see the light. I found out last night that I was a vile sinner." Then I saw the tears gather in his eyes and roll down his poor thin cheeks. And, looking at me, he added, "I want to tell you about my life. I've been a sceptic." He was only twenty-one! His friends set him up, and as his voice was very faint I bent close to him, and he began: "I had a good education, but I got to be sceptical. I began to pick the Bible to pieces; and when a young man begins to do that, you know there are many things he cannot understand; and I was young." He paused a moment, then continued, "Now I want you to explain to me fully and clearly the birth of Christ." Lifting a silent prayer to God, I turned to Luke 1, and read a few verses; then spoke to him of sin and the necessity of atonement; At last he had his feet upon the Rock. He had been to God about his sins before I saw him. I knelt and thanked God for His mercy to him; and left him trusting in the Saviour. He went from the night of scepticism into the morning of faith. He found happiness and peace in gazing with believing eyes on the Christ of God.

THE EPIDEMIC OF SUICIDE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached last Sunday Morning, October 14, 1888.

"He drew out his sword and would have killed himself, supposing that the prisoners had been fled. But Paul cried with a loud voice, saying, Do thyself no harm." Acts 16 : 26, 27.

The Sheriff's Dismay—His Anticipation of Disgrace—Resolves to Avoid it by Suicide—Historical Suicides—A Common Modern Crime—The Worst of Crimes—Napoleon's Attempt—Demented Suicides—Hugh Miller's Overtaxed Brain—William Cowper Saved—The Suicide's Place After Death—How God Regards the Crime—The Rogues' Picture-Gallery—The Cause of the Present Epidemic—Infidel Teaching of Annihilation—Appendices to a Bad Book—How to Meet Temptation—The Sorrowless World.

HERE is a would-be suicide arrested in his deadly attempt. He was a sheriff, and according to the Roman law, a bailiff himself must suffer the punishment due an escaped prisoner; and if the prisoner breaking jail was sentenced to be endungeoned for three or four years, then the sheriff must be endungeoned for three or four years; and if the prisoner breaking jail was to have suffered capital punishment, then the sheriff must suffer capital punishment. The sheriff had received especial charge to keep a sharp lookout for Paul and Silas. The government had not had confidence in bolts and bars to keep safe these two clergymen, about whom there seemed to be something Strange and Supernatural.

Sure enough, by miraculous power, they are free, and the sheriff, waking out of a sound sleep, and supposing these ministers have run away, and knowing that they were to die for preaching Christ, and realizing that he must therefore die, rather than go under the executioner's axe on the morrow and suffer public disgrace, resolves to precipitate his own decease. But before the sharp, keen, glittering dagger of the sheriff could strike his heart, one of the unloosened prisoners arrests the blade by the command: "Do thyself no harm."

In Olden Time,

and where Christianity had not interfered with it, suicide was considered honorable and a sign of courage. Demosthenes poisoned himself when told that Alexander's ambassador had demanded the surrender of the Athenian orators. Isocrates killed himself rather than surrender to Philip of Macedon. Cato, rather than submit to Julius Cæsar, took his own life, and after three times his wounds had been dressed tore them open and perished. Mithridates killed himself rather than submit to Pompey, the conqueror. Hannibal destroyed his life by poison from his ring, considering life unbearable. Lycurgus a suicide, Brutus a suicide. After the disaster of Moscow, Napoleon always carried with him a preparation of opium, and one night his servant heard the ex-emperor arise, put something in a glass and drink it, and soon after the groans aroused all the attendants, and it was only through utmost medical skill he was resuscitated from the stupor of the opiate. Times have changed, and yet needs to be toned up on the subject of suicide. Have you seen a paper in the last month that did not announce the passage out of life by one's own behest? Defaulters, alarmed at the idea of exposure, quit life precipitately. Men losing large fortunes go out of the world because they cannot endure earthly existence. Frustrated affection, domestic infelicity, dyspeptic impatience, anger, remorse, envy, jealousy, destitution, misanthropy, are considered sufficient causes for absconding from this life by Paris-green, by laudanum, by belladonna, by Othello's dagger, by halter, by leap from the abutment of a bridge, by fire-arms. More cases of felo de se in the last two years than any two years of the world's existence, and more in the last month than in any twelve months. The evil is more and more spreading.

The American Conscience

A pulpit not long ago expressed some doubt as to whether there was really anything wrong about quitting this life when it became disagreeable, and there are found in respectable circles people apologetic for the crime which Paul in the text arrested. I shall show you before I get through that suicide is and I shall lift a warning unmistakable. But in the early part of this sermon I wish to admit that some of the best Christians that have ever lived have committed self-destruction, but always in dementia, and not responsible. I have no more doubt about their eternal felicity than I have of the Christian who dies in his bed in the delirium of typhoid fever. While the shock of the catastrophe is very great, I charge all those who have had Christian friends under cerebral aberration step off the boundaries of this life, to have no doubt about their happiness. The dear Lord took them right out of their dazed and frenzied state into perfect safety. How Christ feels toward the insane, you may know from the kind way He treated the demoniac of Gadara and the child lunatic, and the potency with which He hushed tempests either of sea or brain.

The Worst of all Crimes,

Hugh Miller's Suicide.

Scotland, the land prolific of intellectual giants, had none grander than Hugh Miller. Great for science and great for God. He came of the best Highland blood, and was a descendant of Donald Roy, a man eminent for piety and the rare gift of second-sight. His attainments, climbing up as he did from the quarry and the wall of the stonemason, drew forth the astonished admiration of Buckland and Murchison, the scientists, and Dr. Chalmers, the theologian, and held universities spellbound while he told them the story of what he had seen of God in the old red sandstone.

That man did more than any being that ever lived to show that the God of the hills is the God of the Bible, and he struck his tuning-fork on the rocks of Cromarty until he brought geology and theology accordant in divine worship. His two books, entitled "Footprints of the Creator" and the "Testimony of the Rocks," proclaimed the banns of an everlasting marriage between genuine science and revelation. On this latter book he toiled day and night, through love of nature and love of God, until he could not sleep, and his brain gave way, and he was found dead with a revolver by his side, the cruel instrument having had two bullets—one for him and the other for the gunsmith, who at the coroner's inquest was examining it and fell dead. Have you any doubt of the beatification of Hugh Miller, after his hot brain had ceased throbbing that winter night in his study at Portobello? Among the mightiest of earth, among the mightiest of heaven.

William Cowper's Escape.

No one doubted the piety of William Cowper, the author of those three great hymns, "Oh, for a closer walk with God," "What various hindrances we meet," "There is a fountain filled with blood"; William Cowper, who shares with Isaac Watts and Charles Wesley the chief honors of Christian hymnology. In hypochondria he resolved to take his own life, and rode to the river Thames, but found a man seated on some goods at the very point from which he expected to spring, and rode back to his home, and that night threw himself upon his own knife, but the blade broke; and then he hanged himself to the ceiling, but the rope parted. No wonder that when God mercifully delivered him from that awful dementia he sat down and wrote that other hymn just as memorable:

"God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform;
He plants His footsteps in the sea,
And rides upon the storm.

"Blind unbelief is sure to err
And scan His work in vain;
God is His own interpreter,
And He will make it plain."

While we make this merciful and righteous allowance in regard to those who were plunged into mental incoherence, I declare that that man who in the use of his reason, by his own act, snaps the bond between his body and his soul, goes straight into perdition. Shall I prove it? Revelation 21 : 8: "Murderers shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone." Revelation 22 : 15; "Without are dogs and sorcerers and whoremongers and murderers." You do not believe the New Testament? Then, perhaps, you believe the Ten Commandments: "Thou shalt not kill." Do you say all these passages refer to the taking of the life of others? Then I ask you if you are not as responsible for your own life as for the life of others. God gave you a special trust in your life. He made you

The Custodian of Your Life,

as He made you the custodian of no other life. He gave you as weapons with which to defend it two arms to strike back assailants, two eyes to watch for invasion, and a natural love of life which ought ever to be on the alert. Assassination of others is a mild crime compared with the assassination of yourself, because in the latter case it is treachery to an especial trust, it is the surrender of a castle you were especially appointed to keep, it is treason to a natural law, and it is treason to God added to ordinary murder.

To show how God in the Bible looked upon this crime, I point you to

The Rogues' Picture-Gallery

in some parts of the Bible, the pictures of the people who have committed this unnatural crime. Here is the headless trunk of Saul on the walls of Bathshan. Here is the man who chased little David—ten feet in stature chasing four. Here is the man who consulted a clairvoyant, Witch of Endor. Here is a man who, whipped in battle, instead of surrendering his sword with dignity, as many a man has done, asks his servant to slay him; and when the servant declined, then the giant plants the hilt of his sword in the earth, the sharp point sticking upward, and he throws his body on it and expires, the coward, the suicide. Here is Ahithophel, the Machiavelli of olden times, betraying his best friend David in order that he may become prime minister of Absalom, and joining that fellow in his attempt at parricide. No getting what he wanted by change of politics, he takes a short-cut out of a disgraced life into the suicide's eternity. There he is, the ingrate!

Here is Abimelech, practically a suicide. He is with an army, bombarding a tower, when a woman in the tower takes a grindstone from its place and drops it upon his head, and with what life he has left in his cracked skull he commands his armor-bearer: "Draw thy sword and slay me, lest men say a woman slew me." There is his post-mortem photograph in the book of Samuel. But is Judas Iscariot. Dr. Donne says he was a martyr, and we have in our day apologists for him. And what wonder, in this day when we have a book revealing Aaron Burr as a pattern of virtue, and in this day when we uncover a statue of Georges Sand as the benefactress of literature, and in this day when there are betrayals of Christ on the part of some of His pretended apostles—a betrayal so black it makes the infamy of Judas Iscariot white! Yet this man by his own hand hung up for the execration of all the ages, Judas Iscariot.

The Hero of This Group

All the good men and women of the Bible left to God the decision of their earthly terminus, and they could have said with Job, who had a right to commit suicide if any man ever had—what with his destroyed property, and his body all aflame with insufferable carbuncles, and everything gone from his home except the chief curse of it, a pestiferous wife, and four garrulous people pelting him with comfortless talk while he sits on a heap of ashes scratching his scabs with a piece of broken pottery, yet crying out in triumph: "All the days of my appointed time will I wait till my change come."

Notwithstanding the Bible is against this evil and the aversion which it creates by the loathsome and ghastly spectacle of those who have hurled themselves out of life, and notwithstanding Christianity is against it, and the arguments and the useful lives and the illustrious deaths of its disciples, it is a fact alarmingly patent that suicide is on the increase.

What is the Cause?

I charge upon infidelity and agnosticism this whole thing. If there be no hereafter, or if that hereafter be blissful without reference to how we live and how we die, why not move back the folding-doors between this world and the next? And when our existence here becomes troublesome, why not pass right over into Elysium? Put this down among your most solemn reflections, and consider it after you go to your homes: there has never been a case of suicide where the operator was not either demented, and therefore irresponsible, or an infidel. I challenge all the ages, and I challenge the whole universe. There never has been a case of self-destruction while in full appreciation of his immortality and of the fact that that immortality would be glorious or wretched according as he accepted Jesus Christ or rejected Him.

You say it is a business trouble, or you say it is electrical currents, or it is this, or it is that, or it is the other thing. Why not go clear back, my friend, and acknowledge that in every case it is the abdication of reason or which practically says: "If you don't like this life get out of it, and you will land either in annihilation, where there are no notes to pay, no persecutions to suffer, no gout to torment, or you will land where there will be everything glorious and nothing to pay for it"? Infidelity always has been apologetic for self-immolation. After Tom Paine's "Age of Reason" was published and widely read, there was a marked increase of self-slaughter.

The Teaching of Infidelity,

A man in London heard Mr. Owen deliver his infidel lecture on socialism, and went home, sat down, and wrote these words: "Jesus Christ is one of the weakest characters in history, and the Bible is the greatest possible deception," and then shot himself. David Hume wrote these words: "It would be no crime for me to divert the Nile or the Danube from its natural bed. Where, then, can be the crime in my diverting a few drops of blood from their ordinary channel?" And having written the essay, he loaned it to a friend, the friend read it, wrote a letter of thanks and admiration, and shot himself. Appendix to the same book.

Rousseau, Voltaire, Gibbon, Montaigne, were apologetic for self-immolation.

Infidelity Puts Up No Bar

to people's rushing out from this world into the next. They teach us it does not make any difference how you live here or go out of this world: you will land either in an oblivious nowhere or a glorious somewhere. And infidelity holds the upper end of the rope for the suicide, and aims the pistol with which a man blows his brains out, and mixes the strychnine for the last swallow. If infidelity could carry the day and persuade the majority of people in this country that it does not make any difference how you go out of the world you will land safely, the Hudson and the East rivers would be so full of corpses the ferry-boats would be impeded in their progress, and the crack of a suicide's pistol would be no more alarming than the rumble of a street-car.

I have sometimes heard it discussed whether the great dramatist was a Christian or not. I do not know, but I know that he considered appreciation of a future existence the mightiest hindrance to self-destruction:

"For who could bear the whips and scorns of time,
The oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumely,
The pangs of despis'd love, the law's delay,
The insolence of office, and the spurns
That patient merit of the unworthy takes,
When he himself might his quietus make
With a bare bodkin? Who would fardels bear,
To grunt and sweat under a weary life,
But that the dread of something after death—
The undiscovered country, from whose bourne
No traveller returns—puzzles the will?"

Would God that the coroners would be brave in rendering the right verdict, and when in a case of irresponsibility they say: "While this man was demented he took his life"; in the other case say: "Having read infidel books and attended infidel lectures, which obliterated from this man's mind all appreciation of future retribution, he committed self-slaughter!"

Ah! Infidelity, stand up and take thy sentence! In the presence of God, angels and men, thy lip blasted with blasphemy, thy cheek scarred with lust, thy breath foul with the corruption of the ages! Stand up, Satyr, filthy goat, buzzard of the nations, leper of the centuries! Stand up, thou monster, Infidelity! Part man, part panther, part reptile, part dragon, stand up and take thy sentence! Thy hands red with the blood in which thou hast washed, thy feet crimson with the human gore through which thou hast waded, stand up and take thy sentence! Down with thee to the pit, and sup on the sobs and groans of families thou hast blasted, and roll on the bed of knives which thou hast sharpened for others, and let thy music be the everlasting miserere of those whom thou hast damned! I brand the forehead of Infidelity with all the crimes of self-immolation for the last century on the part of those who had their reason.

Stand Up, Thou Monster,

My friends, if ever your life through its abrasions and its molestations should seem to be unbearable, and you are tempted to quit it by your own behest, do not consider yourself as worse than others. Christ Himself was tempted to cast Himself from the roof of the Temple; but as He resisted, so resist ye. Christ came to medicine all our wounds. In your trouble I prescribe life instead of death. People who have had it, worse than you will ever have it, have gone songful on the way. Remember that of your life with as much precision as He keeps the chronology of nations, your death as well as your cradle. Why was it that at midnight, just at midnight, the destroying angel struck the blow that set the Israelites free from bondage? The four hundred and thirty years were up at twelve o'clock that night. The four hundred and thirty years were not up at eleven, and one o'clock would have been tardy and too late. The four hundred and thirty years were up at twelve o'clock, ane the destroying angel struck the blow, and Israel was free. And God knows just the hour when it is time to lead you up from earthly bondage. By His grace make not the worst of things, but the best of them. If you must take the pills, do not chew them. Your everlasting rewards will accord with your earthly perturbations, just as Caius gave to Agrippa a chain of gold as heavy as had been a chain of iron. For the asking—and I do not know to whom I speak in this august assemblage, but the word may be especially appropriate—for your asking, you may have the same grace that was given to the Italian martyr, Algerius, who, down in the darkest of dungeons, dated his letter from "the delectable orchard of the Leonine prison." And remember that this brief a very thin but very important rim, and close up to that rim is a great eternity, and you had better keep out of it until God breaks that rim and separates this from that. To get rid of the sorrows of earth, do not rush into greater sorrows. To get rid of a swarm of summer insects, leap not into a jungle of Bengal tigers.

God Keeps the Chronology

Life is Surrounded by a Rim,

There is a sorrowless world, and it is so radiant that the noonday sun is only the lowest doorstep, and the aurora that lights up our northern heavens, confounding astronomers as to what it can be, is the waving of the banners of the procession come to take the conquerors home from church militant to church triumphant, and you and I have ten thousand reasons for wanting to go there, but we will never get there either by self-immolation or impenitency. All our sins slain by the Christ who came to do that thing, we want to go in at just the time divinely arranged, and from a couch divinely spread, and then the clang of the sepulchral gates behind us will be overpowered by the clang of the opening of the solid pearl before us. O God, whatever others may choose, give me a Christian's life, a Christian's death, a Christian's burial, a Christian's immortality!

THE CHRISTIAN CONVENTION.

THE fifth annual gathering at the Rev. A. B. Simpson's church, in New York, of Christian friends from all parts of the country who believe in and practice Divine Healing, commenced on Sunday, October 7. The church being just now without a home, pending the erection of their new commodious building, the hospitality of the Central Baptist Church, in Forty-second Street, was accepted, and at all the meetings the house was well filled.

Three meetings were held each day, the subjects being Christ our Saviour, Christ our Sanctifier, Christ our Healer, and Christ our Coming Lord. The addresses were more lengthy than on previous occasions, but no sign of weariness could be detected in the large gatherings. Prominent among the speakers were Dr. Wilson, of St. George's Church, Dr. John Cookman, Rev. E. W. Oakes, who is doing a grand work at Manchester, N. H., Rev. Dr. Peck, Miss Carrie F. Judd, of Buffalo, N. Y., and Miss Mattie Gordon, of Nashville, Tenn.

One of the most interesting meetings was that of Friday afternoon, when several testimonies of Divine Healing were given. One of these was from Miss Mattie Gordon, who related her experience in a voice singularly soft and melodious. She had been in weak health from a child, but five years ago she became a confirmed invalid, and was confined for six months to her bed. Several doctors were consulted about her, but they did not agree in their diagnosis, though the results of their various modes of treatment were alike, in their failure to cure her. During this long illness she gave her heart to the Saviour, and dwelt much on His love and power. Expecting a speedy release from her suffering, to go to be with Him in glory, her mind became more and more detached from the things of the world and concentrated on Christ and His life and work. She read much, prayed much, and her meditations brought her near to the Saviour.

At length the thought occurred to her that the word of Jesus must be as efficacious now as when He was upon earth. She had trusted her soul to Him, could she not trust her body? The thought of His working a miraculous cure for her seemed impious at first, but, as she meditated upon it, the trust seemed logical and well founded. She began to pray for healing, but always begging that if she was wrong in doing so she might be forgiven. Finally, after a long struggle with doubt and temptation, she was enabled to triumph, and solemnly put herself physically as she had previously done spiritually into the Lord's hands. Immediately new strength passed into her body. She rose, astonished her family by going down-stairs unassisted, and the very next day was taking her full share of household duties in perfect health.

Another remarkable case among those described was that of Mr. W. J. Fenton, of Toronto, Canada. He said that on November 13, 1886, he was seized with a severe attack of congestion of the brain. He fell unconscious in his own house, and it was believed by his physician that he was suffering from apoplexy. After remaining in bed for a week, or more, he managed to struggle to his office, but the pain in his head was so violent that he could scarcely sign his name, and was so dizzy that he had difficulty in walking at all. He was advised to spend a few weeks in New York. On his way he had another attack. While in New York he called on Mr. Simpson, whom he had known in Canada, was anointed, and was perfectly cured. Since that time his testimony has been the means of convincing a sceptic that God is, and is the Rewarder of those who seek Him, and also of leading to the Divine Healing of a lady afflicted with heart disease, who is now whole.

A JAPANESE MURDERER FORGIVEN.

An affecting scene in Japan, which occurred recently, is reported in the Spirit of Missions. It states that a few months ago a native pastor was celebrating the Lord's Supper in one of the Christian churches of the island empire. He was a relative of a man who, about twenty-five years ago, conceived the idea that for his country to open her gates to Occidental civilization would be a benefit and blessing, and with the prophetic foresight of a practical patriot and statesman, dared publicly to advocate the abandonment of the exclusive policy hitherto pursued by his nation. For such advocacy he became so obnoxious to his countrymen that it was resolved to put an end to his influence by putting an end to his life. On a great festival day, when Japanese came from all quarters to do honor to the gods of the kingdom, three bands prepared to waylay him. He escaped the first, but fell into the hands of the second and perished. At the recent service, the native pastor referred to his relative, who was the first modern martyr to his country's advancement. In the congregation an old man arose and begged to be heard. He said, "I am one of those who murdered that man, twenty-five years ago, and I want to confess my part in that crime." The young pastor said, "By all the ancient customs of Japan, I am bound to avenge that blood-feud by plunging my dagger into the throat of the man who was the murderer of my relative. But Christ's blood reconciles all blood-feuds, and in Christ's Name I wish to extend to this brother the right hand of fellowship." The men who witnessed the scene knew what would have happened but for the grace of God, and praised Him as the two men clasped hands.

THE BERACHAH MISSION.

An astonishing report of work done, and the blessing of God upon it, comes from the Berachah mission, a picture of which, with the portraits of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Naylor, its founders, appeared in this journal on August 4, 1887. In addition to making efforts to reach the depraved characters who are to be found in the streets surrounding the mission building, special efforts have been directed to the salvation of sailors, railroad men, horse-car men, policemen, firemen, and others. During the past year a wonderful blessing has rested upon the work. One English seaman, who was converted at the mission, has gone back to his native country, and has opened a mission in Hull for the benefit of sailors, and is working earnestly and successfully among them.

The Work Ashore and Afloat, during the past twelve months has been far-reaching in its influence. Sailors who have been blessed have brought their shipmates to the mission, and no less than 3,335 have been counted at the various services. Besides this, permission has been obtained from captains to hold services on ships in the harbor, and 1,521 vessels were visited and successful meetings held. The sea work is growing fast, and many Christian mothers in far away lands are blessing God that, through God's blessing on the work of the Berachah mission, their wandering sons have been brought into Christ's kingdom. The number of sailors alone who have made confession of Christ at the services is 306. Street services are also held when the weather permits. Four hundred of these were held during the past twelve months, and it was no uncommon occurrence to have gatherings of from three to four hundred at a time. In these cases tracts were freely distributed, and invitations to the mission scattered among the people. No less than 34,887 Bibles, Testaments, and Scripture portions were given away to families without them, and unable to purchase. An industrial school and a free medical mission have also been established, which are thoroughly appreciated in the neighborhood.

The whole expense of building and supporting the mission has been gladly defrayed by Mr. and Mrs. Henry Naylor, who feel joy and thankfulness in the success which is attending their labors. They are about to establish a library of religious works, for the benefit of the sailors and others who frequent the reading-room. They wish to make it as extensive and complete as possible, and, therefore, will gladly welcome any gifts made for this object. They may be addressed to Mr. Ernest W. Blandy, superintendent of the mission, 463 West Thirty-second Street, New York. Both Mr. Blandy and his wife have had considerable experience in mission work and street services, and Mr. and Mrs. Naylor are glad to have secured their assistance in the work. The prospects for the coming season are, therefore, exceedingly bright, and all the workers are looking in faith to God for a continued outpouring of His Spirit, without which they are conscious all labor would be vain.

CONVERSIONS AT SING SING.

The recent camp-meeting at Sing Sing, N. Y., will long be memorable to all who attended it. Among the preachers were Revs. Thomas Harrison, Gallaway, Merritt, Wardle, Mrs. Van Cott, and two earnest members of the Society of Friends, Mr. Updegraff and Dr. Dugan Clark.

Seven Conversions

in a family of ten persons occurred after one of the night meetings, which had been addressed by the two Quaker brethren. The mother of the family and her youngest daughter had previously given their hearts to God. All the family, except one boy who was away at school, were however present at the meeting. The aged father had been a despiser of the Truth all his life, and the younger members of the family had resisted all appeals to seek Christ. At this night-meeting the father's heart was touched, and he went up to the seat in front of the platform, overcome with anxiety. His children were moved by the Holy Spirit also, and all the six, one after another, made their way to their father's side. The Rev. Mr. Couch gave them his whole attention, talking with them, quoting the promises, and praying earnestly. The scene was a very solemn one, the moon gleaming through the over-hanging foliage, and the silence of the still summer night broken by no sound but that of supplication. Sympathizing people stood and watched it, moved away and came again, drawn by the strange spectacle of a whole family together seeking entrance to the kingdom. It continued until near midnight, when a cry of praise and exultation was raised, and the throng of sympathetic spectators joined with the family in joyful thanks to God that all were saved.

A Wholesale Tea Merchant

from New York City was another to whom the camp-meeting will never cease to be a memorable place. He suffered long under deep conviction of sin. The light was long in penetrating a soul long sunk in carlessness and indifference. When, at last, it broke upon him, he uttered a cry of intense joy and remained kneeling, with his eyes closed. "Open your eyes, brother, and stand upon your feet," said the preacher who had been talking and praying with him. "Nay," said he, "I can see a thousand times better with my eyes closed. I see Jesus! Glorious, precious Saviour! How my soul loves Thee! Glory, glory to God in the Highest!"

WOMEN RANSOMED WITH IVORY.

When the report was published that Major Barttelot had been murdered by Manyema carriers while on his way to find and relieve Mr. H. M. Stanley, the news was imperfectly understood by ordinary readers. But a letter from Mr. Graham Wilmot-Brooke, who recently returned from Stanley Pool, throws a ghastly light on the intelligence in its description of Manyema character. He says that the Manyemas are cannibals. When they can obtain a supply of guns and powder, they set off on a slave raid, feasting on the men they kill, and growing rich on the ransom of the female captives.

"Eye-witnesses, both English and Arab," says Mr. Brooke, "have assured me that it is a common thing, which they themselves have seen on passing through the Manyema camps, to see human hands and feet sticking out of their cooking-pots. To these men the Arabs issue fire-arms, and send them off to catch the human beings, with whom the ivory must be bought. Off go the man-eaters, with shouting and yelling and great jubilation. What follows is now too well known. The raid is over, the first unexpected volley usually rendering further opposition hopeless, the dead are cooked and eaten, the village is nothing but smouldering embers, the women and children are hurried off as prisoners to the Zanzibari camps, with rich stores of plunder, goats and fowls and plantains, and native canoes, and native furniture, far more than covering the cost of the raid. And now 'trade' begins. In a few days the unfortunate husbands and parents of the prisoners come out of the bush; they know what is wanted; they have to ransom their relatives with ivory, and, the price having been agreed upon, the poor creatures go off and collect it. When at last they have scraped it all together the prisoners are returned, and the remnants of a once populous town go off to find a new refuge.

"The Zanzibaris have an object in giving back the prisoners when the ransom is paid; they will do duty again. Hardly have the wretched fugitives settled down again, built some huts, and begun to plant, than the Manyemas sweep down on them afresh, and the whole process is gone through again, as the residents at Aruwimi camp can testify."

A RELIGION COLLECTOR.

In a report from China published in the Missionary Herald, Mr. Smith, of Pang Chuang, gives this account of a Chinese lady who is now one of his most active helpers in his work: "She is a Shantung woman, though this, her present home, is in Chihli, sixty-five miles away. She learned to read when she was a girl. She has the true spirit of a Bible-woman, and has been the life of the movement there. She was the victim of severe persecution till last winter, being beaten every time she went to a meeting, to which she was obliged to go altogether by stealth. Her husband was very curious to know what it was that made her at once so obstinate and so much better behaved at home than before, and at length asked her. He was led through her earnestness to become an inquirer and was baptized at Pao-ting-fu last winter. He had previously told her that it was no business of hers to 'collect religion' for the family, and that if there was anything of that to be done he was the one to do it. This little band have a small sum laid by, with which they are hoping to get a little chapel at an out-station, and we are helping them a little with funds."

EDITORIAL COALS OF FIRE.

An editor's revenge on his enemy is described in the Constitution, of Atlanta, Ga. It states that some years ago the editor of a New York daily journal made the acquaintance of a wealthy and fashionable man about town. The two, after a period of friendly relations, had a violent quarrel. The editor, believing himself deeply wronged, contented himself with ignoring his enemy, but the latter took a more aggressive course. He availed himself of every opportunity of annoying and injuring the editor, and finally gave him such provocation that a duel was fought. The combat was stopped before either was injured, but the two parted in bitter enmity. Soon afterward the editor was relieved by hearing that his enemy had quitted New York. He heard nothing more of him until recently, when among his press despatches was one stating that his enemy had been arrested in a distant city for trying to shoot a policeman, and that he had lost all his property. The despatch also stated that the bail was fixed at $5,000, and had been procured with difficulty as it was feared that the man would make his escape to avoid the long term of imprisonment to which he would surely be sentenced. The editor was deeply moved. Before the day was over he telegraphed his agent in that city to give the bondsmen the five thousand dollars for which they were liable, and to notify the criminal that he might fly without entailing loss on his friends. The man was completely overcome by his enemy's magnanimity, and he hurried to New York to express his gratitude. Though he has escaped punishment for his offence, his life shows that he is in danger of eternal punishment. It is much to be wished that he might learn that in that case, too, One of whom he is still an enemy has paid the dread forfeit for him, and waits for him to avail himself of the sacrifice. (Rom. 5: 8.)

PROPHECY IN THE PENTATEUCH.

By Rev. W. J. Erdman, D. D.

THERE are certain expressions in these five books of the Bible which involve the Personal and Pre-millennial Coming of Christ; their fulfilment demands a time or

A Dispensation Still Future

to us. Especially in Genesis are found the seeds and beginnings and typical forms of all the fulfilments and consummations of the great Messianic future, revealed in the Apocalypse.

In Genesis 3: 15 is the germ and mysterious outline of all prophecy concerning the enmity and conflict of the two seeds whose representatives have been in all ages, but whose final personal manifestations are only two, and to appear in a time, a crisis toward which the race is rapidly moving. This crisis is coincident with the return of our Lord.

In Genesis 3: 24 is evidently implied a guarding, but much more a keeping and preserving of the tree of life; and yet later scriptures tell when and by whom the way to it shall be opened again, and

Eve's Great Primal Hope,

Gen. 4: 1, of a Restorer of a paradise lost, at last after weary, waiting centuries, fulfilled.

In Genesis 5: 24 is found the brief note touching a man who by thousands of years anticipated the highest form of redemption; that awaiting such as shall be alive at our Lord's return. Such translation even possible then, 17. 22; 35: 13. In the light of typical and prophetic scriptures it is evident Enoch lived in the beginning of the crisis of the world before the Flood. His prophecy in Jude is of the Coming in judgment and as preceded by a translation.

In Genesis 5: 29 comes before us the man who passed through that crisis. His deliverance was earthly, that of Enoch heavenly; one vertical, the other horizontal; the one corresponding to the rapture, the other to the apocalypse in judgment; one of heavenly calling, the other earthly, yet both the men of God. He too was looked upon as the bringer of the promised rest, the remover of the curse; but the greater than Noah is yet to come; and before He comes and when He comes the corruption and the judgment of the world shall be as in the days of Noah, Gen. 6: 5–8. In Genesis 12: 1; 22: 18,

The Seven-fold Promise to Abraham and his seed contains the most magnificent hope ever known among men, and the secret consequently of all the contentions and crafty plottings in the patriarchal families. And the promise of land and heirship of the world still belong to Him, the Seed of Abraham, who once came to His own possessions and His own people received Him not, but who in due time will come again, to be acknowledged as heir and Lord at last.

In Genesis 14: 8, is seen the priest king like unto Him who shall sit a priest upon his throne, possessor of heaven and earth, Abraham's seed and Abraham's priest. In Genesis 49: 10 all the promises of Genesis concentrate and culminate concerning the Shiloh, the Prince of Peace, the Lion of the tribe of Judah, unto whom the gathering of the peoples shall be.

In Exodus 3: 14, 15; 6: 2, 3 is given the great memorial name to be forever attached to the everlasting covenant as the pledge of all fulfilments, and these as seen in Genesis lie in the great Messianic age to come.

In Numbers 24: 7–9 is foreseen the King and kingdom to be exalted. In 24: 16–24 is outlined the whole course of human history until Messiah comes again.

In Deuteronomy 18: 15–19, is foretold the great Prophet who would speak with authority, who once came and spoke on earth, who is still speaking from heaven, and who is coming again to judge them who obey not His gospel. (Acts 3: 22, 23.) In Deuteronomy 32: 1–43 we have the "compendious outline and the common

"Key to all Prophecy"

(Delitzsch). It is the mould of Jewish and Gentile history; it confirms (32: 8, 9) Israel as the head and heart of the human family; it foresees Israel's apostasies to Gentile idols and Israel's punishments by Gentile hands; it declares the unchanging mercy of God according to the promises made to the fathers, and announces the judgments in turn to come upon the proud, self-deifying Gentile oppressors and usurpers, who after all were only Jehovah's hammers, and saws and axes and scourges; and finally through Israel's deliverance and blessings as the people of God and of the Messiah, the Rock and Stone of Israel, all the blessings foretold in Eden, all afterward promised to Noah, to Shem, to Eber, to Abraham, shall come upon all the nations.

To conclude, we find then in the Pentateuch touching the Personal and Pre-Millennial coming of the Lord the very teachings of the later and fuller scriptures of the prophets and apostles, even the Prophet, the Priest, and the King yet to come; and accordingly the final bruising of Satan, the restoration of the tree of life, and both as preceded by the momentous preparatory events of the millennial day; the Enoch-like rapture of the Church, and the Noah-like deliverance of Israel (Isa. 26: 20), the restoration of Israel to imperial pre-eminence over a consolidated world of nations under Messiah, the Lion of the tribe of Judah, the Star out of Jacob; the fulfilments of the promise to Abraham and his seed as the heir of the world (Rom 4: 13); and the Melchizedek priesthood of a harmonized heaven and earth when in the name of Jesus as Lord over all every knee shall bow and every tongue shall sing to the glory of God the Father. (Phil. 2: 9–11.)

MILITARISM A PROPHETIC SIGN.

By the Rev. E. J. Hytche.

OUR Lord, in answer to the question of His disciples (Matt. 24: 3–8), "What shall be the sign of Thy coming? and of the end of the age," or dispensation, pre-reported some physical as well as moral and social signs which would indicate its proximity. Amongst the political signs were these (5: 6, 7), "Ye shall hear of wars, and rumors of wars: for nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom. All these are the beginning of sorrows."

What Have We Seen?

In 1870–71 there was a life-and-death struggle between France and Germany, whereby Alsace and Lorraine were torn from France, and which as a fatal legacy has sown the seeds of that future war of revenge in which Germany will doubtless be defeated by France.

Far indeed, unhappily, from there being any signs of universal peace, the whole of Europe is so disturbed by "rumors of wars," that, as predicted (Luke 21: 26) all thinking "men's hearts are failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on this earth." The mechanical and chemical forces of the world, in fact, appear to be concentrated on forging such weapons of destruction as render a modern battle-field a veritable Aceldama. Nor is this all; for as conscription is the rule throughout Europe—England for the present excepted—the manhood of Europe is taken from the plough and the loom, in order to fit it to wade in human gore. Yes, every man (Cant. 3: 8) "hath his sword on his thigh, because of fear in the night" of this dispensation.

I have said that never in the chequered history of this world have there been such as during these, the closing years of this nineteenth century. For example, Russia has no less than 750,000 soldiers on the peace-footing, whilst in the event of its declaring that war which every statesman expects sooner or later, it can count upon upwards of 5,000,000 armed men. France, too, has already 2,000,000 enrolled in its army, and is increasing its forces every year with the view of reclaiming the two provinces forcibly annexed by Germany in 1871. Austria and Italy have each about 2,000,000 of soldiers; and England, including its Indian army, has about 500,000.

Gigantic Armies

According to the Révue Générale de l'Etat major, than which there is no better authority as to military statistics, the European armies on the war-footing have increased since 1865 from 6,918,000 men to 16,000,000. Under the new military laws, actually existing or proposed, it estimates that the European war-footing will soon be 19,000,000 armed men. As might be supposed, the cost of these armaments annually is enormous, for about $750,000,000 are expended on the military and navies.

Painful, however, as are these facts, they only verify the truths of predictions uttered two thousand five hundred years ago. Hence it is that at a period when so much scorn is thrown upon the prophecies of the Old Testament, respecting the latter days, we see its even in these our days. For example, Joel was instructed by the Holy Spirit to write (3: 9–14): "Proclaim ye this among the Gentiles—prepare war; wake up the mighty men; let all the men of war draw near; let them come up: Beat your ploughshares into swords and your pruning-hooks into spears." In response to this proclamation of war, we learn that there will be "multitudes in the valley of Jehoshaphat."

Truths Vindicated

Prominent among these armed men will be

The Wild Hordes of Central Asia.

Hence we read (Jeremiah 51: 27, 28), "Blow the trumpet among the Gentiles; prepare the Gentiles against her [revived Babylon]; call together the kingdoms of Ararat, Minni, and Ashchenaz: cause the horses to come up as the rough caterpillars: prepare against her the Gentiles, with the kings of all the Medes, the captains thereof, and all the rulers thereof." As Russia is already dominant in Central Asia, and is incorporating one wild tribe after another in its dominions, we cannot but infer that it will necessarily become their leader in the last invasion of the Holy Land by Gog—the then autocrat of Russia. Hence we read that among the many nations which will accompany him in this invasion will be (Ezek. 38: 1–9) Persia. So vast will be his forces that he will (5: 9) "ascend like a storm, and be like a cloud to cover the land, he and all his armies, and the many peoples with him."

Looking, then, at the present military forces of Christendom alone, and the vast increase in their number every year—Prussia alone having added to its standing army no less than 70,000 this very year—we can see how literally true is the prophetic forecast of these last days. And thus the Old Testament is so vindicated by what is now passing around us, that it can only be a Satanic delusion, that any man can doubt for a moment its frightful picture of the fast coming national woes.

[It will be seen from the above remarks that already preparations are far advanced for the fearful conflict, which the study of prophecy leads us to believe will break out during the ensuing eighteen months, and involve all the nations of Europe.—ED.]

An Invaluable Work on Prophecy by G. H. Pember, M. A., entitled "The Great Prophecies concerning the Jews the Gentiles, and the Church of God," is for sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York. It is written in a most popular and eloquent style, and describes the impending fulfilment of Revelation and Daniel, and is illustrated by a colored chart. 458 pages. Price, including postage, $1.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-Class Matter.

EVERY NUMBER CONTAINS:

The Portrait and Biography of some eminent person.
The Sermon Dr. Talmage preached the last Sunday morning.
An Exposition of Unfulfilled Prophecy.
A Summary of the Events of the Week, Notes of Religious and Temperance Movements, etc.
A Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, of London, from advance sheets sent by special arrangement.
Pictures of Missionary Life, etc., and Descriptive Articles.
An instalment of a Serial Story.
An Exposition of the International Sunday-School Lesson, by Mr. J. M. Baxter.

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION, $1.50.
Single Copies, Price Three Cents, may be obtained by order of any Newsdealer.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Congress Disposed of the Last Obstacle to an adjournment, except the tariff bill, on October 10, when the House agreed to the conference report on the Deficiency Appropriation Bill. It is probable, therefore, that this week will see the end of the session. Members are anxious to get away to their own States to take part in the campaign, and so many have already gone, that it is difficult to maintain a quorum. The only important legislative event of the week was the presentation in the Senate of a report from the select committee appointed to investigate the operations of the Civil-Service law. Senator Hale presented it, and the Senate ordered it to be printed. As might be expected, it is a severe arraignment of the Administration for its unfaithfulness to the cause of civil-service reform. The President cannot complain of the investigation, if it has been done fairly, because a large number of independent voters supported him four years ago on that and no other ground. His opponents, therefore, were justified in exposing any infractions of his pledges, if they could find them, and active politicians of either party may be trusted not to miss the opportunity in such a case. The report is a bulky document of fifty pages, and is very unequivocal in tone. It charges that "the letter of the law has been repeatedly evaded, and its spirit uniformly violated," and that, too, with the connivance of the President or members of the Cabinet. It deals mainly with the civil service in New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Indiana, and charges "active partisanship," removal of Union soldiers, appointments of drunken and incapable clerks, and the assessment of office-holders. Unless some friend of the Administration with access to materials compiles an exhaustive and convincing document in reply, the President will find very few of George William Curtis's league voting for him again next month.

The Alarming Labor Struggle which Developed in Chicago last week caused general apprehension throughout that city. The employees on the North-side cable-road, some five hundred in number, went on strike October 6. The company of which Mr. C. T. Yerkes is president promptly secured drivers and conductors to operate the road with horses instead of by cable. The new men had to be protected by the police, and the strikers, though evidently dangerous, abstained from violence, but embarrassed the new men by placing obstructions on the tracks, kindling bonfires there, and upsetting bricks, etc., in the way. As Mr. Yerkes is president also of the West-side lines, the two thousand men employed there showed their sympathy with their fellow-workmen on October 9 by going on strike. The West-side men made no complaint on their own account as to hours or pay, but notified the company that they should hold out until the demands of the North-side men were granted. On that day there were several fights, and the police had to use their batons in the charges on the strikers. There were few cars run, and the public used any vehicle available, or walked. On October 10, two officers of the company, who rode out in front of a car, were set upon by a howling mob, throwing stones and threatening them with death. Both officers, and the police protecting them, used their revolvers to save their lives. On Thursday the trouble increased. Cars were smashed, rails torn up, dynamite cartridges laid on the tracks, and severe fighting in many places. The police are apprehensive of a still further extension of the trouble by the accession of sympathizers from other trades, and fear that, unless the company yields, there will be much bloodshed.

Though Slightly Better News Comes from Jacksonville, Fla., the scourge is evidently still rampant, and death, sickness, and destitution are afflicting the community. The daily record of deaths last week varied from nine to two, and of new cases from ninety-three to thirty-three. On October 10 a bride was seized with the dreaded premonitory chill while receiving the congratulations of her friends at the conclusion of the wedding ceremony. She received prompt medical attention, and it is believed that she will recover. The frost is anxiously looked for. One encouraging item of news received a glad welcome in the city on Tuesday. It was contained in a letter from Surgeon-General Hamilton to Dr. Porter, informing him of the intention of the Government to establish a public disinfection house in the city and asking for suggestions in regard to it. The hopes of the people were raised by the news. They have been longing for the time when the stores would be again opened and labor would be resumed. It has been dreary work living on charity, and the hardships of the camps have been very severe. With the disinfection house established, there will be a prospect of better things, and those outside the city can return. Last week the relief committee fed 10,688 persons daily.

The Appalling Railroad Disaster on the Lehigh Valley road at Mud Run, near White Haven, Penn., on October 10, directs public attention to the conduct of railroad companies in employing engineers unfit for their duties. The annual convention of Father Mathew societies was being held at Hazleton, and so large was the crowd of visitors from Luzerne and Lackawanna counties that seven long trains were required to carry them, and these were crowded to the doors. The journey there was made safely, but in returning in the evening, shortly after 5 o'clock, the sixth train had reached Mud Run, and was standing on the track when the seventh train ran into it. The heavy engine ploughed its way into the crowded car, telescoping it with the next car, and throwing the third car up on its forward end, and then its boiler burst. The horrors of the scene are beyond description. One hundred and forty men, women, and children scalded, crushed, and mangled, every one in the three cars more or less hurt, and groups of relatives and friends around watching the awful carnage, but unable to extricate the wounded. Axes were found at length, but it was terrible work cutting through the walls of the telescoped cars, and the cries of the wounded warned the workers of the danger of incautious blows in the darkness. When the work was done, fifty-seven dead bodies were taken out of the wreck, twenty-five badly injured persons were sent to hospital, and a crowd of the less seriously hurt went to their homes. The engineer of the seventh train escaped with a sprained ancle, and it is he of whom public opinion demands an explanation of the catastrophe. The red danger signals were burning, and could be seen nearly a mile away, and it is stated that a flagman with a red lamp was sent back from the sixth train as an additional precaution to stop the seventh. How it was that the signals were unheeded is a mystery. Whether the engineer was asleep, or intoxicated, or was not looking ahead, is not disclosed, but strict inquiry will doubtless be made.

The Growing Tendency in England Toward federation found expression on October 10 in a speech by Lord Rosebery, Mr. Gladstone's ex-Secretary of State. Speaking in Leeds on the Canadian Fishery difficulty, Lord Rosebery advocated the appointment of a non-political Foreign Secretary, who should speak with the united voice of the English people, without distinction of party. He said that England's colonial policy was becoming more and more involved with her foreign policy, and that if she wished to retain her colonies she must admit them to a larger share in promoting the influence of England in foreign affairs. In connection with this idea comes a statement that in the fall of 1885 a well-known Gladstonian ecclesiastic laid before Mr. Gladstone a plan for electing National Parliaments at London, Dublin, Carnarvon, and Edinburgh. Mr. Gladstone asked if the Scotch would accept it. "Perhaps not the Scotch members," replied the ecclesiastic, "but certainly the Scotch people." Mr. Gladstone's reply was that the Irish question demanded settlement before the larger question of federation.

The French Government has Issued a Decree regulating the proceedings of foreign visitors to that country. The Paris correspondent of the New York Herald states that in a total population of 37,930,759 there were, two years ago, not less than 1,126,531 foreigners in the country. It is therefore fair to assume that for every thirty Frenchmen, France to-day counts at least one resident stranger enjoying all the advantages of citizenship without any corresponding share of its burdens or responsibilities, and this proportion is increasing with extraordinary rapidity. French authorities regard this state of things with dissatisfaction, as the mass of these strangers show little disposition to identify themselves with the country. A decree has therefore been promulgated, requiring all resident foreigners to give an account of themselves to the Prefect of Police. It is aimed at the vast influx of the lowest strata of society from all nations, who are gradually making France an asylum for the thieves, vagabonds, and outcasts of other countries. Moreover, most of these foreign tramps come from two nations which France most hates—Germany and Italy. American visitors will be required to make only a formal registration.

Dr. Mackenzie's Vindication of His Treatment of the late Emperor Frederick was given out last week for publication. The British Medical Journal gives long extracts from it, in which the Doctor says that he was not deceived in his patient's real condition, of which there was ample proof. The German doctors made this charge, knowing it to be false, in order to prejudice Frederick against his British adviser. At the beginning of October, 1887, Dr. Bergmann admitted that Dr. Mackenzie's course was correct. The visit of Frederick to England was arranged before Dr. Mackenzie was summoned. Dr. Mackenzie does not hesitate to say that the death blow was given to the Emperor on April 12, when a false passage made by Dr. Bergmann's tube caused extensive suppuration around the trachea, which steadily drained away the Emperor's remaining strength and shortened his life at least ten months. Except when the false passage was made and Dr. Bergmann thrust his finger into the wound, the Emperor never suffered actual pain.

A Disastrous Inundation in China is Reported in advices by a steamer which arrived in San Francisco on October 8. The chief scene of devastation is in the Province of Moukden, about three hundred and fifty miles northeast of Pekin, where the overflow caused the death of hundreds of the natives, the utter annihilation of very many homes, the destruction of crops, and the prospect of a general famine for the coming winter. The whole of the new embankment of the Yellow River, at Chang Chou begun last autumn, and carried on at a cost equal to over $9,000,000, has been completely swept away by the flood. Of the eight thousand lineal feet of river wall which has been completed, not one inch remains, and the waters are pouring unchecked through the immense gap into Honan. From eight hundred to one thousand laborers, who were on the bank, were swept away and drowned.

The McAll Mission in Paris has Just Acquired a room for its work in the Rue St Antoine which has a remarkable history. On the site of the garden of the palace of a Queen Blanche, about one hundred years ago a ballroom was built, called the Bal de la Reine Blanche. It was largely frequented by artists and their models, and was thus used till the year 1844. Then it was, for a few years, turned into a billiard-room, to be re-opened as a dancing-saloon, under the name of the Salle Rivoli, of a lower kind than before. It was then used three or four times a week, especially on Sundays, and the worst class of society frequented it. It was also a meeting-place for the anarchists. More than once has Louise Michel made her passionate appeals from its platform. In fact, the hall had about as bad a name as could be for low society and for tumultuous political gatherings. It is a fine building, well arranged, and will seat, with the galleries, 800 people.

An English Convert to Prohibition has Recently been made. The editor of a prominent religious journal, who has heretofore advocated high license, local option, and other ineffectual remedies for the liquor curse, paid a visit to this country a month ago. On his return he promptly ran up the Prohibition colors in the following editorial paragraph: "At first sight Local Option seems more reasonable, more feasible, more practical than Prohibition. It even seems more fair to those who do not think as we do. But the more we think, the more evident is it that the drink traffic is an offense against God and man. No legislative act could do so much good by preventing so much evil as the absolute prohibition of this pernicious trade. But it is constantly said that Parliament can do nothing until public opinion is educated up to it. How, then, will public opinion be the more speedily educated? By such devices as Local Option on the one hand, or High License on the other; or by affirming the principle that the traffic is evil, and demanding its prohibition? Surely by the latter. We shoot higher, aiming at the stars."

The Discovery of Pearls in Kentucky is Announced in the Louisville Courier-Journal. It states that the attention of State Geologist Proctor was recently called to some peculiarly beautiful stones found by some boys in the limestone regions of the State, and he immediately pronounced them to be pearls of singular purity. He has now taken hold of the work, and is laboring to have the resource developed for its full worth. The pearls have been found in no less than twelve counties. They are of great value to jewelers, who can utilize to great advantage all the pearls of shape and size they get. Some of the stones are very beautiful when touched up by the jeweler. Hundreds of beautiful stones have no doubt been found by the boys along the banks, who, after keeping them for a few days as a "pretty thing," would throw them away ignorant of what they had found. But Mr. Proctor's report will show them the true worth of these pearls, and more systematic searches will be made. It would be well if the Church of Christ were similarly awakened to the true value of jewels which, in the shape of human souls, are lying around neglected, but which, if won for Christ, would add to the glory of His crown. (Mal. 3: 17.)

An Unguarded Valuable Gem Outside a jeweller's store on Broadway, New York, attracted public attention recently. Some time ago, the jeweller, who had found a ready sale for polished blocks of petrified wood, heard that large pieces of it were being found at Chalcedony Park, Arizona. A member of the firm went out to secure specimens, and soon after his arrival notified his partners that he had succeeded in purchasing the very largest piece that had ever been found. He sent it on to New York, and it was deposited on the sidewalk in front of the store, where it remained for several days. Customers, who had been accustomed to the sight of pieces about the size of a silver dollar, were amazed by this gigantic specimen, which was a cube measuring over thirty-three inches each way, and weighed two tons. The polished surface showed a beautiful blending of yellow and black, with some tints resembling those of the red wood of the big California trees. It was so hard that two hundred blocks of marble could be cut up while one block of the agatized wood was cut. The gem belongs to the class known as chalcedony. It is believed that there is in existence no gem to equal it in size or beauty, but the time is now near at hand when that and all other precious stones will be eclipsed as men see descending out of heaven the city which John saw in prophetic vision, the wall of which rested on twelve jewels the third of which was a chalcedony. (Rev. 21: 19,)

A Cruel Execution for Witchcraft took Place recently in California. Ranchers who have been in the eastern part of St. Bernardino County, state that during the past two months the Indians of the Mojave tribe have suffered from an epidemic which has carried off many of their bravest men. They slaughtered dogs and burros to appease the wrath of the Great Spirit, but without avail. Finally a council was held, which resolved on offering a human sacrifice. Believing that the epidemic was produced by "the black art," they caught a male pigeon and his mate, and administered to both a decoction of herbs. The male flew away, but the female fluttered and fell to the ground. The inference the red men drew was that the guilty person was a squaw, and they drove their women past the dying bird, while the medicine-men watched. As the women went by, a young squaw stepped out of the rank and attempted to pick up the bird. Her act was deemed proof that she was the woman guilty of witchcraft. She was seized, dragged to the council-place, and burned to death. The Indians expect that the sacrifice of the squaw will propitiate the Great Spirit, and the scourge will be stayed. If, as is stated, the disease is malignant typhoid fever, their removal to another district was the remedy needed, not the death of the squaw. Christian teachers must be sadly needed among them to teach them that cruel sacrifices cannot remedy physical evils, and that for their great spiritual malady of sin, one Sacrifice has been offered for the sins of the whole world. (Rom. 3: 25.)

The Strange Reconciliation of Two Rival suitors is described in the Americus Republican. It states that in a southwestern town two young men had been warm friends from childhood. They were almost like brothers. Nothing occurred to disturb their friendship until the advent of a very beautiful girl, with whom both fell in love. They soon hated each other more intensely than they had formerly loved. They never met but they reviled and cursed each other. At length words were spoken that could have but one result. They agreed to have a duel in the woods, and the time and place were arranged. One of the duelists passed a restless, miserable time before the hour fixed. His wretchedness would not let him eat or sleep. He was at the appointed place long before the time, and sat down to wait for his enemy. It was a hot afternoon in August, and the man, wearied out, fell asleep. He was awakened by the report of a pistol, and, looking up, he saw his rival standing near him, with his smoking weapon in his hand. At his feet was a large, venomous snake writhing in death agony. "John," said the awakened man, "you have saved my life, let us be friends. I give the girl up to you." "No," said the other, "when I saw that snake about to strike you, I found I loved you still, and I, too, give up the girl. Let us be friends." They shook hands and returned together. A reconciliation so romantic is not often recorded, but many cases occur in which one who is rescued from the power of Satan, who is called the old serpent, finds hate eliminated from his heart, and makes peace with his enemies. (1 John 3: 14–16.)

A Mother's Intense Devotion to a Wicked son has achieved his release from prison in Baltimore, Md. Four years ago a young man, the son of an eminent physician in New York State, wound up a long series of disgraceful performances by the commission of a murder. He had gone on an excursion of sinful pleasure to Baltimore, where, in the midst of a drunken orgie, he slew one of his companions in sin. He was arrested and tried. His mother visited him in prison, engaged the best lawyers for his defence, and made prodigious exertions to save his life and liberty. Largely through her efforts his neck was saved from the noose, but he was sentenced to a long term of imprisonment. The mother continued her labors in his behalf, and has ever since been untiring in her efforts to get him a pardon. She hunted out the members of the jury that convicted her son, and obtained the signatures of ten of them to a petition to the Governor for his release. She pleaded with the judge who tried the case, and with the State's attorney, and by her persistent pleading won their signatures to her petition. She even gained the intercession of Governor Hill, of New York. Then she presented it to Governor Jackson, and begged as a mother for her son's liberty. On July 19, the Governor yielded, and to her intense joy, her four years of labor were crowned with success, and she returned to her home in triumph, taking her son with her. Not one of the men who signed the petition, nor the Governor who granted it, has a particle of sympathy for the son, who is said to be utterly worthless, but they yielded to the mother's importunities for her sake. It is so that the sinner obtains his pardon, not for his own merits, but because of what Jesus has done and suffered on his behalf. (1 John 2: 12.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Rev. George C. Needham passed through New York last week on his way to Ireland, to commence an evangelistic tour.

The Rev. Dr. Spear has resigned the position of treasurer of Madison University, after having held it for twenty-five years.

More than three hundred delegates attended the recent Conference of the Young People's Christian Endeavor Societies of New York State in Elmira.

A revival has been going on simultaneously in different parts of Japan. It is estimated that as a result the increase of membership in the churches of Tokio cannot be much less than a thousand.

The Mormons are acquiring large tracts of land in Mexico by quiet purchase from private parties. The purchases have been made in agricultural lands in the valley of the Casas Grande River.

At the last meeting of the American Institute of Christian Philosophy, the Rev. John C. Clyde, D. D., of Bloomsbury, New Jersey, read a paper entitled "The Christian Temper and Scientific Thought."

Tobacco is to be shut out at the Chambersburg, Pa., academy. No boy will be admitted who uses it in any way. It is prohibited to day and boarding pupils alike on the ground that it injures mind and health.

The General Conference of the Evangelical Alliance will meet in Montreal from the 22d to the 25th of October. Its sessions will be held in the Crescent Street and the American Presbyterian churches of that city.

Both of Mr. Moody's Northfield schools are obliged to refuse entrance to an army of applicants for whom there is no room. The Mount Hermon school for boys has 318 students, and there are 300 girls at the Northfield Seminary.

The third annual convention of Christians interested in Christian work among the unevangelized classes in the cities and towns of America. will be held in the Tabernacle M. E. Church, Detroit, Mich., for six days, November 15 to 20, inclusive.

A correspondent writes to the Norwich Bulletin: "Permit me to say that there is no town in Connecticut without a church in which regular Sunday services are maintained. There is only one town (Beacon Falls) in which there is not a Congregational church."

In an address delivered by the Rev. D. A. Reed, in Springfield, Mass., at a reception upon his return from a European trip, Mr. Reed said that he found in the Scandinavian countries, Norway and Sweden, that the people had a peculiar reverence for the Gospel. The churches were all very large, having a seating capacity of between 3,000 and 4,000. There were 100,000 Congregationalists and 15,000 Methodists in Stockholm.

Very Liberal Terms are Offered to any Person canvassing for subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Sample copies will be sent, postage paid, on application from any one desiring to undertake the work. Ministers and others will find it easy to obtain subscriptions. Send postal card for terms, and state number of sample copies required. Address The Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

FURTHER AFIELD.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Then Paul and Barnabas waxed bold, and said, It was necessary that the Word of God should first have been spoken to you; but seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles," etc. Acts 13 : 46–48.

Paul's Message Ill-Received—I. Rejection of Christ a Solemn Business—It was so for the Jewish Nation—Many Rejecters Now—Do Not Believe in the Resurrection—Reject the Evidence of Honest Men—Spots of Royal Blood on a Prayer-Book—An Experience with the Phonograph—II. The Rejection Led to a More Extended Effort—Are Example for the Church of To-day—III. Encouraged by the Promise of God IV.—And by Speedy Success.

DEAR friends: Last Sabbath morning I tried to stir you up to sacred activity. I heard from many that they felt thoroughly aroused, and I know of some who at once commenced to speak for Christ. I wish I could hope that your whole company kept step together in this. If what is said on Sabbath were really carried out, what splendid advances we should make! But if not, it is as though a commanding officer spoke to his troop, and the men did not march according to orders. However, I am thankful for what was done, and for the many of you who did keep step together in an earnest march to conquer the powers of sin by making known the gospel of Jesus Christ. "They that were scattered abroad went everywhere preaching the Word," and I hope that you, as you scattered to your various abodes, did go everywhere teaching the Word of God

According to Your Capacity.

If so, you have already come far enough to have met with individuals upon whom your warnings and invitations have been spent in vain.

I thought it would be well for us this morning to go with Paul to Antioch, in Pisidia, and just see how he was treated there, and what he did when he met with an ill reception from the Jews, that we might not be discouraged if our message has been refused, but that we might be instructed by the example of Paul and Barnabas as to what we should do; and be comforted by the success which their perseverance achieved. The Jews of Antioch, after having heard Paul with considerable attention, made up their minds to refuse Jesus, the Son of David, and not to accept Him as their Messiah and Saviour.

I. Our first point for consideration will be that the rejection of Christ is A Very Solemn Business.

It has been a very solemn business for the Jewish nation. The history of the Jews since their rejection of our Lord may be written in blood and tears. No Gentile should read it without ten thousand blushes, for they have been evil entreated by all the nations, though through them the greatest blessing that ever came to men has come to us. Never should we forget that our Redeemer is of the seed of Israel. Yet, when the chosen people rejected Jesus deliberately, from that day a history of woe and sorrow began, which has gone on even to this day. Oh, that they had received the Messiah! I shall not attempt to picture what would have been their history if they had accepted the Son of David as their Lord. I am bound to talk about a people nearer home, about some here present, who have refused the Saviour. Perhaps they will say, at the very outset, "We have not done so; we will receive Him one day." Yes, but you refuse Him now. If you do not now believe in Him, you have up till now rejected Him.

This you have done as they did at Antioch, against the evidence of honest men. They doubted whether Christ had really risen from the dead, although His resurrection was attested by hundreds of true witnesses. My unconverted hearer, if you do not believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and in the work which was crowned by His rising from the dead, you set aside the witness of apostles, saints, and martyrs. The number of martyrs has been very great from that day till now, but you set aside the testimony borne by their lives and death. You also impute foolishness or deceit to your dearest friends, some of whom are with God, and who died in the faith, exhorting you to believe in Jesus Christ. Indeed, you make all of us who preach the gospel to be liars; and we are not so; neither do you think so badly of us when we speak in every-day life. We shall not be gainers by your conversion, nor losers by your ruin; but we love you, and therefore pray you to believe those necessary truths without which you can never enter the kingdom of heaven.

These people next did violence to Christ Himself and His precious blood. It does seem amazing to those of us who love Jesus and worship Him that any should reject Him. He comes so tenderly, so meekly, the Lamb of God! All that He does is so generous, so self-denying, that we marvel that you refuse Him. "He taketh away the sin of the world"; why does the world despise Him? What has He done that you should refuse to become His disciples and accept His salvation? Do you not know that you do despite to His blood? To me there is a great sanctity about the blood of man. I saw last Wednesday the prayer-book which Bishop Juxon held in his hand as he stood by the side of Charles I. on the scaffold at Whitehall. There are two wherein he was reading the prayers as the axe fell upon the monarch's neck. I have no reverence for Charles I., but I have reverence for drops of blood. I looked at them, and they were no theme of jest for me: the blood of a man is sacred. But what shall I say of the blood of the Son of God! God Himself, incarnate, in some mysterious manner taking into union with Himself our humanity, and then shedding His blood to redeem us! What is to be said of this? Look with reverence upon that precious blood.

Spots of Blood on the Page

These people had to do despite to all the marvels which lie wrapped up in the gospel. To us, my dear hearers, who believe in Jesus, the gospel is the most wonderful thing that can ever be. The more we know of it, the more astounded we are at it. It is a compound of divine and infinite things. When we study it, we go from wonder to wonder. Here we behold the heart of God, and hear the voice of His infinite tenderness, His infallible wisdom, His stern justice, and His supreme beneficence. How can all this be rejected by you? Surely, you do not know what is in the gospel, or you would hearken to its every tone. I sat yesterday with two tubes in my ears to listen to sounds that came from revolving cylinders of wax. I heard music, though I knew that no instrument was near. It was music which had been caught up months before, and now was ringing out as clearly and distinctly in my ears as it could have done had I been present at its first sound. I

Heard Mr. Edison Speak:

he repeated a childish ditty; and when he had finished, he called upon his friends to repeat it with him; and I heard many American voices joining in that repetition. That wax cylinder was present when these sounds were made, and now it talked it all out in my ear. Then I heard Mr. Edison at work in his laboratory: he was driving nails, and working on metal, and doing all sorts of things, and calling for this and that with that American tone which made one know his nationality. I sat and listened, and I felt lost in the mystery. But what of all this? What can these instruments convey to us? But oh, to sit and listen to the gospel when your ears are really opened! Then you hear God Himself at work; you hear Jesus speak: you hear His voice in suffering and in glory, and you rise up and say, "I never thought to have heard such strange things! Where have I been, to be so long deaf to this? I pray you, do not despise it. Be not such dull, driven cattle that, when God has set before you what angels desire to look into, you close your eyes to such glories, and pay attention to the miserable trifles of time and sense.

This rejection of the gospel of Christ is the more grievous because it is a decided act of the will. When a man refuses to be saved, it is his own act and deed. Nothing in Scripture will support us in throwing the blame elsewhere. The devil himself cannot refuse Christ for a man; he must do that for himself. Only yourself can bolt the door against yourself. There is a will in man, and it so that the Saviour said of it, "Ye will not come to Me, that ye might have life." The not coming of which the Lord complains is a direct act of the man's own will. You choose to sin; you choose to remain uncleansed from guilt; you choose to abide under the wrath of God. You have deliberately chosen to be without Christ for years; and therein you are choosing your own destruction. This is a fearful thing.

Is a Sadly Perverse Will,

Notice! We have here the rejection of Christ regarded as a man's own verdict upon himself. No man can claim a fairer jury than to let his own faculties sit in judgment upon himself. Listen! "Ye judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life." This, then, is your own verdict, you who refuse the gospel. In looking the whole thing up and down, you have felt hitherto that you were not the men to believe in Christ, you were not the women to be saved. You felt rather that you were the kind of people who should spend your zeal in attending the theatre or the dance. You felt that you best answered the end of your being when you did your daily labor, or opened your shop and saved a little money; but that you were not called upon to think of more high and heavenly things. You judged yourselves worthy to live a temporary life, and then, like beasts, to die and be no more; but an eternal destiny of glory and immortality you have not judged yourselves worthy to obtain. Remember, this is your own verdict upon yourself. If you deliberately prefer sin to Christ, and let go pardon, everlasting life, and heaven, who is to blame? Will you not curse yourselves to all eternity? and will not this be hell?

There stands the case; they put everlasting life from them, and judged themselves unworthy of it. What an unhappy state of things! It is too painful for me. I cannot speak longer upon it; I must hasten to my second point.

II. This rejection of Christ by some led to A More Extended Effort.

When Paul and Barnabas found that their message was rejected, what did they do? They met the Jews with this bold sentence: "Seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles." In consequence of the ill manners of the Jews, they did not turn away from their work. It never entered their minds to give up their ministry because it did not succeed among these Jews. They did not say, "Lo, we turn away from preaching Jesus: we will speak no more in the name of the Lord." Neither, my brethren, may we speak thus. I know the heart grows sick when tender testimony is rejected. The constant reiteration of the same gospel, to ears that will not hear, becomes wearisome work. It needs great faith to go on from day to day ploughing a rock. Oh, shall we always have to cry to you in vain! Will you always be so perverse? Yet we dare not cease to plead with you. We cannot give you up. We overcome the suggestion of our weariness, "I will speak no more in the name of the Lord." For love of you the gospel is as fire in our bones, and we cannot cease to warn every man, and Plead with Every Man for Jesus.

Instead of turning from the work, these holy men addressed themselves to those who had been somewhat neglected: "Lo, we turn to the Gentiles." Beloved, if you have been mainly laboring with the children of godly parents, and these refuse, turn you to the slum children. If you have tried to bless respectable people, and they remain unsaved, try those who are not respectable. That, I believe, is the Lord's mind toward the church of to-day. Let her break up esh soil, and she will have richer harvests. et her open new mines, and she shall find rare ches. We too often preach within a little cir- e where the message of life has already been jected scores of times. Let us not spend all ir time in knocking at doors from which we ve been repulsed; let us try elsewhere. Dur- g this new week, and throughout the rest of ir lives, let us e utterly irreligious, the worldly and profane. art not: I mean just what I say. Let the in- lel and the superstitious be the object of our ayers; let the frivolous and worldly be spoken th. This seems to me to be the parallel of ul's conduct when he turned to the Gentiles. There is this happy, and yet unhappy, circum- ance to urge us on—the outsiders are by far e larger number. What were the Jews in mber as compared with the Gentiles? If you ork for Christ among those who are in our re- gious circles, and fail to win them, the field is e world, and the larger part of that field has ver been touched as yet. We have labored r London; but if London counts itself un- rthy of eternal life, let us think of Calcutta, nton, and the Congo. If these near ones will t reward our endeavors, let us be of enter- ising spirit, and do as traders do, who, when ey find no market at home, strike out new es. This is precisely what the text teaches us.

Seek After the Neglected,

III. Thirdly, please notice that this enlarge- ent of effort was Encouraged by the Promise

God. "For so hath the Lord commanded , saying, I have set thee to be a light of the ntiles, that thou shouldest be for salvation to the ends of the earth." Let us notice is: God has set Jesus to be a light, and a ht He must be. God's appointment is no pty thing. No man thinks of setting up a ht if nobody will ever see it; and if God has pointed Christ to be a light, depend upon it me are to see that light. But all men are ind by nature. So, as the Lord has set Jesus be a light, you may be sure that He means to en blind eyes.

Our Lord is set to enlighten every class. The w no longer has a monopoly of the light of aven. God has not appointed His Son to ve a few dozen people who go to a particular eeting-house. He has set Him to be a light the nations, and He means He shall be so. his encourages us to labor among all classes. sus is a fit light for the upper ten thousand, d some of them shall rejoice in that light: He equally set to be a light to the teeming mil- ns, and they shall rejoice in Him, too.

The great Father has set Christ Jesus to be alvation unto the ends of the earth." So, en, if any are further off than others, they are ecially included. If any seem so far gone at they stand on the verge of creation, out of e reach of civilization and charity—these are e people whom Jesus is set to save. He can ve to both ends of the earth, and all that lies between. To the most debauched, depraved, unken, and desperate, Jesus is set to be salva- on. From that poverty which has been ought on by vice, and that degradation which the consequence of sin, Jesus can uplift man- nd. Where even the image of manhood seems bliterated, and the brute reigns supreme, the ord Jesus can set the superscription of God. o the lost, Jesus is set to be a Saviour. The iumphs of the gospel at the first were largely nong the lowest of the low. Slaves and out- sts embraced Christianity, and rose to holi- ess. It was by such that the Lord overthrew e idols of Greece and Rome. The Lord can ork such wonders again, and He will.

IV. Observe that this effort was Encouraged by Speedy Success:

And when the Gentiles heard this, they were ad, and glorified the Word of the Lord: and many as were ordained to eternal life believ- d. And the Word of the Lord was published roughout all the region."

First, the Gentiles were glad. We little guess with what joy the message of mercy would be received by those who had never yet heard it. Go, and see what it will do. How I should like a congregation of people who have never heard of Jesus Christ before! I should expect to have a blazing time of it, like the man who set light to a straw-stack, and found that he had a world of fire before him in no time. To hear of salvation by the blood of Jesus for the first time must be a sensation indeed! As for many of my hearers, they have heard of Jesus so long that the topic is stale. I feel you will never accept the Saviour, but will die in your sins. Those who have never heard of Jesus at all, often hear the gospel with great interest, and believe unto eternal life.

The Gentiles accepted the Word. They did not sit down and cavil and raise questions, and so forth; but it is written, "they were glad, and glorified the Word of the Lord." This is more than many ministers do. Look at our divines now! What are they doing? They are not glorifying the Word of God, but taking the glory from it. According to some of them the Word of God in His Book is full of blunders: how much less trustworthy must it be as it is preached! The

Shepherds are Now Destroying the pastures. Holy Scripture, according to them, is not infallible. The sure word of testimony is no longer sure, according to modern ideas. With these I have no fellowship. O my soul, come not thou into their secret! Let us loathe such dishonoring of the Word of God. Let us get far away from all pretense of communion with these enemies of our faith.

Get among the poor, the lowly, the sinful. Tell them the glad news of pardon bought with blood. I warrant you they will not turn critics, and cavil and find fault; but they will, many of them, believe unto eternal life. The man who has grown accustomed to luxuries is and picks off a bit here, and a bit there; for this is too fat, and that is too gristly. Bring in the poor wretches who are half-starved, Fetch in a company of laborers who have been waiting all day at the docks, and have found no work, and in consequence have received no wage. Set them down to a joint of meat. They find no fault: they never dream of such a thing. If the meat had been a little coarse, it would not have mattered to them; their need is too great for them to be dainty. Oh, for a host of hungry souls! How pleasant to feed them! How different from the task of persuading the satiated Pharisees to partake of the gospel!

The Man who turns His Meat Over.

I wish specially to speak to any here present who are not familiar with the gospel. I speak to rank outsiders, to people who know nothing of these things. "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved"—

Saved at Once.

"But I never go to a place of worship." I mean exactly you, my friend. "But I have been a swearer." I am thinking of the blasphemer. "But I have been an awful drunkard." To you I speak this gospel. "Alas!" cries one, "I shrink from your eye. I crept in here this morning, but I am a daughter of shame." I say to you, even to you—"This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." You are aimed at in the mission of Jesus. Trust Him, and you are saved. "But I have been violent against the gospel." You are the very man that I am specially looking for. I prayed for you before I came to this place; for I prayed that Saul of Tarsus might this day become Paul the apostle. I long to win, by this sermon, some outrageous enemy of God, that he may become a fervent friend of Jesus.

Oh, for a batch of great saints made out of great sinners! Oh, that your energy, now used to fight against God, may be subdued by sovereign grace, and employed in defending and spreading the gospel of Jesus! Shall it be so, my friend? Oh, that some woman that is a sinner, would come and wash our Lord's feet with tears, and wipe them with the hairs of her head! Come, you with long hair, unbind your tresses, and honor them by this service. If they have been a net in which to entangle precious lives, make them a towel for your Saviour's feet. Come, sinners, come to Him who loves you! Bring them, O Lord! Hear us, O Jehovah, as we entreat Thee to save them by the blood of Thy well-beloved Son! Hear us now, we beseech Thee, and save myriads! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

A LITTLE GIRL'S INQUIRY.*

"PAPA, are you going to say anything to-day that I can understand?" asked a little girl of her father—a Massachusetts pastor—as he was setting out for church on a Sabbath morning. This tender appeal touched the loving father's heart, and he could not answer his daughter nay; he could not say to his child that she must sit in penance through all the long service, with never a word designed for her instruction or cheer. So, as he preached he said, "And now, children, I will say something to you about this." At once the face of every child in that audience brightened. Sleepy little ones started up; tired ones took fresh heart. Looking, first at the minister, then at each other, then back to him. They were all eagerness for his message, as though now there was something else for them than to nod and ache and yawn, uncared for; and although the pastor's following sentences to them were few and simple, doubtless many felt as did the child who pleaded for this attention, when, on her return at noon, she said, contentedly, "Papa, I understood all that you said this morning." Dear children! who wouldn't do as much as this for them in every sermon? They are gratified so easily.

A Child's Penetration.

Riding along a country road, on the borders of his parish, a Connecticut clergyman stopped to speak to a boy whom he saw there. After asking the boy's name, he attempted a little pastoral catechizing, after this sort: "Do you know who made you, boy?" "Yes, sir, God made me." "Where is God?" "In heaven, sir." "Isn't God anywhere else?" "I didn't know that He was, sir." "Well, my boy, God is not only in heaven, but He is everywhere else at the same time; and He can see you always, wherever you are." That was a new thought to that boy. It impressed him as a new thought. Pointing to a close-faced, heavy stone wall, near which he stood, the boy said, inquiringly: "Can God see through that stone wall?" "Yes, indeed," answered the pastor, "God can see through that wall. God can go through that wall." "Go!" responded the boy, instantly. "Go! I don't see how God can go at all, if He is everywhere to begin with!" "Ah!" said that pastor to me, as he told the story, "that boy had made the truth of God's omniscience more really his own, in those two minutes, than I had made it mine in the thirty years of my ministry." And it was because he was a child, that that boy received the truth of God as a child. To the minister, God's omniscience was a doctrine; to the child, it was a reality.

A Hawaiian Mother's Lesson.

I heard the Rev. Dr. Titus Coan, the veteran missionary to the Sandwich Islands, tell of seeing the native mothers among the Christian Hawaiians bring their infants in arms up to the church contribution-box and practice them there in giving money into the Lord's treasury. The mother would put a piece of money into the child's hand. With the instinct of nature—not of grace—the child's fingers would close tightly over the money, and hold it fast. Then the mother would take the child's arm by the wrist, and hold the little hand over the contribution-box, and with gentle firmness would shake the

* From "The Sunday-School: Its Origin, Mission, Methods, and Auxiliaries." By Dr. H. Clay Trumbull. An exhaustive treatise on the institution, and the duties of the teacher, superintendent, and pastor with regard to it, showing what it may do, if efficiently worked for the Church of Christ. 415 pages; Price $1.50. Published by John D. Whattles, Philadelphia.

Dr. Dwight, President of Yale College.

The Physician's Welcome Home.

hand until the grasp on the money was loosened, and the coin dropped into the box. The mother's loving smile and words of approval were the child's reward for its submissiveness, and the frequent repetition of this process brought the child to a certain enjoyment of winning his mother's commendation in this way, and of performing an act to which he was urged. Thus it was that before the child was able to go alone, he was in the habit of bearing a part in missionary giving; and by the whole course of his training, of which this was a portion, he found the blessing of being a giver in behalf of the Lord's cause.

A Connecticut Pastor's Need.

He was in conference with several of his ministerial brethren over a proposal to invite a well-known evangelist to labor in their immediate field. He expressed a readiness to co-operate in any such effort to promote the religious welfare of the community. "Well," said one of the ministers, "I hope the evangelist will come; for even if the time is not quite ripe for him, he may be the means of bringing in a few additions to our church-membership." "Oh, that's not what I'm hoping for," said this pastor, earnestly; "it is not any more members that I want, but it's improvement in those I have. Why, I would refuse an offer to-day of two hundred more of the average sort now in my church. But if an evangelist can stir up a few of those I have, and bring them up to a fair standard of Christian activity, I'll hold up both hands for his coming, and will sit up nights to pray for him."

DR. TIMOTHY DWIGHT,
President of Yale College.

THE eminent professor who is now President of Yale is the grandson of the famous scholar of that name who held the Presidency of the same institution from 1795 to 1817. His father, James Dwight, was a merchant living at Norwich, Conn., where the future president was born November 16, 1828. He is, therefore now nearly sixty years of age. He entered Yale College in 1845, and graduated with high honors four years afterward. He then spent two years in studying in the Divinity school, at the expiration of which he was chosen tutor in the college, and continued his work in that capacity until 1855, when he resigned. In the following year he went to Europe and spent two years in the universities of Germany, returning to America in 1858. His college promptly elected him to the chair of Sacred Literature and New Testament Greek in the Theological Seminary. This chair he filled for twenty-eight years, until his recent elevation to the Presidency of the college.

President Dwight is eminently qualified, by his personal and social gifts as much as by his profound learning, for the efficient discharge of the duties of his high position. He has the quality popularly known as magnetism, attaching to himself professors and students alike. His home in New Haven has always been known for its generous atmosphere. No man in Yale entertains so much as Professor Dwight. At the annual Commencement of the college his house is continually packed, and on every night of the week there is some reunion or other afoot there, and never one event under his roof has had dullness in it. This social home life brought into a sort of official relation to the college will largely affect Yale society. Fathers and mothers will have less anxiety about the well-being of their sons during the critical period of their college career, while Dr. Dwight has the oversight of the college.

A PHYSICIAN'S RESTORATION.

(See Illustration on this page.)

IT was a dark, chill winter's day and the sky seemed heavy with a coming fall of snow. On the streets were very few pedestrians, and such as there were hurried with quick steps toward their destination, anxious to escape the bitter wind that blew as if it had come direct from the region of eternal ice and snow. Poor half-clothed beggars shivered under their rags at the street corners, and seeing no prospect of alms, went in quest of lodging for the night.

Noticeable in the throng of pedestrians was the figure of a man walking with a firm, erect bearing toward the outskirts of the city. He could not have been much over thirty years of age, but his face was bronzed with exposure, and there were marks upon it of thought and care. He walked rapidly until he came to a large house surrounded by a garden, and bearing on its outer gate the name of Dr. Sedgwick. He turned in there with the manner of a man well acquainted with the place, and mounting the stoop he rang the bell. When the door was opened he inquired, "Is Mrs. Reade at home?" and receiving an affimative answer he entered and bade the help tell Mrs. Reade that "a friend wished to see her."

After a few minutes waiting in a room which seemed familiar to the visitor, a lady entered, her face, of almost childish beauty, wearing a look of innocent wonder. She stood for a m ment regarding her visitor with intense earnes ness, and then with a cry of joy nestled in h outstretched arms, exclaiming, "My husban my darling husband!"

This was the moment to which John Rea had looked forward for more than two lo years during which he had been separated fr his young wife. As she held him off at arm length to note the changes time and travel h produced in the bronzed, bearded face before h he saw the look of love in her eyes, and on more clasped her to his breast in joyful gladne Then she wanted to hear an account of his a ventures and unexpected return, but before could give it, the door was thrown open a John Reade was overwhelmed with hearty gre ings from a group of delighted friends. Sedgwick, who was Mrs. Reade's father, h been driving with another daughter and t friends, and returning had heard of his son-law's arrival and rushed at once to the ro where he was, to give him cordial welcome.

"I am delighted to see you, Reade," said Sedgwick, grasping with both hands Reade's tended palm; "you are just in time for a re lar round of entertainments and New Y parties; you will have quite a public ovati coming in like this as if you were an angel flyi among us without a word of preparation."

"I think quiet and rest would be the great blessings to me just now," said Reade.

"Oh! you will soon overcome all that; now to dinner, and then let us know someth of your adventures."

The joyful family were soon seated at a w spread board, and an hour later gathered arou a roaring log fire to listen to the travell story. Dr. Reade was an ambitious man, w having devoted himself to the study of chem try and medicine, had accepted an appointm which involved frequent and prolonged abse from home. He did this to increase his k knowledge as well as to gain for himself a put reputation. Dr. Sedgwick was proud of his s in-law, and had approved of his course, and w true fatherly kindness consoled his daugh Emily for her husband's absence. His story, he told it that night, thrilled every auditor. was a narrative of danger and of hair-brea escapes from death by drowning, from w beasts, and by savage hands. At its conclus Dr. Sedgwick proposed that they should all u in offering thanks to God for His preserv e over one so dearly

ed.
"I know you do not
ıpathize with me,
ın," said Dr. Sedg-
k, "but let me have own way to-night."
is was an allusion to Reade's well-known delity. He had durhis college course died the works of ıdillac, and had n led to doubt the
ıtence of the soul,
had abandoned his
h in God Himself.
ny were the efforts
Sedgwick had made convince his son-in-
. but they had al-
's failed.
'o the astonishment
all, however, Dr.
ıde replied, when his ıer-in-law made the posal, "I will join very heartily in the rcise. My heart is nged and I will tell how it came about."
ppeared that during journey he had visa hospital where an aged man who,
ile suffering from an urable disease, had
n fearfully crushed
l mangled in a railroad accident. Reade had er witnessed suffering such as the old man lured from his injuries and his disease. He ected to find him overwhelmed, but instead, saw him, even in the paroxysms of his agony, mly looking forward to release, and confident he belief that his soul would be carried into presence of his glorified Saviour. The soul uninjured, and while the body was racked l tortured, the man himself seemed to rise ve his frame. Reade saw him die, and heard last triumphant words, and he came away n that death-bed a believer in the immortal-of the soul and the truths of revelation.
d had answered prayer, and the student who resisted Dr. Sedgwick's arguments was rcome by the spectacle of a Christian's th-bed.

The Cathedral Mountain in the Yosemite, California.

THE CATHEDRAL MOUNTAIN.

HE wonderful pile of rocky heights depicted he illustration on this page, has from each a sufficiently striking resemblance to a nedral to justify the name given to it. It is of the most prominent objects in the Yo-ite Valley, in California. The Government acted wisely in reserving so grand and pic-sque a district for a national park. It is ie eight miles long, and about one mile wide.
ough properly called a valley, its surface is r thousand feet above the level of the sea, le the hills that tower around it rise from thousand to six thousand feet above the in of the valley. The Cathedral rocks are ut 2,660 feet high, while in the rear rises the tary peak called the Sentinel Rock, 4,500 high.
he valley itself is richly wooded, and the er Merced, with its tributaries, flows through dding to the wonder and exquisite beauty of scene by numerous waterfalls. Geologists e hazarded many theories to account for the ious depression. It is, however, now generbelieved to have been caused suddenly by earthquake or sinking of the earth's crust, not, as was formerly believed, by the action ushing water. Another theory is that the ge was once a lake, which was gradually filled to its present level by huge masses of rock ing into it from the heights above. It was until 1851 that anything was known of this most beautiful of earth's glorious scenes. The miners in the Sierras organized an expedition in that year to punish the marauding Indians, and traced them to this retreat. Its grandeur at once impressed them, and by 1856 tourists had made acquaintance with the spot, and the first hotel was erected.

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. L. S. Keyser.

(Continued from page 654.)

Surprises.

IT happened one day, as Hadley was glancing languidly over the column of church announcements in one of the daily papers of the city, that his attention was arrested by the statement that Mr. Hanson, the pastor of one of the churches, would preach the next Sabbath morning on "The Sin of Unbelief." The announcement stirred him into a belligerent posture at once. "The idea that unbelief is a sin!" he muttered, contemptuously. Howbeit, the hostility he felt was the very stimulus he needed to make him resolve to attend the services.

As he entered the church the next Sabbath morning, he was surprised to find that the preacher was still a young man, perhaps a few years Hadley's senior. It was a strong, handsome face, with features well-chiseled, and expressive of the kindliest sympathies, that appeared before the sceptical visitor as the clergyman rose to begin the service; and in spite of Hadley's previous feelings of antipathy, he was favorably impressed by the preacher's appearance and the clear, firm ring of his voice. There was no affectation, no pomposity, no assumption of superiority, in his bearing, but he was perfectly natural, and free from all appearance of a desire to display his abilities. Yet a few sentences indicated the educated Christian man.

After the preliminary exercises, which were very simple, were over, the preacher announced that his text would be found in John 3 : 18 : "But he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed on the name of the only begotten Son of God."

The preacher's line of argument was simple but cogent. He dwelt on the responsibility involved by the claims of God's word. If it is a Divine revelation, it must be a sin to reject it. It is, therefore, a duty on the part of any man disposed to doubt, to take every means at his command to find out whether its claims are substantiated before he rejects it—a duty he neglects at his peril.

So far Hadley agreed, and his conscience acquitted him. He had not rejected the Bible lightly or hastily. Had he not studied and thought and shrunk from unbelief until it was forced upon him by the power of reason? Yes, he admitted that, if the Bible was God's word, rejection would be sin, but he believed that it was not, and he had taken all means to find out before arriving at that conclusion. But what was the preacher saying now?

"Let not the sceptic think that he has exhausted all the means at his command, if he has not used humble, earnest prayer to God for enlightenment. What means can be so effectual as to ask his Maker to enlighten the reason that Maker has endowed him with? It is a logical method, and experience justifies it. Many have by that road found conviction and assurance after trying in vain every other road." The preacher then gave a striking account of his own deliverance from scepticism through prayer, and affectionately pressed on his hearers the remedy which had saved him.

Hadley was startled by the unexpected turn in the argument, and he listened intently as the preacher cited John Bunyan, Thomas Chalmers, Dr. Tholuck, George Müller, and others, who by the same path had come to the light.

At the conclusion of the service Hadley, who had been ushered to a seat in the front of the church and was impeded in leaving by the crowd in front of him, heard himself addressed by name, and turning, found his hand grasped by the preacher, who said: "Mr. Madelling, I am glad to see you in my congregation to-day. Ah!" noting the wonder in Hadley's face, "you are surprised at my knowing you. I am interested in young men; it does not seem long since I was young myself. When I heard of your appointment in the schools here, I was curious about you, and a friend pointed you out to me in the street. That is how I came to recognize you this morning."

"You did not know that I should be here, or I should think that you were personal in your sermon, Mr. Hanson."

"Ah! is it possible? But that often happens. We are guided unconsciously in the selection of a subject, and do not know until afterward that there was a special purpose in it. But, really, have you been troubled with these doubts? I know what a rough, toilsome road that is to travel alone. Give me your address, and let me call on you and have a talk on the subject. Perhaps my experience may help you."

Hadley willingly gave it, and with a friendly pressure of the hand the two parted. That afternoon after turning over many books listlessly, Hadley fell into a reverie.

It had been many months since he had been in so humble and tractable a mood, and so ready to welcome religious teaching. With more alacrity than usual he made his way to the church of which his uncle was pastor; and never had a sermon from the old man's lips seemed so replete with the eloquence of relevant and cogent truth. It was far different from the argumentative discourse to which he had listened in the morning, but it was full of appeal, comfort, and loving admonition. "The dove that flew out over the illimitable waters of the Deluge found no rest for the sole of her foot until she flew to the window of the ark, and was taken beneath its shelter by the hand of the patriarch. So the soul that is tossed in the tempest of sin and doubt can only find rest in the ark of redemption built by the bleeding hands of the Saviour." It was the same doctrine that he had heard in the morning.

"It is inexplicable," he said to himself, "that these two men, who are so different in mental traits, should teach doctrines so perfectly accordant, and in the same day prescribe the same antidote for doubt."

Although the following day was one of ceaseless questionings, yet it was the brightest day he had spent for many months. When his work in the school-room was done, he decided to take a walk into the suburbs of the city for relaxation. With an interest ever on the alert when he came into contact with nature, he wandered far beyond the limits of the town, along the wooded banks of the clear river, gathering many data of interest and value, and it was almost dusk when he again returned to the outskirts of the city. The street-car was just ready to leave the park, which was a resort outside the city limits, when the pedestrian arrived at that locality. Swinging himself into the car, he scarcely looked about him to see who his fellow-passengers were as he seated himself.

He was just in the act of drawing a magazine from his pocket for the purpose of finishing an article in which he had become interested, when he almost bounded to his feet in astonishment; for directly opposite him his eyes fell upon a familiar face. He rose impulsively and spoke:

"Miss Winters, surely! This is indeed a surprise. I almost wonder whether I can be dreaming. You are quite the last person I should have thought myself likely to meet."

"Ah! you did not know that I was living in this city," said Miss Winters, a warm flush coming to her cheeks.

"No, I did not. It certainly was not your home while you were at college."

"That is true; but soon after I left Bromfield my father moved to this place for business reasons, and so you find us domiciled here. Our home is at 318 Franklin Street."

The expression, "Fate is determined to make our paths cross, for better or for worse," had almost broken from his lips; but he remembered that the eyes of his fellow-passengers were upon him, and their ears were eagerly devouring every word of the conversation, and he therefore said, as he reseated himself: "It is a strange coincidence that we should be living again in the same town; but—but it will give us an opportunity to review the old college days."

"Yes," she responded, in evident embarrassment, for she was startled at the significance of making a retrospect of the past. Then she said, more composedly: "But I knew some time ago that you were employed in the schools here. I saw the notice of it in the town papers."

"Why did you not — why have I not met you before, then?" he asked. He despised himself the next moment for asking the awkward question. But the girl was equal to the emergency.

"In a city of this size," she answered, "a person may not meet his acquaintances for a long time. I have seen you several times on the street, but was not near enough to you to speak."

The conversation was an embarrassing one, in view of the relations that had previously existed between them, and Hadley was glad when the car had reached the street where he would leave it. Making her a courteous bow, he stepped from the car, and hurried to his room.

His mind was hurtled hither and thither by conflicting currents of emotion. Whether agony or joy preponderated, he could not tell. His meeting with the girl had revived all the old anguish, but there was also a feeling of ecstasy in being near her, and being able to look occasionally into her sweet face and deep blue eyes. So in spite of the awful quavering of his heart, he trembled and thrilled with pleasure. Perhaps — oh, enrapturing thought! — by meeting her again and again, he might eventually overcome the barriers that stood in the way of their union.

A few days afterward, Mr. Hanson paid his promised visit, and Hadley welcomed him with a pleasure he never expected to feel in greeting a minister of the gospel. With excellent tact the visitor easily fell into a chat about the books which lined the walls of the room in which they sat. The silent, eloquent friends of the young man were a good index to his character, and Mr. Hanson moved from shelf to shelf, uttering short, acute comments, which showed his intimate acquaintance with Hadley's favorite authors. There was a cheerfulness, an enthusiasm, about the man, very refreshing at a time when most cultured men of Hadley's acquaintance wore a bored, wearied air, and affected a pessimism of spirit depressing to an ardent nature. On Hadley remarking upon it, Mr. Hanson said, with a smile:

"Oh yes, I am hopeful of the future, and I think a great deal of the gloom now fashionable is due to bad digestion, and still more of it to wounded vanity. When a man is waiting for all the world to bow down at the shrine of his genius, and discovers that the world is occupied with other matters, and has little time to humor his egotism, he begins to feel that he is badly treated, that the world is steeped in selfishness, and is unable to appreciate his superior qualities of mind, and then he gets to berating the world as a great big sensuous, grovelling, self-centred clown. He looks at the world through a glass that has been colored by his own wounded vanity. Let any man imagine himself to be the hub of the universe, and he will soon discover that the universe is not endowed with the centripetal qualities necessary to meet his requirements. There is plenty of wickedness and stupidity in the world, but to sit down and mourn helplessly over the sad fact, is imbecile to the last degree, especially when there is a way by which a man may become jubilant and hopeful in spite of it."

"Have you learned the secret of happiness in a dismal world like this, Mr. Hanson?" questioned Hadley, in tones that evinced his surprise and interest. "If so, perhaps you may allow others the benefit of your discovery."

"There was a time when I was inclined to take a despondent view of life, but since my doubts took wing, religion has brought brightness and joy into my life. It has wrought a change in my nature, and consequently I look at the world with different eyes. In short, it has converted me from despondent pessimism into a hopeful optimism."

"I do not understand how religion could produce a change like that."

"Well, if it were possible to be assured of the truth of religion, so that the evidences were indisputable, would not that fact have a quieting and exhilarating effect upon a man's mind?"

"It certainly would," conceded Hadley.

"Let me say, friend Madelling, that it is possible to get just such an experience of the truth."

"Ah! you mean by the method which you recommended in your sermon last Sunday."

"Yes, and I would urge that course upon you."

"Mr. Hanson, I will tell you candidly that there are difficulties in the way that seem to me insuperable. It appears to me that the plan you recommend, carries upon the face of it its own condemnation. It seems so illogical, so inconsequential. How can an appeal to supernatural powers bring about a solution of a man's intellectual difficulties with the Bible? There are the historical discrepancies; will Heaven vouchsafe an explanation of these, and thus save us the trouble of investigating them?"

"No," replied the clergyman, readily; "those are matters for intellectual research, and God allows plenty of play for man's mental powers in the study of His Word. However, it is a debatable question whether there are historical discrepancies, or any other, in the Bible; and it would be unwise for a man to stake his everlasting welfare upon that assumption."

This remark stirred Hadley into a somewhat aggressive frame of mind. "Do you mean to say that there are no disparities in the Bible? They are certainly very palpable."

"Yes, I know to what you refer," replied Hanson, kindly; "and I sympathize with you in your perplexities; but if you were assured by the testimony of the Spirit of God that the Bible is His Word, would you not feel then that some explanation of these discrepancies is possible, and would you not, therefore, investigate them in a more sympathetic and less hostile spirit? Such an assurance is possible. You perceive that the sincere inquirer may be certified of the truth of the Bible without understanding all the difficulties, just as he breathes the air about him without understanding all the mysteries of respiration or meteorology."

"Possibly, though I cannot conceive of the process. It seems to me more manly and rational to grapple with such problems than to look for a revelation."

"Were there any professors in the college you studied at, Mr. Madelling?"

"Certainly," said Hadley, laughing. "There would not have been much benefit in the institution without the professors."

"And you did not think it unmanly or ignoble, when you encountered difficult problems, to receive their help and suggestions?"

"Oh, certainly not! Why should I? The expectation of getting help attracted me there."

"Now, Madelling," said Mr. Hanson, "why not deal so with these problems? You expect to get the truth by research. You admit that there are many difficulties in the way. How long will it require to clear them all up? It will be a long and toilsome process, and may end unsatisfactorily. There ought to be a shorter and surer route to the land of truth, especially when we remember the importance of the question at issue. A man might die before his arduous task of investigation was completed. There is as there should be, a sure and direct route."

"Your positiveness is infectious, but I confess that the whole subject is shrouded in mystery to me."

"Yes, I know how you feel. Once you thought that the land of truth was just before you, and all you needed to do was to step in and possess the land. So you began your journey hopefully. But soon disillusion came, and your bright oasis turned out to be a deceptive mirage, ever receding from you in the distance, and to-day you are in greater aridness than when you began your investigations. Am I not right?"

"I am surprised, sir, at the accuracy with which you have described my mental life," rejoined Hadley. "I confess, candidly, that my disappointments have made an agnostic of me."

"Are you not ready, then, to try the panacea for doubt which I have recommended?" asked Hanson, anxiously.

The young man hesitated. "Not yet, not yet," he said. "I will think about it. You must not expect too much of me so soon. I do not feel ready just yet to resort to heroic measures."

"Perhaps you are right," Hanson replied. "But allow me to remind you that there is danger in delay. There is special danger that you will lose your interest in religion, and subside into indifference, which would be a more perilous state of mind than your present one."

"I shall come to your church occasionally, and that will keep the subject fresh in my mind."

"I hope that you will also call upon me at my study," answered Hanson, rising.

The two men shook hands cordially, with mutual expressions of pleasure in having met each other.

(To be Continued.)

THE FALL OF JERICHO.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. Lesson for October 28, Josh. 6: 1-16. Golden Text, Heb. 11: 30.

Joshua Learning—Spiritual Progress More Important than Work—The Captain of the Lord's Host—Joshua's Submission to Him—The True and the False Power—How to Know the One from the other—Self Satisfaction Never the Work of the Spirit—Fatal Ignorance—Degrees of Guilt and Punishment—The Faith that Implies Possession—The Destruction of the City—Rahab the Inn-Keeper Alone Spared.

"By faith the walls of Jericho fell down after they had been compassed about for seven days." (Heb. 11: 30.) Such is the pithy, comprehensive version given by the Holy Ghost in the New Testament. The spies had described the cities of the Canaanites as "great, and fenced up to heaven." (Deut. 1: 28. R. V.) Jericho was one of these. Before, however, the Lord sent Joshua forward to take the city, He taught him one of the most important lessons he ever learned. God will never sacrifice for the sake of the work they do. He could do all which He wants done independently of us if He would, and in so far as the work we do is a hinderance to our spiritual progress, we shall find God thwarting us on all sides. Often and often the work is obliged to stop for the sake of the worker, or the conversion of the child has to be delayed for the sake of the mother, that she may learn lessons of faith which she could learn in no other way.

The Education of His Children

As Joshua had led the children of Israel over Jordan, Moses was no longer missed; the people saw that God was with Joshua, and the celebration of the Passover after the universal circumcision which had taken place, must have greatly confirmed them in their covenant relationship to God. All was going well; they went forth to conquer and to possess. "And it came to pass, when Joshua was by Jericho, that he lifted up his eyes and looked, and, behold, there stood a man over against him with his sword drawn in his hand." What should Joshua do in such a case? What did Moses always do? Did he not invariably inquire of the Lord? True, God had said to Joshua, "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life"; but He had added, "As I was with Moses, so I will be with thee; I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee." (Josh. 1: 5.) Neither Moses nor Joshua were to act on their own responsibility. Joshua took for granted that it was his vocation to conquer and overcome the Stranger. Oh, how often we take things for granted, and when God has been greatly blessing us, how often are we tempted to go right on, without stopping to get God's mind on every tiny detail of our lives! How often we forget that it is not our own lives we are living, but that God has chosen us for Jesus to repeat His life in us, and that we can no more divine His mind about this or that without asking Him and receiving His answer, than if we were unconverted. We cannot, must not, dare not, be for a single moment. Joshua, without a moment's hesitation, addressed the Stranger as though he alone were marshal of Israel's hosts. "Art thou for us or for our enemies?" Oh, how ashamed he must have been, how small in his own eyes, when the answer was, "Nay: but as captain of the host of the Lord am I now come." Joshua's heart was right, he only wanted to know the right thing in order to do it: he fell on his face to the earth, and did worship, and said unto him, what saith my Lord unto His servant?" In an instant he fell back before God, and took the second place. Until we learn this lesson, God cannot do much with us. How many there are who seek a baptism of power, and what they long for is something which will make them remarkable people, not a witness of the Holy Ghost with them which will enable them to show that God is a wonder-working God. They want men to feel the power of their words, of their holiness; in fact, they want something which shall be a satisfaction to themselves, something which really ministers to their spiritual pride. They want the power of the Holy Ghost, but that they may use it in their own way, and too often the devil simulates the power of the Spirit, and just fills these Christians with that which their hearts desire—intense self-satisfaction, a power of utterance, often power in healing too, and very remarkably with visions and dreams. But how shall we know the true from the false? By this—the Spirit of God never glorifies man, but always testifies of Jesus, glorifies Him. The first command of the Captain of the Lord's host, who is none other than Jesus "the Captain of our salvation," was, "Loose thy shoe from off thy foot, for the place whereon thou standest is holy." Now things were in order;

Independent of Him

God was in Command and Joshua was only second in command; God was responsible for victory, and Joshua was only responsible to trust and to obey. When we come to this point, where we let the management of our souls and bodies and all we are and have so pass into God's hands that we see Him responsible for all, a wonderful, deep peace, "which passeth all understanding," drives anxiety and worry out of our lives. How can anything go wrong which God has undertaken? how, if we have no will but God's will, can anything be wrong to us? "And Joshua did so."

The people were now in the plains of Jericho. A terror had seized upon the inhabitants; the siege of the city was strict. Orders were given by the authorities that no one should leave the city on any pretext. All traffic, all trade outside the city, was stopped. Poor doomed people! they knew not God, and they must perish! And so must the heathen, Chinese, and Hindus, the natives of Africa, and all the people who know not God. True, their doom will not be so terrible as that of those who have heard of Christ and wilfully rejected Him, but they cannot have their part with those who are saved by the blood of the Lamb. Now that God had prepared Joshua for the work, He says to him, "See, I have given into thine hand Jericho, and the king thereof, and the mighty men of valor." Are we to reckon as ours that which we have not in hand, which we cannot feel or touch or see? Has Joshua to act as though Jericho already were theirs, or as though he hoped it was? God was in command, and He gave orders that the priests bearing the ark, and the people following, should compass the city for seven days, and the priests should blow the rams' horns. What for? In token that the city was theirs. But the walls were standing, the gates were closed, the armed men were within, waiting to sally forth and discomfit the children of Israel? Did not God know this? Surely yes. Dear reader, you have put into God's hand some great need of yours. He has shed light upon a promise in His Word which assures that very thing to you. All things whatsoever ye pray and ask for, and ye shall have them." (Mark 11: 24, R.V.) How do we act if we believe we have received money because the cheque or the postal order is in our hands? Do we not write a thankful acknowledgment at once, although we do not see the coin? Joshua did as God commanded him. There was nothing in the "march past" of this wilderness-born people to awe the people of Jericho, and perhaps some of them may have recovered in a measure from their terror, and strongly criticised the generalship and the military tactics of Joshua. We have to count the cost if we put the Lord in command, for His way of working reflects no honor upon man in the eyes of the world. It is only as seen on the side of heaven that faith in God is appreciated. Had Joshua not learned to take the second place, he might have fretted and chafed in spirit at the apparent loss of time and waste of strength and of shoe-leather, but he knew God well enough to trust Him. Again, his pride might have been mortified at cutting such a grotesque figure in the eyes of the people of Jericho. But God was responsible, and He was training all this time to good account in teaching them to obey and trust Him.

Believe that ye Have Received Them,

At last, the supreme moment had arrived. Seven days the Lord had succeeded in keeping people's hands off the work He was about to do, and the seventh day they had at His command compassed the city seven times, and were still contented, although no break had been made in the walls, and there was no apparent sign of victory. Then came the command, "Shout; for

The Lord Hath Given You the City!"

The people shouted by faith in His promise, and, with a roar as of thunder, the walls cracked all round the city, and fell, not in a confused mass, but flat, making a roadway right into the city, so that every man north, south, east, or west could enter from the very point where he stood! And, in very deed, no man was able to stand before them; the poor heathen people who would not know God, although His eternal power and Godhead may be clearly seen in His works (Rom. 1: 20), these also glorified not as God the Maker of all the things which they saw around them, and therefore were without excuse, fell before the sword of God's people. Some way they had had their chance of salvation, they had fallen into awful sins, which their very nature condemned, and now they must perish for ever. God commanded that everything that had life should be slain, and everything which could be destroyed by fire should be destroyed, but all the silver and gold and vessels—all which could abide the fire (Num. 31: 23)—was to be devoted to the Lord, and put into His treasury. God must always have the first-fruits; this was the first city taken in the promised land, and no man in Israel was to be enriched by its spoils, for this would be sacrilege, and God would show by its utter destruction His anger against the fearful sins of the Canaanites (Deut. 18: 10–12).

One command and one reservation was made. God commanded, "Ye, in any wise keep yourselves from the accursed (or devoted) thing," that is "Do not take for yourselves

That Which is God's Portion,

"Lest when ye have devoted it ye take of the devoted thing: so should ye make the camp of Israel accursed, and trouble it." It is the trouble of the Church of Christ that Christians live unto themselves.

The reservation was in the case of Rahab the harlot. She had been a wicked woman, but when she heard of God and of God's people, she took sides with God, and hid the spies because they belonged to God, and she had faith to trust the promise that this her house should be spared when the city was destroyed. And God took the matter in hand. He meets the first turning of a sinner towards Him, the first putting forth of faith or confidence in Him.

The city was burned; no man, woman, child, animal, or substance of any kind, except the devoted thing, was spared. Nothing was left but God's portion: this is His will for each of His children. "But Rahab the harlot, and her father's household, and all that she had, did Joshua save alive." So faithful is God to His Word. "And Joshua charged them with an oath at that time, saying, Cursed be the man before the Lord that riseth up and buildeth this city Jericho; with the loss of his first born shall he lay the foundation thereof, and with the loss of his youngest son shall he set up the gates of it!" (R. V.) One man was found wicked enough and daring enough to challenge God to fulfil His Word, and, surely enough, his eldest and youngest were sacrificed to his wilful disobedience. (1 Kings 16: 34.)

The Antichrist Babylon and the Coming of the Kingdom, by G. H. Pember, M. A. A new work of remarkable originality and power, written in a popular and simple style, yet showing much scholarly research, 171 pages; Price in cloth covers, 50 cents. For sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York.

A CALL TO THE WEARY.

BY R. M. OFFORD.

Come, ye weary, do not tarry,
Bring to Jesus all your grief;
Why your burden longer carry
Since he offers sure relief?
Heavy-laden, sin distrest,
Come to Jesus Christ and rest.

Have you tried all worldly pleasure,
Sounded all the depths of sin,
Found no joy in earth's best treasure,
Seek you other joy to win?
Come to Jesus, He imparts
Lasting joy to joyless hearts.

On His lips is no upbraiding,
Though from God thou far hast strayed,
Though thy life's brief light is fading,
Sad the record thou hast made.
Come and welcome, do not wait,
Late it is, yet not too late.

Vile and most unworthy feeling,
'Twas for such His life He gave;
Bring thy wounded heart for healing,
If not lost how could He save?
Hast thou sinned beyond compare?
Greater need His grace to share.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike), will be sent post-paid, for 10 cts., or 100 for 20 cts. Postage stamps taken.

Horsford's Acid Phosphate,
For Indigestion,
Dyspepsia, and diseases incident thereto.

Have you read the advertisement of B. F. Johnson & Co., Publishers, of Richmond Va., in another column? If not, please do so at once. You may not be specially interested in what they have to say, but if you will call some of your friends' attention who need employment to their advertisement you may confer a life-long favor on them.

The latest and best imperial Photographs of Dr. Talmage and Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, with their fac-simile autograph, and also imperial photograph of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, can be obtained from J. E. Jewett, 77 Bible House, New York. Sent postpaid for twenty-five cents each. Postage stamps taken.

MEXICO

Contributions in aid of Christian work in Mexico are most pressingly needed, and can be mailed to the address of

BISHOP H. C. RILEY,
Care of J. P. HEATH,
43 Bible House, New York.

TO OUR CHRISTIAN FRIENDS:

As there is a regular monthly expense in connection with the work a regular monthly income is needed to meet that expense. We, therefore, specially ask for regular monthly contributions in its behalf. If many will each send a little every month, or quarter, or whenever they can, it will do great good. Remember, every little helps.

H. CHAUNCEY PEET.

UNIVERSITY PIANOS FROM $180 TO $1500.
FINEST PIANOS IN THE WORLD.
SOLD DIRECT TO FAMILIES, saving the enormous expenses of agents. Sent with beautiful cover, stool and book, for trial in your own home before you buy. Guaranteed six years. Send for catalogue to Marshal & Smith Piano Co., 255 E. 21st St., N. Y.

ILLUSTRATIVE GATHERINGS
for Preachers and Teachers. A Manual of Anecdotes Facts, Figures, Proverbs, Quotations, &c., &c., adapted for Christian teaching. By Rev. G. S. Bowes. Two volumes, 12mo. muslin, each $1.25. "For variety, pertinency and availability it is decidedly superior to anything we have seen."—Evangelical Repository. Sent to any address free on receipt of above price.
PERKINPINE & HIGGINS, 914 Arch St., Philadelphia, Pa

$75.00 to $250.00 A MONTH can be made working for us. Agents preferred who can furnish a horse and give their whole time to the business. Spare moments may be profitably employed also. A few vacancies in towns and cities. B. F. Johnson & Co., Pub's, 1009 Main St., Richmond, Va

THE
ALFRED DOLGE
Felt Shoes
AND Slippers.

NOISELESS, WARM, DURABLE.

COMFORT AND EASE.

Prevent Rheumatism, Coldness of the Feet, and Excessive Perspiration.

OLD GENTLEMAN: "Now for a comfortable evening after a busy day. Those felt slippers are real havens of rest to my tired feet."

Send for Catalogue and Price-list.
Mention this Publication.

PERFECT EASE AND COMFORT!
BY USING

Slippers and Shoes
WITH SOLES AND UPPERS OF
ALL-WOOL FELT.

DANIEL GREEN & CO., 122 East 13th Street, New York.

EVERY LADY HER OWN DRESS MAKER.

WOMEN enjoy, above all other things, neat-fitting garments. By the use of WORTH'S FRENCH TAYLOR SYSTEM ON DRESS CUTTING, a person of ordinary intelligence can cut and fit any article of dress perfectly WITHOUT TRYING THE GARMENT ON. The system is so plain, and the book of instructions so complete and clear, that a child may cut and fit as perfectly as the most experienced Dress Maker. With the Diagrams and Book of Instructions you know exactly the amount of goods you need. How to fit stout or lean people; how to fit round or hollow shoulders, how to fashion waists, and all the secrets of Dress Making. The extra sleeve pattern is well worth $5 to any woman. Worth's is the only simple and correct system by which a person can measure, cut and fit garments without first learning the trade. Instruction Book Special Sleeve Pattern and System, $10 00.

$10.50 FOR $1.00

OUR BIG OFFER On receipt of $1.00, we will send the Worth System of Dress Cutting, Complete Book of Instructions, Sleeve Pattern, and one year's subscription to American Housekeeping. To each of the first 1000 ANSWERS to this a vertisement, we will send The Every Day Cook Book, 325 pages, FREE. [Price, $1.00]
Agents Wanted. American Housekeeping.
143 La Salle St., Chicago, Ill.

American Housekeeping.
A Ladies' Home Journal.

Full 20 pages with a handsome colored cover each month. Complete on all home subjects. COOKING RECEIPTS, KITCHEN and DINING ROOM, HOUSEHOLD DECORATION, ART and FASHION, FANCY WORK, BRIC-A-BRAC, ETC. WELL ILLUSTRATED. New Serials by our best authors. WOMEN'S RECOLLECTIONS of the late War is a New, Novel and very Original feature for a Ladies' Magazine. Entertaining to all, young and old. Our Fashion Notes prepared specially for us, give the latest styles, hints and suggestions to amateurs. Worth to any woman, several times the subscription price. Yearly Subscription, 50 cents.

We know that the above offer is just as represented, a bargain, and recommend it to our subscribers.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED FOR
MY STORY OF THE WAR
By Mary A. Livermore

Her own narrative of "Four Years' Personal Experience as Field and Hospital Nurse." It portrays the Womanly or "Heavenly" side of the War, its Lights and Shadows "as a woman saw them." Bright, Pure, and Good, full of "laughter and tears," of thrilling interest and touching pathos, it sells at sight to all. Splendid Steel-Plates, and famous old Battle-Flags richly colored in exact fac-simile. The "booming" book for Men and Women Agents. $100 to $200 a month made. ☞ Distance no hindrance, for we Pay Freights and give Extra Terms. Write for circulars to A. D. WORTHINGTON & CO., Hartford, Conn.

ON 30 DAYS' TRIAL.

THIS NEW ELASTIC TRUSS
Has a Pad different from all others, is cup shape, with Self-adjusting Ball in center, adapts itself to all positions of the body while the ball in the cup presses back the intestines just as a person does with the finger. Without pressure the Hernia is held securely day and night, and a radical cure certain. It is easy, durable and cheap. Sent by mail. Circulars free. EGGLESTON TRUSS CO., Chicago, Ill.

The New England Medical Monthly says:
—"WALES' INVISIBLE SOUND DISC for deafness, by practical demonstration outranks all other devices of our age! Concentrating the sound waves on the drum head, its possibilities are indeed very great." For sale only by the Inventor
H. A. WALES, Bridgeport, Conn.

In all the world there is but one sure cure for the OPIUM Habit. The Dr. J. L. Stephens Remedy never fails, and no other treatment ever cures. We have cured more than 10,000 cases. No other treatment ever cured one case. NO PAY TILL CURED. Remember this, and write to the J. L. Stephens Co., Lebanon, Ohio.

SEATTLE The largest City in Washington Territory. Population 20,000. Commercial center of PUGET SOUND Country. Coal, Iron, Timber and Agricultural Lands. Send for full information of Queen City.
SE-AT-TLE. CHAS. H. KITTINGER, Seattle, Wash. Terr.

TEAS LADIES Send at once for our new terms. THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO., 31 and 33 Vesey St., New York, N. Y.

FEATHERS. The finest live white geese feathers in the country, 75 cts. per lb. Hair Mattresses made over for $2.50. Feathers cleansed & renovated. Pickford. 11 Nassau St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

BLACK SILK WARP. HENRIETTA CLOTH.

We are now offering an unusual opportunity to buy this favorite weave of Black Goods, from the looms of a world-renowned maker.

We have purchased about 200 pieces, regular made in every respect as to weight, quality and finish, subject only to slight manufacturer's imperfections, and have marked the different grades as follows:

$1.25	per yard	regularly marked	$1.75
1.35	" "	" "	1.85
1.50	" "	" "	2.00
1.75	" "	" "	2.50
2.00	" "	" "	2.75

These goods may be safely ordered by mail or express.

James McCreery & Co
Broadway, cor. Eleventh St.,
NEW YORK.

New Musical Instrument.
10 lbs. Boxed. AUTO-ORGAN. 22 Reeds
Plays Sacred Music, Popular Airs, Operas, etc. Especially adapted for the family circle. Catalogue of 342 pieces. AGENTS WANTED in every town. Large commissions, best selling musical instrument. For special terms to Agents and descriptive Catalogue address L. A. BARBER & CO., Groton, N. Y.

FALL ISSUES—188

ST. DEDS IN MARK'S GOSPEL. C. S. Robinson, D.D., LL. D. 12mo. 300 pp. $1.25. Paper, 50c.
The author does not follow the beaten tra commentators, but presents in his own happy ma new phases and fresh illustrations of Scripture which the reader is instructed and enriched.
These "studies" elucidate from week to wee Sunday-school lessons for first half of 1889.

THE LIFE OF ST. PAUL. Rev. Ja Stalker, M. A., with map. 12mo. 183 pp. Cl.
A new and admirable work on this exhaus theme. The author presents the gist of the best vious writings and his own fresh thoughts clearly concisely. Highly commended for S. S. Teachers NEWLY ENLISTED. By Rev. Th. L. Cu D.D., LL. D. Square. 16mo. Paper, 25c. C 50c. Cloth, gilt, 75c.

Counsels for young converts from this prince a pastors. Dedicated to Mr. Moody a compani "Heart Life."

FROM THE FORECASTLE TO T PULPIT. C. J. Jones, D.D. 12mo. 540 pp.
A truly wonderful story—the life of a sailor b the mast, its rough and strange experiences le formation into a faithful Christian minister, and wonders of grace God wrought through his labors

JUDGE HAVISHAM'S WILL. L. T. kins author of "Good-Times Girls," etc. 4 cuts. 311 pp. $1.25.
A story that boys will enjoy, illustrating the of firm faith under trial. The young hero will b mired for his sterling manly qualities.

MARGIE AT THE HARBOR-LIG Rev. E. A. Rand. 12mo. 6 cuts. 264 pp.
A sequel to "Her Christmas and Her Easter;" with the same fresh sea-air; stirring and helpful.

CHANGING PLACES; or How One Climbed Up and Another Slipped D Miss C. M. Trowbridge, author of "Victo Last." 12mo. 4 cuts. 217 pp. Cl., 95c.
Full of incidents suggested in the title; more hinting to boys how they may succeed in life.

BERNIE'S LIGHT. Minnie E. Ke author of "Mrs. Morse's Girls." 12mo. 272 pp. Cloth, $1.15.
The charming story of a young girl whose light kindled at a Mission Sabbath-School and b cheer to many in dark places.

THE GARMENT OF PRAISE. Hel Strong, author of "His Abiding Prese Monotint booklet. Daintily illustrated. in colors and gold. Large 16mo. 36 pp.
An elegant gift and devotional volume, full quisite designs in harmony with the inspired with which the church in all ages praises God.

THE SEA IS HIS; or, Words of Gon for Sea and Shore. Susan A. Brown. 48 pp. 50c.
In ten colors and gold. Elegant sea and shore and sea mosses, on alternate pages with choice form God's Word and our best poets.

STORIES TOLD BY A DOLL. Miss Hunter. 4to. 6¼x8½ in. 80 pp. 50c. Nu illustrations. Handsome chromo cover. A fasc book for the nursery, with much quiet humor; s be a universal favorite and home classic.

CLASSICS FOR THE CLOSET.—N The Lord's Prayer. Dr. A. Tholuck. 46 pp. Limp cloth, 20c. Evangelical, rich, ful.

PICTORIAL WALL-ROLL. 13x20 pp., on walnut roller. 75c. A choice full page on each page, with a few lines of suggestive expl Pictures tell a whole story without a word.

APPLES OF GOLD. Four col'd pic 200 other cuts. 208 pp. 4to. Cl. back, lin er, 50c.

DEAR OLD STORIES TOLD MORE. Quarto. In six parts. Bright c cover. Each part contains six Bible S with full-page illustrations, one color stout paper cover, 15c; boards, 20c.

FAMILY CHRISTIAN ALMANAC. Illustrated. Single copies, 10c.; $1 per $7 per 100; $60 per 1,000. A household tr

AMERICAN TRACT SOCI
150 Nassau St., New York; 54 Bromfie Boston; 1512 Chestnut St., Philadc 93 State St., Rochester; 122 Wabash Chicago; 735 Market St., San Franci

Pertain sons, 10 Things, Bible S Concer Prayer Topics, etc. I by J. cent, pages. By mail, $2. Immensely popular. A new book, BOW IN THE CLOUD, of Comfort, etc., by 200 Best Authors, $1 WOMEN'S HAND-BOOK $2. J A lady wanted in every tow duce it. Quick Sales. Big Pay. A E. B. TREAT, Publisher, 771 Broad

PRINTING PRES Book of Type, 5c. Amateur Printers' Guide Book, 15c. JOSEPH W 19 Murray
Samples of Scrap Pictures and Cards, 10 c

"Demonology or Spiritual Ancient and Modern."—"An effective weapon sword of fire."—"Only unanswerable wor subject."—Startling disclosures.—History data.—Scores saved already. Whole con verted. Every family, preacher and christia should own one. 310 pp. 12mo. cloth. Price red by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price. JEWETT, 77 Bible House, Ne

AGENTS WANTED to sell "The Bible." Introd Bishop J. H. Vincent, D.D. The best sel handled by agents. Recommended by all c Address Cassell & Co., E.B.S.D., 104 and 1 Ave., New York; 40 Dearborn St., Chicago, I

MORE MEN WANTED for loca eling Good Pay. Address
E. B. RICHARDSON & CO.,
Nurserymen, Geneva

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1888, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.

This Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. TALMAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events, as well as Stories, Anecdotes, etc.

Vol. XI., No. 43. Office, 63 Bible House, N. Y. THURSDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1888. Price, 3 Cents. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

PORTRAIT AND LIFE OF DR. MOORHOUSE, BISHOP OF MANCHESTER, AND PICTURE OF MANCHESTER CATHEDRAL.

SEVEN IN THE BIBLE. Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

THE GREAT ELCHI'S TRIUMPH IN TURKEY.

INCIDENTS OF THE REVIVAL IN JANE ST. M. E. CHURCH, NEW YORK.

CURRENT EVENTS: Congressional Notes—The Presidential Campaign—Emperor William in Rome—The New Map of Europe—A Widower's Embarrassment—A Service Disturbed by a Cat.

THE EARTH'S FUTURE METROPOLIS.

CONSOLATION FROM RESURRECTION. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

Gems from New Books: Louisa Alcott's Childhood—Personal Hardships Retold in her Books, etc.

PORTRAIT OF LORD STANLEY, the New Governor-General of Canada.

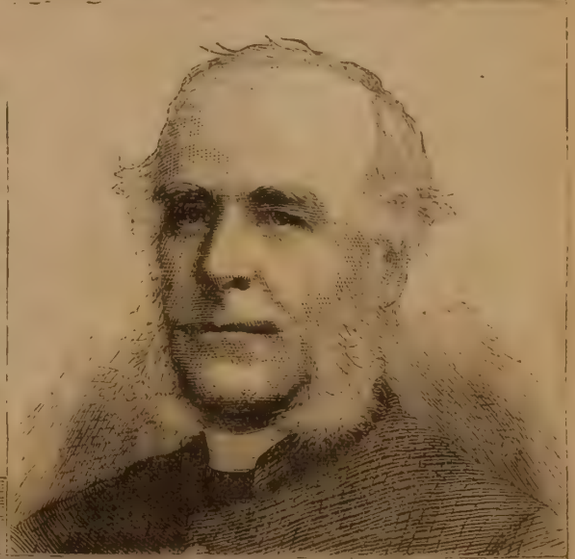
PICTURE OF MR. EDISON TESTING HIS PHONOGRAPH.

An Infidel Judge Converted—A Brooklyn Pastor's Healing—How the Gospel Fails in India—A Persian Nobleman's Gratitude—A Dutiful Son Blessed.

THE FISHERMAN'S LITTLE FRIEND. (With Illustration.)

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE. A New Serial Story by Rev. L. S. Keyser. (Continued.

DEFEAT AT AI. By Mrs. M. Baxter.



THE RT. REV. JAMES MOORHOUSE, D. D., Bishop of Manchester—Manchester Cathedral.

THE RIGHT REV. JAMES MOORHOUSE.

P. E. Bishop of Manchester, Eng.

Education and Clerical Training—His Life Work—An Apology for Flight—Autobiographical Incidents—A Struggle with Poverty—Voluntary Resignation of Income—A Bishop's Life in Australia—A Hurricane in a Forest—Sexagenarian Reasons for Leaving Australia—Not to be Trusted with Money—A Gift he Could Not Use—A Husband's Tribute—A Witty Rejoinder—Reproof to the Press—A Bishop Pumping Water for Starving Cattle—The Questions of the Day.

THE bishop who this year has had the honor of welcoming the Congress of his Church, and whose portrait, with a picture of his cathedral, appears on the first page, is a man whose qualifications for his responsible duties have been tested and proved in two hemispheres. He was formerly Bishop of Melbourne, Australia, and is now Bishop of Manchester, England.

James Moorhouse was born in Sheffield, in the year 1826, and is sixty-two years of age. His parentage was essentially a North of England one, which means something different in degree, both in personal characteristics and in training, from Southern English than the difference in latitude suggests. His father was the senior partner of a large firm of Sheffield cutlers (Messrs. Moorhouse, Rushforth & Steele), while his mother, formerly a Miss Jane Frances Bowman, of Whitehaven, came of an old Cumberland family. Young Moorhouse received his early at the Sheffield Collegiate School, and in course of time proceeded to Cambridge, where he entered as an alumnus of St. John's College. He graduated B. A. (Senior Optime) in 1853, and received his M. A. degree in 1860. Ordained deacon in the former year by the Bishop of Ely, he was curate at St. Neot's until 1856, when he removed to Sheffield, and remained until 1859, having meanwhile been ordained priest. After that he held a pastoral charge at Hornsey. In 1861 he received preferment to the vicarage of St. John's, Fitzroy Square, London, and here he remained till 1867. In that year he was presented to the vicarage of Paddington, and was made rural dean. He was Hulsean Lecturer at Cambridge in 1865; Warburtonian Lecturer in 1874; and was appointed chaplain in ordinary to the Queen, and prebendary of Caddington Major in St. Paul's Cathedral in 1875. On the resignation of the bishopric of Melbourne by Dr. Perry, in 1876, he was appointed to the diocese, and his University conferred upon him the degree of D. D. There he remained for ten years, his work being characterized by much vigor and enthusiasm. In 1886, the death of the lamented Dr. Frazer having rendered vacant the See of Manchester, it was given to Dr. Moorhouse.

Educational Training

That is the bare record of facts, but the Bishop, when leaving Australia two years ago, found so much surprise and regret manifested in his diocese, and so many testimonies of esteem showered upon him, that he felt it incumbent upon him, at a public meeting, to give, as he said,

An Apology,

not for his life, but for his flight. As his speech on that occasion was largely autobiographical, some extracts from it will serve to clothe the skeleton of facts above given. The Bishop said: "Early in my life I found it very necessary to establish for myself some rule about possible promotion, and after some consideration I adopted this principle: I determined never to seek preferment; never to ask any man to give me or get me a place; but I thought that if work were offered to me of a larger and more important kind than that in which I was engaged, I would accept it without regard to consequences. I have always followed that principle to its results. Sometimes the following of it brought me what people call worse fortune, and sometimes it brought me what they call better fortune. For instance, it was worse fortune, as the world counts fortune, when I accepted the living of St. John's, Fitzroy Square—a living containing 22,000 people, nearly all poor, without a parsonage, without a penny of income, with only the four bare walls of the church. For six whole years my connection with that parish was

A Struggle With Poverty,

but though the ship very often scraped the rock, yet it never altogether foundered, even in the midst of those storms. Again, when I came to you it was not to better my fortune. I was receiving in a London parish the same sum of money which you promised me if I came to work amongst you. But in that rich London parish I had very light responsibilities. I came, nevertheless, following out my principle, for the work offered to me here was larger and more important than that in which I was engaged. [The population of the bishop's Australian diocese was 606,000 souls, scattered over an area of 45,000 square miles.] When I settled down amongst you I found that the sum of $1,500 of my yearly income was taken from a fund which might be devoted to the maintenance of the poor clergy, and I immediately resigned that sum of money, because I wanted you to give me only what was secured in trust for the Bishop of Melbourne, and what you could not divert to any other purpose. Therefore, you see that by my own act I

Made Myself Poorer

by $1,500 a year when I settled in Victoria. Now I think that is proof enough that I have followed my principle, not only to good fortune but to bad fortune; and if it is sufficient proof, I hope you will believe me when I say that I accepted the offer of the See of Manchester because I thought I should be consistently following out the principle that had always regulated my action in the case of offered preferment. I thought, and I think, that in the present circumstances the See of Manchester offers a more important and influential field of labor than even that in which I was engaged. When you remember the terrible crisis in which the Church stands at home, and when you remember the population of Manchester, and the weighty factor it must be in the national life, you will easily guess the reasons which led me to that conclusion. What I feared in the diocese of Melbourne was the failure of physical strength in

The Hardships

of visitations in a diocese larger than half England and Wales, with roads that are mere tracks through its forests, and with a population necessitating more and more of hard visitation as it scattered itself more widely over the land. I never was afraid of the mental strain in Melbourne. I was only afraid of the bodily strain in visitations, and it was for that reason that I wanted the diocese divided, that I might have mental work to do here rather than physical work out in the open country. Now I know that I shall not find any of that physical strain when I go to Manchester. 'Physical strain?' you may ask, 'what are you talking about?' Well, you are not likely to understand it, because you have not experienced it; but I may tell you that in the short tour I have just completed, I began with three tremendous thunder-storms, that being in an open buggy, I got wet to the skin, and then I had to encounter

A Hurricane

among the lofty forest trees, with the boughs crashing down around me, any one of which, if it struck me, would have killed me on the spot. The latter was peril, not hardship, and I do not think I ever cared for peril. But there was this hardship, aggravated by unavoidable hard living and unavoidable hard shaking. Ladies and gentlemen, when I say this, I am not charging any one with neglect. The people of this diocese, and especially the people in the country, have given me hospitality in the most generous way. But as one advances in years, getting wet to the skin brings on twinges of rheumatism and the like; and eating good wholesome food which is not well cooked is not conducive to health when the digestion is delicate. That is the kind of trouble I was always facing. I know the work in the diocese of Manchester will require great effort both of brain and heart, but it will not impose upon me such hardships as I have described. Therefore I believed that I should be able to work for a longer period in the Church of God if I changed the place of my labors. That, to a man of my temper and my habits, is an unspeakable profit and pleasure."

Not Trusted with Money.

From the time it became known that he had accepted of the See of Manchester it was determined that leave should be taken of him in a manner worthy of the man and his nine years of work. One feature was that of the gift of a sum of money. At the public meeting at which this was inaugurated, one of the speakers suggested that the money should be given to the Bishop with the distinct understanding that it should be appropriated to none but personal uses; for, added he, "the Bishop cannot be trusted with money. If we give him money without this limitation he will leave it in the Colony for some Church purpose." This was a noble testimony to the unselfishness of his character, and not more noble than true.

A Husband's Tribute.

One of the Bishop brightest speeches was the one he made to the ladies of the colony, who, before the embarkation, presented Mrs. Moorhouse with a diamond necklace. The Bishop said: "I beg to thank you for the token of kindness which you have just bestowed upon my wife. If you will let me say so, I am very glad your benevolence took the especial shape it did; for had you given her a clock, a service of plate, or anything of that kind, I should have had the use of it in common with her. But, ladies, you are well aware I cannot wear a diamond necklace. Therefore, it is quite clear that the gift is a personal gift, and all I can do is to look upon it with pride, and fancy—if it be a fancy—that the light of Australian love shines from its brilliants.

"You are very right in saying that my wife has been a constant companion to me. She has been, but I do not think she deserves quite as much credit for that part of her work as for some other parts. I do not mean that she likes to go with her husband, for that goes without saying, but she likes travelling; and I believe if I could look back through her genealogy I should discover somewhere a trace of Gipsy or Arab blood. [She was the daughter of Dr. Sale, who was rector of the church in which Dr. Moorhouse served, when a young man, as curate.] She bore the fatigues of my journeys bravely, and faced whatever dangers there were undauntedly. She undauntedly faced the bush, and it proved a great comfort to me that she should go, for her presence lightened half the burden of my visitations, not only in relieving the discomforts incidental to travelling, but also in helping me with her ready sympathy with country clergymen and country people.

A Witty Reply

to a warning which was given to him on going to Australia, also evidenced the Bishop's freedom from vanity and his love for his fellows. He was entertained on his arrival by one of the Australasian governors, who told him that in Victoria he must expect every man to consider himself just as good as he was, and a good deal better. "If that be so," replied the Bishop, "I shall meet with a good many men of the same opinion as myself." "Oh," said the Governor "in that case, when you start you will be sure to get on." Bishop Moorhouse then said that he had been used to that kind of feeling; he had been born in a democratic community brought up in one, and afterward ministered in one, and that he had great sympathy with democracy. It is no doubt to this trait in the character of the new ruler of the See of Manchester that he owes his success, for he has always possessed the faculty of placing himself en rapport with men, both collectively and individually.

A Reply for the American Press was given to a reporter by the Bishop on his arrival in his new diocese, when he was questioned about some of his reported eccentricities. "You gentlemen of the Press," said the Bishop, "did me an injustice once. Australia is overrun with rabbits, and I was actually asked a one time to frame a prayer to Almighty God that these animals might be smitten with sterility. Of course, on the grounds of consistency, I refused to do anything of the kind. To my surprise, some time afterward I received a copy of the Glasgow Herald, in which it was stated that I had prepared and framed a prayer in which a desire was set forth that the rabbits might be rendered for the future barren, and accompanying this paper was an American publication, which quoted the story, and added point to it by the heading, 'An Eccentric Bishop.' As a matter of fact, I had taken the very opposite course, and the Melbourne representative of the Glasgow Herald, knowing the error into which his paper had fallen, asked, and obtained, my consent to contradict it." At the same interview the reporter said: "Since your appointment, my Lord, we have heard many stories about you—of your declining to prepare a form of prayer for rain because the people would not irrigate their country, and of your pumping water yourself to slake the thirst of dying cattle, and so on." "Oh, yes, they are quite true," said the Bishop, laughing at the repetition of these stories. "I took my own line in Melbourne and acted accordingly. The people approved and disapproved, but in spite of some objections to the course I pursued, in general the people approved of it."

True Christian Socialism, which is the great need of the Church in these times when the hearts of the poor are sore and agitators are laboring to inflame them to hate the rich, who squander in luxuries money that would save many from dying of starvation, was the subject of a ringing utterance by the Bishop on a recent occasion, and it applies as much to the Church in this country as that across the Atlantic. The Bishop said: Why should he love his neighbor as himself? He looked at many of his neighbors, and found that they were ignorant and vicious, that they were unlawful in their lives, coarse in their manners, disagreeable and disgusting to a refined tase. Why was he to take the rough, uncultured, vicious vagabonds of the street to his heart and love them as himself? Would they be good enough to tell him that? It was because they were Christians, because the Lord Jesus loved them all and came to die for them all. That was the sanction, that was the basis, that was the justification, of his obedience to the law of the second table. If they did not teach their children that, they took away the basis of all morality.

Dr. Moorhouse is not a prolific writer. A series of four sermons preached before the University of Cambridge, and entitled "Nature and Revelation," was his first publication, and he has also published his Hulsean lectures in 1865, under the title of "Our Lord Jesus Christ the Subject of Growth in Wisdom," his sermons on "Jacob" before the University of Cambridge in 1870, and "The Expectation of Christ."

THE CATHEDRAL.

MANCHESTER cathedral, of which a picture appears on the first page, dates back as a parish and collegiate church nearly five hundred years, and has undergone many alterations and had many additions. As completed, it has a choir and nave, both with aisles from end to end; and chantry chapels form, as it were, additional aisles, also very nearly from end to end: a projecting lady chapel on the east; a semi-octagonal chapter-house on the south side of the choir; and a south porch and a noble tower on the west. The church measures 220 feet from east to west, and 112 feet from north to south. In elevation it consists of arcades with a lofty clere-story; the whole is built in a highly ornate Perpendicular style, and the plan is full of interest and variety.

The Antichrist Babylon and the Coming of the Kingdom, by G. H. Pember, M. A. A new work of remarkable originality and power, written in a popular and simple style, yet showing much scholarly research, 171 pages; Price in cloth covers, 50 cents. For sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Quarrel with the Mistress.—Mr. McKeith relates: "At one of our meetings the wife of a working-man brought in a girl, sixteen years of age, whom she had seen standing in the street without any apparent object. She had gone up and spoken to her, and found out the cause of her present forlorn condition. She was a country girl, and had recently come as a servant to a respectable family in the city, but she had a quarrel with her mistress, whom she had left at once, and had since then been wandering about the streets. She was taken to an institution and kept there, while inquiries were made, and when it was found that her story was true, a situation was found for her, where she is giving every satisfaction. But during the time she was in the institution, she was shown the way to Jesus, and when she left it she was rejoicing in her Saviour. What a noble work it is for women to rescue their sisters, fallen, or in danger of falling, from the dreadful fate which threatens them. How many a sinner, just on the brink halting between right and wrong, may be turned toward Jesus and saved, by the timely kind word or action of a worker for Christ."

"That Pipe and Baccy."—Mr. Jameson remarks: "Among many cases of good which I have recently seen are the cases of three men who were drunken, dissipated, and low. We influenced them by our open-air singing and preaching. They gave up the intoxicating cup at once. Little by little they learnt what were the claims of God upon their lives, and as the claims of God were brought to bear upon them they were prepared at any price to fulfil them. I shall never forget one of them coming to me one day, perhaps about four months after his conversion, and he said: 'I am in trouble, sir; may I walk home with you this morning after the service?' I said, 'Most decidedly.' We walked along. 'What is your trouble?' said I. 'Ah,' he said, 'I have been troubled about that pipe and baccy. I want you to buy me every week a shilling's-worth of tracts, and the money that was wasted in smoke I will spend in buying tracts to distribute for my blessed Master.' Every week for eighteen months that man has religiously spent his shilling a week, and you will find him every Sabbath day distributing tracts which he buys himself for the glory of God."

The "Star" on an Orphan's Brow.—Mr. Thorne observed: "A lady and gentleman were on a visit to Paris, and one day, while passing through the streets, they came upon a poor girl who was crying bitterly. They stopped and spoke to her, and discovered that she had neither home nor parents. As the lady and gentleman had no children of their own, they took this poor girl and adopted her, bringing her up as their own daughter. When the child was educated, it was found that she had a wonderful taste for music, in which she became so proficient, that people came from great distances to see and hear her. After one of her recitals a gentleman who was acquainted with the story of her life, asked her benefactor, 'How was it you adopted her?' He replied, 'When I first met her in the Paris streets, and looked at her, I saw that there was the star, the true mark of genius, on her brow, therefore I adopted her, and you see she has not disappointed me.' Yes, though she was poor and starving, she had what the gentleman called the star of genius on her brow. Similarly the sinner saved by grace, and adopted into God's family, though poor and toiling through this life, has the star of Divine sonship on his brow."

A Typical Story of Wrong and Ruin.—Mr. Napier reports: "As illustrating the difficulties of our evangelistic work on account of one-room life, we instance the case of a young woman about eighteen years of age, who waited in the inquiry-room after the free breakfast, on a bitterly cold morning last spring. She was scantily clad, and her bleared eyes and thin figure told the tale of weak health and incipient consumption; while to make her more pitiable still, she held in her arms a little child, which looked even more sickly and miserable than its mother. She was spoken to by our workers, to whom she told her sad story of wrong and ruin, and said that she was now earning her livelihood by singing in the streets. On visiting the room in which she lived, it was found to be occupied by about a dozen persons. Three or four men, three or four women, a number of children, and a dead child. We tried to induce her to come to us—at least to be fed—but after a few visits she disappeared, and we learned she was apprehended for cruelty to her child in exposing it to the inclemency of the weather while singing in the streets. She was sent to prison, and while there her child died, and the mother, after her release, again appeared at our breakfast, but only once or twice, falling away again into that old, hopeless condition with which it is so difficult to deal."

A Strange Means of Locomotion.—Mr. George Hatton says: "On Sunday evening, April 8, at the close of a children's service, I made my way to the mission chapel. It was a very wet night, and the street being entirely deserted, brought prominently to my notice a costermonger's hand-barrow standing directly in front of the entrance to the chapel. After the meeting I was about to start on my homeward journey, leaving the vehicle to its fate, when to my astonishment I saw a man, poorly clad, come out of the chapel and place himself between the handles of the barrow. Immediately behind him came a woman assisting a deformed cripple. The first-comer helped the cripple on to the barrow, and having made him as comfortable as he could under the circumstances, yoked himself to the vehicle, and amid the pouring rain trotted off with his human load. As this curious turn-out appeared to be going the same way as myself, I thought I should like to see how far it had to go before reaching its destination; so I quickened my pace and kept it in sight for a considerable distance, but upon reaching High Holborn, the road being clear of traffic, the man in the shafts proceeded at such a quick run that the barrow and its freight disappeared from my view near Red Lion Street. What a lesson, thought I, to those in health and strength who enjoy the luxuries of life, plenty to eat and drink and good warm clothing, and yet find some paltry excuse to stay away from the house of God."

Capture of a Desperado.—There is a Story told of one of the French towns, which was lighted by lamps hung on ropes, which stretched from one side of the street to the other. Their light was very imperfect, and in the partial darkness thefts, murders, and many other crimes were too often committed. The perpetrators were frequently caught, but there was one who spread terror, by the boldness and success of his crimes, whom the officers had never been able to capture. His face was well known, and though he was rigorously searched for, the place of his retreat remained unknown. A special day of rejoicing came upon the whole country. That town among others prepared to hold a fête. There was to be a grand procession, followed by illuminations. Everyone was anxious to see it; even the robber heard of it, and felt a longing to view what was to be seen. He crept from his lair and took his place among the crowd. Rough, unkempt, and savage-looking, he soon attracted general attention. Who was that strange-looking man? He was brought under the notice of the authorities, who recognized in him the robber who had so long eluded justice. He was apprehended, tried, and condemned. He was comparatively safe as long as he lurked in darkness, but as soon as he was exposed to the light of day, people saw his true colors and dealt with him accordingly. Many people think that they can safely sin in darkness and never be discovered. But there cometh a time when there shall be no shirking the eye of justice; when the light of God's righteousness will blaze down upon the unforgiven sinner and show him as he is.

SEVEN IN THE BIBLE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached last Sunday Morning, October 21, 1888.

"God blessed the seventh day." Genesis 2 : 3.

The Mathematics of the Bible—Remarkable Biblical Associations of the Number Seven—The Number in Nature—I. The Seven Candlesticks—Light-Bearers Not Lights—Churches to be Beautiful—Christ Not to be Put in a Kitchen—Christless Churches—Degradation of St. Sophia—II. The Seven Stars—The Ministers of the Churches—A Captain's Dying Words—The Stars and the Comets—III. The Seven Seals—The Folly of Consulting Spiritualists and Soothsayers—IV. The Seven Thunders—Evils to be Thundered Down—Fraudulent Commerce—Drunkenness—Atheism—Social Impurity—Awaiting Omnipotent Thunder—The Seven Precious Stones.

THE mathematics of the Bible is noticeable: the geometry and the arithmetic : the square in Ezekiel: the circle spoken of in Isaiah : the curve alluded to in Job : the rule of fractions mentioned in Daniel : the rule of loss and gain in Mark, where Christ asks the people to cipher out by that rule what it would "profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his soul." But there is one mathematical figure that is in the Bible: it is the numeral seven, which the Arabians got from India, and all following ages have taken from the Arabians. It stands between the figure six and the figure eight. In the Bible all the other numerals bow to it. Over three hundred times is it mentioned in the Scriptures, either alone or compounded with other words. In Genesis the week is rounded into seven days, and I use my text because there this numeral is for the first time introduced in a journey which halts not until in the close of the Book of Revelations its monument is built into the wall of heaven in chrysolite, which, in the strata of precious stones, is the seventh.

Crowned Above All Others

A Curious Recurrence.

In the Bible we find that Jacob had to serve seven years to get Rachel, but she was well worth it: and, foretelling the years of prosperity and famine in Pharaoh's time, the seven fat oxen were eaten up of the seven lean oxen : and wisdom is said to be built on seven pillars : and the ark was left with the Philistines seven years : and Naaman, for the cure of his leprosy, plunged in the Jordan seven times : the dead child, when Elisha breathed into its mouth, signalled its arrival back into consciousness by sneezing seven times : to the house that Ezekiel saw in vision, there were seven steps : the walls of Jericho, before they fell down, were compassed seven days : Zachariah describes a stone with seven eyes : to cleanse a leprous house, the door must be sprinkled with pigeons' blood seven times : in Caanan were overthrown seven nations : on one occasion Christ cast out seven devils : on a mountain He fed a multitude of people with seven loaves, the fragments left filling seven baskets : and the closing passages of the Bible are magnificent and overwhelming with the imagery made up of seven churches, seven stars, seven candlesticks, seven seals, seven angels, and seven heads, and seven crowns and seven horns, and seven spirits, and seven vials, and seven plagues, and seven thunders.

Yea, the numeral seven seems

A Favorite with the Divine Mind

outside as well as inside the Bible, for are there not seven prismatic colors? And when God with the rainbow wrote the comforting thought that the world would never have another deluge, He wrote it on the scroll of the sky in ink of seven colors. He grouped into the Pleiades seven stars. Rome, the capital of the world, sat on seven hills. When God would make the most intelligent thing on earth, the human countenance, He fashioned it with seven features—the two ears, the two eyes, the two nostrils, and the mouth. Yea, our body lasts only seven years, and we gradually shed it for another body after another seven years, and so on, for we are, as to our bodies, septennial animals. So the numeral seven ranges through nature and through revelation. It is the number of perfection, and so I use it while I speak of the seven candlesticks, the seven stars, the seven seals, and the seven thunders.

The Seven Candlesticks

were and are the churches. Mark you, the churches never were, and never can be, candles. They are only candlesticks. They are not the light, but they are to hold the light. A room in the night might have in it five hundred candlesticks, and yet you could not see your hand before your face. The only use of a candlestick, and the only use of a church, is to hold up the light. You see it is a dark world, the night of sin, the night of trouble, the night of superstition, the night of persecution, the night of poverty, the night of sickness, the night of death; aye, about fifty nights have interlocked their shadows. The whole race goes stumbling over prostrated hopes and fallen fortunes and empty flour-barrels and desolated cradles and deathbeds. Oh, how much we have

Use for All the Seven candlesticks, with lights blazing from the top of each one of them! Light of pardon for all sin! Light of comfort for all trouble! Light of encouragement for all despondency! Light of eternal riches for all poverty! Light of rescue for all persecution! Light of reunion for all the bereft! Light of heaven for all the dying! And that light is Christ, who is the Light that shall yet irradiate the hemispheres.

But, mark you, when I say churches are not candles, but candlesticks, I cast no slur on candlesticks. I believe in beautiful candlesticks. The candlesticks that God ordered for the ancient tabernacle were something exquisite. They were a dream of beauty carved out of loveliness. They were made of hammered gold, stood in a foot of gold, and had six branches of gold blooming all along in six lilies of gold each, and lips of gold, from which the candles lifted their holy fire. And the best houses in any city ought to be the churches—the best built, the best ventilated, the best swept, the best windowed, and the best chandeliered. Log-cabins may do in neighborhoods where most of the people live in log-cabins; but let there be palatial churches for regions where many of the people live in palaces. Do not have a better place for yourself than for your Lord and King. Do not live in a parlor and put your Christ in a Kitchen.

These seven candlesticks of which I speak were not made out of pewter or iron; they were golden candlesticks, and gold is not only a valuable but a bright metal. Have everything about your church bright—your ushers with smiling faces, your music jubilant, your hand-shaking cordial, your entire service attractive. Many people feel that in church they must look dull, in order to be reverential, and many whose faces in other kinds of assemblage show all the different phases of emotion, have in church no more expression than the back wheel of a hearse. Brighten up and be responsive. If you feel like weeping, weep. If you feel like smiling, smile. If you feel indignant at some wrong assailed from the pulpit, frown. Do not leave your naturalness and resiliency home because it is Sunday morning. If as officers of a church you meet people at the church-door with a black look, and have the music black, and the minister in black preach a black sermon, and from invocation to benediction have the impression black, few will come; and those who do come will wish they had not come at all.

Golden candlesticks! Scour up the six lilies on each branch, and know that the more lovely and bright they are, the more fit they are to hold the light. But a Christless light is a damage to the world rather than a good. Cromwell stabled his cavalry horses in St. Paul's Cathedral, and many now use the church as a place in which to stable worldliness. A worldly church is and it had its prototype in St. Sophia, in Constantinople, built to the glory of God by Constantine, but transformed to base uses by Mohammed the Second. Built out of colored marble; a cupola with twenty-four windows soaring to the height of 180 feet; the ceiling one great bewilderment of mosaic; galleries supported by eight columns of porphyry and sixty-seven columns of green jasper; nine bronze doors with alto-relievo work, fascinating to the eye of any artist; vases and vestments encrusted with all manner of precious stones. Four walls on fire with indescribable splendor. Though labor was cheap, the building cost one million five hundred thousand dollars. Ecclesiastical structure, almost supernatural in pomp and majesty. But Mohammedanism tore down from the walls of that building all the saintly and Christly images, and high up in the dome the figure of the cross was rubbed out that the crescent of the barbarous Turk might be substituted.

A Candlestick Without the Candle,

A great church, but no Christ! A gorgeous candlestick, but no candle! Ten thousand such churches would not give the world as much light as one home-made tallow candle by which last night some grandmother in the eighties put on her spectacles and read the Psalms of David in large type. Up with the churches, by all means! Hundreds of them, thousands of them, and the more the better. But let each one be a blaze of heavenly light, making the world brighter and brighter, till the last shadow has disappeared, and the last of the suffering children of God shall have reached the land where they have no need of candlestick or "of candle, neither light of the sun, for the Lord God giveth them light, and they shall reign forever and ever."

Turn now in your Bible to

The Seven Stars.

We are distinctly told that they are the ministers of religion. Some are large stars, some of them small stars, some of them sweep a wide circuit and some of them a small circuit, but so far as they are genuine they get their light from the great central sun around whom they make revolution. Let each one keep in his own sphere. Ministers of religion should never clash. But in all the centuries of the Christian church some of these stars have been hunting an Edward Irving or a Horace Bushnell or an Albert Barnes; and the stars that were in pursuit of the other stars lost their own orbit, and some of them could never again find it. Alas for the heresy hunters! The best way to destroy error is to preach the truth. The best way to scatter darkness is to strike a light. There is in immensity room enough for all the stars, and in the church room enough for all the ministers. The ministers who give up righteousness and the truth will get punishment enough anyhow, for they are "the wandering stars for whom is reserved the blackness of darkness for ever."

I should like, as a minister, when I am dying, to be able truthfully to say what a captain of the English army, fallen at the head of his column and dying on the Egyptian battle-field said to General Wolseley, who came to condole with him: "I led them straight; didn't I lead them straight, General?" God has put us ministers as captains in this battle-field of truth against error. Great at last will be our chagrin if we fall leading the people the wrong way; but great will be our gladness if, when the battle is over, we can hand our sword back to our great Commander, saying: "Lord Jesus! We led the people straight; didn't we lead them straight?" Those ministers who go off at a tangent and preach some other gospel are

Not Stars, but Comets,

and they flash across the heavens a little while and make people stare, and throw down a few meteoric stones, and then go out of sight if not out of existence. Oh, brethren in the ministry, let us remember that God calls us stars, and our business is to shine and to keep our own sphere, and then when we get done trying to light up the darkness of this world, we will wheel into higher spheres, and in us shall be fulfilled the promise "they that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars forever."

Ah, the ministers are not all Pecksniffs and canting hypocrites, as some would have you think! Forgive me, if having in your presence at other times glorified the medical profession and the legal profession and the literary profession —I glorify my own. I have seen them in their homes and heard them in their pulpits, and a grander array of men never breathed, and the Bible figure is not strained when it calls them stars; and whole constellations of glorious ministers have already taken their places on high, where they shine even brighter than they shone on earth; Edward N. Kirk, of the Congregational Church; Stephen H. Tyng, of the Episcopal Church, Matthew Simpson, of the Methodist Church; John Dowling, of the Baptist Church; Samuel K. Talmage, of the Presbyterian Church; Dr. DeWitt, of the Reformed Church; John Chambers, of the Independent Church; and there I stop, for it so happens that I have mentioned the seven stars of the seven churches.

I pass on to another Bible seven, and they are

The Seven Seals.

St. John in vision saw a scroll with seven seals, and he heard an angel cry: "Who is worthy to loose the seals thereof?" Take eight or ten sheets of foolscap paper, paste them together and roll them into a scroll, and have the scroll at seven different places sealed with sealing wax. You unroll the scroll till you come to one of these seals, and then you can go no further until you break that seal; then unroll again until you come to another seal, and you can go on no further until you break that seal; then you go on until all the seven seals are broken, and the contents of the entire scroll are revealed. Now, that scroll with seven seals held by the angel was the prophecy of what was to come on the earth: it meant that the knowledge of the future was with God, and no man and no angel was worthy to open it; but the Bible says Christ opened it and broke all the seven seals.

He broke the first seal and unrolled the scroll, and there was a painting of a white horse, and that meant prosperity and triumph for the Roman Empire, and so it really came to pass that for ninety years virtuous emperors succeeded each other—Nerva, Trajan, and Antoninus. Christ in the vision broke the second seal and unrolled again, and their was a painting of a red horse, and that meant bloodshed, and so it really came to pass, and the next ninety years were red with assassinations and wars. Then Christ broke the third seal and unrolled it, and there was a painting of a black horse, which in all literature means famine, oppression, and taxation; and so it really came to pass. Christ went on until He broke all the seven seals and opened all the scroll. Well, the future of all of us is a sealed scroll, and I am glad that no one but Christ can open it.

Don't go to Some Spiritualist or soothsayer or fortune-teller to find out what is going to happen to yourself, or your family, or your friends. Wait till Christ breaks the seal to find out whether in your own personal life or the life of the nation or the life of the world it is going to be the white horse of prosperity or the red horse of war or the black horse of famine. You will soon enough see him paw and hear him neigh. Take care of the present, and the future will take care of itself. If a man live seventy years, his biography is in a scroll having at least seven seals: and let him not during the first ten years of his life try to look into the twenties, nor the twenties into the thirties, nor the thirties into the forties, nor the forties into the fifties, nor the fifties into the sixties, nor the sixties into the seventies. From the way the years have got the habit of racing along, I guess you will not have to wait a great while before all the seals of the future are broken.

I would not give two cents to know how long I am going to live, or in what day of what year the world is going to be demolished. I would rather give a thousand dollars not to know. Suppose some one could break the next seal in the scroll of your personal history, and should tell you that on the 4th of July, 1890, you were to die—the summer after next; how much would you be good for between this and that? It would from now until then be a prolonged funeral. You would be counting the months and the days, and your family and friends would be counting them; and next 4th of July you would rub your hands together and whine—"One year from to-day I am to go. Dear me! I wish no one had told me so long before. I wish that necromancer had not broken the seal of the future." And meeting some undertaker, you would say: "I hope you will keep yourself free for an engagement the 4th of July, 1890. That day you will be needed at my house. To save time, you might as well take my measure now, five feet, eleven inches." I am glad that Christ dropped a thick veil over the hour of our demise.

There is another mighty seven of the Bible, viz.,

The Seven Thunders.

What those thunders meant we are not told, and there has been much guessing about them; but they are to come, we are told, before the end of all things, and the world cannot get along without them. Thunder is the speech of lightning. There are evils in our world which must be thundered down, and which will require at least seven volleys to prostrate them. We are all doing nice, delicate, soft-handed work, in churches and reformatory institutions, against the evils of the world, and much of it amounts to a teaspoon dipping out the Atlantic Ocean, or a clam-shell digging away at a mountain, or a tack hammer smiting the Gibraltar. What is needed is thunder-bolts, and at least seven of them. There is the long line of fraudulent commerical establishments; every stone in the foundation, and every brick in the wall, and every nail in the rafter made out of dishonesty; skeletons of poorly paid sewing girls' arms in every beam of that establishment; human nerves worked into every figure of that embroidery; blood in the deep dye of that proffered upholstery; billions of dollars of entrenched in massive storehouses, and stock companies manipulated by unscrupulous men, until the monopoly is defiant of all earth and heaven. How shall the evil be overcome? By treatises on the maxim: Honesty is the best policy? Or by soft repetition of the golden rule that we must do to others as we would have them do to us?" No, it will not be done that way. What is needed, and will come, is the seven thunders.

Accumulated Fraud

There is drunkenness backed up by a capital mightier than in any other business. Intoxicating liquors enough in this country to float a navy. Good grain to the amount of 67,950,000 bushels annually destroyed to make the deadly liquid. Breweries, distilleries, gin shops, rum palaces, liquor associations, our nation spending annually seven hundred and forty millions of dollars for rum, resulting in bankruptcy, disease, pauperism, filth, assassination, death, illimitable woe. What will stop them? High license? No. Prohibition laws? No. Churches? No. Moral suasion? No. Thunderbolts will do it; nothing else will. Seven thunders!

Yonder are intrenched

Infidelity and Atheism

with their magazines of literature scoffing at our Christianity: their Hoe printing-presses busy day and night. There are their blaspheming apostles, their drunken Tom Paines and libertine Voltaires of the present as well as the past, reinforced by all the powers of darkness from highest demon to lowest imp. What will extirpate those monsters of infidelity and atheism? Thunderbolts! The seven thunders!

For the impurities of the world empaleaced as well as cellared, epauletted as well as ragged, enthroned as well as ditched: for corrupt legislation which at times makes our State and National capitals a hemispheric stench: for superstitions that keep whole nations in squalor century after century, their Juggernauts crushing, their knives lacerating, their waters drowning their pyres burning, the seven thunders!

Oh, men and women, disheartened at the bad way things often go, hear you not a rumbling down the sky of heavy artillery, coming in on our side, the seven thunders of the Almighty? Don't let us try to wield them ourselves; they are too heavy and too fiery for us to handle; but God can and God will; and when all mercy has failed and all milder means are exhausted, then judgment will begin. Thunderbolts? Depend upon it, that what is not done under the flash of the seven candlesticks will be done by the trampling of the seven thunders.

But I leave this imperial and multipotent numeral seven, where the Bible leaves it, imbedded in the finest wall that was ever built, or will be constructed, the wall of heaven. It is of precious stones that make up that wall. After naming six of the precious stones in that wall, the Bible cries out—"the seventh chrysolite!" The chrysolite is an exquisite green, and in that seventh layer of the heavenly wall shall be preserved forever the dominant color of the earth we once inhabited. I have sometimes been saddened at the thought that this world, according to Science and Revelation, is to be blotted out of existence, for it is such a beautiful world. But here in this layer of the heavenly wall, where the numeral seven is to be embedded, this strata of green is to be photographed, and embalmed and perpetuated, the color of the grass that covers the earth, the color of the foliage that fills the forest, the color of the deep sea. One glance at that green chrysolite, a million years after this planet has been extinguished, will bring to mind just how it looked in summer and spring, and we will say to those who were born blind on earth, and never saw at all in this world, after they have obtained full eyesight in heaven: "If you would know how the earth appeared in June and August, look at that seventh layer of the heavenly wall, the green of the chrysolite."

The Seven Strata

And while we stand there and talk, spirit with spirit, that old color of the earth which had more sway than all the other colors put together, will bring back to us our earthly experiences, and noticing that this green chrysolite is the seventh layer of

Christalized Magnificence

we may bethink ourselves of the domination of that numeral seven over all other numerals and thank God that in the dark earth we left behind us we so long enjoyed the light of the seven golden candlesticks, and were all of us permitted to shine among the seven stars of more or less magnitude, and that all the seven seals of the mysterious future have been broken wide open for us by a loving Christ, and that the seven thunders having done their work have ceased reverberation, and that the numeral seven, which did such tremendous work in the history of nations on earth, has been given such a high place in that Niagara of colors, the wall of heaven, "the first foundation of which is jasper; the second, sapphire; the third, a chalcedony; the fourth, emerald; the fifth, sardonyx; the sixth, sardius; the seventh, chrysolite."

"When shall these eyes thy heaven-built walls
And pearly gates behold;
Thy bulwarks with salvation strong,
And streets of shining gold?

"HOW THE GOSPEL FAILS."

THE report that the Gospel fails in India and other lands where missionaries have gone has been extensively circulated. The following, however, which is a cutting from the Indian Witness, published in Calcutta, does not confirm the report: The Dnyanodaya describes the results of an hour's reading in three current newspapers as follows. Baptisms: a prominent priest in Jaffna, a Brahman student in Tinnevelly, a Brahmo preacher in Faizabad, a Brahman munshi at Asansole, a veteran school-master near Calcutta, 160 persons at Budaon, five of whom were Mahommedans, eleven Hindus at Simla, 134 adults in the Scotch Mission at Darjeeling, 365 persons added to thirty-six churches in Madura Mission; a Hindu teacher in Nepal sends word to the King of Nepaul that his predecessor told him Christ was the true Guru, and he is now proclaiming Jesus to his followers. This is the way the Gospel fails in India.

AN INFIDEL JUDGE CONVERTED.

THE following incident related by Mr. D. L. Moody appears in Dr. Cullis's Times of Refreshting: I knew an old judge who had gone through all the honors of his locality, but was an infidel. Pressed by his Christian wife, I approached him; but it was no use, and I left him, saying, "Judge, I am no match for you now, but when you are converted, will you please let me know?" He laughed, but promised to do so. A year and a half later, great was my surprise when, being in the same town, the old judge came to me and announced his conversion. His narrative of how it happened was as follows: One evening his wife had gone to church, and he was all alone, when he commenced to think, "Suppose my wife is right?" Then he commenced to think that the world could not have made itself, and must have been created by a God, and he said, "Why don't you ask that God to teach you, judge?" He did so, and from that moment things appeared to him in a different light. But still he did not want a mediator, and wished to communicate with the heavenly Father direct; and he felt burdened. Then, falling on his knees, he exclaimed: "For Christ's sake, deliver me from this burden!" The burden was taken off, and from that moment he was a Christian, after his wife had prayed twenty years.

A DUTIFUL SON BLESSED.

AN incident of blessing following a Christian father's death is related by Rev. M. Phillips, of South India, who says: "I went last month on a tour through Tripatore. Large crowds listened daily to our preaching. Some years ago a Sudra farmer in one of the out-of-the-way villages was baptized under the name of Israel. At first his wife and family gave him a great deal of trouble, refusing to associate with him for fear of defilement, and his wife even declined to give him food. He gradually overcame these difficulties, but his family seemed as far as ever from Christianity. When camping last month within seven miles of Israel's village, a young man came to the tent and said he was Israel's eldest son. 'Well, come and sit down,' I said, 'I am very glad to see you.' He sat down, and told me that last year his father died. I replied, 'Your father was a good man, and he is now in heaven with Jesus.' 'Yes,' he said, 'I believe that. When my father was very ill, and could not read the Bible, he asked me to read to him.' 'And did you? 'Yes, I read to him every day, and he seemed always better after I read to him.' 'What did you read?' 'I read the Psalms and the Gospels. My father was very fond of the Psalms and the Gospels.' 'When he died, did you burn the body like a heathen?' 'No; we had a grave dug for him in the field, and we buried him as a Christian.' 'I suppose there was no Christian present to read the Scriptures and pray?' 'No; but I read Psalm 23 after the body was lowered to the grave.' I said, 'I am very glad to hear that. How did you have the courage to do it?' 'Well, I felt that it was right, and that it was in accordance with the wish of the departed, and so God gave me courage. And not only that, but I am determined to become a Christian, too, and die like my father.' 'What about your wife? 'She is quite willing to be baptized.' 'Do you want to be baptized now?' 'No; I will wait till you come again, for I want my brothers and their families to be baptized at the same time.'"

A PERSIAN NOBLEMAN'S GRATITUDE.

THE value of medical missionary work in overcoming the prejudices of the heathen is illustrated in a letter recently received by Dr. George D. Dowkontt. It refers to the work of Dr. Cochran, the eminent medical missionary in Persia, "On his way to a distant village," says the writer, "Dr. Cochran unwittingly passed the door of a nobleman whose son, a young man, he had saved from death. The grateful man saw the Doctor, however, and running out, begged him to alight and be his guest, wishing to get up a great supper for him. Being told that he was on his way to see a sick person and could not stop, he said, 'At least come in long enough to drink a cup of tea with me,' and this he did. This man had opposed our teachers being sent to his village to preach or to teach, and showed his hatred to Christianity. Now he has asked for one of our teachers to be settled in his village (He Soy) to teach 'my Christian subjects'; but he takes his Mohammedan friends, and goes himself to listen and ask him to read and explain the Bible to him and his companions. When his Mohammedan acquaintances express their astonishment at the change in him, he replies, 'I did not know these men till I went to the hospital where the Doctor took care of my son. They are good people, and now I shall have their preachers to teach in my village. Other cases there are of Mohammedans having been changed outwardly from the influence of the physician and our helpers in the hospital, but this will suffice. Nothing arrests their attention like surgery, and causes them to exclaim, 'Surely we have never seen the like!' In this department the blessing of God has been particularly apparent. In more than forty cases of lithotomy not one has been lost! This I say to the glory of God's mercy, for thereby, as in other lines of surgery, the success attending operations has given the highest classes confidence in the missionaries as 'Just and true men, doing good to all, and only good.'"

Dr. Dowkontt has now sixty Christian young men in training for the foreign mission field. They are gaining experience in free dispensaries, and in the homes of the poor, in New York and Brooklyn. The cost of the work for last year was $9,000. It is a work of faith. Contributions toward it may be sent to Dr. George D. Dowkontt, 118 East 45th Street, New York.

A BROOKLYN PASTOR'S HEALING.

AT the recent Christian convention in New York, the Rev. H. C. McBride, pastor of a Methodist Episcopal Church in Brooklyn, gave a vivid account of his recovery after a quarter of a century of suffering. He said: "I was converted at seventeen and began to preach at eighteen in the school-house on my father's farm in western Pennsylvania. Until within a year I have been a great sufferer from a difficulty that baffled the skill of physicians. When I was fourteen years old I was trying with some boys to see who could dive furthest in the mill-pond. While I was under the water, holding my breath, a stitch took me at the base of my brain, and since that time my suffering has been very great, not so much during the day-time as at night, so that I have been thought pretty well, though not very rugged. But I usually lay propped up in bed, frequently without closing my eyes all night.

"I went to many physicians, but received only temporary relief. This went on for twenty-five years. None but God, my wife, and myself know what I suffered. Often after passing such a night I have preached three times on Sunday. God has been very good to me. I have never had a charge where, by His blessing, there were not from fifty to a hundred and fifty converted.

Last winter I was suffering as usual; my wife, who had come to believe in Divine healing, wanted me to give up all remedies and trust the Lord entirely, but I was not quite able to do so. I said to a dear sister who was talking to me about it, "It seems to me God thinks it is necessary for me to suffer to keep me humble." "Brother McBride," said she, "if you keep under the blood of Jesus, won't that be enough to keep you humble?" It was an argument that could not well be answered. I finally went forward with forty-seven others in my own church to be annointed in the name of the Lord, and have taken no remedies since; I have gone through severe testings; I thought I should die on the night after, but I stepped out on the promises, and I will stand there though the heavens fall. I have been learning the Word on this subject since then, and fight the devil with it, many a time, when he has tried to keep me awake since, I have given him some word of the Lord, and have gone to sleep as quietly as a baby. I have never had such peace in soul and body as now."

INCIDENTS OF THE REVIVAL AT JANE ST. M. E. CHURCH, NEW YORK.

THE revival commenced under the labors of the Rev. Thomas Harrison has been continued under Mr. Yatman, and during this month under Dr. George D. Watson, formerly of Indianapolis, and the author of "White Robes," "Live Coals," "Fruit of Canaan," etc., etc. It is the intention of the Rev. Stephen Merritt, the pastor of the church, to secure the services of some earnest evangelist for a month at a time, all through the winter, that the work which has been so much blessed may go on.

A Reunited Family.

A Christian worker, connected with the church, reports a most delightful restoration of domestic happiness in connection with the revival. At one of the services she noticed a dissipated man standing up to ask the prayers of God's people for himself. The man's evident intelligence and refinement impressed her, though they were almost effaced by the brutalizing influence of liquor. She spoke to him, and learned his story. He said, that not long ago he was in good circumstances, with a flourishing business, and devotedly attached to his wife and children. He was accustomed to go on occasional "sprees," at long intervals, much to the grief of his wife. Gradually they became more frequent, until he became an habitual drunkard, and his wife and children were terrified when they heard his step. Finally, after many futile attempts to reform and many broken promises of amendment, the woman, who was an earnest Christian, was driven to seek a home for herself and children elsewhere.

The man had strayed into the revival service, heard of the power of God to change the heart and life, knew that it was just what he needed, and humbly, but anxiously, sought it in prayer, "The pledge is of no use to me," said the man, with pathetic conviction; "I have signed it already several times. It is the power I want—the power that holds. Can I get that? Is it too late?" He was assured that God would give him the power if he sought in faith. He was evidently sincere, and before he left the church he received the assurance of acceptance, and went out to live his new life.

The Christian worker who had spoken to him and been the means of leading him to Christ, sought out the wife and told her what had occurred. The faith of the woman manifested itself immediately. If she had been told that her husband had signed the pledge, she would have felt little joy; but this was a different matter. Instantly she was eager for reconciliation. Knowing by happy experience the power of grace, she felt secure for her husband's reformation, and authorized her visitor to invite the husband to her home. He went, was joyfully welcomed, and the whole family thanked God together. Since then, the husband, with his elder son, who is also a seeker after God, have been in regular attendance at the services, and the light in both their faces is evidence of the light that has come into their home.

A Momentous Eight Minutes.

At one of the services an engineer was present and listened intently. He was deeply moved. As the evangelist passed through the meeting afterward, the engineer caught him by the arm and said to him, in a voice shaking with excitement: "Is it possible to be saved in eight minutes?" "Certainly; why not?" was the reply. "I am the locomotive engineer of the New York and Troy Express," he said, "and I have but eight minutes before I must leave to catch my train." The evangelist conducted him to the altar, where several Christian friends were engaged in praying with anxious souls. The engineer knelt and prayed earnestly for salvation, and others prayed with him. In his anxiety he took no note of the lapse of time, but when he rose to his feet to testify of the joy that had come into his heart, the evangelist, looking at his watch, said, "Yon are in time to catch your train." There is good reason to believe that in those few minutes a change took place which will be felt throughout eternity.

THE GREAT ELCHI'S TRIUMPH.

THE Great Elchi was a name popularly bestowed in Turkey on the late Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, who, when he was the Right Honorable Stratford Canning, was British Minister at Constantinople. The name was a recognition of the extraordinary influence he had acquired over the Sultan and his wonderful skill as a diplomatist. To the student of prophecy his career, as unfolded in his recently published biography, is noteworthy from the fact that during his term of office, and largely through his efforts, the Sultan was led to grant the two important Reforms which progressively promoted the "cleansing of the Jewish Sanctuary" of the Holy Land at the ending of the 2,300 years of Daniel 8: 14. First, on Nisan 1 (March 21) 1844—being 2,300 years from Ezra's Reforms on Nisan 1 B. C. 457, and secondly, on Nisan 22 (April 27) 1756, at the ratifying of the Crimean War Treaty of Peace—being 2,300 years from Nehemiah's Reforms begun on Nisan 22, B. C. 445 in Nehemiah 2; Daniel's forty-five years in Daniel 12: 11, 12—the excess of the 1,335 beyond the 1,290—extend from that Treaty on Nisan 22, 1856, to Nisan 22 (April 11) 1901 as the End of this Age.

The following is an extract from the 32d chapter of his life, which relates to the Turkish "Charter of Reform," granted in 1856:—Lord Stratford de Redcliffe's negotiations in connection with the peace after the Crimean War, had one great point, viz., to confirm, corroborate, and, so to speak, codify, all the reforms which had been wrung from the Sultan of Turkey since the decree of Gulhane in 1838. The Elchi was busy with the former of these two points before the opening of the negotiations at Paris, in the spring of 1856. It was important that the details should be settled by the Sultan himself, before Russia had the opportunity of putting in her oar. To effect this, the ambassador set to work with all his might, and the result was the crown of all his many efforts for the regeneration of Turkey,

The Famous Hatti-Humayun

of February 21, 1856 (afterward recorded as part of the Treaty of Paris on April 27, 1856, ending the Crimean War.) In this imperial proclamation the Sultan announced his desire of renewing and enlarging the numerous improvements which had been introduced into his institutions with a view to making them worthy of the place which his empire held among civilized nations; he was anxious, he said, to assure the happiness of his people, "who, in my sight, are all equal, and equally dear to me"; and with this object he first confirmed the former guarantees of the Hatti Sheriff of Gulhane to all his subjects, without distinction of class or religion, for their security in person, property, and honor; and at the same time renewed all the privileges and spiritual immunities granted ab antiquo and subsequently to Christian and other non-Mussulman communities established in Turkey. The proclamation went on to enumerate various guaranteed the free exercise of its religious rites and the control of its sacred and educational buildings to each and every sect; and announced in bold terms that: Every distinction or designation tending to make any class whatever of the subjects of my Empire inferior to another class on account of their religion, language, or race, shall be forever effaced . . . As all forms of religion are and shall be freely professed in my dominions, no subject of my Empire shall be hindered in the exercise of the religion which he professes, nor shall in any way be annoyed on that account. No one shall be compelled to change his religion.

Ecclesiastical Privileges,

The eligibility of all Turkish subjects, without distinction, to public offices; their admission to the civil and military schools; the abolition of the system of farming the taxes; and various other reforms tending to the repression of corruption, extortion, and malversation, and the equal encouragement of good citizenship without prejudice of class or creed, were all promised in this great charter.

Lord Stratford's hand is traceable in every line; these were his reforms, either already carried, or pressed upon the Porte; this was in Lord Stratford's reforming career, and the seal to all his labors on behalf of just and equal Government in Turkey, It was a signal triumph to have extorted such a programme of reform from a Mahommedan sovereign, in face of the hostility of the vast majority of his Moslem subjects, despite the opposition of most of the men in office, and notwithstanding the indifference, if not contempt, manifested by the European Powers for all dreams of Turkish regeneration. Lord Stratford himself was astonished: "Considering that of the five persons who joined me," he wrote, "in drawing up the Charter, two were Mohammedans, two Roman Catholics, and one a member of the Greek Church, its acceptance was little short of a miracle. I confess that I had no previous expectation whatever of overcoming the prejudices of such colleagues in negotiation, and particularly of those who professed the Mussulman belief." No one but Lord Stratford could have won such a victory The Hatti-Humayun was indeed part of the Treaty of Paris of April 27, 1856, ending the Crimean War. It was recognized in Article IX.

The Culminating Moment

THE EARTH'S FUTURE METROPOLIS.

[THE following is the substance of a remarkable interview with Dr. H. P. Mendes, the well-known Jewish Rabbi, which is printed in the Jewish Chronicle. It will be seen that the learned Rabbi fully expects the restoration of Jewish nationality, and fully realizes the blessings to result from it to his own race and the world. He is mistaken, however, in supposing that centuries may elapse before that restoration is achieved, not having taken into account the power of Antichrist, under whose protection it will take place.]

"The subject of restoration is one not clearly understood. It is as distinctly a prophecy of the Bible as our expatriation and dispersion, which has come to pass. Apart from patriotic or Jewish sentiment, let us look over it for a moment from a common-sense standpoint.

"First, is the land of Palestine desirable? The answer is, most emphatically, it is

A Desirable Land.

Its fertility was proverbial, and the soil, after its centuries of rest, must, from a farmer's standpoint, be fully recovered. Apart from Bible sources, where it is constantly called 'a land flowing with milk and honey,' or 'the land is exceeding good' (Num. 14: 7), or 'a good land whose stones are iron and out of whose hills thou mayest dig copper'—apart from these and other such Biblical sources, we find in Josephus, Strabo, Hecateus, and Tacitus statements as to the large population it sustained.

We must draw a distinction between Palestine and the Promised Land, which we regard as our inheritance. The former was from about latitude 31 deg. 7 min. to latitude 33 deg. 15 min., or about one hundred and fifty miles in length. The latter is from about latitude 29 deg. 31 min. to latitude 37 degrees, or upwards of five hundred miles. The breadth of the former was, as can be seen by a glance at any ordinary map, but very few miles. The breadth of the latter is from the Nile longitude 30 deg. 2 min. west, or the 'River of Egypt,' as the Bible calls it (Gen. 15: 28, &c.), to the Euphrates, longitude 48 deg. 26 min., or more than eleven hundred miles.

"Now, as for its geographical position as A Trade Centre.

Imagine Canada and the United States with 826,000,000, which is the given population of Asia. Imagine South America with 307,400,000, which is the given population of Europe. And the millions of Africa, estimated at 206,000,000. Imagine next that Central America has the milder climate of Palestine; that the supply and demand between North and South America, with all these millions of people with wants to be supplied, passes through, as it must, when North and South America will be connected by rail. Would not Central America offer brilliant promises for business purposes?

"Just so is Palestine. Railroad communications between Africa and Asia, and through Asia to Europe, and vice versa, must pass through our promised land. The connecting line, already talked of as the Euphrates Valley road, to connect the European system of railways with India and the further East, will also roll trade into the confines of our land. And when this comes to pass, strange to say, history will only be repeating itself. For in the days of Solomon, as Dean Milman so aptly points out, the five great caravan and trading lines of the ancient world converged in Palestine, and hence it was that in his days the national prosperity was so great that they used to say 'silver was in Jerusalem as stones, and cedars as the sycamore-trees that are in the vale, for abundance' (1 Kings 10: 27).

"A common idea is that the doctrine of our restoration means that all Hebrews must go back to Palestine. Our great prophet, however, seems to distinctly indicate that but that some will stay and engage in prosperous business among Gentile nation. Thus, 'And their seed shall be known among the Gentiles, and their offspring among the people: all that see them shall acknowledge them, that they are the seed which the Lord hath blessed' (Isa. 61: 9). Or again, 'I will take you one of a city and two of a family, and I will bring you to Zion' (Jer. 3: 14). However, as soon as business possibilities are visible you will see that the Hebrews will be ready enough to return to Palestine.

All Will Not Return,

"Every Day Brings Us Nearer.

Long years doubtless have to pass first. Even centuries perhaps. At any rate, events at this moment seem to indicate that only decades and not centuries are destined to slide away before our restoration becomes a fact. Notice the strained attention at times in connection with the Eastern question—often enough it is brought up. Rational common sense has already suggested that the only way to calm the jealousies of the Great Powers as to Syria, which all of them want, is to make it a neutral state; then give it in charge of the Jews, who are peaceful and able to develop business posibilities."

"But do not let it be at all imagined that Palestine is desired by us simply because it gives us a national home. We desire it on account of What Things it Involves.

To briefly state these I would say—First, the establishment of a respected court of arbitration for the settlement of international and such like disputes, thus causing war to cease (Isa. 2: 4); second, an evidencing of a religionizing religion, if I may coin a phrase. I mean a religion which shall not be a conventionality, so that no more shall we see how these Christians do not love one another, or how orthodox Jews are oft most unorthodox and reformed Jews sadly need reforming. Verbum sap. For the expectation of a better moral tone in the world see Isa. 11: 10, or Jer. 31. 34.

"In short, to sum up what we mean by our restoration to Palestine, we mean the institution of universal peace and universal brotherhood. Universal happiness must naturally follow. This will be not simply a consolation for the Jews, or the consolation of Zion, so long bereaved of her children. It will be the consolation of the world after all the sobbing and shrieking which history's page records of each and every nation."

An Invaluable Work on Prophecy by G. H Pember, M. A., entitled "The Great Prophecies concerning the Jews the Gentiles, and the Church of God," is for sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York It is written in most popular and eloquent style, and describes the impending fulfilment of Revelation and Daniel, and is illustrated by a colored chart. 458 pages. Price, including postage, $1.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

TERMS AND INSTRUCTIONS.

Published Weekly. Subscription price in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, $1.50 a year; $1 eight months; 75 cents six months; sent two months on trial for 25 cents, postage free; in Europe and in all countries in the Postal Union, 50 cents extra postage; subscriptions always payable in advance. Single copies, price 3 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

New Subscriptions can commence at any time. When no date is mentioned, we begin it with the issue of the week in which the subscription is received.

Remittances by Mail should be by Post-office money order, bank cheque, draft, or express money order, whenever possible, and should always be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Letters containing money sent in this way need not be registered, as when lost, duplicates can always be obtained.

If a Postal Note or currency is sent, it should always be in a registered letter. Letters can be registered at any office. Subscribers sending money of this kind, and not registering, do it at their own risk.

Change of Address. Name of Post-office and State, of both old and new address, should always be given in case of removal, as without the previous address it is impossible to find the name on our list.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Both Houses of Congress Agreed, by a Joint resolution on October 18, to adjourn indefinitely on October 20. The proposal originated in the Senate, and some capital was made by the Democrats in the House out of the readiness of the Senators to adjourn without passing the substitute for the Mills tariff bill. There was, however, no possibility of passing it, or even of debating it with the thoroughness so momentous a question demanded, as in neither house was there a quorum during the week. The prevalent feeling, however, which doubtless prompted the decision of the Senate, was that voiced by Senator Brown, who suggested that the verdict of the people at the polls next month would settle what sort of a tariff-bill should be passed, and he could see no use in remaining there to talk on that subject. It has been the longest session of Congress on record, and probably one of the most barren.

An Important Factor in the Approaching Presidential election is the curious situation in New York. It forms an instructive illustration of the selfishness of spirit which seems inseparable from politics in State and city. It is notorious that many politicians are indifferent to national questions, but are deeply concerned, for obvious reasons, in city or State government or misgovernment. When, therefore, it happens that there is a hard fight over the election to the mayoralty to be decided on the same day as the election of a President of the United States, an opportunity for deals is presented, which is sure to be extensively used. It is easy for bosses of particular districts in New York City to effect an exchange of votes, on the principle of barter, which may have a mighty influence on national prosperity for the next four years. Instead of voting the straight tickets of their respective parties, they can vote, and cause their hundreds of henchmen to vote, a composite ticket bearing the names of the candidates of one party for the national offices and the candidates of the opposite party for State and city offices. There are this year exceptional inducements to do this. The Democratic candidate for governor is obnoxious to an influential section of the Democratic party, which would prefer seeing, in the State executive mansion, even Warner Miller to David B. Hill. Again, the prospect of another term under Mayor Hewitt is sufficient to make any strong Democrat prepared to scratch the ticket, if he can get some party compensation from the Republicans that will soothe the thing which he calls his conscience. Thus, if the present situation holds over November 6, and New York gives, as is almost certain, the casting vote in the Electoral College, that vote will be determined, not by the respective merits of Cleveland and Harrison, not by the question of the tariff, but by the question of who shall give away contracts, and put his friends into office in New York. Were it not that the Christian has a strong and abiding confidence that God controls and guides the destinies of this nation, the situation would fill him with disgust and despair.

The Settlement of the Strike of the Chicago car drivers and conductors proved a difficult undertaking, and caused much angry feeling on both sides. Mr. Yerkes, the President of the Company, directed his efforts to separating the West Side men, who had no grievance, from their brethren or the North Side. Several conferences were held, in which, at length, one of the West Side men plainly said that there was an apprehension that if Mr. Yerkes succeeded in lowering wages on the North Side, he would require the West Side men to accept the same terms. Mr. Yerkes then volunteered to maintain the present rate for five years, whatever might be the issue of the North Side struggle, and to discharge none of the strikers if the men went back to work at once. The men accepted those terms and resumed their places on the cars. To the North Side men, after some pressure and a resort to arbitration, the offer of six per cent. advance of wages was conceded. The strike was declared at an end, but when the strikers found that the new men were to be retained, and consequently there would not be so many trips per man per day, the dissatisfaction broke out afresh, and there was some fighting, in which several of the new men were injured. No new strike was, however, declared, and as Mr. Yerkes has promised to transfer the new men, as speedily as possible, to other roads, it is hoped that the trouble is over for the present.

The Reduction in the Death Rate from Yellow fever at Jacksonville, Fla., last week, and also in the number of new cases, affords reason to hope that the end of the epidemic is near at hand. Thursday passed over with only one death and twenty-nine new cases, which was the lowest figure of the preceding week. The list given out on that day placed the total number of cases since the outbreak of the epidemic at 3,692, and the deaths at 322. There is considerable uncertainty about the work of disinfection and destruction of property. It appears probable that the work will not be done with the thoroughness essential to future security, unless the owners of property regarded as infected are compensated for its loss. It was expected that the Government would bear the cost of compensation, but there is doubt of this, and there is reason to fear that some property may be spared which safety requires destroyed.

The Visit of the Emperor of Germany to Rome has been the occasion of unprecedented festivities and magnificent ceremonies. The King of Italy has spared no pains to entertain his exalted guest in a manner worthy of Italian traditions. The Colosseum and the Forum were illuminated in his honor. A naval and a military review were held and a new ironclad launched. An excursion was made to Naples, where the excitement of the populace exceeded any demonstration made since Garibaldi's entrance into the city in 1860. Fifty brass bands accompanied the imperial carriage, and 120,000 persons assembled to give the visitor a characteristic Neapolitan welcome. A visit was paid to Pompeii, and the excavations were examined. The workmen duly "discovered" several beautiful vases while the Emperor was present and gave them to him as souvenirs of his visit. The most significant event of the trip, however, was the call the young Emperor made upon the Pope. In order not to hurt Papal sensitiveness the Emperor set out for the Vatican from the German Embassy, not from the Royal palace, and in a carriage of his own instead of using the one placed at his disposal by the King. The Pope received him with impressive courtesy, and the two potentates were closeted together in private conversation for some time. It is more than eight hundred years since a pope and an Emperor of Germany met before this. It was in 1077, when Henry IV. did penance in the snow at the feet of Hildebrand at Canossa.

A Crisis in French National Affairs Appears likely to be developed by the scheme proposed by the Cabinet for the revision of the Constitution. M. Floquet, the Premier, introduced it on October 15. He contended that the present Constitution, which was adopted in 1875, was never regarded by Republicans as more than temporary, and that the time had arrived for making a permanent system. The Republic, he said in explaining his scheme, would remain. Its existence was beyond discussion, since it was the issue of universal suffrage. The revision was aimed against royalist plots, and plots for the creation of dictators; a remark intended for the benefit of General Boulanger and his friends. M. Floquet remarked that the bill proposed to grant the Ministers a legal period during which they should remain in power. They would thus be less preoccupied by votes of the Chambers, and have some chance of showing what stuff they were made of. At the same time the Chambers would always possess the right to impeach Ministers. President Carnot is reported to be resolutely opposed to this scheme of the Cabinet.

The Irish Situation was Rendered More difficult of settlement last week, by acrimonious utterances on both sides. On October 18, Mr. Balfour, who is Secretary for Ireland and the nephew of the Premier, was entertained at Manchester by a local political organization, and was subsequently fêted by deserting Liberals, who vied with their political rivals in doing honor to the Conservative statesman. They congratulated him upon "his patient courage in dealing with the Parnellites." In replying to the address Mr Balfour charged the English followers of Mr. Gladstone with sharing the guilt of the Parnellites in supporting politics by crime. On the other side Mr. Michael Davitt sent in a letter to the Times, in which he says that the Irish will not accept the scheme proposed by the liberals for the Government of Ireland unless an Irish Parliament is allowed to solve the land question and fix the compensation to be paid to the landlords.

Prince Bismarck's New Map of Europe Was a revelation made last week by the New York Herald, but whether it was based on reliable information does not appear. Its intrinsic probability, however, has gained credence for it in many quarters. The following are its main features: The impending death of the King of Holland, the last male descendant of William the Silent, and the consequences that it involves, have been thoroughly discussed at Berlin, St. Petersburg, and Vienna. The eventual annexation of the delta of the Rhine, including Holland, Luxemburg, and part of Belgium, by Germany is already tacitly assented to by Russia and by Austria. Holland's colonies go, of course, with Holland herself. Even the boundary line is already clearly defined. In consideration of their acquiescence Russia and Austria are of course to have adequate compensation. Russia is to have a perfectly free hand to take, whenever she chooses, Constantinople, the eastern half of the Balkan Peninsula, and all she can grasp in central Asia, Persia, and India. Austria is to have the western half of the Balkan Peninsula and Salonica. Prince Bismarck's secret is to isolate England; to unite Russian and German fleets against England, while Russia strikes at India; to keep France in check by giving her a slice of Belgium; to work with the Dutch colonies and newly acquired German coaling-stations in the Indian Ocean and Pacific, as a basis to oust England from her present colonial supremacy.

Very Liberal Terms are Offered to any Person canvassing for subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Sample copies will be sent, postage paid, on application from any one desiring to undertake the work. Ministers and others will find it easy to obtain subscriptions. Send postal card for terms, and state number of sample copies required. Address The Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

Christian Workers Throughout the United States and Canada, have been invited to attend a conference next month at Detroit, Mich., and the request is made that the widest publicity be given to the invitation at this early date, to allow of all who can attend, making arrangements to do so. The convention is called by the Committee of Christian Workers in the United States and Canada. Pastors, missionaries in cities and towns, superintendent of city evangelization socities, workers in missions, evangelists, theological students, Y. M. C. A. secretaries, business men, Christian women, and all others especially interested in aggressive Christian effort, are invited to be present as delegates without further notice. The convention will meet in the Tabernacle M. E. Church, Detroit, Mich., November 15–20. The purpose is mutual acquaintance and conference of workers, discussion of practical themes and methods of work, and prayer for God's blessing upon the workers in their efforts "to seek and save the lost" in America. The names of all who expect to attend should be sent immediately to John C Collins, Secretary, New Haven, Conn., in order that delegates' certificates may be sent for use in securing reduced railroad rates, and other necessary arrangements made.

An Important Convention Commenced its sessions in New York on Friday last. It was the fifteenth annual convention of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union. The meetings were held in the Metropolitan Opera-House, and attracted an immense concourse of outsiders besides the delegates of the Union. Every State was represented in the Convention, over three hundred and fifty elected and duly certified ladies being present as delegates. A prayer-meeting lasting one hour preceded the opening of the convention. It was conducted by Mrs. S. M. J. Henry, of Illinois, presiding officer of the Evangelistic Board of the National W. C. T. U. The convention was then called to order by Miss Frances E. Willard, the president. In the evening addresses of welcome by Mrs. Henry T. Burt, the president of the W. C. T. U. of New York, and by Gen. Clinton B. Fisk, were well delivered. Mrs. Mary A. Livermore, of Massachusetts, responded. A delicate question has to be decided by this convention. An attempt is to be made to exclude from the Union certain ladies, notably Mrs. J. Ellen Foster, of Iowa, for supporting the Republican candidate for the Presidency of the United States, instead of the Prohibition candidate. A very strong feeling has been developed on both sides by the question, and it is feared that a large secession from the Union may result.

A Wife's Last Request is Causing her Widowed husband considerable trouble in New York. The wife died suddenly, of hemorrhage, three weeks ago, at Fort Riley, Kan. Her husband, who is a commercial traveller, was away from home at the time. When he heard of his bereavement he was much distressed, and hurried home immediately. He was about making arrangements for her funeral, when a neighbor, who had been with the lady when she died, came to him and said that his wife made it her last request that he would bury her beside her dead mother. The husband felt a melancholy pleasure in complying with her wish, but he had no idea where her mother was buried, nor where her home was. He knew, however, that it was somewhere in the East, so he had the body embalmed, and brought it to New York, and inserted personal advertisements in the daily journals asking for information. His ignorance of his wife's family is remarkable; but he says that he first met her in the West, where she was travelling for her health. He fell in love with her, persuaded her to marry him, and afterward was so much occupied with home and business matters, that he made no inquiries about his wife's family or her antecedents: hence his present embarrassment. It is strange that one, who evidently cherished loving recollections of her mother, should not have spoken to her husband more about her, and her childhood home. Unhappily we are too familiar with such reticence in religious matters. Some Christians so seldom speak of their Heavenly Father that few know that they are His children. (Matt. 10: 32.)

Two Trains Were Wrecked and Eight Men killed and twenty-four injured on the Lehigh Valley Railroad, on October 16, owing to a flagman's failure to signal the rear train. A Lehigh gravel train, to which was attached a car containing a number of railroad employees, was being switched to a siding to allow the Pennsylvania Railroad fast freight to pass. There was some delay in making the passage to the siding, and a flagman was sent back to stop the Pennsylvania train. Whether he took the wrong road, or did not go far enough back, was not known, but the train came on at full speed and dashed into the cars of the gravel train, which had not reached the siding. Among these was the car containing the railroad men. Both trains were wrecked, with the loss of life and limb abovementioned. The most vexatious part of the catastrophe was that provision should have been made to prevent it and some awful blunder should have thwarted the precaution. It will be so in the more terrible loss of souls. The atonement which Christ has made would suffice for the salvation of the whole world, but comparatively few will benefit by it. Some, there is reason to fear, will perish through the negligence or mistakes of those who are appointed to watch for souls. (Ezekiel 33: 7, 8.)

A Cat at a Religious Service Caused Some excitement in Philadelphia recently. The Telegraph of that city says that during the Sunday afternoon service in the Masonic Home, Germantown, the proceedings went on as usual until the first hymn was sung, when the piteous wailing of a cat was heard, and the persons present looked at one another in amused surprise. No cat was to be seen, and when the hymn was over the mewing ceased. It commenced again, however, during the reading of the Scriptures and was much more noticeable then. Several persons searched around for the miserable creature, but failed to find it, until the organist opened a door in the side of the organ, when the cat jumped out, and made a wild rush through the building for the door. It was much emaciated, and is believed to have been in the organ since it was used on the previous Sunday. Possibly curiosity or the hope of getting food had tempted the animal into the building. Similar motives have sometimes led human beings into churches, and like the cat, they have been disappointed. Happily, however, some who have been so led have through the influence of the Holy Spirit found a satisfaction which mere amusement, or the gain for which they came, could never have afforded them. (Rom. 10: 20.)

A Young Man's Hair Turned White Through terror in the Catskills recently. A local journal says that on the northern point of Samsonville, High Point, is a rocky slide of slate, about 1,500 feet in length, as smooth as polished marble, and inclined at an angle of about 55 degrees. At the base is a yawning chasm, fifty feet in depth. While a young man, who was spending his vacation in the mountains, was amusing himself by casting huge boulders down the slide so as to see them bounce to the opposite side of the chasm and fall with a crash into the yawning abyss, he lost his balance, and away he went down the steep. What passed through his mind in his rapid flight, he will never be able to state clearly, but his clothes bore unmistakable evidence of what friction will do. As he was about to topple in the yawning abyss below, he caught a firm hold of a young cedar, and clung for his life. As he hung suspended in mid-air, a party of young ladies appeared on the cliff. They heard the voice of the young man and saw his queer predicament. Shouting to him to retain his grip on the tree they ran for help, and soon the young man was rescued by the aid of ropes. When the reporter saw him, his hair had turned white. Probably the young man's experience will make him more cautious about venturing in dangerous places in future. There are still more fatal inclines which he will also do well to avoid. Numbers who go for amusement near the downward path, which leads to perdition, have lost their balance and have not been able to take hold of Christ, who alone can save them. (Prov. 4: 14, 15.)

A Bridegroom was Near Being Left Behind on his wedding trip a few days ago. The marriage had taken place at Union City, Conn., and the newly married couple at once boarded a train for Philadelphia. At Waterbury the train was side-tracked to allow the up-train to pass. The bride boarded the train, while the groom stood with grip-sack in hand watching the up-train. The down-train started for Bridgeport and had proceeded several rods, when the bride rushed to the brakeman at the rear and exclaimed: "Oh, stop the train; that's my husband, and we have only been married about ten minutes." The brakeman looked up the track, and saw a man running towards them, took pity on the bride, pulled the bell-rope and stopped the train. It is much to be hoped for his wife's sake and his own, that this fatal habit of procrastination will not characterize him through life, or there may be some misfortunes come of it that his wife cannot remedy. Especially would it be deplorable if, on that decisive day when so many separations will take place, his wife should be caught up, and he be left behind. Her intercession would be futile then. (Matt. 24: 40.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Mr. George Bancroft, the eminent historian, recently celebrated his eighty-third birthday at his cottage, at Newport, Mass.

The Rev. Sam Jones has been preaching at Cartersville, Ga., and at McMinnville, Tullahoma, and Sparta, Tenn. He has now commenced services in Nashville.

Mr. D. L. Moody commenced his work on the Pacific slope with three services in San Francisco. He then went to Portland, Oregon, and will return to San Francisco later in the year.

The Church Unity Society of Chicago has issued a request to ministers of all denominations, to make the unity of the churches of Christ the subject of sermons and prayers next Sunday.

Remarkable success is attending the evangelistic tour of the State of Illinois by Allen Folger. In all the sixteen years of his labors, there has never been so much eagerness to listen to the gospel.

There has been a water famine in Jerusalem. Nine hundred children in Jewish homes died during the summer for lack of plenty of pure water. Money contributions to a water-fund are being sent by London Jews.

A new mission for Frenchmen in New York was opened on Sunday, October 14, at No. 58 West Third Street, near South Fifth Avenue, the Rev. Paul Desjardins, pastor, under the auspices of the New York City Church Missionary Society, and there was a large attendance.

A convention of branches of the Evangelical Alliance in New York State will be held at Syracuse, N. Y., November 20–22. Pastors from towns in which no branch is yet organized are invited. It is intended at this convention to perfect arrangements for a permanent State organization of the Alliance.

A notable celebration in Berlin was held on October 8. A large convention of Sunday-school officers and teachers assembled to commemorate the introduction into Germany of the American Sunday-school system thirty-five years ago. Rev. W. Reinhard, minister of the Prussian National Church, was appointed travelling agent.

A wonderful blessing has attended the labors of Rev. R. G. Pearson, of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, in evangelistic services in North Carolina. At Winston and Salem there was a widespread movement. The revival was preceded by a Union Prayer-meeting, in which the Moravian, Methodist, Baptist, Episcopal, Methodist-Protestant, and Presbyterian churches participated.

The Rev. B. Fay Mills is now conducting revival services in Philadelphia, and expects to remain there nearly all the year. At Deckertown and Middletown, N. Y., his labors have been followed by large accessions to the churches. In the latter town the services were held in the First Presbyterian, Second Presbyterian, Congregational, Methodist, and Baptist churches alternately.

The following statistics of the Baptist Denomination in the United States were presented at the recent conference. There are 1,281 Baptist associations in the United States, 31,891 churches, 20,497 ministers, 158,373 baptisms last year, 23,228 restorations, 26,403 deaths. The associations have a membership of 2,917,315. There are 15,447 Sunday-schools and 1,126,405 pupils. The value of the church property is $48.568,686.

CONSOLATION FROM RESURRECTION.

A New Sermon By Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death; O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, I will be thy destruction; repentance shall be hid from mine eyes."—Hosea 13: 14.

A Rock of Mercy in a Sea of Wrath—I. A Fact Used as a Figure—A Special Resurrection for Believers—From Among the Dead—Through Redemption—By Divine Power—Death Abolished at the Resurrection—II. Implies Deliverance out of Troubles—The Passover Lamb Supplied both Blood and Food—III. Resurrection from Death and Sin—IV. From Other Forms of Death—The National Death of the Jews—The Spiritual Death of the Church—Individual Churches—The Depressed Child of God—A Man Imbedded in Snow.

THIS verse stands in the midst of a long line of threatenings. Like a rock of mercy, it rises in the midst of a sea of wrath. Hence many critics have felt bound to see in it a continuation of threatening. I am quite content to accept the united authority of the Authorized and the Revised Versions, and to believe that the mind of the Holy Spirit is fairly expressed in the grand old Bible of our fathers. I regard our text as a promise overflowing with delight.

While it does stand as a rock apart, this gracious word is far from being the only one in the book of the prophet Hosea.

In the Torrent Bed

of this prophet's denunciations we find dust of the gold of promise. Hosea, in his style, is jerky and abrupt: he says exactly what you do not think he is going to say. The Holy Spirit, speaking through him, interjects promises in the midst of threatenings, in wrath remembering mercy. If any should think that this passage is exceptional, let them read the rest of Hosea's prophecy.

Israel was coming to its very worst. The people were to be carried to Babylon, and thence to be scattered to the ends of the earth. Yet the Lord, in His great love, lets them know that this was not to be a final and entire destruction. He would not utterly cast away the people whom He did foreknow, nor allow death to hold them in bondage for ever. He would open their graves, and bring them out, and make them to know Jehovah. Therefore, he drops in this word of promise when it was least expected.

I. I shall ask you this morning, to consider which is here used as a figure. The Resurrection of the dead is here employed as a figure of that which the Lord was about to do for His people. At one time salvation from sin is called a creation, and creation is a fact; here it is a Resurrection from the dead, and that also is sure to be accomplished in due time: we have the first-fruits of it already.

The Fact

Brethren, there will be a special Resurrection for those who are in Christ Jesus. "There shall be a Resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust." But for the members of the body of Christ there is a Resurrection from among the dead. These are the many that sleep in the dust of the earth who shall awake to everlasting life. (Dan. 12: 2.) That which is sown in weakness shall be raised in power; that which is covered with dishonor by the very fact of death and decay shall be raised in splendor, made like unto the glorious body of Christ. This is no poetic fiction, but a literal matter of fact, even as was the Resurrection of the Lord Jesus. We hear our Redeemer say, "Thy brother shall rise again," and we accept it literally. Our dear ones whom we have laid in the grave shall come again from the land of the enemy. Concerning ourselves, also, we believe, as we just sang—

> "Sweet truth to me,
> I shall arise,
> And with these eyes
> My Saviour see."

We accept the doctrine of the Resurrection of the dead as the revelation of Christianity. The immortality of the soul was seen before the appearing of our Lord in a dim and cloudy manner; but the Resurrection of the dead was not discoverable by the light of nature, and when it was at first preached, men called the preacher a "babbler"; they could not understand that such a thing could be. The philosophy of human nature rejected the Resurrection, and rejects it still. Only by the revelation of Christ do we know that the dead shall rise again.

This Resurrection is connected with redemption: "I will ransom them from the power of the grave." A ransom is the paying of a price for something. There was to deliver us from the death which is the desert of sin. You know who paid it, and how He paid it. Remember how He opened wide His hands, and poured forth more than gold; remember how His side was digged by the spear, that the deep mines of his life-wealth might be emptied out for us. Jesus our Lord has paid the ransom price. Now are we "waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body." (Rom. 8: 23.) Regeneration has liberated the soul, and Resurrection will do the like for the body before long. The grave holds the bones of the saints as with the grasp of an iron hand; but the redemption of our Lord Jesus will open the giant fist and set the prisoners free. Glory be to God for the sure hope of resurrection! No mass of stone, nor superincumbent clay, shall keep down these bodies of ours when our Saviour's angels shall "their golden trumpets sound."

A Price Paid for Us,

This, according to our text, is wrought entirely by divine power. It must be so; for how could the dead contribute to their own lives? How can bodies which have been dissolved in the sepulchre reconstruct themselves? But all things are possible to the Creator. We have heard many objections raised to the doctrine of the Resurrection. Let them object as long as they please. Grant us a God, and or even difficult to Him. By the risen Christ we shall be raised again from the dead. We shall sing hallelujahs to Him that was slain. He by death has destroyed death, and by His Resurrection has torn away the gates of the grave. This is our Lord's doings, and we adore Him because of it.

Nothing is Impossible,

Observe next, that by the Resurrection death itself is transformed, and totally overcome. Satan gloated over the mischief which he had wrought by death; but lo, it is through death that Jesus has destroyed him, and delivered His people. God makes His which never seems so large as when it sets. All the glories of mid-day are eclipsed by the marvels of sunset. Watch the west! See how the clouds are mountains of gold, and anon the skies are seas of fire. All the tapestries of heaven are hung out to welcome the returning hero of the day to his rest beyond the western sea. So does the dying saint light up his dying chamber with heavenly splendor as he sets upon this world to shine in another. Thus the Lord plagues death, leaving the monster powerless to harm or even terrify the believer.

Dying People to be Like the Sun,

To close this first subject—this Resurrection will abolish death and every possibility of it in the future. I notice that certain persons, in their anxiety to suck the meaning out of the word "everlasting," so as to avoid everlasting punishment, have questioned the everlasting nature of heaven. They have even gone the length of hinting that they are not quite clear that if believers get to heaven they will always remain there. Yes, and this is what it comes to. Nothing is safe from these revolutionists. They would tear away every covenant blessing from the children of God in their zeal to make the punishment of sin a trifle. But it is not so. Jesus has said: "Because I live, ye shall live also." So long as God is God, His children, partakers of the divine nature, must live for ever, and be for ever blessed. Raised from the dead, and taken up to Christ's right hand, we shall henceforth fear no second death.

II. In the second place, in these words lies an encouragement to look for Deliverance Out of Great Troubles.

The encouragement comes in this way: God, that will surely raise His people from the dead by His own power, can and will as surely raise them from every kind of trouble and apparent destruction. If there can be any comparison of ease with omnipotence, it must be easier to raise Job from his dunghill than to raise Job from his grave. If God, therefore, shall restore us from the sepulchre, He can certainly restore us from sickness, from poverty, from slander, from depression of spirit, from despair. That is clear; who shall doubt it? When the Lord puts us into the furnace, it is to refine us; and as soon as the dross is consumed, He will bring forth the pure gold. He puts us under chastisement for our profit; and when that profit is seen, He will break the rod. We may assuredly expect that He who bringeth up dead bodies from the grave, will bring His distressed people up from their troubles, when those troubles have wrought their lasting good.

And now, to come to the text, we must traverse the same ground again: this deliverance comes through redemption. He that died for you, lives for you, and cares for you. You shall be supplied not only with grace and glory, but with food and raiment. "Thy bread shall be given thee; thy waters shall be sure." Oh, rest in the Lord; especially confide in the redemption of Jesus. Let the precious blood speak peace to you; for if He has bought your soul, He has bought all that goes with it, and all that is needed for this life as well as the next. As well our temporal as our eternal concerns come under the protection of the blood. The Paschal lamb, whose sprinkled blood shielded the house wherein the Israelite was sheltered, also became food for his journey. He who provides heaven will provide all necessaries on the road thither

This deliverance will also be God's work. What aid does He need in rescuing His servants? Oh, learn to wait only upon the Lord! Do not think that I am talking mere words. No; trust in God must be real and practical, and it must be simple and unmixed. "My soul, wait thou only upon God; for my expectation is from Him." Oh, how sweet it is to rest

On God's Bare Arm!

Long have I known what it is to trust in God, and at the same time to repose on the help of many friends; but now I know what it is to rest in Him unmoved when forsaken by many. I cling to that dear arm, and find it all the help I need. And now I will henceforth abide in my confidence in that lone arm; and should deserters all return, and ten thousand friends rally to my side, I will not spare them a particle of my reliance, but still cry, "My soul, wait thou only upon God!"

When the Lord delivers His people, His work is singularly complete, for He triumphantly turns evil into good. He will enrich you by your impoverishment; He will make you strong out of weakness; He will give you health by means of sickness; and fullness by emptying you. Does the adversary threaten to destroy you? You shall be more than a conqueror. Are you led away in bonds? You shall lead your captivity captive. Those who seek your ruin will unconsciously be doing the best thing that could be done for you. That which seemed to be the death and burial of your hope shall be the overthrow of your fears.

The Lord will do this so completely that He will make you sing concerning it. We shall before long look back upon all our afflictions with gladness, and bless the Lord for them as for our chiefest blessings. We may yet feel like that great saint who, when he recovered from sickness, cried, "Take me back to my sick-bed again, for there have I enjoyed such fellowship with Christ as I never knew before." We may yet have to say, as certain saints of the Church of Scotland said, "Oh, that we were meeting among the moors and the hills once more; for never had the bride of Christ such fellowship with the Bridegroom as when she met Him in secret places!" The Lord knoweth how to lift us high by that which cast us low, and to make psalms for our stringed instruments out of the dirges which drowned our music. The God of the Resurrection has delivered, doth deliver, and will deliver His people.

III. Time fails me, and, therefore, I must hurry on, else I had loved to linger and expand. See here a declaration that God will save

From Death in Sin.

He that will raise our bodies from the grave will, according to His everlasting covenant, raise His chosen from their death in sin. This must be so. If the Lord did not raise His people's souls from their death in sin, a resurrection of their bodies would be a curse rather than a blessing. Resurrection will be no boon to those who die unregenerate. My hearers, you will all rise from the grave; but I fear that some of you will rise to shame and everlasting contempt. This regeneration must come to all of you, if you are to be partakers of the glory of Christ hereafter. Ye must be quickened, though ye were dead in trespasses and sins. That fact suggests a question to each—have you received the divine life?

If you are indeed made alive unto God, you will agree with me that this resurrection comes to us entirely through redemption. There is no quickening a dead soul, except by the process here described: "I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death." Beloved, life only came to you when you received Christ, your Redeemer. Well do I remember when I first looked unto Him, and lived!

The Life and the Look Came Together.

There is no receiving eternal life apart from believing in Him who is the life. There is no life except by looking unto Jesus. In Him we died unto sin, in Him we were redeemed from death and the curse, and in Him we live for ever. Our resurrection from spiritual death is always connected with the precious blood once shed for many for the remission of sins.

This work once done is an abiding work. I point to the seal at the bottom of the text. "Repentance shall be hid from mine eyes." God resolves that they shall live, for He has redeemed them, and His redemption price is too precious to be wasted. He has ransomed them from the grave, and they shall never return to their grim prison-house again. Man's work is superficial, and, therefore, soon disappears. All that nature spins, nature unravels: all that is woven in the loom of human excitement will be rent to pieces by the hand of time and trial; but surely I know that what God doeth He doth for ever, and it standeth fast without a change. Oh, that He would this morning come and quicken dead souls!

IV. What little time you can yet afford me, I will use in stating that here we have an assurance that the Lord can deliver from Any Other Form of Death.

The Jews: as an organized nationality, they are dead. They are a people scattered and divided under the whole heaven. Truly might they say, as in the prophet Ezekiel, "Our bones are dried, and our hope is lost: we are cut off from our parts." We have no instance in history of a nation dying and coming to life again. Assyria, Babylon, these had their day, and they failed and passed away. Where are they now? Can these empires live again? Persia, Greece, Rome, these vast dominions, died morally, and then they ceased to be a living power. Can they ever be restored? Impossible! But because her God liveth, Israel can never die. Israel will be a nation yet again, and a glorious one. Restored to her own land, and rejoicing in her own Messiah, who is "the glory of His people Israel," it shall be seen that the Lord hath not cast off His people.

In the next place, suppose the church at large should decline to a spiritual death—and I am sure it does so just now—what then? The faults which are now so apparent may only be the beginning of worse evils. Brethren are prophecying that the Jesuits will ruin us, and others that rationalism will eat out the heart of the Church. I think both these sets of prophets have a good deal to say for themselves; are much with them. But suppose error should become rampant in all our churches, as it may; suppose those who bear testimony should grow fewer, and their voices should be less and less regarded, as they may be; suppose at last the true Church of Christ should scarcely be discoverable, and that men should bury it, and dance a saraband upon its grave, and say, "We have done with these believers in atonement. We have done with these troublesome evangelical doctrines." What then? The truth will rise again. The gospel will burst her sepulchre.

The Signs of the Times

Some of you perhaps from the country may happen to belong to churches which have come near to death's door. That which is true of the church at large is true of any individual church. Have faith in God. He can trim the expiring lamp. They talk about shutting the doors of the chapel. Has it come to that? Prayer-meetings—are they given up? Gospel preaching—have you almost forgotten the joyful sound? The Sunday-school—has that become a farce? Does everything seem dead? Cry to the living God. Do not say to yourself, "Can these dry bones live?" They can, if the living God intervenes. God, who made Ezekiel see the dry bones stand up as a great army, can make you see it yet. Be of good confidence. "When the Lord shall build up Zion He will appear in glory."

Suppose I am now speaking to some child of God, who says, "I can believe all this; but, alas! I feel dead myself." We do sometimes faint, and are full of fears, and cry, "Will the Lord cast off for ever? and will He be favorable no more?" We trust we do really love the Lord; but we get very dull at times. We feel as if we could not pray; there is no singing in us; and we feel as if we could not feel. At times we are so dull and stupid that we cannot think ourselves to be enlightened of the Lord at all. For my own part, "I am more brutish than any man" at times, in my own esteem. Be our case as it may, let not faith waver because feeling changes.

When You are down in the Dumps, remember that as the Lord will raise your dead body, He can certainly revive your fainting heart. Trust in Him to restore your soul. A man, finding himself imbedded in the snow, discovered, to his horror, that he could not move his feet, for they were frozen; nor his hands, for they were stiff with cold. He would have given himself up, therefore, as certainly doomed to die, but he found that he could speak, and here was hope. His tongue was not frozen, so he began to call aloud; and he did not call long before helpers came and dug him out, and thawed him back to life. If you cannot do anything else, my dear friend, do cry aloud. Cry, "O God, help me! Quicken thou me, O Lord."

Do any of you say, "Well, I never get into so sad a state. I am always lively?" I am very glad to hear it, if it be true. But I have heard that the statues in St. Paul's Cathedral are never afflicted with rheumatism; and the reason is because they have no life. I am just a little afraid that you also may have no changes and no fears, because you have no spiritual life. God knows whether it is so or not. Look to it. I would sooner have the rheumatism, and be alive, than be without pain, and be a statue.

Hope for the Unconverted.

Lastly, let us have that same hope about our unconverted friends. Let us begin by knowing what they are, and what is their condition. Do not say, "I hope my boy will be saved, because I do not see much evil in him." Your boy is as spiritually dead by nature as anybody else's boy. "That which is born of the flesh is flesh"; and however good your flesh may be, it is only flesh, and only flesh has come of it. I beg you to regard every soul that is not begotten unto God as being dead in sin, else you will not go to the bottom of things, and you will not go the right way to work. Next, go to the Lord and Giver of life, and say, "Lord I cannot make this dear child live; I cannot bring my unconverted husband to Thee. I will do all I can by teaching, persuasion, and example; but O my Lord, I look to Thee to give the spark of divine life." Go to God with your anxiety for dead souls, and cry, "Lord quicken them!" In dependence upon the Spirit of God, preach the gospel, which is the vehicle of divine life, and you shall see them live. Have faith about those who are laid on your heart. God grant your faith a full and speedy reward, for Jesus' sake! Amen.

[The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors, and those whose sermons, articles or labors for Christ are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Dr. Talmage and Mr. Spurgeon especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

LOUISA MAY ALCOTT.*

It was on the 29th of November, in the good year 1832, when a dear little baby girl came into a sweet and beautiful home in the pleasant suburb of Germantown, near the great City of Brotherly Love, or Philadelphia. Very welcome was the dear baby, for she came to loving, true hearts: to a father who was noble and good, and felt reverence for every child; to a mother whose great, generous heart was ready to hold all in its loving embrace; and to a little sister who was full of delight in the baby. This baby was Louisa Alcott, the children's friend. A picturesque house it was, and it is still standing, though the little town has grown into a great one, and is not so country-like and pretty as it was then. Her father taught a school in Philadelphia, and the little ones grew and throve under their mother's watchful eye.

Her Education.

At this time Mr. Alcott kept that school in the Masonic Temple which has become so famous through the account Miss Peabody has given of it. Some things in the school at Plumfield are taken from this model, but not much, for this was only a day school, and I don't think the teacher thought quite so much of making the children's bodies strong and giving them a jolly time as Mr. Bhaer did. But he did encourage them to talk and express all their earnest thoughts. "It was a school of thirty children, mostly boys under ten years of age; well disposed, good-natured, overflowing with animal spirits, and all but intoxicated with play." Louisa never went to this school, but the children had very good times at home. She went later to a smaller school kept by her father in the home at Beach Street, Boston. In fact, Louisa went to school very little, and learned all she knew from her father and mother, and the bright intelligent people they always had about them. She went a little while once or twice to a child's school, and a few weeks to a district school, but her education was very varied and irregular. But the children were taught by their father in the pleasantest way at home. For two hours in the morning they were either in his study or on some shady seat in the garden under his care. He taught them much by writing, and they each kept a journal of their work and their lives. They wrote down words and their meanings, and often made drawings to illustrate them. The father sometimes made pictures of the houses in which they were staying, or the landscapes they loved, and I have seen in one of the journals a sketch of himself, with the little Elizabeth in his lap.

Early Hardships.

I want you children to realize how fully Miss Alcott had known almost all she has described in "Little Women" and her other books. She knew the bitterness of poverty, when even the

---

*From "Louisa May Alcott, the Children's Friend," a memorial volume by Mrs. Ednah B. Cheney. Illustrated by Miss L. B. Comins, with two views of Miss Alcott's home and burial place, and a colored frontispiece representing Miss Alcott reading, from a volume of "Little Women," to children of various nationalities. Price $1. Published by L. Prang & Co., Boston, Mass.

Lord Stanley, Governor-General of Canada.

Mr. Edison Listening to the Phonograph's Reproduced Concert.

daily food, if not scanty, was simple in quality and sweetened by no luxuries. All that she has told you of the struggles of young girls, turning their dresses and painting their shoes, and carrying a torn glove in the hand, and every little petty misery of the toilet, she has not only seen but known. All the sacrifices made by one sister or friend to help another were felt or observed by her, and all the tender, wise rebukes from father and mother were treasured up in her memory. Scarcely an adventure in her stories but is painted from life, altered in time or place, but still revealing some real person.

Her Secret.

Out of their hard trials, borne with love and courage, but felt just as keenly as other girls feel them, as out of a dark mine she has drawn the gold and silver and precious jewels with which she has brightened the lives of so many children and hard-working girls; for nothing helps us like knowing that others have suffered as we have and conquered as we may. What was the secret of her power to do this? It was that her heart was full of love and faith and courage. She was never ashamed of the poverty or hardships she had been through, but was proud that she could do whatever work was necessary for herself or her family, and she was full of loving thought for everybody else, and longing to help them in the trials she knew so well herself.

BARON STANLEY.

Governor-General of Canada.

THE present representative of monarchy in Canada, in succession to the Marquis of Lansdowne, is a member of the family of the Stanleys whose head is Earl of Derby. He is the second son of the late Earl of Derby, who was three times Prime Minister of England, and whose parliamentary ability won him the name of "the Rupert of Debate." The Governor-General may yet inherit the title and estates of the Earl of Derby, as his elder brother, the present Earl, has no son who can succeed him.

Frederick Arthur, Lord Stanley of Preston, was born in 1841, and after the completion of his education entered the army. The brief period of seven years sufficed to satisfy his military ardor, and in 1865 he quitted the Grenadier Guards for a political career. He was elected to Parliament as a Conservative by the town of Preston, in Lancashire, and subsequently was honored by an election by the northern section of the county. In 1868 he was appointed to an office under the Government as one of the Lords of the Admiralty. In 1874 he was made Financial Secretary of the War Office, and in 1878 he entered the Cabinet as Secretary of War. He retired from office with his party in 1880, but in 1885, the Conservatives being in the ascendant, he was made Secretary of the Colonies. Lord Stanley now receives one of the most coveted prizes in the gift of the British Government.

THE NEW PHONOGRAPH.

(See Illustration.)

A PORTRAIT of Mr. Thomas A. Edison, and a picture of his phonograph receiving the strains of music at a concert, appeared in this journal on September 13. We are now enabled to give a picture of Mr. Edison seated in his laboratory at Menlo Park, listening to the reproduction of the record.

When the first phonograph was invented, some years since, it was generally felt that, though the machine as then constructed was no better than a toy, and reproduced vocal sounds in the unnatural tones of a parrot, it was the germ of an important discovery which Mr. Edison in time might develop into a successful reproducer of the human voice. This in great measure he has done. He has replaced the tinfoil recorder by a ring of more durable material, which can be removed and transmitted through rhe mails. The ring is placed upon a cylinder, which is slowly revolved by means of a battery. The sender of a message speaks through a tube, the modulations of his or her voice being accurately impressed upon the ring. When the recipient wishes to hear the phonogram, he places it in the same position on his reproducing cylinder, which revolves as before, and he listens to the words of his correspondent through tubes which, having connection with a battery, he applies to his ears. Both the receiving and reproducing phonographic instruments have been privately exhibited in England by Colonel Gouraud.

Among the guests who accepted invitations to inspect the instrument was the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, whose sermons appear every week in this journal. In the course of his sermon on the following morning he thus referred to the phonograph: "I sat yesterday with two tubes in my ears to listen to sounds that came from revolving cylinders of wax. I heard music, though I knew that no instrument was near. It was music which had been caught up months before, and now was ringing out as clearly and distinctly in my ears as it could have done had I been present at its first sound. I heard Mr. Edison speak: he repeated a childish ditty; and when he had finished, he called upon his friends to repeat it with him; and I heard many American voices joining in that repetition. That wax cylinder was present when these sounds we made, and now it talked it all out. I sat and li tened, and I felt lost in the mystery. But wh of all this? What can these instruments co vey to us? But oh, to sit and listen to the go pel when your ears are really opened! Th you hear God Himself at work; you hear Jes speak: you hear His voice in suffering and glory, and you rise up and say, 'I never thoug to have heard such strange things!'"

THE FISHERMAN'S LITTLE FRIEND.

(See Illustration on page 685.)

"HERE again, my little man!" said a stalwa fisherman to a bright, intelligent boy, whom had seen day by day playing about the roc sometimes with his sisters, but more frequen alone. "You must be fond of the briny."

"Oh yes," said the child, with that readin to make acquaintance with strangers whi characterizes all American children. "We not have the sea at my home. I never saw in all my life till this summer."

"Maybe you'd like to go out with me in t boat some fine day, if your mamma wouldn't scared? You'd know more about the sea if y were out on it."

"That's just what I want," said the child. asked mamma to let me have one of the bo out yonder. I am sure I could row. But sh worrisome, you know, and she laughed at and wouldn't think of it."

"Well, tell your mamma that a man who g out fishing every night of his life will take y if she is willing."

"Oh! I'll ask her, you may depend. Ha you always been a fisherman?

"Most ever since I could walk. I went w father when I was a little un, and got to h him as soon as I could, till I could go it alon

"Did you ever try to walk on the sea?" ask the boy, looking up in his new friend's face.

The fisherman burst out laughing. "N he said, "I often swim in it; I guess I sh never try to walk on it, unless I am drunk crazy. What made you think of that?"

"Something my papa told us when we w at home. I'll tell it you: I remember all ab it, because he showed us a picture of it."

"Well," said the fisherman, "I'll put you this rock and then we'll be more on a level conversational purposes, and you can tell your story without cricking your neck." T boy was lifted up, and the tall fisherman st by his side.

"Well," said the boy, "papa said that th was a boat went out one night for fishing o and it was driven about by wind, and the men were

ed. And they were out all
t. In the morning, before it quite light, they saw some walking on the sea toward n, and they thought it was ook."
Exactly what I should have ught, myself," put in the rman.
Ah! but it wasn't. When got close He spoke to them told them who He was, and do you think it was? Why, as Jesus!"
And He was alive, and walk-on the water?"
Oh yes! But then, you
w Jesus could do anything.
there was something else.
of the men in the boat—
name was Peter—thought hould like to do it, too, so asked Jesus if he might.
Jesus said 'Yes.' So Peter out of the boat and he ed, too. And he walked ight while he looked at s, but he looked off once he saw the big waves rolland the wind was blowing
, and he got scared and t away down he went."
Drowned, I guess."
No, he called out to Jesus, Jesus put His hand out and him up till they got to the
and they both got in."
That's a wonderful story," the man. "No, I never anything like that, and t expect to."
But it's quite true," said the
l. "It's in the Bible. I have a book of fairy stories ever onderful, but they ain't true, says. What's in the Bible hough, and this story is ere. Papa read it to us, after he had told out it."
've got a Bible," said the fisherman; "it my mother's, but I never read that in it. is, I ain't read it as I'd ought to. Never good at reading, somehow. But I'll look it It's wonderful."
Papa said it was put there to teach every-when they were in trouble to call out to s—pray, you know—and He would help like He did Peter. I say my prayer every
t. You do, too, I suppose."
Well, no, I can't say I do. I know I ought My mother trained me to, but somehow dropped out of it. More shame for me."
Well, you should. Papa says God does so h for us, it would be real mean not to thank
, even if we don't ask Him to do anything
."
guess that's so."
There's my mamma," said the boy, looking
nd. "I'll run and ask her now if I may go you. It's a good time, because she don't k I'm big enough to take care of myself, she can see you now, and she can't say you ot big enough."
e boy ran off and soon returned with his er, to whom he introduced his new friend.
urged his request. It was granted, and that, many a sail did the two strangely asd companions have together. The boy's le stories, about Jesus hushing the tempest, passage of the Israelites through the sea, other incidents which he told, as being na-ly interesting to a seafaring man, strongly essed the fisherman. He wanted to see the boy's stories really were, and rememng his mother's reverence for the Bible, he ed up the Book and read for himself.
few weeks later, the boy's father came down to fetch his family home, and the boy could not rest until he, too, was introduced to the fisherman. The latter, by that time, was in an inquiring, receptive state, and the earnest Christian father had the joy of leading him to Christ.

The Fisherman Hears a Wonderful Story.

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. L. S. Keyser.

(Continued from page 670.)

A Congenial Companion.

THE next Sunday morning Hadley listened with rapt attention to a sermon by Mr. Hanson on the reasonableness of faith, which still further dissipated the prejudices that he had entertained against religion.

When, a few days afterwards, he called upon the minister in his study, Hadley's bias against clergymen as a contracted and uncultured class of men received a still further shock. He was surprised at the large and choice collection of works in Mr. Hanson's library—critical commentaries on the Scripture, theological and apologetic works, the best works on philosophy, books of reference in several different languages, the best literature and poetry, and also, much to Hadley's amazement, a shelf full of the productions of the leading sceptical writers of the past and present.

Mr. Hanson noticed his visitor's look of pleased surprise, and led him from shelf to shelf, while he discoursed on the merits of the principal writers.

"I did not suppose," remarked Hadley, "that a minister required such extensive apparatus for his work."

"A preacher of the Gospel cannot know too much," replied Hanson. "No knowledge comes amiss to him, if he knows how to use it. We come in contact with all classes of persons, with the learned and the unlearned, and if we can adapt ourselves to all, we may, as Paul says, win some. Of course, it would be unpardonable pedantry for a preacher to make a display of his knowledge in the pulpit, but still, when there is a real demand for the discussion of difficult questions, he ought to be equal to the exigency. It is, however, in his intercourse with scholarly people that his culture is most needed, if he wishes to win them to Christ. It gives him so much greater purchase power."

"I have heard sermons that did not give evidence of a library like this at the back of them."

"There are ignorant preachers as well as ignorant lawyers and physicians," interposed the minister. "Sometimes uneducated preachers do a great deal of good. It depends upon whether they are well-balanced men or not, and whether they know that their intellectual resources are limited."

Hadley mused awhile. "I have a difficulty that I wish you would explain," he said. "I never could understand how an educated man can believe the Bible to be the Word of God, when it seems to me so preposterous."

"Ha! ha! you think that it is a book for the illiterate only, do you? Let me divulge the secret to you. An educated man accepts the Bible for the same reason that an uneducated man does: because he has been born from above."

The young sceptic was silent. Somehow every difficulty seemed to find a solution in the supernatural, which, though an unknown quantity to him, was very real to believers. Mr. Hanson noted the young man's thoughtful silence and felt sure that the grain of seed would be better left to grow in its own way without further attention. The talk drifted off into literature and local topics. An incidental allusion to lonely bachelor evenings led Hadley to ask: "Are you, also, a bachelor, Mr. Hanson?"

"Yes, sir, so far, that is my condition," replied Hanson, blushing.

"That is not saying that your 'emotional life' is still in an undisturbed state," suggested Hadley, with a laugh.

The clergyman turned crimson, which indicated to Hadley that he had driven a shaft into a sensitive spot of his friend's heart. "I am not good at fencing on that delicate theme," he said. "Good-day, sir; I hope that you will come often."

As Hadley walked away, he felt convinced that his clerical friend was not heart-whole.

"He is the most intelligent and able parson I ever met," mused Hadley on his return toward his room. "He has accumulated a vast fund of knowledge, and it does not seem to be composed of disjecta membra, either, but appears to be well systematized and assimilated. Yes, it is remarkable for a parson. I wonder whether he is an exception—a rara avis. Now, he venerates the Bible. Certainly that is a strong endorsement of the old Book. At any rate, I like him immensely and believe that he is perfectly honest. He elucidated some of the questions that have been perplexing me very satisfactorily; I shall avail myself of the opportunity of seeing him often."

A few steps farther brought another train of thought. "Judging from his appearance, he must be about five years my senior—yes, he is fully thirty. His blush betrayed him, when I spoke of his being in love. I wonder who the object of his choice might be."

The reflection that his friend had fallen a victim to Cupid's wiles, reminded Hadley of the perturbed state of his own affections, and caused him to say to himself: "She told me that she lives at 318 Franklin Street. I am like a poor moth fluttering about a candle, but I cannot resist the temptation to see her home."

Turning to his left he soon reached Franklin Street, which he followed, carefully scanning the numbers on the houses as he passed. His heart fluttered into his throat when he reached the looked-for residence. It was a pleasant home, the house being larger than those near it, which indicated that its owner was in comfortable circumstances, although not affluent. Tall elms, maples, and willows, relieved by green, sighing pines, surrounded the house, while a closely shaven lawn and beds of late autumn flowers showed that careful hands and an artistic taste might be found within. All these signs of æsthetic culture suggested Madeline to Hadley. They were like her. Her taste would bring all her environments into harmony with her characteristic love of the beautiful and good. A cat-bird among the trees was filling the air about the place with his vibratory melody.

Ah! what was that? There was the flash of a woman's dress as some one issued from a side door. The pulsations in the hot temples of the young man might have almost been counted, so intense was his excitement, as the girl's figure stepped carefully and lightly across the lawn beneath the trees, while she looked up toward the place whence the bird-song was emanating. Evidently she had been attracted by the bird's raptured strains. After standing in a listening attitude for a few moments, she sat in a rustic seat that stood by the bole of an elm-tree.

Hadley had recognized her at once. Her lithe form and graceful carriage were indelibly stamped upon his memory, for how often had his eye surreptitiously followed her as she went down the walks of the campus in the old college days! She was the same girl she had been then, except that she was a little paler, as if some sorrow had left its traces on her life.

In his absorption Hadley had slackened his pace, and was treading so quietly upon the cement walk that his steps were scarcely audible; so that the girl did not perceive him until he had come directly opposite the place in which she was sitting, which was a few rods from the street. When she saw him, the tell-tale blood flowed to her cheeks. "It is always embarrassing for her to meet me after what has happened between us," reflected Hadley, when he saw the flush on her face. He lifted his hat and bowed, which she acknowledged with her characteristic gracefulness.

"Ah, you are listening to the song of Mimus Carolinensis, are you?" asked Hadley.

"You mean the cat-bird, do you?" she answered. "I had forgotten his scientific name. Yes, I have been listening to him; he is an exquisite vocalist."

"I am glad that you are a lover of our feathered contemporaries."

"I learned to care for them through—you—at college; you know that you were always directing the attention of your fellow-students to the birds."

Oh! she remembered his idiosyncrasies, did she? Why should any peculiar propensity that he had shown at college impress itself upon her memory? Did she care? He felt an almost ungovernable impulse to decrease the lineal distance between them by stepping across the lawn and taking the seat by her side. But he feared that it would be too bold to do so uninvited. He hoped that she would say, "Can't you come in awhile?" as she had said so often in the happy days before his ill-fated proposal; but the girl was evidently restrained, by some reason best known to herself, from making the wished-for overture, and he therefore felt that the only course open was to pursue his way.

Saying, "Ah! you remember my scientific hobby, I see. Well, I have not worn it out yet," he lifted his hat and resumed his walk.

"She does not care to have an interview with me," he said to himself, bitterly. "The conclusion is self-evident. Our relations are still unchanged. I am still the rejected suitor who is to keep at a distance from her. My fate is a hard one to bear. What have I done to deserve it?"

And again the old rebellion, the old chafing under affliction, rose in his heart, almost causing him to call down imprecations upon his seemingly inimical destiny. The old questioning, the old ground of complaint, was gone over again.

"Why must I carry this eidolon of a hopeless love on my heart? My life is a parody on the doctrine of a kind overruling Providence—a travesty on the Christian conception of God as a 'Father.' I wonder what solution Hanson would give of these harrowing problems! I shall draw him out on this matter when I meet him again."

A little more than a week later—it was a pleasant Saturday morning of Indian summer—Hadley heard a firm, elastic step on the stairway, and the next moment there was a knock at the door of his room. On opening it, "Why, Mr. Hanson, you are out early; come in," broke from his lips.

The clergyman was dressed for a walk, and under his arm he was carrying several books and pamphlets, among them the hand-Bible which Hadley had seen upon his writing-desk a few days before.

"I hope that my unseasonable visit is not unwelcome," he began, without taking the chair which Hadley had offered him. "The fact is, I am going to take a jaunt along the river to-day, for a little recreation, and as I was passing your room, the thought struck me that you might perhaps be willing to join me. What do you say, Mr. Madelling?"

"I shall be delighted," replied Hadley, in his heartiest style. "I was just wondering how I should pass the day, as in my present mood books are a little dull. May your shadow never grow less for your thoughtfulness in inviting me to go with you," he added, gratefully.

Presently the two friends were walking along the street toward the suburbs of the city. Little had the young sceptic thought, a few months prior to that morning, that he would ever entertain so warm a feeling of friendship for a member of the profession which he had despised so long. He had often called clergymen "pensioners on the public bounty," and once when he saw a group of divinity students he had derisively called them "a flock of charity birds." And yet here he was walking arm-in-arm with a "parson." But the secret of it was, as Hadley well knew, that there was no clerical stiffness, no repellant sanctimoniousness about the minister with whom he was conversing. Indeed, so completely had Hanson thrown off all professional airs, that Hadley almost forgot that he was in the company of a man who was to stand in the pulpit on the following day.

The pedestrians made their way across a bridge that spanned the river at the outskirts of the town, and then, leaving the highway, they turned to their left and followed the curvature of the river to a grove of beeches and maples, where the ground was carpeted with a green lawn-like sod, that came up everywhere flush with the stream. It was a beautiful dreamy day, such as is known only to Indian summer.

For awhile the young men carried on their conversation in a rather desultory fashion, the sights and sounds of the natural world claiming a large share of their attention. The season, the falling leaves, all the aspects of nature, served to recall to Hadley's mind some of the episodes of his past life. It was on a day like this, a year ago, that he had succored Madeline Winters from a terrible death. It seemed to him, now, that he had saved her only to blight his own happiness. These reflections filled him with profound melancholy, and it was natural that his pensive mood should give color to his remarks.

"What a medley of joy and pain existence is!" he observed, sadly. "To-day the sparrows are singing their Jubilate; to-morrow, some casualty may change it into a dirge."

"Ah, you are low-spirited to-day," remarked his friend.

"Yes; I suppose it is because 'the melancholy days have come, the saddest of the year.'"

"I think not altogether, if you will allow so blunt a contradiction," said Hanson.

"Do you think that our surroundings have nothing to do with our moods?"

"Somewhat, no doubt," answered Hanson, sententiously, and then continued: "But more frequently our pensiveness is the outgrowth of some unsatisfied longing of the soul, some craving, some disappointment."

Hadley looked at his friend in wonder. What had this acute analyst of the human heart divined. "Are you gifted with a second sight?" he asked.

"Human experience is pretty much the same the world over," Hanson said, philosophically; "and when I take a leaf out of my own biography and read it carefully, I have found the key that unlocks the secrets of almost every heart; and so I say that disappointment in ambition, or love, or fond desire has more to do with our melancholy moods than our external environments have, unless, of course, our environments are extraordinary."

Hadley looked at his friend in surprise, and wondered whether a bitter disappointment had ever cast its shadow upon his path.

"I have been wishing to have a talk with you about the ills of life," he said, at length. "There is the great problem of human sin and suffering—how do you explain it? And especially, how do you reconcile it with the doctrine of the fatherhood of God?"

"That is a mystery of which no complete explanation has ever been found. Many have tried with unsatisfactory results. The best answer is that which the Bible gives."

"Your usual treasury of wisdom," said Hadley.

"Yes, that is so," replied the clergyman, simply. "In this case, we learn that sorrow has its uses and brings its blessings. Among others, moral discipline and clearer spiritual light." Then, seeing Hadley smile incredulously, Mr. Hanson added, "You, too, recognize the difficulty of the problem of sorrow and suffering, what light does agnosticism throw upon it?"

"None at all: it is a great mystery."

"And you have not the consolatory hope we cherish that what we know not now, we shall know hereafter," said Mr. Hanson, sadly. "But let us continue our walk."

"This has been a most delightful ramble to me," said Mr. Hanson, as in the shades of evening they re-entered the city. "I am indebted to you for more bird-lore than I could have thought it possible to gain in one day. Come to my church to-morrow and give me an opportunity to repay the obligation."

They were turning a corner as Mr. Hanson spoke, and Hadley started as he observed Madeline Winters only a few paces ahead and coming toward them. He was also surprised by that strange, subtle, inexplicable perception that his companion was also agitated. He was still more surprised when, raising his own hat in courteous greeting, he saw Mr. Hanson do the like, uttering her name, as he did so, in his singularly sweet, musical tone. Hadley's curiosity was aroused. "Ah," he said, "you know Miss Winters?"

"Oh, yes; she is a member of my congregation. I formed her acquaintance about three months ago, when she first came to this city. But I am surprised to find that you are acquainted with her."

"Why, she was a class-mate of mine at college; we graduated the same time."

"Is that so?" said Hanson, turning a penetrating look upon Hadley, as if he meant to read his secret. Then he said: "She seems to be a noble girl."

They parted soon, each taking his own course. Hadley was ill at ease, "So he knows Miss Winters, and she is a member of his congregation! Why should that fact cause him to blush so when he met her? I wonder—well, I can't say that I am glad that he is acquainted with her. Of all men he—"

The sentence was left unfinished.

(To be continued.)

DEFEAT AT AI.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for November 4. Josh. 8:1-12. Golden Text, Ps. 119:36.

Sin Injurious to the Sinner's Surroundings as well as to the Sinner—Joshua Acts on his own Responsibility—Relies on the Report of the Spies—Small Spiritual Foes not to be Despised—May be Difficult to Overcome—Light Obtained through Humiliation and Prayer—Death may be Spiritual Deliverance—A Lesson on the Heinousness of Sin—Tainting all the Belongings—Purification Followed by Victory.

WHILE God deals with the people and carries out His own purposes, He does not forget the education of Joshua. In spite of His command (Josh. 6:18, 19), the children of Israel did commit a trespass in the devoted thing. The deed of one man who was disobedient, and who took for his own that which was devoted to the Lord, was sufficient to trouble and hinder the progress of the whole camp of Israel. We cannot too fully learn the lesson that "none of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself." (Rom. 14:7.) Our surroundings are affected by us more than we are aware. Without our speaking a word or doing a single thing which we imagine may affect other people, our very atmosphere, our very tenor of life, affects all with whom we come in contact. Probably Achan, when he appropriated the spoils from Jericho, thought that he alone was running the risk of God's displeasure. But "the anger of the Lord was kindled against (not Achan only, but) the children of Israel.

In an atmosphere of failure it is much easier to fail. Joshua, who had trusted God at the Jordan, yielded the supremacy to the Captain of the Lord's hosts, and acted second in all the steps of faith in the fall of Jericho, now acts

Without Waiting God's Instructions.

He sends men from Jericho to spy out the land. This is simply his own idea, a prudential manœuvre. Very naturally, the men who are sent return and give counsel, and God was ignored in the matter from first to last. But God did not, therefore, give up the generalship of Israel's hosts. Praise Him, He is wonderfully long-suffering; but He must teach a lesson both to Joshua and to the people. The spies discovered that Ai was but a small place, with few inhabitants, and they thought it was bad economy for all Israel to go up against it. Oh, if we saw the relative position of things, we should not forget that the smallest foe is as difficult to conquer as the greatest, without God. Only three thousand men went up against Ai, and they were discomfited, lost thirty-six of their number, and were smitten and driven back by their enemies. Was God fulfilling His promise, "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee!" If God's promise fails at one time, may it not also fail at another time? Oh, how many ask this question! Joshua at last did the right thing—he went to God, and fell upon his face before the ark of the Lord until the evening; and not he alone, but also the elders of Israel. In any case, he did not charge God with blame, or say that God makes exceptions, and that it cannot always be His will to fulfil His promises. He humbled himself before God, and took a listening attitude. Then God could speak. He cried, "Alas, O Lord God, wherefore hast Thou at all brought this people over Jordan, to deliver us into the hands of the Amorites, to cause us to perish? Would that we had been content, and dwelt beyond Jordan! O Lord, what shall I say, after that Israel hath turned their backs before their enemies!" And then he suggested that utter defeat must follow, and continued, "What wilt Thou do for Thy great name?" and God at once told him the reason of defeat, "Get thee up; wherefore art thou thus fallen upon thy face?"

Israel Hath Sinned.

Therefore the children of Israel cannot stand before their enemies, they turn their backs before their enemies, because they are become accursed. I will not be with you any more, except ye destroy the devoted thing from among you." (R. V.) And He goes on to tell Joshua in detail just how to deal with the matter. Many of us who take counsel with God, have not patience to get the details clear; we are too ready to go ahead at our own pace, and do not wait to keep step with God all the time. But Joshua, although he made mistakes, and was far from being perfect in his walk with God, was always ready to be instructed; he had an ear to hear God at all times.

He returned from the presence of the Lord with a distinct light upon the situation. "God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all." (1 John 1:5.) He went to proclaim among the people, "Sanctify yourselves against to-morrow; for thus saith the Lord, the God of Israel, there is a devoted thing in the midst of thee, O Israel; thou canst not stand before thine enemies until ye take away the devoted thing from among you." And then he announced that a solemn investigation would be made upon the morrow, tribe by tribe, family by family, man by man; "And it shall be that he that is taken with the devoted thing shall be burnt with fire, he and all that he hath: because he hath transgressed the covenant of the Lord, and because he hath wrought folly in Israel." "So Joshua Rose up Early in the Morning."

Nothing which the Lord commanded him was wrong in the eyes of Joshua; as soon as he knew the will of God, he hastened to do it. God loves this spirit. When a man calculates how much it will cost him to do the will of God, what people may think of it, what he may suffer in his own heart, etc., etc., he does not rise up early to do God's will. Many of the saints of old were early risers, and these were ready doers of the will of God. But was it not hastening Achan to his destruction? Let us look at it in another light. Was it not hastening the time when the devil's hold of Achan's soul should cease? It may be that it was with him as with him who is mentioned in 1 Cor. 5:5, that he should be delivered to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit might be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus. God loves souls more than any of us do; He may see that it is a kinder thing to let a man who has sinned, have the chance to confess his sin, and then to let him die, rather than live a longer life on earth. "God is Love"; and though we may not understand all His ways, let us at least trust Him.

When the time of trial arrived, the tribe of Judah and the family of Zerak were taken. It was coming near to Achan; how he must have trembled! At last, Achan was taken. It was no use to deny; by God's own test he had been singled out as the guilty one. Joshua said to him, "My son, give, I pray thee, glory to the Lord, the God of Israel, and unto Him; and tell me now what thou hast done; hide it not from me." Confession meant execution of the most terrible kind; denial was impossible. But oh, there was mercy in this bringing of the truth home to the sinner—anything is better than letting a sin lie on the sinner's conscience. "Achan answered Joshua, and said, Of a truth, I have sinned against the Lord, the God of Israel, and thus and thus have I done: when I saw among the spoil a goodly Babylonish mantle, and two hundred shekels of silver, and a wedge of gold of fifty shekels weight, then I coveted them, and took them; and, behold, they are hid in the earth in the midst of my tent, and the silver under it." Joshua sent to Achan's tent to verify his story, and, sure enough, it was as he had said. Would there be now forgiveness? No; the law could not forgive, the camp must be cleansed, and Achan must die. But how much more blessed must have been his death than if the unconfessed sin had gone before him to judgment; there was shame, there was anguish, in his death, but very probably we shall find Achan among the saved through the merits of a Saviour. Perhaps the most awful part of his doom was that his family was involved in it. Each of them had taken part in the sin because they had not made it known, and therefore they too must suffer. But oh, if he had not sinned, Israel might have been victorious, and his family as well as himself might have lived! One of the awful features of the present day is the making light of sin, and arguing that sins of temper, because inherited, are a misfortune instead of a sin, while sin itself has been inherited from our first parents. God shows us in this history how awful sin is in itself and in its consequences.

Make Confession

It was a solemn funeral procession which wended its way to the valley of Achor, Achan

Followed by his Sin,

"the mantle, the silver, and the wedges of gold—and then by his sons and his daughters (probably his wife was not living), then by his oxen, asses, sheep—the poor, innocent animals were tainted by belonging to a master who had sinned against the Lord; his very tent was contaminated, for it had harbored the devoted thing. All must perish with him. They arrive; Joshua says, "Why hast thou troubled us? The Lord shall trouble thee this day." Then all Israel who were present to witness God's judgment upon the offender, stoned them with stones, and burned them with fire, and a great heap of stones, such as we call a "cairn," was raised over the ashes to remind Israel in all ages of God's judgment against sin.

"And the Lord turned from the fierceness of His anger." The wrong was put right, and God resumed command again. His first words to Joshua were, "Fear not." It had appeared as though there were everything to cause him to fear. But when we are in touch with God, keeping step with Him, we have nothing to fear. "Fear not, . . . take all the people of war with thee, and arise, go up to Ai; see, I have given into thine hand the king of Ai, and his people, and his city, and his land." God's thoughts are not as our thoughts. God would have every man in Israel concerned in taking possession of the city which He gave them. They would obtain nothing by their own efforts anyway, whether by many or by few. But God did not repeat Himself, and make Ai another Jericho. God can do with or without military tactics. In this case He would employ them, and so directed Joshua to set an ambush against the city. He directed five thousand men to lie in ambush on the west of the city, while he with the remainder of his army made an attack from the north, and then made a feint of flying, as before, until Ai was emptied to pursue them; then the ambush arose, fired the city, and then destroyed all the inhabitants. Thus God redeemed His honor, and the honor of His people, as soon as they were right with Him, and the disgrace of their defeat was wiped away. Here Israel might take the spoil and the cattle, for God had received His first-fruits in Jericho.

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman (London), edited by the Rev. M. Baxter, may be had from the office of this journal, 63 Bible House, New York; price six cents, including postage. Annual subscription, seventy cents. The following articles, among others, are contained in the number for October:

The Nineteenth Century in the Light of Prophecy.
The Kingdom of Christ as Predicted by Daniel.
The literal Return of the Jews. By the Rev. Samuel H. Kellogg, D. D.
The Morning Star, the Sun of Righteousness, and the Everlasting Light. By the Rev. Canon Faussett.
The Rapture of the Saints, and the New Jerusalem.
The Scarlet Woman or the Church of Rome.
Rev. M. Baxter's Prophetic Lectures.
Railways and Prophecy. By W. Appleford.
The Seven Trumpets Explained in their past Year-day Historical Fulfilment.
Passing Events Viewed from a Prophetic Standpoint.

CHISEL-WORK.

'Tis the Master who holds the mallet,
And day by day
He is clipping whatever environs
The form away;
Which, under His skillful cutting,
He means shall be
Wrought silently out to beauty
Of such degree
Of faultless and full perfection,
That angel eyes
Shall look on the finished labor
With new surprise,
That even His boundless patience
Could grave His own
Features upon such fractured
And stubborn stone.

'Tis the Master who holds the chisel,
He knows just where
Its edge should be driven sharpest,
To fashion there
The semblance that He is carving;
Nor will He let
One delicate stroke too many,
Or few, be set
On forehead or cheek, where only
He sees how all
Is tending—and where the hardest
The blow should fall,
Which crumbles away whatever
Superfluous line
Would hinder His hand from making
The work Divine.

With tools of Thy choosing, Master,
I pray Thee then,
Strike just as Thou wilt, as often,
And where, and when,
The vehement stroke is needed;
I will not mind
If only Thy clipping chisel
Shall leave behind
Such marks of Thy wonderous working
And loving skill,
When discipline's hand are over,
Have all sufficed
To mould me into the likeness
And form of Christ.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike), will be sent post-paid, for 10 cts., or 100 for 20 cts. Postage stamps taken.

For Tired Brain
Use Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

Dr. O. C. STOUT, Syracuse, N. Y., says: "I gave it to one patient who was unable to transact the most ordinary business, because his brain was 'tired and confused' upon the least mental exertion. Immediate benefit, and ultimate recovery followed."

"The best thing yet!" That is the way a young man put it who made arrangements to work for B. F. Johnson & Co., Publishers, of Richmond, Va. You can get further information by dropping them a card.

The latest and best Imperial Photographs of Dr. Talmage and Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, with their fac-simile autograph, and also imperial photograph of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, can be obtained from J. E. Jewett, 77 Bible House, New York. Sent postpaid for twenty-five cents each. Postage stamps taken.

MEXICO

Contributions in aid of Christian work in Mexico are most pressingly needed, and can be mailed to the address of

BISHOP H. C. RILEY,
Care of J. P. HEATH,
43 Bible House, New York.

TO OUR CHRISTIAN FRIENDS:

As there is a regular monthly expense in connection with the work a regular monthly income is needed to meet that expense. We, therefore, specially ask for regular monthly contributions in its behalf. If many will each send a little every month, or quarter, or whenever they can, it will do great good Remember, every little helps.

H. CHAUNCEY BILEY.

WHAT EVERYONE WANTS.

Work for All. Large Profits to Agents. An illustrated card picture of the "Twenty-Third Psalm" sells in delicate coloring, and heavy gold border. The central picture is the Shepherd leading His flock. Everyone likes it. Single copies 2 cts.; three to 50 cts.; eight for $1.00. Lower prices for larger orders. Wm. P. Breck & Co., 59 John St., New York.

FEATHERS. The finest live white geese feathers in the country, 75 cts. per lb. Hair Mattresses made over for $2.50. Feathers cleansed & renovated. Pickford, 11 Nassau St., Brooklyn, N.Y.

ALONE WITH GOD:

STUDIES AND MEDITATIONS OF A SICK-ROOM.

By Rev. JOSEPH CROSS, D. D., LL. D.

READ THIS REVIEW.

"In singularly sweet and chaste language he gives expression to the thoughts which one who has long walked with God finds refreshing in hours of solitude. A strange, soothing, solemnizing influence comes over the spirit almost unconsciously as one reads these meditations, as if one were in the very presence of God. They breathe a spirit of simple, trusting faith, full of intelligence, as of one who says, 'I know in whom I have believed.' The section on 'The Christian surrendering his will,' and that on 'The Christian drawing nearer to Christ,' are especially beautiful. We can imagine no book of modern time more fitted for the sick-room or one more adapted to the condition of the Christian sufferer nearing the grave. It speaks of peace, of resignation, of acquiescence in the divine will, a calm loving trustfulness which few in the heyday of health and strength ever attain."—The Christian Herald.

SPECIAL OFFER.

Copies of this popular book, containing 324 pages, bound in rich cloth, will be mailed, postpaid, for $1, or copies with full gilt edges for $1.25. Send early and secure a copy of this excellent book.

THOMAS WHITTAKER, Pub'r,
2 and 3 Bible House, New York.

Ladies' American Housekeeping.
A Ladies' Home Journal.
"The Best Ladies' Magazine Published."

Full 20 pages with a handsome colored cover each month. Complete on all Home Subjects, COOKING, KITCHEN and DINING ROOM, HOME DECORATION, ART, FASHIONS, FANCY WORK, HINTS TO MOTHERS, HOME READING, BRIC-A-BRAC, Etc., Illustrated Serials by our best Authors. WOMEN'S WAR RECCOLLECTIONS is a New feature for a Ladies' Journal. Our Fashion Notes, prepared specially for us, give latest styles of Dress, Millinery, valuable suggestions for Amateurs. To anyone who will BEFORE JANUARY 15th, 1889, send us 50 CTS. to pay for one year's subscription to AMERICAN HOUSEKEEPING, we will send free, THE EVERY-DAY COOK BOOK, an Octavo Volume of nearly 400 pages—best tried receipts on Cooking, Pickling, Preserving, Etc., a complete Home Encyclopedia of practical receipts of all kinds, well bound in illuminated cover. This offer is made to introduce American Housekeeping in New Homes. SEND 50 CENTS FOR THE PAPER FOR ONE YEAR, and get the COOK BOOK (Price $1.00) FREE.

$1.00 Cook Book Free

American Housekeeping, Chicago, Ill.

BUNYAN'S PILGRIM'S PROGRESS
AND
THE HOLY WAR.

A New Large Type Edition, Illustrated, with Marginal Notes and References, printed from new plates, and beautifully bound in rich English muslin, with beveled edges and gilt back and side. This is the complete edition of the Pilgrim's Progress, The Holy War, and a Memoir of John Bunyan, all bound in one volume of over 700 pages. Price, $1.50, sent postpaid to any address on receipt of price.

J. E. JEWETT, 77 Bible House, N. Y.

For Gas

BAILEY'S COMPOUND Slight-spreading Silver-Plated CORRUGATED-GLASS REFLECTORS

A wonderful invention for Lighting Churches, Halls, etc. Handsome designs. Satisfaction guaranteed. Catalogue and price list free.

Bailey Reflector Co.
113 Wood st. Pittsburgh, Pa.

For Oil

ILLUSTRATIVE GATHERINGS

for Preachers and Teachers. ... al of Anecdotes Facts, Figures, Proverbs, Quo... &c., &c., adapted for Christian teaching. ... G. S. Bowes. Two series, 12 mo. ... "For variety, pertinency and availability ... edly superior to anything we have seen." ... Sent to any address free on ... above price. PERKINPINE & H... Arch St., Philadelphia, Pa.

$75.00 to $250 A MONTH can be made working for us. Agents preferred who can furnish a horse and give their whole time to the business. Spare moments may be profitably employed. A few vacancies in towns and cities. B. F. Johnson & Co., Pub'rs, 1009 Main St., Richmond, Va.

AGENTS WANTED to sell "The Child's Bible." Introduction by Bishop J. H. Vincent, D.D. The best selling book handled by agents. Recommended by all clergymen. Address Cassell & Co., B.E.S.D., 104 and 108 Fourth Ave., New York; 40 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

MORE MEN WANTED for local and traveling Salesmen. Good Pay. Address
E. E. RICHARDSON & CO.,
Nurserymen, Geneva, N. Y.

THE Non-such Professor in his Meridian Splendor; by the Rev. William Secker. 16mo, - - - - - - $1 25

"It is a mine of sparkling gems."—Presb. Observer.

"A sheaf of golden grain, ripened by grace, and sweet with the flavor of rare simplicity and holy wisdom."—N. Y. Observer.

GOSPEL SERMONS, by Dr. McCosh. $1 50

THE CREDENTIALS OF SCIENCE, by Prof. Cooke, - - - - - - - 1 75

THE HEATH IN THE WILDERNESS, by Dr. Richard Nowton. With Memoir and Portrait, - - - - - 1 50

TWO GIRLS ABROAD, by Nellie M. Carter, - - - - - - 1 00

FROM FLAX TO LINEN, by Mrs. Conklin, - - - - - - 1 50

ROBERT CARTER & BROTHERS,
530 Broadway, New York.

Any of the above sent by mail, postage prepaid on receipt of price.

WEIGHTS AND WINGS

By CHARLES F. DEEMS, D.D., LL.D.,

President of the American Institute of Christian Philosophy, Editor of "Christian Thought," Author of "The Home Altar," "What Now?" etc.

Square, 12 mo., cloth, 272 pp., $1.00

A book which will, by virtue of its practical import, command universal attention. It is full of brief, but sharp-arrowed articles on themes of the most practical import. It contains subjects and hints, full of fire and fervor, that are designed to make church members, true and tried co-operators with their pastors. The power of church members would be strengthened mightily by heeding the hints of this delightful book. Christian pastors will find it abundantly suggestive.

"Forty-five short talks, all founded on texts of the Bible, that members of a congregation are always to the pastor either weights or wings. The author gives excellent rules to be followed by all who profess and call themselves Christians."—Publisher's Weekly.

"A very handsome volume, whose contents are well worthy of the faultless dress in which the publisher has sent them forth. No professing Christian who reads it thoughtfully can remain in doubt as to whether his Church membership is a help or hindrance to his pastor—a 'weight or wing'—as he prosecutes his laborious and painfully responsible mission. The whole tendency of the book is to improve the relations of communicants to their pastors; and it would be remunerative to the latter to urge its circulation. There is a freshness and force about the forty-five chapters."—Southern Christian Advocate.

"The topics are all practical and thoroughly evangelical and full of genuine interest to the Christian ambitious for a more vigorous piety."—National Baptist.

"A series of bright and suggestive brief essays upon Christian duties, by one well and favorably known. The title tells the drift and aim of the volume, which is to urge Christians to lay aside every weight and to mount up with wings in the race upon which we enter at our conversion. Bright, kindly, and stimulating to more vigorous effort, and to more entire devotion of life, the book will attract readers, and cannot fail to benefit those who heed its counsels."—Episcopal Recorder.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher,
77 Bible House, New York.

New Musical Instrument.

10lbs. Boxed. AUTO-ORCAN 22 Reeds.

Plays Sacred Music, Popular Airs, Operas, etc. Especially adapted for the Home Circle. Catalogue of 342 pieces. AGENTS WANTED in every town, large commissions, best selling musical instrument. For special terms to Agents and descriptive Catalogue address L. A. BARBER & CO., Groton, N. Y.

BAGSTER Comprehensive Teachers' Bibles.

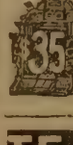
With New Helps, New Concordance, Index of Proper Names, Duplicate References, Four colored Maps, Numerous Illustrations, Etc. Styles and prices to suit all purchasers. Sold by all booksellers, or D. Appleton & Co., 1, 3 & 5 Bond St., New York, Agents.



UNIVERSITY ORGANS.—Three Stops Two Sets Reeds—$35 to $40. Sold Direct to Families. No Middlemen. Solid Walnut—5 Octaves—Double Couplers. Guaranteed for Six Years and sent on trial. $35 with Stool and Book, for TRIAL IN YOUR OWN HOME BEFORE YOU BUY. ESTABLISHED 1859. MARCHAL & SMITH, 235 East 21st Street, New York.

TEAS LADIES Send at once for our new terms. THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO., 31 and 33 Vesey St., New York, N. Y.

Estey Organ Co.
BRATTLEBORO VT.
ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE SENT FREE

NEW ENLARGED EDITION.

Encouragements to Faith.

207 Pages. Cloth. Price 75 Cents.

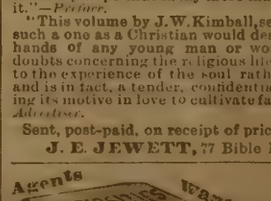
The Rev. ANDREW MURRAY, in his popular "Abide in Christ," has mentioned this book as specially to be recommended for young, weak, doubting Christians.

Here is a warm hand and a loving heart ten... you, in the name of the Lord, from one who barbo... doubts, and would gladly help you to break away ... them. This book has greatly helped many Chris... to a stronger faith in the blessed Lord Jesu... earnestly hope that in any more may be benefit... it."—Preacher.

"This volume by J. W. Kimball, seems to be pre... such a one as a Christian would desire to put int... hands of any young man or woman troubled ... doubts concerning the religious life. It has refe... to the experience of the soul rather than the ... and is in fact, a tender, confidential exhortation ... ing its motive in love to cultivate faith in God."—Advertiser.

Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price.

J. E. JEWETT, 77 Bible House, New Y...



Pertaining ... sens, Plac... Things, wi... Bible St... Concert I... Prayer-M... Topics, ... etc. Intro... by J. H... cent, D... pages. By mail, $2. Immensely popular. Also new book, BOW IN THE CLOUD, or ... of Comfort, etc., by 200 Best Authors, $1.5...

WOMEN'S HAND-BOOK. $2. A lady wanted in every town to introduce it. Quick Sales. Big Pay. Add... E. B. TREAT, Publisher, 771 Broadway

---

PRINTING PRESS Book of Type, 5c. PRESS CIRCU... Amateur Printers' Guide Book, 15c. JOSEPH WA... 19 Murray S...

Samples of Scrap Pictures ... Cards, 10 cents

"Demonology or Spiritual... Ancient and Modern."—"An effective weapon ... sword of fire."—"Only unanswerable work ... subject."—"Startling disclosures.—History ... data.—Scores saved already. Whole comm... rescued. Every family, preacher and christian ... needs one. 310 pp. 12mo. cloth. Price reduc... Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price. ... J. E. JEWETT, 77 Bible House, New ...

The New England Medical Month...
—"WALES' INVIS... SOUND DISC ... by practical deaf-mutes and ranks all other devices ... aged. Concentrating the ... waves on the drum head. ... sibilities are indeed very ... For sale only by the I... H. A. WALES, Bridgeport, ...

In all the world there is but one OPIUM Habit. The Dr. J. L. ... Remedy never fail... cure for the other treatments ... We have cured more than 10,000 cases. ... ever cured one case. $50 PAY TILL CURED. ... this, and write to the J. L. Stephens Co., Lebanon

ALL BOOKS at Wholesale to members. Book Buyer's ... Membership free. AGENTS WANTED ... members. Send 2c. stamp for catalogue and ... tion to R. H. Woodward & Co., Baltimo...

New Catalogue. Now R...

BEFORE YOU BUY ANY BOOKS FOR ...

SUNDAY-SCHOOL LIBRA...

Send to me for a full Catalogue of the cheap... best Sunday-School Books ever offered, and ... SPECIAL OFFER TO SUNDAY-SC...

Satisfaction guaranteed or money refunde...

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and ...
77 Bible House, New Yo...

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1888, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.

Vol. XI., No. 44. Office, 63 Bible House, N. Y. THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1888. Price, 3 Cents. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

PORTRAIT OF THE LATE MAJOR BARTTELOT, THE LIEUTENANT OF MR. H. M. STANLEY

THE DIVINE MISSION OF PICTURES. Dr. Talmage' Sermon Last Sunday Morning.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

NOTES OF THE RECENT PROPHETIC CONFERENCE IN EDINBURGH.

Ladies Learning in Japan—The Effect of a Kiss in a Prison—Mr. Arnot in Africa—A Cure for Insomnia—A Drunkard's Promise.

NO COMPROMISE. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

THE LONDON PROPHETIC CONVENTION.

Gems from New Books: An Answer to Peter—A Daring Life-Boat Captain.

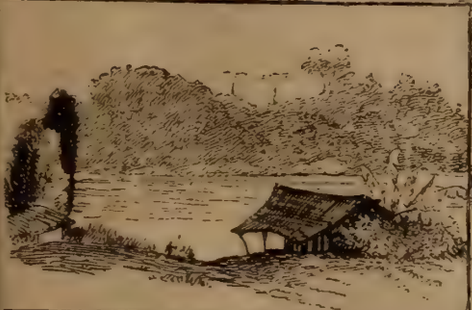
PICTURE OF A SCENE ON THE BANKS OF THE SUSQUEHANNA.

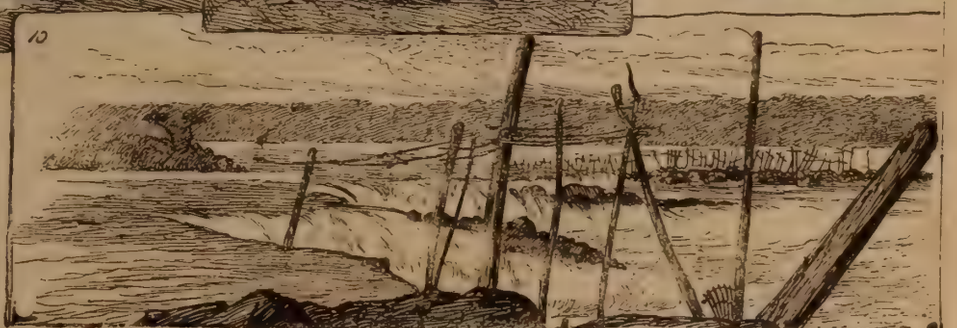
PORTRAIT OF HON. ROBERT B. ROOSEVELT, U. S. Minister to the Hague.

ELLA'S PICTURE. (With Illustration.)

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE. A New Serial Story by Rev. L. S. Keyser. (Continued.)

CALEB'S INHERITANCE. By Mrs. M. Baxter.





The Late Major EDMUND W. BARTTELOT, Murdered on the Congo—Sketches in the Congo Country.

MAJOR EDMUND M. BARTTELOT.

Mr. H. M. Stanley's Murdered Lieutenant.

MENTION has already been made in our news columns, of the death of Major Barttelot, who was murdered in Africa, as he was setting out for the relief of Mr. H. M. Stanley. We are now enabled to give on the first page of this issue, his portrait and a few illustrations connected with the district he was in when he died.

When Stanley was setting out for the relief of Emin Pasha, whose portrait and life appeared in this journal on March 24, 1887, he chose as his chief lieutenant, Major Barttelot, an officer in the British Army, who had seen active service in Egypt and Afghanistan. The major was a man of good family, courageous, energetic, and reputed shrewdness. He was born in 1859, and was, therefore, under thirty years old when he died. He accompanied Stanley to Africa in January 1887, and was village near the Aruwhimi Falls, which was the most advanced station on Stanley's route. Here he remained in charge of supplies and ammunition, while Mr. Stanley pressed on, with such loads as he had bearers to carry, toward Wadelai, where he expected to meet Emin. He carried with him considerable ammunition of which Emin represented himself in need, and expected either to assist him in maintaining his position, or to help him in effecting a retreat, but in any case to relieve his immediate wants. Major Barttelot, was to await orders from Stanley or upon obtaining bearers, to proceed after Stanley.

Left at Yambuya

The Leave Taking

of the two brave men at Yambuya, was their final parting. The letter in which Mr. Stanley conferred the command on his trusted associate and friend, has a melancholy interest in the circumstances of the present report. Mr. Stanley, after a warm tribute to the personal qualities of his subordinate, proceeded to give him the most minute instructions for the fortification of the camp, and for the organization of a troop to defend it. For himself, he said, his course would be true east, or by magnetic compass east-by-south. "Certain marches that we may take," said Stanley, "may not exactly lead us in the direction aimed at; nevertheless in the south-western corner of Lake Albert, near or at Kavalli, that is our destination."

For a weary year Major Barttelot waited and watched at his post, and when, in April last, reports began to arrive, through deserters, that disaster had befallen Mr. Stanley and that the explorer was reduced to serious straits, he determined to organise a great expedition for the purpose of following his chief's track, and, if possible, of taking him relief. Major Barttelot accordingly, with the help of Tippoo Tib, the Governor of Stanley Falls, organized a party of some six hundred men, including two white men, Mr. Jameson, and Mr. Bonny, and over one hundred trained and armed Zanzibaris. In Major Barttelot's last report he speaks highly of the head Arab, Muni Somai. But sinister reports of the characteristics of the Manyemas had reached him. Sir Francis de Winton writes that "the Manyema are a tribe considerably to the South, from which, no doubt, Tippoo Tib obtained a supply or porters or carriers to fulfil the contract he entered into with Mr. Stanley. They are a wild tribe, and attempted Livingstone's life on more than one occasion, when he was between Tanganyike and Nyangwe."

It would appear that there were endless delays in getting Tippoo Tib, the Arab trader, whom Stanley had made governor of the region, to fulfil his contract by providing Barttelot with seven hundred carriers. That may have been due to a prejudice excited against Tippoo Tib himself by his alliance with the Europeans. In any case, whether Tippoo Tib could not or would not furnish the carriers promptly, he did not, and Barttelot after waiting a year, had to start with a smaller number of inferior men. He was doubtless, prompted to accept the compromise by the reports of Mr. Stanley's extremity, which continued to reach him, and which have not yet been contradicted. Barttelot left Yambuya Village in April of this year. He proceeded on Stanley's tracks and had reached a place stated to be about thirty-nine days journey from Yambuya by July 19. There

He Was Killed.

It seems, from the reports received of the catastrophe, that Barttelot had been much annoyed by Manyemas practising singing and drumming early in the morning and in the evening, and threatened to stop the practice. On July 19, early in the morning, in spite of Bonny's efforts to dissuade him, he proceeded alone to the drummer's tent. Shortly afterward a shot was heard, and Bonny, running out, found the camp in a state of excitement and heard shouts of "The white man is dead!" Barttelot's body was found lying before the drummer's tent. His breast had been pierced by a bullet and his clothes were burned by gunpowder.

Jameson, who was with the advance guard, heard of Barttelot's death the next day and immediately returned, but the natives had already dispersed, after stealing the stores. Jameson then proceeded to Stanley Falls, leaving Bonny in charge of Camp Aruwhimi. The murderer was discovered and was sent to Stanley Falls, where he was hanged. Mr. Jameson was seized with fever on his journey, and he, too, is dead.

The account represents Tippoo Tib as being grieved at the death of Barttelot. He said he would have given half his fortune to prevent the murder. He also said that both he and the officers at the Falls had often warned Barttelot against the danger of using harshness toward the natives. Tippoo Tib, the telegram goes on to say, with Baert, a Belgian, has started on a four months' expedition for the purpose of exploring the country south of Kassongo and establishing stations therein. He has also sent parties of men to the north, in the hope of hearing some news of Stanley. It is, however, regarded as impossible to organize another relief expedition, unless the Government sends a large and carefully officered force, which even then would have to encounter gigantic obstacles, and would have to depend on native assistance, which is evidently untrustworthy in the extreme.

INCIDENTS OF THE EXPEDITION.

YAMBUYA, which was the weary waiting-place of Major Barttelot and his company for over a year, was visited by Mr. Stanley in 1883. He appears to have formed a bad opinion of its inhabitants. In his work on the Congo (published by Messrs. Harper & Brothers), he says: "On the left bank of the river were seen a number of villages, all the huts of which seemed to be of the sharp, conical form [as seen in illustration No. 6 on first page]. We formed a camp about two miles below the rapids [shown in illustrations Nos. 3 and 10] on the right bank, at sight of which, the natives of the villages across made a terrible racket with their drums. Yumbila [Mr. Stanley's guide] was urged to try to start a conversation, the effect of which was that the drumming was silenced, and for nearly an hour the creatures kept bawling across the river, one to another, puerile information relative to bananas and goats. Yumbila, always hungry, clamored to the aborigines to bring food to sell for beads. The natives as loudly denied that they possessed any. We went across in the whale-boat next morning to attempt to obtain the good-will of the natives of Yambuya, but after an hour's effort we were compelled to desist. I fear that they were such consummate actors that not much reliance can be placed on any information given to us, since while they gave us numerous names of places, they never mentioned, for instance, that their own village was Yambuya, but declared it to be Ngondé.

A reporter who accompanied the expedition sends sketches of three specimens of the Babulu. Wasongolo tribe [reproduced in panel No. 4 of first page], who must have been by no means agreeable companions for a long sojourn in camp. He also sends a portrait of a woman of Aruwimi Falls [panel No. 8]. The hut in which the correspondent lived is depicted in panel No. 7. The curious receptacles in panel No. 9 are palm-oil pots, which show that the aborigines have some knowledge of pottery, and also are not without taste in matters of graceful form. To make the miseries of the expedition worse the same correspondent reports which was made by some of its members, and which confirmed a suspicion long held by African travellers. He says that the practice of cannibalism is common among the tribes. Mr. Stanley himself had not been altogether explicit in his evidence one way or the other, although the alleged Soko or chimpanzee skulls which he sent to Professor Huxley, as his readers will remember, turned out to be human. Whatever they were, the natives of the village where Stanley found them, confessed they had eaten the bodies, which they called "Wajimi meat." It is only quite recently that the truth has come out. Stanley suspected it. He offered large rewards for a specimen of a "Soko," alive or dead. He saw plenty of skulls of the creature, but could procure no other evidence. This was at a village above Stanley Falls. It is now pretty well understood that these trophies must have been the remains of human beings. Cannibalism exists in the great basin of the Congo, on sundry of its tributaries, and was active in the neighborhood of the camp at Aruwhimi.

A Revolting Discovery,

On Sunday, February 26, 1888, he says: "I went this morning to Nassibu's Camp, which is situated about an hour's march from our camp on the Falls (Aruwhimi). He received me with much ceremony, and, at my request, drummed to the natives, who were in two clearings at the back of his camp. A number came, and went through the usual demonstrations of surprise at seeing a white man. Among them were about a dozen young women, with pleasing countenances. I selected a man as a model for myself, but it was very difficult to induce him to stand still while I sketched him.

"Almost the first man I saw was carrying four

Lumps of Human Flesh

(with the skin on) on a stick, and through Fida I found they had killed a man this morning and had divided the flesh. She took me over to a house where some half-dozen men were squatting, and showed me more meat on sticks in front of a fire; it was frizzling and the yellow fat was dripping from it, whilst all around was a strong odor which reminded me of the smell given out by grilled elephant meat. It was not yet the general meal-time, they told me, but one or two of the natives cut off pieces of the frizzling flesh and ate it and laughed at Majuta, who, being disgusted, held his nose and backed into the bush. I spoke with the natives through Fida, and they told me from what parts the meat was cut. One tall, sturdy native was quietly leaning against a tree and picking off pieces of flesh from a thigh bone, with relish. Other dainty joints were grilling at the fire.

The Dreary Waiting

is awful—waiting for what never comes! Day after day passes; we see no fresh faces, we hear no news. Many of our men are daily growing thinner and weaker, and are dying off. Poor wretches! they lie out in the sun, on the dusty ground, most of them with only a narrow strip of dirty loin-cloth; and all the livelong day they stare into vacancy, and at night gaze at a bit of fire. It was a pitiable sight, a few days ago to see an emaciated skeleton crawl, with the aid of a stick, after a corpse that was being carried on a pole for interment. He staggered along, poor chap, and squatted down alongside the newly-made grave and watched the proceedings with large, round, sunken eyes, knowing that it would only be a matter of a few days and he himself would be a dead man. He told me in a husky voice, 'Amekwa rapiki angu' (he was my friend). Another poor fellow is a mass of bones, yet persists in doing his work, and every evening staggers into camp. He has been told to lay up, and that his manioc shall be provided for him, but he refuses, and in replying to my sympathetic remark that he was very thin, he said, 'Yes, only a short time more, master.' Death is written in his face, and just as plainly in the faces of many others in this camp. Almost as many lives, I fear, will be lost in this philanthropic mission as there are lives of Emin Bey's people to save."

The Unknown Difficulties

which Mr. Stanley must have encountered are sufficiently demonstrated by the known difficulties which have beset his followers in a region which had become familiar to them, and under the express cognisance of Stanley's Arab ally Tippoo Tib. If this gentleman and his officers have been so remiss in the fulfilment of their undertakings, almost within easy reach of settled Congo stations, what may have happened to Stanley in the wilderness, is full of painful possibilities. Major Barrtelot lost his life in endeavoring to organize a party to follow his leader. Mr. Jameson has succumbed to fever, probably induced by anxiety and worry in the same direction. The obstacles in the path of an advance towards Wadelai must be enormous. The dangers, while they have in some respects been reduced by the Arab alliance, have in other ways been increased by it. The Arabs harass the natives, and plunder them of ivory and slaves. The natives everywhere seek reprisals on the Arabs; it must be a difficult thing for the native mind to discriminate between Stanley's people and their Arab allies.

The Slave Trade,

the suppression of which it was hoped Mr. Stanley's mission might help to promote, is, it appears, still flourishing and increasing. In addition to the reports which come from Europe carried there by missionaries and explorers, the members of Major Bartelot's company send appalling details of scenes of slaughter which they witnessed, ending in the carrying off of large bands of captives into slavery. The question has frequently been raised as to the destination of these wretched beings, since the chief ports are now in the hands of European powers. A daily journal of New York has been investigating the subject, and it asserts that the majority of them are actually worked to death in Africa itself, the frightful mortality requiring a continually fresh supply. The Arabs and the native chiefs, who encourage their crimes, now absorb the greater part of the new supplies of slaves. The Arabs employ many thousands of these slaves in cultivating the large plantations they have started for three hundred miles along the Congo, between that river and Lake Tanganyika, and the lake and the Indian Ocean.

They no longer engage Zanzibar porters to carry their trade goods into the country and their ivory to the sea, but great slave caravans, often numbering over a thousand souls, now perform these services. While many native chiefs are associated with the Arabs in the business of slave catching, many others gladly exchange their ivory for slaves; and by far the larger part of the field labor and the household drudgery is now performed by slaves.

Within the past two years, the British having relaxed their vigilance in guarding the coast, there has been a partial revival of the export trade. The number of slaves who have been smuggled into Arabia has been insignificant, but of late there has been a large increase of the traffic between the east coast and Madagascar.

A few years ago, when the east coast export slave trade was almost unimpeded, it was easy to see what became of the unfortunates who were driven from the far interior to the sea. Consul Holmwood said that in 1874 1,000 slaves a month passed through the port of Mombasa alone. Captain Elton confirmed these figures, and added that in that year 30,000 slaves were exported from the various ports controlled by the Sultan of Zanzibar. There is reason to hope that the agitation of the question now going on in Europe, may stir up public opinion and lead to pressure being brought to bear on European governments to make them more vigilant to at least prevent the export of slaves.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Christian at a Fair.—Mr. Hamilton says: "A Christian once met a friend at a fair, and somehow he felt it impressed upon his mind that he should speak to him about his soul, but thinking that a fair, with all its noise and bustle, was a most unsuitable place for the purpose, he put it off to a more convenient season. What must have been his feelings when he heard that his friend, returning that night from the fair, had been thrown from his horse and killed. He had the warning that might have saved him, and he neglected to give it. If God puts the sinner in your way, my Christian friend, it is your duty to speak to him at that instant; you know not but that the next moment he may be beyond the reach of your ministrations forever."

Refusing to Sing a Lie.—Mr. W. A. Campbell observes: "One of my dearest friends was brought to Christ while singing the hymn beginning, 'Just as I am, without one plea.' He had sung the first two verses right through, but when he came to the end of the third verse, 'Because Thy promise I believe, oh Lamb of God, I come.' He stopped short. 'No,' he said, 'I cannot sing that. It is not true. I will not sing a lie. I have not believed His promise.' The singing went on, 'Just as I am, Thy love unknown, has broken every barrier down.' In a moment the great love of God came before his eyes. He felt his heart fill with love and gratitude to Him who had given His Son for poor sinners; and there and then he joined in, and sung with truth from his heart, 'Now to be Thine, yea Thine alone, O Lamb of God, I come.' We can make our hymns prayers; we can accept Christ in singing a metrical hymn just as truly as by getting down upon our knees."

Suddenly Called Away.—An Evangelist Relates: "There was a young lad in a warehouse in which I am engaged, who left his work quite well at six o'clock one evening, and went home and had his tea as usual. Afterwards he joined the family circle, and seemed in the same condition of health and spirits as usual. About half-past eight he fell ill, and at nine he was dead. In the Sunday-school of which I am superintendent, a young fellow went the other week from the school, and did not feel altogether well. On Monday morning he was not yet all right, and about ten o'clock set out to see a friend who lived not a stone's throw from his own home. He arrived there, and when entering the room, seemed rather weak. He seated himself, and asked the lady for a glass of water. The lady brought it herself, and as he took it he said, 'I am dying; I know it, I feel it.' The lady at once sent for his mother, and when she arrived it was scarcely half-past ten, not half an hour since her son had left her, and now she stood by his dead body. Oh, young men, count not on the morrow. Take Christ now while you have the opportunity. Christ is holding out His hands in tenderest pity to you, asking you to accept Himself. Will you do so?"

The Twine Under the Thumb-nail.—A minister relates: "A few months after my ordination, I was invited to spend an evening at the house of a parishioner. Among the company was an old gentleman named Mr Ford. When we had tea the most of us gathered round the table, and began to speak about various passages of Holy Scripture. But I was grieved to see, while the majority of the company was thus profitably employed, this old man, seated on the sofa with a number of young ladies around him, engaged in a conversation of a decidedly frivolous and flippant nature. A few days afterward, meeting my rector casually in the street, he asked me if I had heard that Mr. Ford was very ill. While he had been engaged in his office, tying a parcel, the twine had slipped under his thumb-nail and forced it up. Inflamation had set in, which rapidly extended to the hand, and then to the arm, so that great fears were entertained for his life. I hastened to his house, and was immediately shown into the sick-room. As he recognized me he faintly said: 'Ah, it is you, sir; I did not expect to meet you this way.' I sat down and read the Gospel to him, and after a few words of conversation and prayer, left him. He was too weak even to listen. In a few hours that man was in the presence of God. Oh, how he would regret, whether saved or lost, the time he had given to frivolous conduct, to the prejudice of his own salvation and that of others whose attention he diverted from the things of God."

The One Afraid of the Other.—Mr. Climie relates: "I remember two girls, who lived near a place in which I was preaching. One of their friends had been converted, and she often tried to persuade them to come to the meetings, but they refused; they feared if they came they would be converted, and they did not want that. By-and-bye, however, one of the girls who was only on a visit to the other, had to return to her own home; and they both thought they would go to the meeting just for once; there could not be much danger in that. They went. The earnest words of the speaker that night were directed by the Holy Spirit straight to the hearts of both, but neither would show what was in her heart for fear her companion might laugh. Next day, the friends parted, and the one now left in freedom came back to our meeting, and gave her heart to Jesus. About a week afterward the new convert was surprised to see her friend walk into her house. She had not been able to obtain an hour's peace since she left her, and had come back to try and find the Saviour. Her friend brought her to the meeting, when I had the privilege of pointing her to Christ, whom she gladly embraced."

Maggie's Message to her Father.—Mr. Stewart remarks: "A little girl, whose mother was dead, was obliged to live alone with her father, a confirmed drunkard. When the man was in his sober senses, there could not be a kinder or more indulgent father, and often in his fits of remorse he would call his little daughter to him and, looking into her face, the image of her dead mother, he would say, 'Maggie, you have a bad father.' But Maggie always interrupted him with, 'No, father, you are not bad, it is the drink that is bad. Oh, father dear, if you would give up the drink we should be so happy!' Little Maggie fell ill. For weeks she lay upon her bed, her life slowly ebbing away. Her father saw how ill she was, and knew that soon he would lose his child, but still he could not resist spending his earnings in the saloon. As the father stood by the bed one evening, she slipped her wan hand into his own, and said, 'Father, you might stay with me just for this one night!' He promised. The girl fell asleep with her hand still clasped in his. The time went on. A knock was heard at the door. It was two of the man's companions, who had come for him, and in a few moments he was gone. The girl awoke, asked for her father, and was told by a kind neighbor who was in the room, that he was out, but she would send for him. 'No,' was the reply, 'he is too late to see me die; but tell him not to be too late in coming to Jesus.' Soon afterward the drunkard reeled home. As he entered the room, one glance sobered him; he saw that his child was dead. Her last message was given him. He had not complied with her first request that night, but he would with her last; and he did come to Jesus. Her death was the birth of her father's soul."

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman (London), edited by the Rev. M. Baxter, may be had from the office of this journal, 63 Bible House, New York; price six cents, including postage. Annual subscription, seventy cents. The following articles, among others, are contained in the number for October:

The Nineteenth Century in the Light of Prophecy.
The Kingdom of Christ as Predicted by Daniel.
The literal Return of the Jews. By Dr. Kellogg.
The Morning Star, the Sun of Righteousness, and the Everlasting Light. By the Rev. Canon Faussett.
The Rapture of the Saints, and the New Jerusalem.
The Scarlet Woman or the Church of Rome.
Rev. M. Baxter's Prophetic Lectures.
Railways and Prophecy. By W. Appleford.
The Seven Trumpets Explained.
Passing Events Viewed from a Prophetic Standpoint.

THE DIVINE MISSION OF PICTURES.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday Morning, October 28, 1888.

"The day of the Lord of Hosts shall be . . . upon all pleasant pictures." Isa. 2 : 12, 16.

God Scrutinizing Pictures—The Art Sometimes Degraded—The Bad Pictures of Pompeii—A Worse Crater than Vesuvius—Other Arts Bedraggled—Pictures in the Family Bible—Famous Pictures of Bible Scenes—Benefits from Dore's Bible Illustrations—Vandalism in Pictures—A Painter's Itemized Bill—The Sufferings of Poverty-Stricken Artists—Picture-Galleries Needed for the Cities—An Opportunity for Millionaires—Cardinal Mazarin's Last Walk—A Warning to Parents—Pictures Suggesting Immorality—A Universal Language—Christ's Sermons Were Picture-Galleries—A Picture on the Wall of a Cell—The Blind Man at the Cyclorama.

PICTURES are by some relegated to the realm of the trivial, accidental, sentimental, or worldly, but my text shows that God scrutinizes pictures, and whether they are good or bad, whether used for right or wrong purposes, is a matter of Divine observation and arraignment.

The divine mission of pictures is my subject.

That the artist's pencil and the engraver's knife have sometimes been made subservient to the kingdom of the bad is frankly admitted. After the ashes and scoria were removed from Herculaneum and Pompeii, the walls of those cities discovered to the explorers a which cannot be exaggerated. Satan and all his imps have always wanted the fingering of the easel; they would rather have possession of that than the art of printing, for types are not so potent and quick for evil as pictures. The powers of darkness think they have gained a triumph, and they have, when in some respectable parlor or public art gallery they can hang a canvas embarrassing to the good but fascinating to the evil.

Degradation in Art

It is not in a spirit of prudery, but backed up by God's eternal truth, when I say that you have no right to hang in your art rooms or your dwelling-houses that which would be offensive to good people if the figures pictured were alive in your parlor and the guests of your household. A picture that you have to hang in a somewhat secluded place, or that in a public hall you cannot with a group of friends deliberately stand before and discuss, ought to have a knife stabbed into it at the top and cut clear through to the bottom, and a stout finger thrust in on the right side ripping clear through to the left. Pliny the elder lost his life by going near enough to see the inside of Vesuvius, and the further you can stand off from the burning crater of sin the better. Never till the books of the Last Day are opened shall we know what has been the dire harvest of evil pictorials and unbecoming art galleries. Despoil a man's imagination and he becomes a moral carcass. The show-windows of English and American cities, in which the low theatres have sometimes hung long lines of brazen actors and actresses in style insulting to all propriety, have made for multitudes of people. But so have all the other arts been at times suborned of evil. How has music been bedraggled? Is there any place so low down in dissoluteness that into it has not been carried David's harp, and Handel's organ, and Gottschalk's piano, and Ole Bull's violin? and the flute, which though named after so insignificant a thing as the Sicilian eel, which has seven spots on the side like flute holes, yet for thousands of years has had an exalted mission? Architecture, born in the heart of Him who made the worlds, under its arches and across its floors, what bacchanalian revelries have been enacted! It is not against any of these arts that they have been so led into captivity!

A Broad Path to Death

What a poor world this would be if it were not for what my text calls "pleasant pictures"! I refer to your memory and mine when I ask if your knowledge of the Holy Scriptures has not been mightily augmented by the woodcuts or engravings in the old family Bible, which father and mother read out of, and laid on the table in the old homestead when you were boys and girls. The Bible scenes which we all carry in our minds were not gotten from the Bible typology, but from the Bible Pictures.

To prove the truth of it in my own case, the other day I took up the old family Bible, which I inherited. Sure enough, what I have carried in my mind of Jacob's ladder was exactly the Bible engraving of Jacob's ladder; and so with Samson carrying off the gates of Gaza; Elisha restoring the Shunamite's son; the massacre of the innocents; Christ blessing little children; the Crucifixion, and the Last Judgment. My idea of all these is that of the old Bible engravings which I scanned before I could read a word. That is true with nine-tenths of you. If I could swing open the door of your foreheads I would find that you are walking picture-galleries. The great intelligence abroad about the Bible did not come from the general reading of the book, for the majority of the people read it but little, if they read it at all; but have been put before the great masses, and not printer's ink, but the pictorial art, must have the credit of the achievement. First, painter's pencil for the favored few, and then engravers' plate or woodcut for millions on millions!

All the Sacred Scenes

What overwhelming commentary on the Bible, what reinforcement for patriarchs, prophets, apostles, and Christ, what distribution of Scriptural knowledge of all nations, in the paintings and engravings therefrom of Holman Hunt's "Christ in the Temple"; Paul Veronese's "Magdalen Washing the Feet of Christ"; Raphael's "Michael the Archangel"; Albert Durer's "Dragon of the Apocalypse"; Michael Angelo's "Plague of the Fiery Serpents"; Tintoret's "Flight into Egypt"; Rubens' "Descent from the Cross"; Leonardo Da Vinci's "Last Supper"; Claude's "Queen of Sheba"; Bellini's "Madonna at Milan"; Orcagna's "Last Judgment"; and hundreds of miles of pictures, if they were put in line, illustrating, displaying, dramatizing, irradiating Bible truths until the Scriptures are not to-day so much on paper as on canvas, not so much in ink as in all the colors of the spectrum. In 1833, forth from Strasburg, Germany, there came a child that was to eclipse in speed and boldness and grandeur anything and everything that the world had seen since the first color appeared on the sky at the creation,

Paul Gustav Dore.

At eleven years of age he published marvellous lithographs of his own. Saying nothing of what he did for Milton's "Paradise Lost," emblazoning it on the attention of the world, he takes up the Book of Books, the monarch of literature, the Bible, and in his pictures "The Creation of Light," "The Trial of Abraham's Faith," "The Burial of Sarah," "Joseph Sold by his Brethren," "The Brazen Serpent," "Boaz and Ruth," "David and Goliath," "The Transfiguration," "The Marriage in Cana," "Babylon Fallen," and two hundred and five Scriptural scenes in all, with a boldness and a grasp and almost supernatural afflatus that make the heart throb and the brain reel and the tears start and the cheeks blanch and the entire nature quake with the tremendous things of God and eternity and the dead. I actually staggered down the steps of the London Art Gallery, under the power of Doré's "Christ Leaving the Practorium." Profess you to be a Christian man or woman, and see no divine mission in art, and acknowledge you no obligation either in thanks to God or man?

It is no more the word of God when put before us in printer's ink, than by skilful laying on of colors, or designs on metal through incision or corrosion. What a lesson in morals was presented by Hogarth, the painter, in his two pictures, "The Rake's Progress," and "The Miser's Feast," and by Thomas Cole's engravings of the "Voyage of Human Life," and the "Course of Empire," and by Turner's "Slave Ship." God in art! Christ in art! Patriarchs, prophets and apostles in art! Angels in art! Heaven in art!

Neglected Painters.

The world and the church ought to come to the higher appreciation of the divine mission of pictures, yet the authors of them have generally been left to semi-starvation. West, the great painter toiled in unappreciation till, being a great skater, while on the ice he formed the acquaintance of General Howe, of the English army, and through coming to admire West as a skater, who gradually came to appreciate as much that which he accomplished by his hand as by his heel. Poussin, the mighty painter, was pursued, and had nothing with which to defend himself against the mob but the artist's portfolio, which he held over his head to keep off the stones hurled at him. The pictures of Richard Wilson, of England, were sold for fabulous sums of money after his death, but the living painter was glad to get for his "Alcyone" a piece of Stilton cheese.

From 1640 to 1643 there were 4,600 pictures wilfully destroyed. In the reign of Queen Elizabeth it was the habit of some people to spend much of their time in knocking pictures to pieces. In the reign of Charles the First it was ordered by Parliament that all pictures of Christ be burnt. Painters were so badly treated and humiliated in the beginning of the eighteenth century that they were lowered clear down out of the sublimity of their art, and obliged to give accounts of what they did with their colors, as which came to publication in Scotland in 1707 indicated. The painter had been touching up some old pictures in the church, and he sends in this itemized bill to the vestry: "To filling up a chink in the Red Sea and repairing the damages to Pharaoh's hosts"; "to a new pair of hands for Daniel in the Lion's den, and a new set of teeth for the lioness"; "to repairing Nebuchadnezzar's beard"; "to giving a blush to the cheek of Eve on presenting the apple to Adam"; "to making a bridle for the Good Samaritan's horse, and mending one of his legs"; "to putting on a new handle on Moses' basket, and fitting bulrushes, and adding more fuel to the fire in Nebuchadnezzar's furnace." So painters were humiliated clear down below the majesty of their art. The oldest picture in England, a portrait of Chaucer, though now of great value, was picked out of a lumber garret. Great were the trials of Quentin Matsys, who toiled on from blacksmith's anvil till, as a painter, he won wide recognition. The first missionaries to Mexico made the fatal mistake of destroying pictures, for the loss of which art and religion must ever lament. But why go so far back when in this year of our Lord, 1888, and within twelve years of the twentieth century, to be a painter, except in rare exceptions, means poorly fed, poorly clad, poorly housed, because poorly appreciated! When I hear a man is a painter, I have two feelings—one of admiration for the greatness of his soul, and the other of commiseration for the needs of his body.

A Painter's Bill

Poverty and Neglect?

But so it has been in all departments of noble work. Some of the mightiest have been hardly bestead. Oliver Goldsmith had such a big patch on the coat over his left breast that when he went anywhere he kept his hat in his hand closely pressed over the patch. The world-renowned Bishop Asbury had a salary of $64 a year. Painters are not the only ones who have endured the lack of appreciation. Let men of wealth take under their patronage the suffering men of art. They lift no complaint; they make no strike for higher wages. But with a keenness of nervous organization which almost always characterizes genius, these artists suffer more than any one, but God, can realize. There needs to be a concerted effort for the Suffering Artists of America,

not sentimental discourse about what we owe to artists, but contracts that will give them a livelihood; for I am in full sympathy with the Christian farmer who was very busy gathering his fall apples, and some one asked him to pray for a poor family, the father of which had broken his leg, and the busy farmer said: "I cannot stop now to pray, but you can go down into the cellar and get some corned beef and butter and eggs and potatoes; that is all I can do now." Artists may wish for our prayers, but they also want practical help from men who can give them work. You have heard scores of sermons for all other kinds of suffering men and women, but I think this is the first sermon ever preached that made a plea for the suffering men and women of American art. Their work is more true to nature and life than any of the masterpieces that have become immortal on the other side of the sea, but it is the fashion of Americans to mention foreign artists, and to know little or nothing about our own Copley, and Allston, and Inman, and Greenough, and Kensett. Let the affluent fling out of their windows and into the back yard valueless daubs on canvas, and call in these splendid but unrewarded men, and tell them to adorn your walls, not only with that which shall please the taste, but enlarge the mind, and improve the morals, and save the souls of those who gaze upon them.

Brooklyn, and all other American cities,

Need Great Galleries

of art, not only open annually for a few days on exhibition, but which shall stand open all the year round, and from early morning until ten o'clock at night, and free to all who would come.

What a preparation for the wear and tear of the day a five minutes' look in the morning at some picture that will open a door into some larger realm than that in which our population daily drudge! Or what a good thing the half hour of artistic opportunity on the way home in the evening, from exhaustion that demands recuperation for mind and soul as well as body! Who will do for Brooklyn, or the city where you live, what W. W. Corcoran did for Washington, and what I am told John Wannamaker, by the donation of a famous picture, is going to do for Philadelphia? Men of wealth, if you are too modest to build and endow such a place during your lifetime, why not go to your iron safe and take out your last will and testament, and make a codicil that shall build for the city of your residence a throne for American art? Take some of that money that would otherwise spoil your children, and build an art gallery that shall associate your name forever, not only with the great masters of painting, who are gone, but with the great masters who are trying to live; and also win the admiration and love of tens of thousands of people, who, unable to have fine pictures of their own, would be advantaged.

Build Your Own Monuments, and not leave it to the whim of others. Some of the best people sleeping in Greenwood have no monuments at all, or some crumbling stones that in a few years will let the rain wash out name and epitaph; while some men, whose death was the abatement of a nuisance, have a pile of polished Aberdeen high enough for a king, and eulogium enough to embarrass a seraph. Oh, man of large wealth, instead of leaving to the whim of others your monumental commemoration and epitaphology, to be looked at when people are going to and fro at the burial of others, build right down in the heart of our great city, or the city where you live, an immense free reading-room, or a free musical conservatory, or a free art gallery, the niches for sculpture, and the walls abloom with the rise and fall of nations, and lessons of courage for the disheartened, and rest for the weary, and life for the dead; and in the future you will be wielding influences in this world for good.

How much better than white marble, that chills you if you put your hand on it when you touch it in the cemetery, would be a monument in colors, in beaming eyes, in living possession, in splendors which under the chandelier would be glowing and warm, and looked at by strolling groups with catalogue in hand on the January night when the necropolis where the body sleeps is all snowed under. The tower of David was hung with one thousand dented shields of battle; but you, oh man of wealth, may have a grander tower named after you, one that shall be hung not with the symbols of carnage, but with the victories of that art which was so long ago recognized in my text as "pleasant pictures." Oh, the power of pictures! I cannot deride, as some have done, Cardinal Mazarin, who, when told that he must die, took his last walk through the art gallery of his palace, saying: "Must I quit all this? Look at that Titian! Look at that Corregio! Look at that deluge of Caracci! Farewell, dear pictures!"

As the day of the Lord of Hosts, according to this text, will scrutinize the pictures, I implore all parents to see that in their households they have neither in book or newspaper or on canvas anything that will deprave. Pictures are no longer the exclusive possession of the affluent. There is not a respectable home in these cities that has not specimens of woodcut or steel engraving, if not of painting, and your whole family will feel the moral uplifting or depression. Have nothing on your wall or in books that will familiarize the young with scenes of cruelty or wassail; have only those sketches made by artists in elevated moods, and none of those scenes that seem the product of artistic delirium tremens. Pictures are

A Universal Language,

The human race is divided into almost as many languages as there are nations, but the pictures may speak to people of all tongues. Volapuk many have hoped, with little reason, would become a world-wide language; but the pictorial is always a world-wide language, and printers' types have no emphasis compared with it. We say that children are fond of pictures; but notice any man when he takes up a book, and you will see that the first thing that he looks at is the pictures. Have only those in your house that appeal to the better nature. One engraving has sometimes decided an eternal destiny. Under the title of fine arts there have come here from France a class of pictures which elaborate argument has tried to prove irreproachable. They would disgrace a bar-room, and they need to be confiscated. Your children will carry the pictures of their father's house with them clear on to the grave, and, passing that marble pillar, will take them through eternity.

Futhermore, let all reformers, and all Sabbath-school teachers, and all Christian workers realize that, if they would be effective for good, they must make pictures, if not by chalk on blackboards, or kinder-garten designs, or by pencil on canvas, then by words. Arguments are soon forgotten; but pictures, whether in language or in colors, are what produce strongest effects. Christ was always telling what a thing was like, and His sermon on the Mount was beginning with a sketch of a "city on a hill that cannot be hid," and ending with a tempest beating against two houses, one on the rock and the other on the sand. The parable of the prodigal son, a picture; parable of the sower, who went forth to sow, a picture; parable of the unmerciful servant, a picture; parable of the ten virgins, a picture; parable of the talents, a picture. The world wants pictures, and the appetite begins with the child, who consents to go early to bed if the mother will sit beside him and rehearse a story, which is only a picture. When we see how much has been accomplished in secular directions by pictures—Shakespeare's tragedies, a picture; Victor Hugo's writings, all pictures; John Ruskin's and Tennyson's and Longfellow's works, all pictures—why not enlist, as far as possible, for our churches and schools and reformatory work and evangelistic endeavor, the power of thought that can be put into word pictures, if not pictures in color? Yea, why not all young men draw for themselves on paper, with pen or pencil, their coming career, of virtue if they prefer that, of vice if they prefer that. After making the picture, put it on the wall, or paste it on the fly leaf of some favorite book, that you may have it before you. I read the other day of a man who had been executed for murder, and the jailor found afterward a picture made on the wall of the cell by the assassin's own hand,

A Great Picture-Gallery,

A Picture of a Flight of Stairs.

On the lowest step he had written: "Disobedience of parents"; on the second: "Sabbath breaking"; on the third: "Drunkenness and gambling"; on the fourth: "Murder"; and on the fifth and top step: "A gallows." If that man had made that picture before he took the first step, he never would have taken any of them! Oh, man, make another picture, a bright picture, an evangelical picture, and I will help you make it! I suggest six steps for this flight of stairs. On the first step write the words: "A nature changed by the Holy Ghost and washed in the blood of the Lamb"; on the second step: "Industry and good companionship"; on the third step: "A Christian home with a family altar;" on the fourth step: "Ever widening usefulness"; on the fifth step: "A glorious departure from this world"; on the sixth step: "Heaven! heaven! heaven!" Write it three times, and let the letters of the one word be made up of banners, the second of coronets, and the third of thrones! Promise me that you will do that, and I will promise to meet you on the sixth step, if the Lord will through His pardoning grace bring me there too.

And here I am going to say a word of cheer to people who have never had a word of consolation on that subject. There are men and women in this world by hundred of thousands, and some of them are here to-day, who have a fine natural taste, and yet all their lives that taste has been suppressed, for they must support their households, and bread and schooling for their children are of more importance than pictures. Though fond of music, they are compelled to live amid discord; and though fond of architecture, they dwell in clumsy abodes, and though appreciative of all that engravings and paintings can do, they are in perpetual deprivation. You are going, after you get on the sixth step of that stairs just spoken of, to find yourselves in the concentered splendors of all worlds before your transported vision. In some way all the thrilling scenes through which we and the Church of God have passed in our earthly state will be pictured or brought to mind. At the Cyclorama of Gettysburg, which we had in Brooklyn, one day a blind man, who lost his sight in that battle, was with his child heard talking while standing before that picture. The blind man said to the daughter: "Are there at the right of the picture some regiments marching up a hill?" "Yes," she said. "Well," said the blind man, "is there a general on horseback leading them on?" "Yes," she said. "Well, is there rushing down on these men a cavalry charge?" "Yes," was the reply. "And do there seem to be many dying and dead?" "Yes," was the answer. "Well, now, do you see a shell from the woods bursting near the wheel of a cannon?" "Yes," she said. "Stop right there!" said the blind man. "That is the last thing I ever saw on earth! What a time it was, Jenny, when I lost my eye-sight!" But when you, who have found life a hard battle, a very Gettysburg, shall stand in the Royal Gallery of Heaven, and with your new vision begin to see and understand that which in your earthly blindness you could not see at all, you will point out to your celestial comrades, perhaps to your own dear children who have gone before, the scenes of the earthly conflicts in which you participated, saying: "There from that hill of prosperity I was driven back; in that valley of humiliation I was wounded. There I lost my eye-sight. That was the way the world looked when I last saw it. But what a grand thing to get celestial vision, and stand here before the cyclorama of all worlds while the Rider on the white horse goes on "conquring and to conquer," the moon under His feet and the stars of heaven for His tiara!

The Royal Gallery of the Universe,

LADIES LEARNING IN JAPAN.

THE Apostolic example of becoming all things to all men, in order to save some, is being followed and blessed in Japan. The lady missionaries there have opened an educational institute for the higher class ladies, who in learning to play on the organ, and to do fancy work are brought under Christian influence. Miss Bull, who writes to the Spirit of Missions from Osaka, Japan, says: "There is nothing in the laws or customs of Japan to keep a man true to his wife. He may even cast her off for another, turn her out of his house, keeping any property she may have brought him; there is no redress for her. Many of the higher class women, whose husbands have more means and opportunity for dissipation usually, and who have themselves learned no means of livelihood, as their sisters of the humbler classes have, hang or drown themselves, or live an unhappy life in a divided household, often made like a 'hell on earth,' as Mr. Mori strongly expressed it, by the abuse of the parents of the alienated husband, if they are a part of the family. Until recently these ladies received very little education aside from the training how to gracefully and deliberately make a 'ceremonial tea,' and other things of that kind. Any real work would have been beneath their station and would have brought discredit on the family. When I realized how little there had been to occupy brain and hand of these unfortunate ladies I wondered that Japan is not full of insane women.

"The Fujiu Gaku Shiu Kwai (literally, the Ladies' Educational Society) was founded with the hope to meet some of these cases. It is more than a school, for it provides not only for the daughters, but for the mothers, who have been so despised for their ignorance and helplessness. They may join the English classes, or even those in Japanese or Chinese, without being considered out of place; or they may learn to play on the cabinet organ, fancy work, foreign cooking and sewing. Mr. Mori said it could not be expected that the elder ladies would learn a great deal, but what they do learn will serve to make their lives brighter, and there is always the hope that the Christian influence which is predominant in the work of the Kwai, may turn them to the Source of life and light. One has already made public profession of her faith in Jesus."

A CURE FOR INSOMNIA.

A REMARKABLE instance of the removal through faith and prayer of the distressing trouble of sleeplessness, complicated by catarrh and other maladies, is cited in a recently published work entitled "A Cloud of Witnesses," edited by Rev. A. B. Simpson. It is that of Rev. F. C. A. Jones, Baptist pastor of Newark, N. J. Mr. Jones says:

"For ten years I have been anything but strong. For six years or more, because of much affliction, I have been a great sufferer; troubled with sleeplessness and nervousness, I was scarcely in a healthy condition for work. On entering the ministry, a few months over three years ago, I did so with great weakness of body and much restlessness of mind. The cares of a city pastorate did nothing to make me better, and by carrying what I should have laid on our Lord, I broke down. For three months I did not preach. With the nervous prostration, heart disease developed, and it seemed as though my work was at an end. A long rest partially restored me, and I was enabled to resume my work. But my heart gave me great trouble. After preaching I would be exhausted; the beating of my heart, the pain in my head and limbs, would make me unfit for work for nearly two days, Added to this, catarrh and sleeplessness, made it difficult for me to do much else than regard myself.

"This condition lasted until August, 1886. For six months or so I had been seeking in the Word for the truth concerning the indwelling of the Holy Spirit. In that month the Lord made known to me as I never realized before, the glorious truth of Christ in us the hope of glory. In the light of this I saw the possibility of Divine healing. At once I searched the Scriptures, and visited the Gospel Tabernacle, in order to see and hear. After a month's study, I was convinced—not by reason, but by the Word—that in the atonement there was healing for the body as well as cleansing for the soul. But while convinced, I could not accept. Then the Holy Spirit revealed myself to me in all my sinful weakness. At the feet of Jesus I confessed my unbelief. Graciously He gave me His faith. From that moment I cast aside medicine, of which I had a stock on hand. Catarrh medicine, tonics, medicine for the heart, etc., etc. No more medicines for me!

"For a short time I experienced much relief and was very happy. Then came trouble. So long as I could trust secretly all was safe, especially if I happened to be mistaken. To avow my position was very much of a test of faith. This had to be done, however. On October 22, 1886, I obeyed the Word of God. All that day, up to the moment of confession, Satan beset my way with difficulties. During the anointing I had the assurance of healing then and there. The same evening, before reaching home, the catarrh had left me, and the next morning I could feel the air passing through the nasel passages as I had not felt in several years. Nervousness departed, and a sleepless night is now a very rare occurrence."

THE EFFECT OF A KISS.

THE transforming influence of a child's kiss on a desperate convict, is described in the Issue. It states, that in a prison in New Bedford, Mass., is a convict known as Jim, who is up for a life sentence. Until last spring he was regarded as a desperate, dangerous man, ready for rebellion at any hour. He planned a general outbreak, but was "given away" by one of his co-conspirators. He plotted a general mutiny or rebellion, and was again betrayed. He then kept his own counsel. While never refusing to obey orders, he obeyed them like a man who only needed backing to make him refuse to. One day in June a party of strangers came to the institution, among them were two ladies with small children. The guide took one of the children on his arm, and the other walked until the party began climbing stairs. Jim was working near by, sulky and morose as ever, when the guide said to him:

"Jim, won't you help this little girl up-stairs?"

The convict hesitated, a scowl on his face, and the little girl held out her hands, and said:

"If you will, I guess I'll kiss you."

His scowl vanished in an instant, and he lifted the child as tenderly as a father. Half-way up-stairs she kissed him. At the head of the stairs she said:

"Now, you've got to kiss me, too."

He blushed like a woman, looked into her innocent face, and then kissed her cheek, and before he reached the foot of the stairs again, the man had tears in his eyes. Ever since that day he has been a changed man, and no one in the place gives less trouble.

MR. ARNOT IN AFRICA.

THE many friends of Mr. F. S. Arnot in this country, will be glad to read an account he recently gave of the exploration in South Africa, from which he has just returned. He said: It was his intention to reach, if possible, a part of the country very little known, but believed to be high and healthy. With this object he crossed from Natal through the Transvaal and the Kalahari Desert to the Zambesi, intending, if practicable, to proceed from thence northward into the centre of Africa. Most of this part of the journey was performed in a wagon drawn by bullocks, and the chief difficulty was the extreme scarcity of water from the Transvaal frontier, to Lake Ngami, stages of ten or fifteen days being performed without any water except what was carried by the party. Mr. Arnot did not find the Boers unfriendly to himself. He described them as an intensely religious people, high Calvinists, and convinced that they are the chosen people, the modern Israel, and that the natives are Philistines, with no rights which they are not at liberty to override. Mr. Arnot had provided himself with a good stock of Dutch Bibles, and the Boers, though ignorant and narrow, appear to have some good qualities, so that he had little difficulty in making his way.

In the neighborhood of Lake Ngami, Mr. Arnot found a number of outcast natives, separated from their tribe owing to some quarrel, and in imminent danger of starvation. On reaching the Zambesi he appealed for them to the chief, and got them readmitted amongst their fellows of the Barota tribe. For similar acts of kindness he frequently was rewarded, when in difficulties, by the assistance of the benefited persons. Unable to proceed direct north from the Zambesi, Mr. Arnot joined himself to a Portuguese trader he came across, and reached Loando, on the West Coast. From Loando, Mr. Arnot determined to make another search for a high and healthy country, where European missionaries could live. He started about due east, and, keeping nearly on the watershed between the Congo and Zambesi basins, he reached and crossed the Lualaba river.

As a rule he was kindly received by the native chiefs, though having to shake hands in one evening with all a chief's relations, including five hundred wives and other relatives in proportion, must have been a trying ordeal. It appears that women are allowed to become chiefs in Central Africa, and one female chief was most useful in checking the warlike propensities of a diminutive nephew, also a powerful chief, who seemed bent on becoming an African Napoleon. The Lualaba, which is really the upper stream of the Congo, was first discovered by Livingston during his last and fatal journey, and on the east side of that river Mr. Arnot lived some time and founded a mission.

A DRUNKARD'S PROMISE.

A REMARKABLE incident is reported from an evangelistic service on the West side of New York. A poor woman entered the hall accompanied by a miserable-looking man, who had evidently led a dissipated life. He was her husband, and his appearance at the meeting was the result of a promise made by him on a bed of sickness. His drinking habits had undermined a strong constitution, and at length utterly prostrated him in an illness which it seemed must end fatally. His wife, a true heart-consecrated Christian, waited upon her stricken husband with patient devotion, keeping things together about the home by means only such as she know how to use. Her chief concern, however, was about her husband's spiritual state in view of his apparently near approach to the grave. The man professed to be a Roman Catholic, but she knew that even in that profession he was not sincere. His life was a godless one, and his rare attendance at the Roman Catholic church was a mere perfunctory custom of his early education. She pleaded with him earnestly but vainly, to repent and believe in Jesus alone for salvation. Once, when he seemed near death, she did gain a promise from him that if God mercifully raised him up, he would go with her just once to the mission. God did spare his life, and the man kept his promise. He sat stolidly through the early part of the service, but as the evangelist spoke, pleading with the unsaved, the man melted. Great tears filled his eyes and rolled down his cheeks. At the close, his wife, who had been watching him, persuaded him to go to the front and speak with the Christian men and women who were there conversing with seekers. He went and knelt down while prayer was offered. Before the close of the meeting the man rose and said: "Friends, I never expected to stand here. I have heard about religion all my life, but now I have got it—" striking his breast—"I have got it here. I never knew what it really was, till now. I had no notion that Jesus could make me so happy. I quit all my bad ways and bad companions without a struggle. From this time Jesus is my only Master, for He is my Saviour." His poor wife, her eyes beaming with joy, watched him as he spoke and as he went out with her, she looked as if that moment was the happiest she had ever known.

PROPHETIC CONVENTION IN EDINBURGH.

A THREE Days' Second Advent Convention was held in the Free Assembly Hall, Edinburgh, on October 9, 10, and 11. Among those who took part in it were—Rev. A. Bonar, D. D., Professor Alexander Simpson, M. D., Rev. H. Sinclair Paterson, M. D.; the Rev. H. Grattan Guinness, and many other eminent students of prophecy.

Dr. Andrew A. Bonar, of Glasgow, in the course of his remarks referred to Joshua 6 : 26, and described its exact fulfilment 550 years afterward, in 1 Kings 16 : 34, as an illustration of where we might not have quite expected it; and then proceeded to take up the subject under three divisions. There was (1) the land and people of Israel. How exactly what had been predicted of them had all come to pass. In quoting Isaiah 6 : 11, "cities without inhabitant," he called attention to the fact that above 300 sites of ancient cities and towns in Palestine had been ascertained, all of them now heaps of ruins. There was (2) the fulfilment of prophecies concerning the first coming of Christ. He showed how to the letter all was fulfilled that had been foretold regarding the Baptist, the Forerunner, in Isaiah 40 : 3–5. We might have been content to find "the wilderness" in which the "Voice" was to be heard, signifying the land silent and desolate in respect of spiritual life; but no, it was literally "In the wilderness of Judea," as the evangelists carefully recorded.

Minute Literal Fulfilment

The prediction of Christ's entry into Jerusalem in triumph was, Zechariah 9 : 9, to be marked by His steed being "an ass, and the foal of an ass," and this was (Matt. 21 : 2). These were some samples of literality; but when we look up the predictions of Christ's suffering, we find "the wagging of the head" by those that passed by the cross, "the piercing of hands and feet," "the vestures" (seamless coat) disposed of by lot exactly as Psalm 22 foretold. Dr. Bonar's third head was the bearing of all this on unfulfilled prophecies regarding the coming of the Lord. He read the first verses, 1 to 9, of Zechariah 14. Following out the principle of literality, he drew attention to the narrative of the Lord's coming given by the prophet. The Lord comes down to earth. "His feet stand on the Mount of Olives," that spot so fragrant with holy memories, "which is before Jerusalem, on the east"—the spot where He took farewell of His eleven.

Fulfilled to the Letter

He will Come to Rejoice over Jerusalem now, not to weep. He will sweep away His and their enemies as easily as He did Pharaoh, or the Amorites in the "day of battle," and then ascend to His throne "King over all the earth."

Rev. Dr. Elder Cumming said: For twenty years he was an Evangelical minister, without being able to see the truth about the speedy pre-millennial advent. It seemed such a difficult and obscure subject he hardly knew where to get light. But in a time of great sorrow God sent him to the Bible to ask about it, and after one little step had been taken, he then began to find that, instead of being obscure and difficult, a few verses here and there, teaching about it, he was overwhelmed

In Every Part of the Bible, and especially in those portions that had been but a concealed book before by the marvellous clearness and fullness with which God was setting this truth forth. There had been no Millennium up to now. It was clear that the Lord was not to return in the midst of a Millennium, and it was not possible to insert any Millennium between the present time and the Lord's return. He proceeded to quote numerous portions of Scripture in support of his contentions. He argued that no man could preach from the text "Watch and pray" if he was a believer in the doctrine that a period of a thousand years had yet to elapse before Christ's Second Advent.

The Rev. Canon Fausset, D. D., said it was to be seen that there would be a virtual before Christ comes, and at His Advent, saints living and dead must be raised again and transfigured in a moment, and sleeping saints awakened. The topic was calculated to enable them to realise their unity in Christ, overleaping the barriers of denominational distinction. The time of Jesus' coming was fast approaching. There would be the presence of angels at His second coming. At every turn in Jesus' history angels were present. As to the question whether the Lord's coming would precede or succeed the millennium, he was of opinion that the Lord would come before the millennium, for the very purpose of introducing it.

Relapse Into Pagan Apostacy,

The Rev. Dr. Norman Macleod next addressed the meeting, remarking that their premillennial view of the doctrine of the second coming of Christ had been held by him for twenty years.

Mr. E. Malcolm, of Burnfoot, said what a very great and glorious subject was the subject of the conference,

The Hope of the Church.

She hath waited long her absent Lord to see, and was it not in accordance with the Lord's will, and in agreement with all Scripture, that she should continue so doing. But they knew sometime of the hindrances, and so the purpose of this conference is to enable His people to realize a little more the Second Coming, and to love it more, to watch more, to be more ready for His coming, to wait for Him, to look for Him. Many things might happen before the Lord comes again. Nevertheless, the coming of the Lord was a great fact in Scripture, a great fact in prophecy, a mighty event held out to their acceptation; and while they were prepared for His appearing, looking for it, they were prepared for whatever might come before it.

PROPHETIC CONFERENCE IN LONDON.

AN interesting Prophetic Conference has just been held in London. Amongst the speakers were Revs. Charles Graham, John Wilkinson, W. Frith, and Mr. Henry Varley.

Hon. Carteret Hill, D. C. L., made some remarks on the increasing propagation of communistic and socialistic principles, which are utterly destructive of human society and government, and subversive of the constituted order of things. These can only be attributed to Satanic agency. Again, look at the vast multitudes of armed men—10,000,000 said to be under arms in Europe. Think of the perfecting of machinery and appliances for the destruction of human life. Is it not preparing the way for the "God of forces"? Observe also the spread of the Satanic spirit of reckless lawlessness. These things should deepen in our minds the expectation of Christ's speedy appearing. Let us be found earnestly praying He would "shortly accomplish the number of His elect, and hasten His kingdom."

Mr. G. H. Pember, M. A., speaking on

The Two Heads of Evil

in Revelation 17, said: Here we have presented to us two great forms of evil—the woman and the beast. Two forms of evil which, though naturally antagonistic to each other, can readily combine, like Pilate and Herod, against the Lord Jesus Christ. What are we to understand by these two? Generally speaking, the two great directions in which human corruption flows. When men begin to be in fear about themselves and to feel their helplessness in view of unseen forces, they turn to some form of religion which seems to offer to them supernatural protection. Then, when fears subside, they begin to drift into unbelief, and at last into the mere worship of humanity. These are the two points of evil between which the natural human mind oscillates—superstition and infidelity—never by any accident going to the true faith. In Rev. 17, we have the culmination of these two movements. Notice first the woman—a woman is used in Scripture as symbol of an ecclesiastical system. We have three great

Symbolic Women

—the two "brides," the two elections of God, and the "harlot," Satan's counterfeit church. And this woman has her name written, "Mystery, Babylon the Great." By that name we understand she is that fallen apostate religion begun in the earliest years of the earth's history, and coming down ever since, spreading over the world and now centred in the Roman Catholic Church. Its history is a very remarkable one, and has only been revealed of late years through the opening up of the long-hidden ruins of Babylon and Nineveh. It is a system formed among the Turanian tribes in the earliest period of the world's history in opposition to God, and taught men by fallen angels, the Nephilim doubtless. From that time its existence can be traced throughout entire history. Its centre was for ages at Babylon; on the destruction of that city it was removed to Pergamos, "where Satan's seat is," and later still to Rome. The chief distinguishing mark of the system is

The Satanic Trinity

—father, mother, and child; and this woman worship can be observed in Theosophism, Buddhism, Positivism, as well as Romanism, and in the later day Anglicanism. Venus in Pagan Rome, Diana in Greece, Isis in Egypt, the Virgin Mary in Papal Rome, are one and the same under changed names. The secret history of the events of the reign of Constantine show fully how the Babylonian mystery settled in Rome and became the inspiring spirit of the Roman Church. Then persecution ceased, for Satan had gained his object by corruption from within. And not only does history clearly show that Rome is Mystery Babylon, but many of her dogmas and practices are directly derived from Paganism—as, for example, monks, shaven crowns, the wafer bread, the "Eastward position," the meaning of which is clear from Ezek. 8 : 16.

Then the second great form of evil in the chapter is the beast. From Dan. 7 we learn that the four beasts are four "world-powers." But when the Revelation is given, three of these—Babylon, Persia, and Greece—have passed away, and the beast is the Roman Empire—the body politic being represented by the beast, the emperor or ruler by the head. There is also a shade of meaning whereby "horn" represents things or powers subordinate to the emperor. Now the seven heads have two interpretations, each literal; one as regards the woman, "seven mountains" marking her seat as Rome; and seven kings, five of whom are fallen, indicating a violent death. These probably were Julius Cæsar, Tiberius, Claudius, Caligula, and Nero. The sixth, who then was, is Domitian, who reigned when John wrote. The seventh, who was yet to come, there is reason to believe

Is Napoleon I.

Then, finally, there is an eighth; but before his appearing, or at all events before his full power is displayed, the Lord Jesus Christ shall return to call away His own or some of them. But observe, the indications are that the Lord Jesus appears when the Roman empire is in a state of democracy. And of the alliance of the harlot church with democracy we can see manifest signs all around us. The priests are making a bold bid for popular power. Soon, however, the world-power shall get tired of her. The Antichrist shall strip her and rend her, shall claim to himself the worship of God, and then shall sudden destruction overtake him from the presence of the Lord. "Seeing, therefore, brethren, we look for such things, what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness?"

An Invaluable Work on Prophecy by G. H. Pember, M. A., entitled "The Great Prophecies concerning the Jews the Gentiles, and the Church of God," is for sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York. It is written in a most popular and eloquent style, and describes the impending fulfilment of Revelation and Daniel, and is illustrated by a colored chart. 458 pages. Price, including postage, $1.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-Class Matter.

EVERY NUMBER CONTAINS:

The Portrait and Biography of some eminent person.
The Sermon Dr. Talmage preached the last Sunday morning.
An Exposition of Unfulfilled Prophecy.
A Summary of the Events of the Week, Notes of Religious and Temperance Movements, etc.
A Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, of London, from advance sheets sent by special arrangement.
Pictures of Missionary Life, etc., and Descriptive Articles.
An instalment of a Serial Story.
An Exposition of the International Sunday-School Lesson, by Mrs. M. Baxter.

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION, $1.50.
Single Copies, Price Three Cents, may be obtained by order of any Newsdealer.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Session of Congress which Closed on October 20, though the longest on record since the foundation of the Government, was not prolific in legislation. The leading correspondent of the New York press thus summarizes its work: The record shows that 15,252 bills were introduced in the two houses, of which 3,644 were put in by the 76 Senators and 11,608 by the 325 Representatives. There were also introduced 231 joint resolutions in the House and 116 in the Senate, a total of 347 joint resolutions, and a grand total of 15,599 measures requiring the consent of both branches of Congress to become laws. Out of this vast mass of proposed legislation the various committees reported in 5,919 cases. The record of measures approved by the President, and thus put upon the statute-books, has not yet been made up, but they aggregate about 1,200. Of these a little over 800 are private measures. And a little less than 400 are public acts. About 14,400 measures therefore, were introduced only to be buried in calendars of business so long that they cannot be cleared off in the short session which begins in December. Some of these measures which have failed to be finally acted upon by the Senate and the House are the Tariff bill, the Retaliation bill, the International Copyright bill, several measures to prevent the formation and operation of trade combinations or "trusts," the bill to incorporate the Nicaraguan Canal, and the bills for the admission as States of Dakota, Washington, and other Territories.

An Indiscreet Letter from the British Minister at Washington was an unpleasant feature developed in the Presidential campaign last week. Lord Sackville received a letter from a person in California, representing himself as a person of British birth, naturalized in this country, asking his advice about the way he should vote next week. With innocence rare in an experienced diplomatist, Lord Sackville fell into the trap. Without directly advising his correspondent to vote any particular ticket, he intimated his own preferences so clearly that no one could misunderstand them. The letter was marked "Private," but it was promptly published, and is being made use of as political capital. The matter has been discussed by the President and his Cabinet, but it is believed that no steps to have the Minister recalled will be taken, although the President has been urged to initiate them. The British press almost unanimously condemns the indiscretion.

Mayor Hewitt, of New York, is Little Likely to present himself at a temperance meeting after his experience of October 19, at the Convention of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union. He had the effrontery, after advocating the opening of beer gardens and wine shops on Sunday, to appear at the Convention and make a speech. He said to the delegates: "The law must be responsive to public opinion and not in advance of it. Therefore, when you come to raise a standard for us, I care not how high it is, it must be raised by education, which will surely be followed by legislation." Referring to the Brewers' Convention, the Mayor said he had told them that he stood as the executor of the law. If the law was oppressive or behind public opinion they might remedy it. It was always dangerous to be in advance of public opinion, but he commended the efforts of the Women's Union toward amendment, and would be in favor of a much higher license than prevails at present in this State. The castigation he received from General Fisk, who boldly declared for "No Compromise" and denounced the Godless tendencies of the Mayor's ideas, and the witty rejoinder of Mrs. Mary A. Livermore, must have moderated the man's inordinate conceit. Happily for him, neither of the speakers was acquainted with his record as Mayor, or they would doubtless have convinced him that he was in no danger of being "in advance of public opinion."

Public Confession of Fraud was Made in New York last week by a notorious spiritualist. Mrs. Margaret Fox Kane, who is the original "Maggie Fox," appeared before a large audience, in which were many spiritualists, and declared that her part in the spiritualistic manifestations which first brought spiritualism before the public, was fraudulent from beginning to end. She said: "That I have been mainly instrumental in perpetrating the fraud of Spiritualism upon a too confiding public many of you already know. It is the greatest sorrow of my life. It is a late day now, but I am prepared to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. I hope God will forgive me, and those who are silly enough to believe in Spiritualism." She then showed the audience how by legerdemain and the clever touch of a sounding-board with her foot, she had been able to produce the rappings and other phenomena, which have helped to fill our lunatic asylums and work so much other mischief.

The Difficulty in the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union was solved without the apprehended secession. The Convention, on October 24, formally adopted the following resolution: "Resolved, That we reaffirm our allegiance to that party which makes its dominant issue the suppression of the liquor traffic, declares its belief in Almighty God as the source of all power in government, defends the sanctity of the Sabbath, recognizes equal suffrage and equal wages for women, demands the abolition of polygamy and uniform laws governing marriages and divorce, and aims to remove sectional differences, promote national unity, and insure the best welfare of our land." The following resolution was presented, but not acted upon, as it would practically read Mrs. Foster out of the Union: "Resolved, That it is the sense of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union that no member should speak from the public platform to antagonize our policy toward the party to which our influence is pledged, and that any member thus antagonizing our policy is hereby declared disloyal to our organization." Miss Frances E. Willard was re-elected president by an overwhelming majority.

The Interview Between the Emperor William of Germany and the Pope appears to have been unsatisfactory on both sides. The European correspondent of the New York Herald states that authentic advices from Rome, which are accepted as accurate, by both official and Catholic circles, assert that the Pope forced from the Emperor William a declaration that Germany could not encourage Papal aspirations without endangering the present friendly relations with the Italian Government. From a member of the imperial attendants it became known that the Emperor William, while telling King Humbert how the Pope had insisted upon talking on the question of Rome, said: "I had to destroy his illusions, and it was done effectually." On the other side the Italian correspondent of an English journal reports an interview with the Pope himself, who said to him: "That the Emperor came to Rome, was not at our request, nor was his object in coming favorable to us, but rather to those who are against us, to those who for ten years past have practically compelled me to restrict myself to this palace, from which I cannot issue. My dignity forbids me to do so. Of our religious orders which have been expelled from Germany three have been authorized to return—the Franciscans, the Dominicans, and the Benedictines. We are in negotiation about the withdrawal of prohibitions affecting our educational orders, but there is great difficulty in this. The German Government desires to keep in its own hands the exclusive instruction of Catholic children. To this I cannot consent."

An Appalling Railroad Disaster is Reported from Italy. Ten cars of a railroad train filled with excursionists returning from the Naples fêtes were crushed by a landslide made up of 200,000 cubic metres of rock and earth. There were over four hundred passengers on the tram. The scene that followed the disaster was horrible. Seventy injured passengers and ninety corpses have been taken from the wreck, and there are still two cars buried beneath the rock. It is certain, therefore, that the list of the dead will be increased. Several headless and armless corpses were found in the neighboring river. A mother, who had been driven mad by the catastrophe, refused to release from her embrace her two dead children. A young priest was buried for two hours, and when extricated it was found that his hair had turned white. An entire family, consisting of six persons, was killed.

The Political Situation in France Gives rise to uneasiness. While the President and his Premier are not in accord on the vital issues of the present conflict, Gen. Boulanger has rallied in opposition to the Government a personal following, curiously made up of Bonapartists, Monarchists, and Communists. All three appear to recognize in the General the one man in France capable of overthrowing the Republic. That is what they agree in wishing done, though they do not agree as to the government to follow the Republic. An intelligent observer in Paris writes: "General Boulanger has more powerful support accorded to him than any one man in France since the time of the Prince-President, Louis Napoleon. The communists—and there are 400,000 of them in Paris alone—believe that when the General has broken down legal barriers, they will be able to rush in and revive the Commune. The Bonapartists and royalists hope to turn him into a voluntary or involuntary General Monk. General Boulanger gains power every day, and people begin to believe that a timely appeal to the nation direct can alone save France from another revolution on the centenary of the first."

The Commission Appointed to Investigate the charges, by the London Times, of the complicity with crime of Mr. Parnell and other Irish members of Parliament, held daily sittings last week in London. The Attorney-General occupied each day with the presentation of the case against the Irish leaders and no evidence was taken. From the counsel's speech it appears that some of the charges were based on revelations made by a former clerk of the Land League, who has given the Times sundry documents, including a letter which shows that the League was paying the medical expenses of some of the men who were shot by the police in moonlighting affrays. It is also stated that evidence will be given to show that the knives used in murdering Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. T. Burke in Phœnix Park on May 6, 1882, were purchased by a member of the Irish Parliamentary party. One admission of the counsel for the Times, however, indicated a surprising weakness in his case. He acknowledged that some of the letters on which the journal had at first relied were now discovered to be forgeries. This admission will doubtless be used by the Parnell lawyers to discredit the whole of the incriminating letters, as a journal once deceived might be deceived in all.

Very Liberal Terms are Offered to any Person canvassing for subscriptions to The Christian Herald. Sample copies will be sent, postage paid, on application from any one desiring to undertake the work. Ministers and others will find it easy to obtain subscriptions. Send postal card for terms, and state number of sample copies required. Address The Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying Colored ministers in the South with this journal have been received since our last acknowledgment to the amount of $13.50. They are from Barrington, N. S., Can., 50c., Washington, D. C., $1; Lancaster, Penn., $5; Montreal, Can., $2; Norwood Park, Ill., $5. These gifts are very welcome. They enable us to supply the need of some of the pastors who are pleading and praying to God for the continuance of the help this journal has afforded them. One pastor in North Carolina, wrote us a few days ago: "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, sent to me for twelve months past in Christian kindness, has been a great teacher to me. But for it, many passages of Scripture would have continued dark to my mind. To part with the paper now would be a sore loss."

A Remarkable Service in a Penitentiary was held on Sunday, October 21. Thirty-two members of the Order of the King's Daughters went to Blackwell's Island, New York, where they held a service of song in the workhouse chapel. Superintendent Stocking received the young women, and told the assembled prisoners who they were, and why they wore the little silver crosses and purple ribbons "In His Name." The members then sang a number of hymns, during which many of the prisoners were softened to tears. A few earnest words of kindness and gospel invitation were spoken, and then the men and women were asked to sign a pledge not to drink liquors. There were thirty-two King's Daughters, and Superintendent Stocking called for two pledges for each one of the band. Fifty men, and twenty-five women signed the pledges. Five King's Tens were represented in yesterday's delegation, and all are members of the Lexington Ave. Baptist Church.

The Impossibility of Disinfecting a Ship Which has once had yellow fever on board is asserted in a Washington journal. It states that when once the microbe obtains a lodging in the timbers of a vessel, no known process can eject it. "You might," said a naval officer to the reporter, "take such a ship and thoroughly clean her, steam all the woodwork if you chose, and then lay her during an entire winter in a cold climate, and then during the following summer go within range of the yellow fever country, and cases would soon develop on board. An illustration of the strange fact is found in the experience with the Jamestown, now the training ship at Baltimore. On one of her trips yellow fever appeared on board, and several deaths followed. Subsequently the vessel was thoroughly renovated and extensively repaired. Her woodwork was steamed. Then she remained in northern harbors for several winters. She was finally ordered South again, and before she reached the fever district, a case of yellow fever developed, and the man died. It is true that once a fever ship, always a fever ship." Happily it is not so with the human being who has been infected with the dread malady of sin. Efforts at self-reformation fail because the germs of evil remain in the heart, but when through faith in Christ the man gets a new heart, he becomes a new creature, and temptation finds nothing in him. (1 John 5:18.)

A Cradle Has Been Turned Into a Coffin at the request of a lady living at Wallingford, Conn. Many years ago the lady, who is now seventy-four years of age, conceived the strange fancy of having the cradle in which she was rocked as a baby made over into a coffin in which her body should lie when she was dead. The cradle had been carefully preserved, and was in her own possession. It was of the large, old-fashioned kind, curiously carved in solid cherry-wood, and contained sufficient material for the purpose. She spoke to an undertaker about the work, but he ridiculed the idea, and there were then no indications of the article being seemingly needed. She still cherished the project, however, and as she passed the line of threescore years and ten, she became urgent about its being carried out. A month ago she became sick, and then she was so uneasy about it that her friends determined to gratify her whim at any cost. The cradle was sent to a coffin manufactory, and it has been duly metamorphosed into a handsome casket, and sent to the eccentric old lady's home, to be ready for her when it is needed. It may be hoped that her concern at the approach of death is not limited to the domicile of her body. Her fancy for thus associating the beginning of life with its close will be more intelligently gratified if she has confided the keeping of her soul to God who gave it. (Eccles. 12:7.)

A Mother's Heroism is Described in a Despatch from Yonkers, N. J. It states that on October 24, a lady of that town was sitting in her dining-room with her two-year-old child, working by the light of a kerosene lamp. She had occasion to leave the room for a minute, and during her absence the child overturned the lamp. The child's cry of terror reached the mother's ears and she ran back quickly. The lamp lay shattered on the floor and the burning oil spreading over the carpet. In her eagerness to rescue her child, the mother tripped and fell upon the blazing oil, which saturated her dress. Though her clothing was instantly all ablaze, she reached out for her child and succeeded in placing him safely in his crib. Then she rushed from the room and down into the street. Here she fell flat on her face in the midst of a horrified crowd. Several men wrapped their coats about the lady, but the flames were not extinguished until she had been terribly burned. In the meantime her husband had come and was rushing off for medical aid, when his wife cried out to him not to trouble about her, but to save the child, He ran up-stairs and found the child safe in his crib and brought him down, and then, and not before, would the mother permit him to attend to her own injuries. These were so severe that her recovery is doubtful. When that child grows up and hears of what his mother endured for his preservation, he will be a monster if his heart is not filled with love and reverence for her. Yet men hear the story of Gethsemane and Calvary and learn what Christ endured to save them, and are unmoved! (1 Pet. 1:18, 19.)

A Wedding in a Tree is Reported to have taken place in Connecticut two weeks ago. A press despatch from Norwich states that a party of young people was entertained at a farm-house near that city. Among them were two lovers who were engaged to be married. During the evening, however, a quarrel occurred which grew serious, and finally the young lady declared that she would never speak to her lover again. The minister of the church with which both the young people were connected, was present, and, noticing the angry looks of the two, endeavored to act as a peacemaker, but failed. On the way home, after the entertainment, he brought the estranged couple together and renewed his effort. While they were walking through the fields a loud bellow startled them, and, looking back, they saw a Texan steer standing in a threatening attitude at the corner of the pasture. Instantly the animal rushed toward the party, and the young man and the minister had only just time to help the girl to climb a tree and get up themselves, before the furious beast was at its foot. The steer appeared determined that they should not escape, and they were in too much fear to make an attempt while he stood on guard below. As time passed it occurred to the minister that the time was propitious for the object he had at heart, and he again urged the two to forgive each other. He found the young lady more amenable to his arguments then, and she consented to forgive and forget. But the young man was sceptical about the permanence of her mood, and he would not be reconciled unless she consented to be married then and there. After some natural reluctance, she agreed, and the minister pronounced the words that made them man and wife. Soon afterward a passing wagon was hailed, and the trio were released from their unpleasant position. Though their refuge in the tree enabled them to escape one danger, and their marriage put an end to their estrangement for that time, other dangers and trials will come. It may be hoped that then they will find a refuge in Christ, and be made one in Him. (Eph. 2:13, 14.)

A Bungling Chemist's Valuable Discovery was the subject of discussion at Cornell University on October 17. A scientist announced that an amateur chemist in New England has discovered a cheap method of dissolving zinc by combining it with hydrogen and producing a solution called zinc water. This liquid, if applied to certain woods, notably whitewood, makes it absolutely fire-proof, and at a low cost. The learned men present fully appreciated the importance of this achievement, and one of them declared it one of the most important chemical discoveries of the age, and one that will surely revolutionize fire insurance, as well as immensely decrease the loss by fire. The invention is kept secret for the present. Only one foreigner — Sir Lyon Playfair, the English scientist — knows of it. He corroborates all that is claimed for the invention, and says that the inventor is a bungling chemist, but that he has a faculty of blundering into the choicest secrets in Nature's laboratory. As soon as patents are perfected and capital interested, zinc water will become an article of commerce. So it will be found in the day of Judgment. Men of whom the learned and cultured have spoken with contempt will be found to have learned the choicest of God's lessons, and to have secured the blessing which alone makes life worth living. (Matt. 11:25.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The bicentennial of the Baptist churches of New Jersey will be celebrated October 30, at Middletown.

Deerfield, Mass., Congregational Church celebrated its two hundredth anniversary on October 17.

Rev. Dr. Colgate was consecrated Episcopal Bishop of Delaware in St. John's Church, Wilmington, Del., on the 18th inst.

There are now 637 Indian boys and girls at the Carlisle School, and the Apaches constitute the largest element of any one tribe.

At the recent Convention of the Protestant-Episcopal Church, Southern Diocese of Ohio, the Rev. Dr. Vincent, of Pittsburg, was elected Bishop of the Diocese.

The London Young Women's Christian Association has more than one hundred and forty branches scattered throughout London, and of these nearly forty are institutes, homes, or restaurants.

A new and commodious building, known as "The Christian Institute," has been dedicated in Toronto. It was erected by William Gooderham, Esq., and is intended to be a home for Bible study.

Of the 174 Presbyterian churches in the Synod of the Pacific, 54 have pastors, 96 stated supplies, and 24 are vacant. There are no vacancies in Los Angeles Presbytery, and only two in Benicia.

The Evangelical Alliance has addressed a letter of inquiry to candidates for legislative and executive positions in New York, as to their attitude toward the religious training of children in public institutions.

The report of the Seventh Annual Convention of the United Societies of Christian Endeavor, just issued, shows that there are now over five thousand of these societies, with an aggregate of over 300,000 members.

From March 1 to September 1, the missionaries of the American Sunday-school Union in the Northwest established 434 new Sunday-schools, and aided 943 old schools, where 5,022 teachers are now giving Bible instruction to 50,238 scholars.

Bishop Whipple has cabled Rev. James Dobbin, of Fairbault, that he has obtained in England a gift of $50,000 for Shattuck School, Minnesota, its designation being for the building of a new wing to the new Shumway Hall, to serve as a dining-room.

Messrs. Hunter and Crossley, the well-known evangelists, have just closed a series of meetings at Oakville, Ont., at which Methodists and Presbyterians united; 347 persons declared themselves as seekers. After spending a few days at Windsor, the evangelists will commence operations at Winnipeg.

Mr. D. L. Moody, in reply to a San Francisco reporter who asked him if he did not find Californians less enthusiastic than citizens of other States, said: "No, I do not think they are less enthusiastic, but there is certainly a greater amount of scepticism here than in the East. In the Southern States the people make very enthusiastic religious converts. In New England and the Middle States they are colder, but they are perfectly willing to accept religious teachings. Out here they are sceptical."

NO COMPROMISE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And the servant said unto him, Peradventure the woman will not be willing to follow me unto this land: must I needs bring thy son again unto the land from whence thou camest? And Abraham said unto him, Beware thou that thou bring not my son thither again." etc. (Genesis 24 : 5–8.)

The Instructive Allegory — I. The Servant's Weighty Errand—His Master's Heart Set Upon It—Difficulty of Finding a Wife Worthy of Isaac —No Exertion to be Spared—II. A Reasonable Fear—The Woman Might Not Believe—Might not Love One Whom She had not Seen—Migh not Like a Pilgrim Life—III. The Servant's Suggestion—Should Isaac be Taken to Her—The Suggestion of the Hour—The Drift of the Times—IV. The Proposal Repudiated—Numbers not the First Consideration —Confidence that the Wife Would be Found—The Power of the Gospel—V. The Absolution of the Servant.

GENESIS is both the book of beginnings and the book of dispensations. You know what use Paul makes of Sarah and Hagar, of Esau and Jacob, and the like. Genesis is, all through, a book instructing the reader in the dispensations of God towards man. Paul saith, in a certain place, "which things are an allegory," by which he did not mean that they were not literal facts, but that, being literal facts, they might also be used instructively as an allegory. So may I say of this chapter. It records what actually was said and done; but at the same time, it bears within it with regard to heavenly things. The true minister of Christ is like this Eleazar of Damascus; he is sent to find a wife for his Master's Son. His great desire is, that many shall be presented unto Christ in the day of His appearing, as the bride, the Lamb's wife.

Allegorical Instruction,

The faithful servant of Abraham, before he started, communed with his master; and this is a lesson to us, who go on our Lord's errands. Let us, before we engage in actual service, see the Master's face, talk with Him, and tell to Him any difficulties which occur to our minds. Before we get to work, let us know what we are at, and on what footing we stand. Let us hear from our Lord's own mouth what He expects us to do, and how far He will help us in the doing of it. Abraham's servant spoke and acted as one who felt bound to do exactly what his master bade him, and to say what his master told him; hence his one anxiety was to know the essence and measure of his commission. During his converse with his master he mentioned one little point about which there might be a hitch; and his master soon removed the difficulty from his mind. It is about that hitch, which has occurred lately on a very large scale, and has upset a good many of my Master's servants, that I am going to speak this morning.

I. Beginning our sermon, we will ask you, first to think of

The Servant's Weighty Errand.

It was a joyful errand: the bells of marriage around him. The marriage of the heir should be a joyful event. It was an honorable thing for the servant to be entrusted with the finding of a wife for his master's son. Yet it was every way a most responsible business, by no means easy of accomplishment. Blunders might very readily occur before he was aware of it; and he needed to have all his wits about him, and something more than his wits, too, for so delicate a matter.

The work this man undertook was a business upon which his master's heart was set. Abraham himself was old, and well stricken in years; and he very naturally wished to see the promise beginning to be fulfilled, that in Isaac should his seed be called. Therefore, with great anxiety, which is indicated by his making his servant swear an oath of a most solemn kind, he gave him the commission to go to the old family abode in Mesopotamia, and seek for Isaac a bride from thence. Although that family was not all that could be desired, yet it was the best he knew of; and as some heavenly light lingered there, he hoped to find in that place the best wife for his son. The business was, however, a serious one which he committed to his servant. My brethren, this is nothing compared with the weight which hangs on the true minister of Christ. All the Great Father's heart is set on giving to Christ a church which shall be His beloved for ever. Oh, for grace to carry out this commission!

This message was weighty because of the person for whom the spouse was sought. Isaac was indeed, to the servant he was unique. He was a man born according to promise, not after the flesh, but by the power of God; and you know how in Christ, and in all that are one with Christ, the life comes by the promise and the power of God, and springeth not of man. Isaac was himself the fulfilment of promise, and the heir of the promise. Infinitely glorious is our Lord Jesus as the Son of man! Who shall declare His generation? Where shall be found a helpmeet for Him? Isaac had been sacrificed. Abraham in spirit had offered up his son; and you know who He is of whom we preach, and for whom we preach, even Jesus, who has laid down His life a sacrifice for sinners. How shall we find men and women who can worthily recompense love so amazing, so divine, as that of Him who died the death of the cross?

An Extraordinary Personage;

Said I not truly that it was a joyful but a weighty errand when you think what she must be to whom his master's son should be espoused? She must, at least, be willing and beautiful. In the day of God's power hearts are made willing. There can be no marriage to Jesus without a heart of love. Where shall we find this willing heart? Only where the grace of God has wrought it. The Spirit of God implants a love which is of heavenly origin, and renews the heart by a regeneration from above; and then we seek to be one with Jesus, but not till then.

Think what she will become who is married to Isaac? She is to be his delight; his loving friend and companion.

She is to be Partner of his wealth; and specially is she to be a partaker in the great covenant promise, which was peculiarly entailed upon Abraham and his family. When a sinner comes to Christ, what does Christ make of him? Ah, dear friends! it is a very small business in the esteem of some to preach the gospel; and yet, if God is with us, ours is more than angels' service. In a humble way you are telling of Jesus to your boys and girls in your classes; and some will despise you as "only Sunday-school teachers"; but your work has a spiritual weight about it unknown to conclaves of senators, and absent from the counsels of emperors. Upon what you say, death, and hell, and worlds unknown are hanging.

In carrying out his commission, this servant must spare no exertion. It would be required of him to journey to a great distance, having a general indication of direction, but not knowing the way. When he reached the place, he must exercise great common sense, and at the same time a trustful dependence upon the goodness and wisdom of God. It would be a wonder of wonders if he ever met the chosen woman, and only the Lord could bring it to pass. We should have cried, "Who is sufficient for these things?" but we see that the Lord Jehovah made him sufficient, and his mission was happily carried out. How can we put ourselves into the right position to win sinners for Jesus?

II. Secondly, I would have you consider which is mentioned. Abraham's servant said, "Peradventure the woman will not be willing to follow me unto this land." This is a very serious, grave, and common difficulty. If the woman be not willing, nothing can be done; force and fraud are out of the question; there must be a true will, or there can be no marriage in this instance. Here was the difficulty: here was a will to be dealt with. Ah, my brethren! this is our difficulty still. Let me describe this difficulty in detail as it appeared to the servant, and appears to us.

The Reasonable Fear

She may not believe my report, or be impressed by it. When I come to her, and tell her that I am sent by Abraham, she may look me in the face, and say, "There be many deceivers nowadays." If I tell her that my master's son is surpassingly beautiful and rich, and that he would fain take her to himself, she may answer, "Strange tales and romances are common in these days: but the prudent do not quit their homes." Brethren in our case this is a sad fact. Here is a heavenly marriage, and right royal nuptials placed within your reach; but with a sneer you turn aside, and prefer the witcheries of sin.

There was another difficulty: she was expected to feel a love to one she had never seen. She had only newly heard that there was such a person as Isaac, but yet she must love him enough to leave her kindred, and go to a distant land. This could only be because she recognized the will of Jehovah in the matter. Ah, my dear hearers, all that we tell you is concerning things not seen as yet; and here is our difficulty. Unless God the Holy Ghost shall work a miracle of grace upon your hearts, you will not be persuaded by us to quit your old associations, and join yourselves to our beloved Lord. And yet, if you did come to Him, and love Him, He would more than content you; for you would find in Him rest unto your souls, and a peace which passeth all understanding.

Abraham's servant may have thought:

She May Refuse

to make so great a change as to quit Mesopotamia for Canaan. She had been born and bred away there in a settled country, and all her associations were with her father's house; and to marry Isaac she must tear herself away. So, too, you cannot have Jesus and have the world too: you must break with sin to be joined to Jesus. You must come away from the licentious world, the fashionable world, the scientific world, and from the (so-called) religious world. If you become a Christian, you must quit old habits, old motives, old ambitions, old pleasures, old boasts, old modes of thought. There must come to you as great a change as if you had died, and were made over again.

Moreover, it might be a great difficulty to Rebekah, if she had had any difficulties at all, to think that she must henceforth lead a pilgrim life. She would quit house and farm for tent and gipsy life. Abraham and Isaac found no city to dwell in, but wandered from place to place, dwelling alone, sojourners with God. Rebekah might have said, "That will not do for me.

I Cannot Outlaw Myself.

I cannot quit the comforts of a settled abode to ramble over the fields wherever the flocks may require me to roam." It does not strike the most of mankind that it would be a good thing to be in the world, and yet not to be of it. They are no strangers in the world, they long to be admitted more fully into its "society." They are not aliens here with their treasures in heaven, they long to have a good round sum on earth, and find their heaven in enjoying it themselves, and enriching their families. Earthworms as they are, the earth contents them. If any man becomes unworldly, and makes spiritual things his one object, they despise him as a dreamy enthusiast. Yet the spiritual is, after all, the only real: the material is in deepest truth the visionary and unsubstantial.

So you see our difficulty. Many disbelieve altogether, and others cavil and object. A greater number will not even listen to our story and of those who do listen, most are careless and others dally with it, and postpone consideration. Alas! we speak to unwilling ears.

III. In the third place, I would enlarge upon

His Very Natural Suggestion.

This prudent steward said, "Peradventure the woman will not be willing to follow me unto this land: Must I needs bring thy son again unto the land from whence thou camest?" If she will not come to Isaac, shall Isaac go down to her? This is the suggestion of the present hour; if the world will not come to Jesus, shall Jesus tone down His teachings to the world n other words, if the world will not rise to the hurch, shall not the church go down to the vorld? Instead of bidding men to be convert-d, and come out from among sinners, and be eparate from them, let us join with the ungodly vorld, enter into union with it, and pervade it vith our influence by allowing it to influence us.

The deceitful adulteration of doctrine is at-ended by a falsification of experience. Men re now told that they were born good, or were ade so by their infant baptism, and so that reat sentence, "Ye must be born again," is de-ived of its force.

Repentance is Ignored, aith is a drug in the market compared with honest doubt;" mourning for sin and commun-on with God are dispensed with, to make way or entertainments, and socialism, and politics f varying shades. Be fashionable, and think vith those who profess to be scientific—this is he first and great commandment of the modern chool; and the second is like unto it—do not e singular, but be as worldly as your neighbors. hus is Isaac going down into Padan-aram; hus is the church going down to the world.

Men seem to say, It is of no use going on in he old way, fetching out one here and an-ther there from the great mass. We want quicker way. To wait till people are born gain, and become followers of Christ, is a long rocess: let us abolish the separation between he regenerate and unregenerate. Come into he church, all of you, converted or uncon-erted. You have good wishes and good reso-utions; that will do: don't trouble about more. : is true you do not believe the gospel, but either do we. You believe something or other. ome along; if you do not believe anything, no matter; your "honest doubt" is better by far han faith. "But," say you, "nobody talks so." ossibly they do not use the same words, but his is the real meaning; this is can justify the broadest statement I have made r the action or by the speech of certain minis-rs, who are treacherously betraying our holy ligion under pretence of adapting it to this ogressive age. The new plan is to assimilate e church to the world, and so include a larger ea within its bounds. By semi-dramatic per-rmances they make houses of prayer to approx-nate to the theatre; they turn their services to musical displays, and their sermons into olitical harangues or philosophical essays. Is not so that the Lord's-day is becoming more d more a day of recreation or of idleness, and e Lord's house either a joss-house full of idols, a political club, where there is more enthusi-m for a party than zeal for God? This, then, the proposal. In order to win the world, the rd Jesus must conform Himself, His people, d His Word to the world. I will not dwell y longer on so loathsome a proposal.

The Drift of the Times.

IV. Notice his master's outspoken, believing Repudiation of the Proposal.

: says, shortly and sharply, "Beware thou that u bring not my son thither again." The Lord sus Christ heads that grand emigration party ich has come right out from the world. Ad-essing His disciples, He says, "Ye are not of world, even as I am not of the world." We not of the world by birth, not of the world life, not of the world in object, not of the rld in spirit, not of the world in any respect atever. Jesus, and those who are in Him, nstitute a new race. The proposal to go back the world is abhorrent to our best instincts; deadly to our noblest life. A voice from iven cries, "Bring not my son thither again." Besides, dear friends, no good can come of try-to conform to the world. Suppose the ser-nt's policy could have been adopted, and Isaac l gone down to Nahor's house, what would e been the motive? The test of separation wholesome, and by no means ought it to be itted. She is a poor wife who would not e a journey to reach her husband. And all converts that the church will ever make by ening down its doctrine, and by becoming worldly, will not be worth one bad farthing a gross. When we get them, the next question will be, "How can we get rid of them?" They would be of no earthly use to us. Why is there such spiritual death to-day?

Why is False Doctrine so Rampant

in the churches? It is because we have ungodly people in the church and in the ministry. Eagerness for numbers, and especially eagerness to include respectable people, has adulterated many churches, and made them lax in doctrine and practice, and fond of silly amusements. These are the people who despise a prayer-meeting, but rush to see "living waxworks" in their schoolrooms. God save us from converts who are made by lowering the standard.

Besides, Abraham felt that there could be no reason for taking Isaac down there, for the Lord would assuredly find him a wife. Abraham said, "He shall send His angel before thee, and thou shalt take a wife unto my son from thence." Are you afraid that preaching the gospel will not win souls? Are you despondent as to success in God's way? Is this why you pine for clever oratory? Is this why you must have music and architecture and flowers and millinery? After all, is it by might and by power, and not by the Spirit of God? It is even so in the opinion of many.

Brethren beloved, there are many things which I might allow to other worshippers which I have denied myself in conducting the worship of this congregation. I have long worked out before your very eyes the experiment of the unaided attractiveness of the gospel of Jesus. Our service is severely plain. No man ever comes hither to gratify his eye with art, or his ear with music. I have set before you, these many years, nothing but Christ crucified and the simplicity of the gospel; yet where will you find such a crowd as this gathered together this morning? Where will you find such a multitude as this meeting, Sabbath after Sabbath, for five-and-thirty years? There is no need to go down to Egypt for help. To invite the devil to help Christ is shameful.

V. And now, fifthly, observe His righteous

Absolution of His Servant.

"If the woman will not be willing to follow thee, then thou shalt be clear from this my oath: only bring not my son thither again." When we lie a-dying, if we have faithfully preached the gospel, our conscience will not accuse us for having kept closely to it: we shall not mourn that we did not play the fool or the politician in order to increase our congregation. Oh, no! our Master will give us full absolution, even if few be gathered in, so long as we have been true to Him. "If the woman will not be willing to follow thee, then thou shalt be clear from this my oath; only bring not my son thither again." Do not try the dodges which debase religion. Keep to the simple gospel; and if the people are not converted by it, you will be clear. Results are in God's hands. If that dear child in your class is not converted, yet if you have set before him the gospel of Jesus Christ with loving, prayerful earnestness, you shall not be without your reward. If I preach from my very soul the grand truth that faith in the Lord Jesus Christ will save my hearers, and if I persuade and entreat them to believe in Jesus unto eternal life; if they will not do so, their blood will lie upon their own heads. When I go back to my Master, if I have faithfully told out His message of free grace and dying love, I shall be clear. I have preached God's truth, so far as I know it, and I have not been ashamed of its peculiarities. That I might not stultify my testimony, I have cut myself clear of those who err from the faith, and even from those who associate with them. What more can I do to be honest with you? If, after all, men will not have Christ and His gospel, it is their own concern.

If Rebekah had Not Come to Isaac she would have lost her place in the holy line. My beloved hearer, will you have Jesus Christ or not? He has come into the world to save sinners, and He casts out none. Will you accept Him? Will you trust Him? "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." Will you believe Him? Will you be baptized into His name? If so, salvation is yours; but if not, He Himself hath said it, "He that believeth not shall be damned." Oh, do not expose yourselves to that damnation! Or, if you are set upon it; then, when the great white throne shall be seen in yonder skies, and the day of wrath has come, do me the justice to acknowledge that I bade you flee to Jesus, and that I did not amuse you with novel theories. Clear me in that day of all complicity with the novel inventions of deluded men. As for my Lord, I pray of Him grace to be faithful to the end, both to His truth and to your souls. Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

AN ANSWER TO PETER.*

"ONE night, a few years ago," says Dr. J. M. King, "in one of my pastorates of New York, there came to my home a very degraded man, who said to me, 'Come, come quickly; there is a woman dying over here that wants counsel of a priest.' When I rose and went with him it was to one of the most degraded sections of the city, where fallen women congregate. When I reached the place I found that couriers had been sent in different directions, and a Presbyterian clergyman, and a Roman Catholic priest were already by the side of the dying woman. As I entered the room the priest said, 'We have been talking to her. You talk to her now.' After putting a few simple, direct questions to the dying soul, I said to her, 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and you shall be saved.' Almost in a moment there came into her face a transfigured look. But in the hour and article of death, which came in about thirty minutes after I entered the room, the power of her early education asserted itself over her, and she thought she could not die in safety without the last ministrations of the Church of Rome. She called for extreme unction. But the priest saw that she was dying, and whatever was to be done had to be done quickly. He said to her, 'Do you believe that the blood of Jesus Christ saves you?' 'Oh, yes!' she said, 'I believe it.' 'Then,' said he, 'never mind about extreme unction. When you get up to the gates of glory and meet Peter, and he asks you what is your title of admission, look him in the face and say, 'The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth me from all sin.' He will understand you, and he will let you in.'"

A Daring Lifeboat Captain.

At the back of one of our capes, four years ago this very day, about 10 o'clock in the morning, the signal-gun was heard. The captain of the lifeboat sounded his trumpet, and his men rushed to the boat. Three times they pushed her out into the surf and three times she came back. The fourth time they were successful. They rowed out in the snowstorm, but found the sea so rough that it was with great danger that they could board. There were eight men on the wreck. Thrice the men in the lifeboat rowed around the wreck. One of the men said, "Captain, what shall we do?" The captain said, "At the next sea I shall put the boat on the wreck, then every man of you save a man." "But," it was asked, "what will become of the other man? there are eight of them." The captain replied, "God will take care of him." At the next sea he put the boat on the raft (for the wreck had become a raft), and every man pulled a man into the boat, and the eighth man jumped in after them. They rowed through the breakers to the shore. They put them into the humane house and carefully nursed them. At 4 o'clock in the afternoon a rocket went up just about on the same shoal, and the captain said, "Men, there is another wreck out there; we can't see it, but there are men perishing." The men went to work once more, took the boat down to the surf, and four times the boat was driven back. Then the men, straightened up and said, "Captain, back of those hills are our wives and children; if we go again they may be widows and fatherless to-morrow." "Yes," said the captain, "I understand that, but those men out there have wives and children, and if we do not go, there will be other widows and fatherless children!" He sprang into his boat, and they went out again and saved fifteen men, and brought them on shore, and watched them through the night. The next morning the wives and children came from back of the hills, and telegrams went all over New England, announcing what these men had done; and there came back telegrams from the Governors of two of our States, sending their congratulations to those brave men for saving citizens of their States. We have been hearing the signal-gun by day; we have been seeing the rocket by night. The Church is the lifeboat, and the only one that has come down from glory; and wherever the signal-gun is heard, if a man here and a man there will respond to it, each will save his man, and in a few years we shall hear no more about the perils; the signal-gun will be silent, there will be no more rockets, and but one strain: "All hail the power of Jesus name!"

* From "Co-operation in Christian Work," being some of the addresses delivered at the Conference of the Evangelical Alliance in Washington, D. C., in December, 1887. Pp. 157. Price, in cloth 60 cents; in paper covers, 30 cents. Published by The Baker & Taylor Company, 740 Broadway, New York.

The Hon. Robert B. Roosevelt

Scene on the Banks of the Susquehanna.

MR. ROBERT B. ROOSEVELT.

THE appointment of Mr. Roosevelt as Minister-resident at the Hague has been generally recognized as one peculiarly appropriate, and one which might have been made with as much propriety by a Republican as by a Democratic Administration. Though Mr. Roosevelt has generally acted with the Democrats, his record has been chiefly one of active hostility to corruption and misgovernment; and he has been always ready to attack plunderers, whether they had foisted themselves on one party or the other. It is, however, by his descent and personal predilections that he has the strongest qualifications for the post. His ancestors were among the Dutch settlers who, some two centuries ago, founded the Empire City, and his historical studies have made him an ardent admirer of the nation to which he has now gone as Minister for the United States. In his person the Dutch people will have an opportunity of seeing the effect of transatlantic influences on Dutch character.

Mr. Roosevelt was born in New York in 1829. He is therefore now fifty-nine years of age. He studied at Harvard and entered the legal profession. He was, however, independent of professional income, and was soon so strongly attracted to the political arena that he abandoned his lucrative practice to devote himself exclusively to politics and literature. In 1868, in conjunction with Charles G. Halpine, he edited the New York Citizen. He also published several books on the culture and catching of fish, a subject in which he was an acknowledged master. He was made a member of the Fish Commission, and in 1881 became its president. During Tweed's reign of fraud in New York, Mr. Roosevelt was active in uniting the best elements of the two parties in opposition to the unscrupulous dictator. He assisted in the organization of the Citizens Association, which ultimately succeeded in freeing the city of Tweed's rapacity. He also served in the Forty-second Congress, and there, too, he distinguished himself by thwarting the designs of a dishonest ring. Mr. Roosevelt consequently has the best wishes of his fellow-citizens of both parties.

ON THE BANKS OF THE SUSQUEHANNA.

(See Illustration.)

ONE of the many charming scenes to be met with by the lover of nature on the banks of the Susquehanna is depicted in the illustration on this page. Probably that river, in its long and tortuous course, from its rise in Lake Otsego, New York, to its mouth in Chesapeake Bay, at Havre de Grace, presents more of these beautiful pictures than any other river on earth. Its length is about five hundred miles, and in its course receives many tributaries, notably its western branch, which is itself a noble stream some two hundred miles long. The country through which it passes is classic ground to all American readers. James Fenimore Cooper has made it familiar to every schoolboy by his wonderfully graphic descriptions, and the scenes of most of his stories can still be recognized by the admiring traveller. To the American patriot one spot which the river waters will always be sacred ground. It is that of the famous Vale of Wyoming, where, on July 3, 1778, the massacre of the patriots occurred at the hands of Major Butler, of infamous memory.

ELLA'S PICTURE.

(See Illustration.)

"I HAVE been a traveller in many lands," said an old man, who, captured by his four grandchildren, bright girls, just budding into womanhood, yielded to their demand for some story of his own life; "I have seen many sights, and looked on many of the most lovely pictures that the most famous artists have produced, but n memory has held none so clearly as one I sa in my youth, and which I sketched myself afte ward. It was that of a young girl leaning again a rustic seat in an old country garden, her ey bent on some needlework on which her finge were busy, and her head framed on a backgrou of leaves and flowers. I have that rough sket still, and some day I will show it to you."

"Oh! that won't do at all," said the gir "we must see it now to help us understan Tell us where it is; we will get it."

"Ah! I do not keep it where heedless finge might meddle with it, but if you insist on see it, I will get it, as I suppose I shall have to sooner or later."

"Oh yes, we insist, came in a musical chor

The old gentleman rose with a sigh, and w assumed reluctance crossed the room to an cabinet, from an inner drawer of which he tracted a paper yellow with age. "Handle carefully, girls," he said; "it would not sell much among the picture-dealers, but I se high value upon it, as most artists do on th own productions."

The girls took the picture, and looked at curiously. As their grandfather had said, artistic merits were not remarkable, but youthful hands had evidently worked lovin upon it, striving, probably vainly, to endow face and form with some of the charms of image cherished in his memory. It was easy see, from the exquisite oval of the face, the d cately chiselled mouth, and the long eyelash that the girl must have been very beautiful; a type of beauty, too, that would make a d impression on a youth of ardent, though nature.

"Now tell us about her, grandpapa," said girls. "Fancy grandpapa having a romance his life, and keeping it a secret all these ye Did she die? Did she marry some one e How was it you did not win her?" Gra mamma was still living, and the girls were that the lined and furrowed face, and the to less mouth, now fallen in, sweet as it was ir venerable cheerfulness, was not the face ske ed on the paper.

"Well," said the old gentleman, "you n let me tell my story in my own way, and your questions afterward. As I told you, I that face just as I sketched it, but I did sketch it at the time, you may be sure. I sa through a gap in the foliage, and as I kn might never see it again, I did not take my

it during the few minutes t I dared stay. The fact hat it was through love of t girl that I was leaving home and native land.
were neighbors, and, it
as to me, we had been ers from childhood. I
't think, though, that I w how much I loved her il she was lost to me. We e to be married after I graduated, and had set-down to the law. But n I went to college I had much money and too lit-principle to do well.
ries of my habits and rse of life reached Ella's ie before I was through ege, and her father bee uneasy. She was his daughter, and it was likely that he would ust such a treasure to orthless, dissolute spend-ft."

You are not talking about rself, are you, Grand-a?" asked one of his itors.

Oh yes, my dear, that was id so it would have been he end of the chapter but he grace of God. But to on with my story: Ella
sed to believe anything nst me, and I suppose I too sure of her love to be ehensive. When I went e, however, and there
d no longer be any doubt it my weakness, as I called r my wickedness, as Ella's er called it, I soon real-the consequences. I was bidden the house, and herself told me plainly
I must think no more
ier. I was stunned by the blow. Could believe it; pleaded, struggled, entreated, but o purpose. Then I made up my mind to et her, but found it impossible. Worse still, uld not conquer the evil habits that had ght my trouble upon me, and I lost hope n I found that even if I did conquer them, ather would have no faith in the permae of my reformation, and, therefore, would refuse his consent to our marriage. And was with him. There was no wavering t her. So, at last, I could bear it no longer, I went away. I had some money that I was ing to establish myself and furnish a home, just then a little fortune from an aunt ped in, so I set off for Europe in about the miest frame of mind you can imagine. But ery day of my departure I sneaked down to s home and peered about for a parting pse of her. That was the time when I saw s I tried to draw her in that sketch. I did the ship, when I was feeling miserable gh to throw myself overboard."

e old gentleman stopped and sighed
tly. "I need not tell you," he went on, w the next three years were spent. Vain gles after a better life, helpless sinking back degradation, that was the summary of it.
money dwindled. I went from one Euro-capital to another, finding no help, but y of temptation. I became hopeless at and had resolved that when my last dollar spent I would commit suicide. That was ime when God laid hold of me. I was just worst, but, somehow, I had the courage to ve that this time it would not end in fail-I had an inward strength that I had never before—and I knew from Whom it came.
ld me, and I recovered my physical and al power with a rapidity that surprised myself. I obtained work, studied hard, and at the end of a year I was a new man. I knew I was safe, for never once had the Power in which I trusted failed me.

Ella's Picture.

"Then I wrote to Ella and her father. I concealed nothing, told the miserable story in its true details, and how I had come to believe myself safe. I asked for nothing. I told them as friends who would be glad to know. That was all. Well, I heard nothing for a long time, and I began to think I had no hope of Ella after all. I used to sit in my Paris lodging and look at that picture, trying to read into the face some expression of pity and love, until my heart would sink at the thought of what I had lost. At last, news came. Ella's father had been making inquiries. It was hard that he did not trust to my word, but I could not blame him. He wrote that if I would come home and lead an honorable, decent life for two years, he would reconsider his resolution. You may be sure I lost no time about doing that, and I went through my probation to his satisfaction. Ella and I were married, and so ends my story."

"But how was it; did she die?" asked the girls.

"Oh no, Ella is living yet. Ah, you did not think it! That is Ella's portrait, and she is your grandmamma! Changed, yes, a little older, may be, but just the same to me."

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. L. S. Keyser.

(Continued from page 687.)

Delicate Ground.

THE intimacy between Hadley Madelling and his ministerial friend, Mr. Hanson, grew rapidly, and each seemed to esteem the other more highly with closer acquaintance. Both were ardent lovers of nature, and enthusiastic pedestrians. Their walks were enlivened with discussions in which each found in the other a foeman worthy of his steel.

One delightful evening Hadley came upon his friend in the street, and easily persuaded him to enjoy a moonlight excursion. Before they were clear of the city Hadley caught sight of a figure on the opposite side of the street which caused the blood to mount to his forehead. His step quickened involuntarily, and his hands clenched, for in that figure he knew his college rival and personal foe, Harrison Duneman.

"What is it?" asked Mr. Hanson, as if his companion had spoken.

"Look at that man!" said Hadley, almost fiercely; "he was a classmate of mine at college. He is a divinity student now. I tell you, sir, that man's meanness and contemptible tricks confirmed my belief that Christianity has no healthful, ennobling power over a man's moral nature." And Hadley proceeded to sketch Duneman as he knew him.

"It would not have surprised you nearly so much, you would not have thought the man nearly so vile, if he had made no profession of religion?"

"No, that was just it; making the profession, yet being so mean and vile."

"What a tribute you unconsciously pay to religion!" said Mr. Hanson. "You see, you expect a higher morality from Christians than from other men. The standard is higher; you perceive that the man is not living up to it. You imply that he is a hypocrite; that he probably does not possess the religion he boasts of. Well, that hypothesis relieves religion of the responsibility for him. If he has none, it cannot influence him. Honestly, now, if he lived up to the standard he professes, would he not be a better man?"

"Of course," said Hadley.

"Then, you see, you honor the creed in condemning the man."

"Still, you exculpate religion only by hypothesis. Probably, you say, he has no religion. How can we tell? I, as an outsider, find a man professing religion and living a contemptible life. Now, I am justified in contending that his creed has not elevated him, and, I should say, cannot elevate him."

"There are many whom that creed does elevate. You must have known such. A physician who administers morphia in doses that cannot fail to produce sleep, would, if he found his patient sleepless, refuse to believe that the medicine had been taken, whatever that patient might say to the contrary. When I find a man living an ignoble, unscrupulous life, his profession counts with me very little, because I know that 'he that hath this hope purifieth himself.' He has not the hope—the faith—or he would not be what he is. When you experience that faith you will know it, too."

"But there are cases of men of high Christian character, even preachers, who have committed most disgraceful immoralities." And Hadley mentioned one instance which at that time was making a grave public scandal. "His religion did not preserve him," he said.

"No," said Mr. Hanson, "but your psychology may explain it on charitable principles.

Have you never known what sudden and overwhelming temptation was? Has it in no instance led you to do something inconsistent with the principles that ordinarily govern your life? I, on a theological plane, would say that the remains of the old Adam continue in the human system after conversion, held down and restrained, but still there. Now, if the jailor relax his vigilance for a moment, and the captives burst their bonds and run riot; if then, instead of calling for help, he struggles alone and is overpowered, what then? You blame the man, you pity him, you regret his folly, but you do not utterly execrate him, nor would it be inconceivable that the man should afterward, bitterly deploring his sin and his weakness, become more faithful and vigilant than other men who have not so fallen."

"I see your point," said Hadley, "but who, then, is safe?"

"No one who trusts in himself. Even to the disciples Christ said, 'Watch and pray,' and they learned by most sad experience what cowardice they were capable of when they neglected their duty. But to come back to our original question: you must admit that an infidel who is guilty of sin is not inconsistent with his principles."

"Mr. Hanson," exclaimed Hadley, hotly, "do you mean to arraign—"

"Excuse me," said Mr. Hanson, "the remark was not personal; what I meant was, that the infidel has no help, no restraining influence, but that of his own manhood, and we are sadly conscious how little that can do."

Hadley was silent: the shaft went home, and he could not but admit that the clergyman was right. They were in the city again by this time, and they were separating, when Hadley said. "When shall I see you again? Friday night?"

"No, I am going to the lecture: you will go, too, shall you not?"

"Oh, yes; I had forgotten it." And the two friends bade each other good night, and Hadley went to his room to meditate on the talk of the evening.

On the following Friday he was early at the lecture, and was wishing that Mr. Hanson would come and occupy a vacant seat next to his own, when he saw the clergyman enter; and saw, too, to his dismay, that he was escorting Miss Winters. What the lecturer said, what the applause was about, what so interested the audience after the lecture was over, Hadley never knew. To his mental consciousness only two persons were present besides himself, and in his storm-tossed soul a fiercer tempest raged than any he had ever known. The time came afterward when a more reasonable, equitable spirit asserted itself; but while that meeting continued, blind, unreasoning passion rent his breast. Was the man whom he had learned to love, to revere, to implicitly trust, about to rob him of the only treasure that the world held for him? Was the hope of winning that girl, which, to his amazement, he found to be still strong within him, to be snatched from him by the hand he had grasped in friendship? At that moment he actually hated Hanson! The smooth, dexterous, religious preacher was the most formidable rival he could have. He was just the man Miss Winters would naturally admire. Yet how cruel it was! It was inhuman on Hanson's part to so desolate his life! Yet how was Hanson to know what Madeline was to him? And was it not natural that his friend, so mentally like himself, should be similarly vulnerable to the darts that had pierced his own heart? And so the inward struggle went on, his lower nature tortured by hatred of his rival, his better nature bidding him admit that he had no claim upon Madeline which it was Hanson's duty to respect.

After he left the building, after he had reached his room, he was no nearer calm. He was ashamed of his state of mind; he recognized the injustice of his animosity toward Mr. Hanson, but he was powerless to suppress it. It must be concealed, however. It was so childish, so unreasonable, that to acknowledge it must provoke Hanson's contempt. But he must have time to fight it down, and till then he must avoid his rival. He could not meet him as a friend; he was ashamed to meet him as an enemy. But it was not so easy to avoid him.

Mr. Hanson was strongly drawn toward Hadley, and he longed, with the true fervor of Christ's ambassador, to win the brilliant sceptic for his Master. He was amazed, when meeting Madelling on the street and greeting him warmly, to get no response but a curt, formal bow. Still more surprised was he, when calling upon him, to be told in Hadley's frigid tones that he was engaged—was busy. The clergyman vainly tried to imagine what offence he could have given, and failing to remember any, determined to insist on the explanation that no honorable gentleman could refuse to give to another. Accordingly, seeing Hadley one day walking ahead of him on the street, he followed, and as they reached a retired spot, he thrust his hand within the young man's arm, and said, in his kindest tones:

"Madelling, you are offended; I have wounded you unconsciously in some way. But I cannot afford to have you cherish resentment. Let us be manly about it. Come home with me and tell me my fault. You will not find me slow to apologize, or to make amends. Friendships, such as ours has been, are too rare in life to lose them lightly."

What could Hadley say? This man was too noble, too manly, to be treated petulantly. He was ashamed of his anger, and was completely overcome by the frank cordiality of the clergyman. "I am afraid it can do no good, Hanson," he said, "but you are entitled to an explanation. Yes, I will come."

"Now what is it?" said Mr. Hanson when they were seated in his study. "Consider beforehand that whatever I have done to annoy you has been done unwittingly, and in so far as I am wrong my apology shall be ample."

"You have done no wrong, my dear sir," Hadley broke out, impetuously. "You have not offended me, but you have wounded me deeply and I have not had time to recover. It is I who have to apologize for discourtesy, and I do so humbly. I am fearfully weak in this thing, and I must have time to get back fortitude."

"But what is it, Madelling? I must know. I can surely undo the mischief."

"I fear you cannot, and I am ashamed to tell you the cause."

"False pride and false shame, my friend," said Hanson, laying his hand on the young man's shoulder. "Tell me frankly. There is no trouble but is made the easier to bear by confidence."

"I will tell you, Mr. Hanson, though I may lose your respect by doing so, as I have lost my own by self knowledge. I am jealous, madly, violently, unreasonably jealous. I have long loved Madeline Winters, and you—you—" The tears would come. It was of no use struggling, and Hadley covered his face with his hands, and his whole frame shook with emotion.

Mr. Hanson's face grew ashy pale. A great lump was in his throat, and his hand nervously clutched the edge of the desk near him, as he stood silently looking down on the agitated man. Gradually the sobs ceased, and Hadley, recovering control of his voice, said: "Miss Winters and I were classmates in college. We were thrown into each other's society. For a time she seemed to be pleased with my attentions, and when I confessed my love to her one evening, she almost gave her consent to be my wife, only asking for a little time in which to consult her parents, and I could not help but believe that she cared for me; but for some inexplicable reason she wrote me a week later that our relations must cease altogether. I have tried to banish her from my mind, but when I met her a few weeks ago in this place, all my old love revived again, and—and—forgive me this sentimental outburst. I have no claim upon her. You have a right to win her if you can."

Something very like a frown overcast Hanson's brow as he listened to this confession; but if there was a rising feeling of jealousy in his heart, the traitor was quickly ejected.

"You have made an honest acknowledgment, and I respect you for it, and sympathize with your trouble," he said, in more measured tones than usual. "Now, Madelling, there ought to be a perfect understanding between us, or we cannot hope to do each other good, and a necessary antecedent to that is an honest confession on my part. About five months ago Miss Winters came to this place, just after she had left college. I met her, and received her by letter into my church. From the first she stirred my affections as no other woman had ever done, and I sought her society; but though I confess that I am attached to her, I have never made her a declaration of love. I acknowledge that I have been thinking of it; but if you have any claim—"

"Dear Hanson, your generosity overwhelms me," interrupted Hadley. "Words cannot describe what I have suffered on Miss Winters' account, but still I am only a rejected lover. Yet, Hanson," he broke out, passionately, "she almost told me that she loved me, that I had the first claim upon her affections. Oh why did she reject me?"

Mr. Hanson's voice shook a little as he spoke, but his words were honest and manly. He said, "Madelling, this is a fierce trial for us both. Each heart knoweth its own bitterness; let us help each other. We must be friends in spite of this untoward affair. I will tell you what I propose. I will put aside my suit for a time; you shall have an open field for a reasonable period. See Miss Winters, talk with her, and when you think the time propitious try to ascertain why she rejected you, and satisfy yourself whether there is any hope for you. When you have done so, come and tell me. In the meantime you must trust to my honor. I must visit at her home, I must continue pastoral relations, but I will make no effort to win her love. But if you tell me that there is no hope for you, then I am free to try. I will wait for that."

"That is nobly magnanimous," said Madelling, "more than I could have believed possible. I honor you for it, however it may end."

"Then you agree, and we are to be friends?"

"Certainly, and on my side conduct worthy of your nobility."

"Then," said the clergyman, "since this matter is so important to both of us, so that our lives may be greatly affected by the issue, and as we do not know which of us may have to suffer, but one surely, I feel that it would be wise to consult One who has promised direction in every difficulty. We ought to ask Him to help us to do right and keep every evil passion under control. What do you say, Madelling? Shall we kneel down and pray about it?"

"I cannot pray," said Hadley in broken tones; "but I will kneel with you while you pray."

Full of unfaltering trust was the prayer that went up, in low, tremulous tones, to a throne of grace from the clergyman's lips. Hanson was a man of strong faith in the providential dealings of God in the personal affairs of men. Whatever might be the issue of the matter which he placed under divine advisement, he knew that in the hands of God it would have no end but good to the one who lost as to the one who won. The sceptic who knelt with him had long rejected the doctrine of God's immanence and interest in the lives of men, maintaining that all things were controlled by inflexible law; but as he listened to his friend's earnest prayer, he felt that in some mysterious way there was a Presence near him that was more than human, and he rose from his knees soothed and uplifted. The two men grasped each other's hands warmly and vowed that, whatever should be the issue of their unhappy and involuntary rivalry, they would be loyal in their friendship to each other.

"Come to me," said Hanson, "and tell me frankly if you think that I am not keeping faith

:h you. Let no suspicion, no doubt, dwell a ›ment in your mind. Make yourself quite :e of your position, do not hurry matters to a :cipitate conclusion on my account; but when ı know, then mercifully end my suspense :hout delay."

"I will," said Hadley, "I promise all, and I nor you the more for my own self-knowledge of at your magnanimity must be costing you." The two men grasped hands, and both knew it their friendship was one that might cost her of them pangs of bitter suffering, but could ng neither humiliation nor self-reproach.

(To be Continued.)

CALEB'S INHERITANCE.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. Lesson for November 11. Josh. 14 : 5-15. Golden Text, Ps. 37 : 3.

leb's Faith and Courage—His Report as a Spy —Confidence Resting on Experience—The Unlaimed Land—Belonging to the Nation, but ıot Occupied—The Believer's Unclaimed Privieges—A Healed Woman Scorned—The Heart's Thoughts Revealed—The Trodden Land Possessed—The Octogenarian's Unabated Force—Fellowship Perfected.

'TRUST in the Lord, and do good: so shalt ›u dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be ." (Ps. 37 : 3.) Thank God, this word of d's, written some three thousand years ago, s worn well; and, far from being worn out, it ıs true to-day, and as fresh and as reliable, as en it was first spoken. Caleb, the son of ›hunneh, was a child of faith. Through ck and thin, through good report and evil ›ort, in the wilderness or in the land, he trust- in the Lord and did good. He always took d's side of the question, whatever it was.

We first hear of Caleb as one of the spies sent t by Moses to search out the land of Canaan. ıile the fearful, tremulous hearts of the ten cs gave them an eye for everything but God, d they saw all things large but the Almighty, leb, whose eye was focussed by faith,

Saw God

›ve all, through all, and in all. When the rful spies eloquently described the strength the inhabitants, the impregnability of the tresses, the prevalence of men of gigantic ture, Caleb saw only the promises of God d His faithfulness. He saw the God whom thing daunted, who was never at a loss, who ›t His reservoirs in the solid rock, His gran- in the heavens, and who could engineer a id roadway in the depth of the sea when : need of His children required it. In full w of such a God, he had said, "Let us go up once, and possess it; for we are well able to ercome it." This was trusting in the Lord. was Caleb and Joshua who were bold enough, en the matter came to a complete uprising of : angry, disappointed people, and Moses and ron were on their faces before God, to take d's side, at the risk of their lives. The people re beside themselves with anger; they looked ›n Moses and Aaron as deceivers, and Caleb d Joshua, who took God's side, were looked ›n as traitors, and they were about to stone :m to death when they rendered their fearless timony, "The land which we passed through search it, is an exceeding good land. If the rd delight in us, then He will bring us into s land, and give it us; a land which floweth h milk and honey. Only rebel not ye against : Lord, neither fear ye the people of the d; for they are bread for us; their defence departed from them, and the Lord is with us r them not."

Caleb's Strong Point

s, "The Lord is with us." This was trusting the Lord. While we reckon upon our talents, r circumstances, our influence, our experience, : prospects, our friends, or anything else but d, we are but weak. All these things change. t when we reckon upon the Lord of hosts it He is with us, we are safe. "When I am ak, then am I strong." (II Cor. 12 : 10.) The rd can change any circumstance, alter any ›spect, add or take away any talent, destroy any influence, reverse any experience, turn any friend to foe. It is a vain thing to rely upon anything but the living God.

Caleb was obliged to suffer through the unbelief of the people. He, as well as they, must wander forty years in the wilderness; but it was like Joseph's prison to him, for the Lord was with him, and the time of his wilderness journeyings worked no wear upon his physical frame. God made it the same to him as though that forty years of his life never had been. Joshua had divided out the land of Canaan among the tribes according to the command of the Lord. "As the Lord commanded Moses, so the children of Israel did, and they divided the land." But there was yet

"Very Much Land to be Possessed"

(Josh. 13 : 1); land which God had given, but which the children of Israel had not claimed. Oh, is not this so with His children now? How many of God's promises lie fallen for want of His people claiming them, how few there are who dare to step out upon the Word of God beyond the miserable boundary line of church conventionalism, and oh, how many stigmatize those who trust in the living God as ignorant and wicked fanatics. At a certain meeting, a dear child of God who had been healed, bore testimony to what God had done for her, and the lady sitting next drew away from her, saying, "Oh how dreadful! have you been healed?" just as though she was infected by a kind of leprosy!

Then the children of Judah came unto Joshua in Gilgal: and Caleb the son of Jephunneh the Kenezite said unto him: Thou knowest the thing that the Lord said unto Moses the servant of God, concerning me and thee in Kadesh-barnea. Forty years old was I when Moses the servant of the Lord sent me from Kadesh-barnea to espy out the land; and I brought him word again as it was in mine heart." Oh what a tale this tells of what was in the heart of the other ten spies! It is when we are put to a test of our faith that we know, and other people know, what is in our hearts. "Nevertheless, my brethren that went up with me made the heart of the people melt; but I wholly followed the Lord my God. And Moses sware on that day, saying, "Surely the land whereon thy feet have trodden shall be thine inheritance and thy children's for ever, because thou hast wholly followed the Lord thy God." No doubt Caleb was attending to two separate promises of God by Moses. First, "My servant Caleb, because he had another spirit with him, and hath followed Me fully, him will I bring into the land whither he went; and his seed shall possess it" (Num. 14 : 24); and secondly, the general promise, made to all the people, "Every place whereon the soles of your feet shall tread, shall be yours." (Deut 11 : 24.) Joshua knew God well enough to be sure that it was His joy and pleasure to fulfil His Word whenever that word should be claimed of the faith of His children. And now, behold, the Lord hath kept me alive, as He said, these forty and five years, even since the Lord spake this word unto Moses, while the children of Israel wandered in the wilderness (it was no mere wandering to Caleb, for God was with him); and now, lo, I am this day four score and five years old. As yet I am as I was in the day that Moses sent me: as my strength was then, even so is my strength now for war, both to go out and to come in." God had so cared for His people, that their raiment waxed not old, neither did their foot swell during the forty years (Deut. 8 : 4); but here was a miracle more wonderful still—forty five years of a man's life had passed away, and because he had been true to God, and had not merited the judgment of the wilderness wandering, God had not allowed the wear of time to tell upon his bodily frame in all that period! Oh what a God we have, so strictly, impartially just! "Now therefore give me this mountain, whereof the Lord spake in that day; for thou heardest in that day how the Amakins were there, and that the cities were great and fenced: if so, He the Lord will be with me (or perhaps more correctly, "If the Lord is with me), then I shall be able to drive them out as the Lord said." Grand old man! He did not say, "Consider my age, and give me something easy, a place where there will be no great difficulties." He looked at the mountain, and all the climbing it entailed; he looked at the giants, and all the force needed to drive them out; and then he looked at the almightiness of

As Strong this Day

God Against All,

and said in his heart, "God is equal to it." Oh for more heroic souls, oh for more of those who rejoice when difficulties come, as the storm petrel is at home in the wild raging wind and roll of the thunder! We have too many faint-hearted drawing-room, feather bed, Christians, who, alas, in time of temptation fall away."

God loves the daring of faith. "Joshua blessed him, and gave unto Caleb, the son of Jephunneh, Hebron for an inheritance." Hebron means fellowship; and fellowship with God cuts us off from the world. It is like a mountain lifting us into another atmosphere. But he who will have real fellowship with God must be willing to renounce all which is not of God: fellowship is sharing with God, and it means leaving all which we cannot share with God. It was a choice inheritance which fell to the lot of Caleb, but the enemies to be driven out were stronger than in almost any other part of the land. Oh how distraction, the being occupied with trifles, hinders real fellowship with God! Oh how the fear of offending some friend, or of losing ground with some Christian, hinders fellowship with God! How, above all else, some wronged and wounded feeling hinders fellowship! Hebron became Caleb's inheritance before he Drove Out the Giants.

Let us taste the fellowship with God and His Son Jesus Christ, which is our inheritance, and then we can tolerate the giants no longer. "Caleb drove thence the three sons of Anak, Sheshai and Ahiman and Talman." (Josh. 15 : 14.) Having done this, he offered his daughter Achsah to wife to whoever should unite Kirjah sepher (the city of the book). If we have fellowship with God, we must have His Word opened to us. Othniel, the son of Kenaz, took the city of the book, and Achsah became his wife. But one thing more was wanting: her father had given her a south land, the sun shone on that side of the mountain; but she wanted springs of water, and urged her request on her father. No fellowship with God is sustained, even by His Word, without the living water of His Spirit. "And he gave her the upper springs, and the nether springs." Thus is fellowship perfected.

MRS. M. BAXTER'S WORKS.

THE following works by Mrs. M. Baxter, and others, may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York:

"Words for Daily Life," "Practical Lessons," "Life Lessons," "Leaves from Genesis," "Trials and Teachings of Paul." By Mrs. M. Baxter. Each, paper, 25 cts.; cloth, 35 cts. "Record of International Conference on Divine Healing. London," 15; Paper, 25 cts. "Living Word in the Gospel of St. John." Paper, 25 cts.; cloth, 50 cts. "God's Prophets." Paper 35 cts.; cloth 50 cts. "Lessons from St. Matthew's Gospel." Paper, 35 cts.; cloth 50 cts. "Teachings from St. Mark's Gospel." Paper, 35 cts.; cloth, 50 cts. "Sunday-School Lessons, 1877 and 78." By Mrs. M. Baxter. Each, cloth, 50 cts.

Any of Mrs. M. Baxter's tracts in the following list may also be had at one cent each or ten cents the dozen: "If it be Thy Will," "Does Sickness Sanctify?" "Casting All Your Care," Two cents each or twenty cents the dozen, "God's Purpose in Sickness," "The Great Physician," "Job's Sickness," "God's Side of Prayer," "Pastor Rein." "The Body for the Lord." Also the following tracts at one cent each, or ten cents the dozen, by the late Rev. W. E. Boardman: "He Careth for You," "A Perfected Self," "Paul's Thorn," "The Father's Rod," at two cents each, or twenty cents the dozen. "The Law of Liberty," at three cents each, or thirty cents the dozen. "Bethshan, a House for Healing," and "Enduement with Power," Miss C. C. Murray's tracts, at one cent each, or ten cents the dozen. "Repeating Prayer," "Thou Art Loosed," at two cents each, or twenty cents the dozen. "Redeemed from all Evil," "Anointing Him with Oil," at three cents each, or thirty cents the dozen. "Pastor Blumhardt," by Miss Sisson, at one cent each, or ten cents the dozen. "What About the Use of Means," and "The Apostolic Attitude," at two cents each, or twenty cents the dozen. "Asking and Receiving," by Mrs. Boardman.

BEYOND.

Beyond life's toils and cares,
Its hopes and joy, its weariness and sorrow,
Its sleepless nights, its days of smiles and tears,
One bright, unending morrow.

Beyond time's troubled stream,
Beyond the chilling waves of death's dark river,
Beyond life's lowering clouds and fitful gleams,
Its dark realities and brighter dreams,
A beautiful forever.

No aching hearts are there,
No tear-dimmed eye, no form by sickness wasted,
No cheek grown pale through penury or care,
No spirits crushed beneath the woes they bear,
No sighs for bliss untasted.

No sad farewell is heard,
No lonely wail for loving ones departed,
No dark remorse is there o'er memories stirred,
No smile of scorn, no harsh or cruel word
To grieve the broken-hearted.

No long, dark night is there,
No light from sun or silvery moon is given,
But Christ, the Lamb of God, all bright and fair,
Illumes the city with effulgence rare,
The glorious light of Heaven!

No mortal eye hath seen
The glories of that land beyond the river,
Its crystal lakes, its fields of living green,
Its fadeless flowers and the unchanging sheen
Around the throne forever.

Man hath not heard the song
Of rapturous praise within the shining portal;
No heart of man hath dreamed what joys belong
To that redeemed and happy blood-washed throng,
All glorious and immortal.

—Selected.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike), will be sent post-paid, for 10 cts., or 100 for 20 cts. Postage stamps taken.

For Nervousness

Use Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

Dr. W. C. HANSCOME, Minneapolis, Minn., says: "I used it in a case of acute rheumatism, during convalescence; the particular symptoms I wished to relieve were sleeplessness and nervousness, and the results were all I desired."

Are you waiting for something to turn up? If so, you are making quite a mistake. Better hustle around and turn up something for yourself. B. F. Johnson & Co., Publishers, of Richmond, Va., can give you a pointer in that direction that will help you wonderfully.

☞ "This is a volume of exceptional excellence."—The Christian Union.

CHRISTIANITY IN DAILY CONDUCT.

Studies of Texts relating to Principles of the Christian Character.

Crown octavo, 338 pages, neat cloth binding. Price $1.50.

"It is one of those books, of which we have too few, which can be read and re-read with growing interest and satisfaction and always with renewed instruction and profit."—Christian At Work.

"This is a volume of exceptional excellence. The style is lucid, the argument strong, the purpose direct, the spiritual uplift continuous. The thoughts are very rich, and there is nothing slipshod in their arrangement. The topics are selected by a master-spirit, who knows what man needs and how to supply his need. Many a volume of sermons announced with flourish of trumpets and supported by illustrious names contains less than this. It is in the conduct of daily life that Christianity declares itself; and the wise adaption of precept and parable to the minute duties of each day shows not only the skill of the writer, but the breadth and beauty of Christian truth. Humility forgiveness, anger, purity, lying, giving, heavenly citizenship, the one talent, the Elder Brother, are all treated with a calm spirit, and a clear apprehension of the true Christian doctrine. It is a pleasure to read these pages, free from the restless drive of an excited passion."—Christian Union.

Copies will be forwarded by mail or express, prepaid, at $1 50.

THOMAS WHITTAKER,

2 and 3 Bible House, New York.

ILLUSTRATIVE GATHERINGS

for Preachers and Teachers. A Manual of Anecdotes Facts, Figures, Proverbs, Quotations, &c., &c., adapted for Christian teaching. By Rev. G. S. Bowes. Two series, 12 mo. muslin, each $1.25. "For variety, pertinency and availability it is decidedly superior to anything we have seen."—Evangelical Repository. Sent to any adress free on receipt of above price
PERKINPINE & HIGGINS, 914 Arch St., Philadelphia, Pa.

BAGSTER Comprehensive Teachers' Bibles.

With New Helps, New Concordance New Maps and Plates, Polyglot References, &c. The Only Teachers' Bible published since the Revised Edition. Four editions various bindings. "A Perfect Help to Bible Study."—S.S. Times. Sold by all booksellers, or, JAMES PORT & CO. 14 & 16 Astor Place, New York, Agents.

$75.00 to $250.00 A MONTH can be made working for us. Agents preferred who can furnish a horse and give their whole time to the business. Spare moments may be profitably employed also. A few vacancies in towns and cities. B. F. Johnson & Co., Pub's, 1009 Main St., Richmond, Va

THE ALFRED DOLGE Felt Shoes AND Slippers.

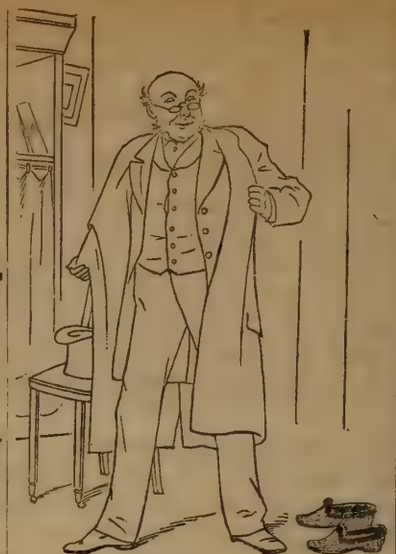
NOISELESS, WARM, DURABLE.

Prevent Rheumatism, Coldness of the Feet, and Excessive Perspiration.



COMFORT AND EASE.

OLD GENTLEMAN: "Now for a comfortable evening after a busy day. Those felt slippers are real havens of rest to my tired feet."

Send for Catalogue and Price-list.
Mention this Publication.

PERFECT EASE AND COMFORT!

BY USING

Slippers and Shoes

WITH

SOLES AND UPPERS OF ALL-WOOL FELT.

DANIEL GREEN & CO., 122 East 13th Street, New York.

$1000 for a Wife! The above sum in cash and goods will be paid to the first 200 who send 25 cents for a sample of our goods, and tell us correctly where in the Bible is the word "WIFE," first found. Mention book, chapter and verse. The first person who sends the correct answer will be paid $100 IN CASH, the second $50, the third $25, the fourth $15, the fifth $10, and to the next 195, if there are as many, a SOLID GOLD PLATE HALF ROUND WEDDING RING, Warranted. We want new agents, and for 25 cents will send A HANDSOME FOLDING CASE containing 140 USEFUL ARTICLES for Domestic Use, elegantly embellished in 8 colors. Last year we paid $20,000 for advertising, and we wish to try the effect of a new method. Send postage stamps or silver, and LOSE NO TIME if you would secure one of the Cash Payments. We will return the money and you may keep the goods if not found satisfactory. Mention this paper. Address at once WORLD MANFG. CO., 122 Nassau Street, N. Y.

"PATTEN" METALLIC SHINGLES

AND

ROOFING TILES.

Endorsed and ordered to be used by all Leading Architects. Make best roof in the world. Light, durable, fire-proof, cannot leak, weigh only one-tenth to the square (one-hundred square feet) to that of slate. These shingles are largely used in churches, other large buildings, etc., on account of their lightness. Being used all over the United States, also in Mexico, Peru, Chili, United States of Columbia, Spain, England, etc.

Send for descriptive pamphlets giving full particulars.

GUMMEY, SPERING & CO.,

Philadelphia, Pa.

UNIVERSITY PIANOS FROM $180 TO $1500.

FINEST PIANOS IN THE WORLD. SOLD DIRECT TO FAMILIES, saving the enormous expenses of agents. Sent with beautiful cover, stool and book, for trial in your own home before you buy. Guaranteed six years. Send for catalogue to

Marshal & Smith Piano Co., 285 E. 21st St., N. Y.

SEATTLE The largest City in Washington Territory. Population 20,000. Commercial center of PUGET Sound Country. Coal, Iron, Timber and Agricultural Lands. Send for full information of Queen City.
SE-AT-TLE. CHAS. H. KITTINGER, Seattle, Wash. Terr.

AGENTS WANTED to sell "The Child's Bible." Introduction by Bishop J. H. Vincent, D.D. The best selling book handled by agents. Recommended by all clergymen. Address Cassell & Co., B.B.S.D., 104 and 108 Fourth Ave., New York; 40 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

MORE MEN WANTED for local and traveling Salesmen. Good Pay. Address
E. B. RICHARDSON & CO.,
Nurserymen, Geneva, N. Y.

TEAS LADIES Send at once for our new terms.
THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
31 and 33 Vesey St., New York, N. Y.

FEATHERS. The finest live white geese feathers in the country, 75 cts. per lb. Hair Mattresses made over for $2.50. Feathers steamed and renovated. H. Pickford. 11 Nassau St., Brooklyn, N. Y

THE PARAGON WEATHER VEST.

Greater protection than Seal-Skin Coat.
A bar to chilling winds and intense cold.
A safeguard against Pneumonia.
Prevents Rheumatism, Bronchitis, or Chills.
Indispensable for sufferers from throat or lungs.
Handsome, durable, neat.
Try one. Satisfaction guaranteed.
PRICE, $3.00. POSTAGE PREPAID.
Send breast measure. Descriptive circular free.
At leading Dry-Goods and Clothing Stores.

DIAMOND SHIRT CO.,
Fine Unshrinkable Flannel Night Robes and Underwear, for Ladies and Gentlemen.
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

Ladies American Housekeeping.
A Ladies' Home Journal.
"The Best Ladies' Magazine Published."
Full 20 pages with a handsome colored cover each month. Complete on all Home Subjects, COOKING, KITCHEN and DINING ROOM, HOME DECORATION, ART, FASHIONS, FANCY WORK, HINTS TO MOTHERS, HOME READING, BRIC-A-BRAC, Etc., Illustrated Serials by our best Authors. WOMEN'S WAR RECCOLLECTIONS is a New feature for a Ladies' Journal. Our Fashion Notes, prepared specially for us, give latest styles of Dress, Millinery, valuable suggestions for Amateurs. To anyone who will BEFORE JANUARY 15th, 1889, send us 50 CTS. to pay for one year's subscription to AMERICAN HOUSEKEEPING, we will send free, THE EVERY-DAY COOK BOOK, an Octavo Volume of nearly 400 pages—best tried receipts on Cooking, Pickling, Preserving, Etc., a complete Home Encyclopedia of practical receipts of all kinds, well bound in illuminated cover. This offer is made to introduce American Housekeeping in New Homes. SEND 50 CENTS FOR THE PAPER FOR ONE YEAR, and get the COOK BOOK (Price $1.00) FREE.
$1.00 Cook Book Free
American Housekeeping, Chicago, Ill.

30 DAYS' TRIAL.

THIS NEW ELASTIC TRUSS Has a Pad different from all others, is cup shape, with Self-adjusting Ball in center, adapts itself to all positions of the body while the ball in the cup presses back the intestines just as a person does with the finger. With light pressure the Hernia is held securely day and night, and a radical cure certain. It is easy, durable and cheap. Sent by mail. Circulars free.
EGGLESTON TRUSS CO., Chicago, Ill.

The New England Medical Monthly says:
THE DEAF HEAR —"WALES' INVISIBLE SOUND DISC for deafness, by practical demonstration outranks all other devices of our age! Concentrating the sound waves on the drum head, its possibilities are indeed very great." For sale only by the Inventor
H. A. WALES, Bridgeport, Conn.

In all the world there is but one sure cure for the OPIUM Habit. The Dr. J. L. Stephens Remedy never fails, and no other treatment ever cures. We have cured more than 10,000 cases. No other treatment ever cured one case. NO PAY TILL CURED. Remember this, and write to the J. L. Stephens Co., Lebanon, Ohio.

TWO POPULAR BOOKS AT A SPECIAL PRI

We want every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to have one, or both of these t our popular books. They are good bo every respect, full of common-sense an crowded with fun.

HOW TO BE HAPPY THOUGH MAR is the title of the first, and a more de ful book has not been printed. It complete handbook to an earthly Par says the London Pall Mall Gazette. page sparkles with wit and wisdom never dull or tiresome. Just the boo present, $1 25 is the regular price, b will send it to you for $1.00, plus 10c age—$1.10 in all.

THE FIVE TALENTS OF WOMAN second book (by the same author equally entertaining. Love, marriag questions for home and mothers are t "From beginning to end it is delig says the New York Sun and this "Racy, witty, sensible and bright," i the Boston Traveler calls it, and adds "it is full of significant suggestion may well be taken into life and char To you, this will be sent for $1.00, plus postage—$1.10.

IF THE TWO BOOKS ARE ORDERE ONE TIME, we will send them postage free, for TWO DOLLARS. But mention this paper, and send direct publishers.

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SO

743 & 745 Broadway, New York.

HOW TO BUY A DRES

JAMES McCREERY & C

Wish to emphasize the vari novelty and selection of t Woolen Dress Fabrics. If need a Winter Dress of Bro cloth, Camels Hair, Serge, B rietta Cloth or Cashmere- plain colors or fancy mi effects---write to us for samp State, as clearly as possible, material and color desired, samples will be promptly warded.

Orders for goods, enclosing mittances, filled at once on ceipt.

James McCreery & C

Broadway, cor. Eleventh St.

NEW YORK.

"Demonology or Spiritualis Ancient and Modern."—"An effective weapon sword of fire."—"Only unanswerable work subject."—Startling disclosures.—History fa data.—Scores saved already. Whole comm rescued. Every family, preacher and christian needs one. 810 pp. 12mo, cloth. Price reduc Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price. A J. E. JEWETT. 77 Bible House, New Pertainin sons, Pla Things, w Bible St Concert E Prayer-M Topics, etc. In by J. H cent, D pages. By mail, $2. Immensely popular. Als new book, BOW IN THE CLOUD, of Comfort, etc., by 200 Best Authors, $1.

WOMEN'S HAND-BOOK. $2. Just duce it. Quick Sales. Big Pay. Ad E. B. TREAT, Publisher, 771 Broadwa

PRINTING PRESS Book of Type, 5c. CIRCULA Amateur Printers' JOSEPH WA Guide Book, 15c. 19 Murray S
☞ Samples of Scrap Pictures and Cards, 10 cts.

"THE OLD, OLD STO

A Responsive Christmas Service for Sunday Sch Carols by FANNY J. CROSBY, and Music by P. P. Competent judges say, "The best ever published." 12 for 36 cents; 100 for $2.50. Send stamp for sam WILBUR B. KETCHAM, PUBLISHER, 71 Bible Hou

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1888, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.

This Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. TALMAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events, as well as Stories, Anecdotes, etc.

Vol. XI., No. 45. Office, 63 Bible House. N. Y. THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1888. Price, 3 Cents. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

PORTRAITS OF DRS. FAIRBAIRN, DALE, AND ALLON, AND PICTURE OF A SCENE IN NOTTINGHAM.

DANGER FOR THE BALLOT-BOX. Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

THE MESSAGE OF THE PROPHETS. By Rev. Albert Erdman, D. D.

The Conversion of a Tough—The Anti-Slavery Crusade—Transformed Temples in Japan—A Visit to King Mwanga—Among Chinese Immigrants.

PORTRAIT OF REV. ALFRED C. WHITE, of Amesbury, Mass.

PICTURE OF THE BOULDER CANYON, COL.

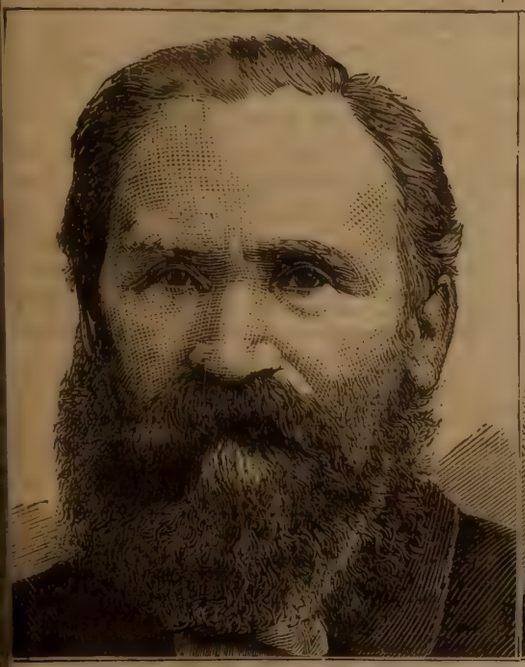
A LIFELONG OCCUPATION. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

Gems from New Books: The Childhood of Agassiz—Franklin's First Compositions.

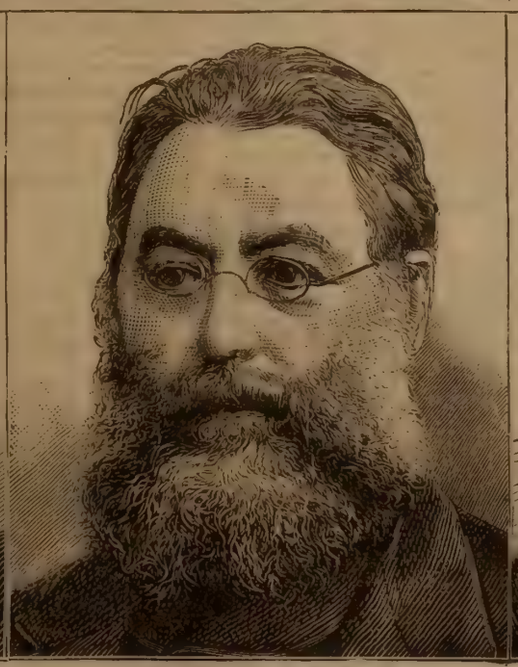
AN UNPROMISING GUEST. (With Illustration.)

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE. A New Serial Story by Rev. L. S. Keyser. (Continued.)

HELPING ONE ANOTHER. By Mrs. M. Baxter.



THE REV. A. M FAIRBAIRN, D.D.



THE REV. DR. R. W. DALE.

THE REV. HENRY ALLON, D.D.

THREE CONGREGATIONAL LEADERS—THE MARKET-PLACE, NOTTINGHAM, ENGLAND.

CONGREGATIONALISTS IN COUNCIL.

HAVING already published portraits and notices of the councils of other denominations in Great Britain, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week gives three portraits of leading Congregationalists, with a picture of a scene in Nottingham, the town in which the annual council of the denomination has just been held. Over one thousand ministers and delegates attended the meetings, representing churches in all districts of the United Kingdom. Among the subjects discussed was that of Education in Elementary Schools, Nonconformity in the University of Oxford, Total Abstinence, and special questions relating to the progress of Congregationalism generally. The addresses were fully as able as those which have been delivered at former assemblies of this body, showing that there has been no deterioration in the learning or culture of its ministers. It evidently still maintains the position it has so long held at the head of all the denominations in England dissenting from the Established Church, for learning, intellectual capacity, and moral power. The three ministers whose portraits appear on the preceding page are the recognized leaders of the denomination.

THE REV. A. M. FAIRBAIRN, D. D.

THE long cherished desire of the Congregationalists to have a college of their own in the ancient seat of learning at Oxford is now at last to be realized. The recognition for which they have so long contended as a right, the protests they have so continuously reiterated against the monopoly, by the Protestant-Episcopal Church of England, of the higher educational advantages, the strenuous labors of generations of great thinkers, to educate the people up to the point at which the obstacles in the way of nonconformity must be swept away, have in this year of grace been crowned with success. Oxford will now see in the heart of the ecclesiastical city a noble institution rear its head, sheltering a body of professors and students whose principles have been the abhorrence of archbishops and bishops and dons of the dominant church. It is no slight tribute of honor that his brethren have paid to Dr. Fairbairn in calling him to preside over the new institution, and exercise the functions which must at the outset require extraordinary tact, discretion, and administrative ability.

Dr. A. M. Fairbairn was born near Edinburgh in 1838, so that he is now fifty years of age. He received his school and university education in his native city, and his theological training at Glasgow. He afterwards studied at Berlin, where in philosophy he had Trendelenburg as his teacher, and in theology Hengstenburg and Dorner. His first pastoral charge was a small church of the Evangelical Union at Bathgate, in West Lothian, Scotland. From thence he accepted a pastorate at Aberdeen, and on leaving that city in 1877 to take the principalship of Airedale Congregational College, he received from his fellow-townsmen a handsome and valuable testimonial as an expression of their recognition of his high character as "a thinker, a scholar, a gifted Christian teacher, and a public-spirited citizen." There he remained until called to Oxford to take the new position of President of Mansfield College in that ancient and renowned city.

As Muir Lecturer on the Science of Religion in Edinburgh University, a post in which Dr. Fairbairn won a high position as and these are still his acknowledged characteristics. In 1883 the Congregational Union elected him to the presidential chair, from which he delivered two addresses remarkable for originality and ability. He is the author of several valuable works, amongst which may be mentioned "The City of God," "Studies on the Philosophy of Religion," "Studies on the Life of Christ," and lectures to workingmen on "Religion in History and the Life of To-day." He has also since 1870 been a frequent contributor to the Contemporary Review. In recognition of his scholarship and ability, and as an expression of good-will to Mansfield College, the University of Oxford has conferred on him the degree of M. A. His D. D. is from Edinburgh.

A Ripe Scholar and Profound Thinker,

It is well known that, although according to the principles of Congregational Independency each church is at liberty to elect to the pastorate any person whom the members may chose, with or without college training or ordination, Congregationalists as a body have always been strenuous advocates for an educated ministry, and have taken care to make adequate provision to secure it in their academies and colleges. Their latest enterprise in this direction, the founding of

Mansfield College,

Oxford, is without doubt one of the most remarkable movements recorded in their history; certainly it is the most important educational undertaking attempted by Nonconformists since the passing of the notorious Act of Uniformity. The building will be a truly noble structure of white stone, and is expected to be completed about the end of the present year or the early part of the next. The endowments of the new College will be those that belonged to Spring Hill College, Birmingham, for that institution is to be sold, and the net yearly income of the endowments is to be appropriated to Mansfield by order of the Charity Commissioners.

The trustees have been fortunate in securing the Rev. Dr. Fairbairn to be the first Principal of Mansfield College. He has had a training in philosophy and theology such as few men have been favored with, and has given evidence of ability of the highest order, together with sound evangelical doctrine.

THE REV. R. W. DALE, D. D.

AMERICA has a kind of partnership in this most talented as well as most cultured of English Congregational ministers. The title which distinguishes him, and which the educational institutions of his own land refrained from conferring upon him on account of his Nonconformity, came to him from Yale College. It was conferred on him in 1877, as a small token of recognition of the benefits which he rendered to the college in a series of lectures, which at its request, he came here to deliver. The learning, the original thought, the strong logical power, the brilliant eloquence of the man, captivated the college, while his vigorous affection for our republican form of government, which at some cost of social distinction he has not concealed in his own land, endeared him alike to young and old in our famous institution.

Robert William Dale is nearly fifty-nine years of age. He was born in London on December 1, 1829. His career at school was remarkable. The boy seemed to have an inexhaustible capacity for hard work, and his abilities were far beyond those of the majority of boys of his own age. At the conclusion of his school life, the necessity of earning a livelihood precluded him for a time from college training. He, therefore, being resolved to push his way forward in the acquisition of knowledge, obtained a situation as assistant teacher in a school and devoted his nights to hard study. Subsequently he became principal of a school established by a Congregational church, and there his remarkable gifts attracted the attention of pastor and people. They were deeply impressed with the power of the man, and learning that he desired to consecrate his life to ministerial work, they decided to defray his expenses at college. He was sent to Spring Hill College at Birmingham, and there soon proved the wisdom of their decision. He remained in the college the full curriculum of six years, and, as a result of his characteristic application and assiduity, in the year 1853 he graduated M. A. at the University of London, with which Spring Hill was affiliated, carrying off the gold medal in the department of Philosophy and Political Economy. Among his tutors at Spring Hill College was Henry Rogers, author of the famous work entitled "The Eclipse of Faith." The marked affection of the venerable tutor for his brilliant pupil, Dale, was heartily reciprocated, and to this day the latter acknowledges his lasting obligations to his master with almost juvenile warmth.

Another remarkable friend of Mr Dale's youth was a good man renowned in the world of Evangelical Nonconformity, and whose praise yet lingers with grateful fragrance in all the churches as the author of "The Anxious Inquirer Directed," who for more than fifty years was the beloved and eminently successful pastor of Carr's Lane Chapel, Birmingham: and no sooner had Dr. Dale completed his University career and the college course of special and technical study, in 1853, than he was unanimously appointed his colleague; and eventually, in 1859, on the death of Mr. James, succeeded to the full charge of that well-known place of worship.

John Angell James,

Dr. Dale presents to everyone he meets the appearance of a happy, hearty man, and combines in no ordinary measure the Laureate's desiderata of manhood, "heart, head, hand." His daily practice and his theory of Christian life constitute a perfect harmony. His soul is in his work. He is a strong admirer of Mr. Moody, and took a prominent part in the campaign of Messrs. Moody and Sankey at Birmingham, in 1875.

When the pressure of Dr. Dale's pastoral and political duties is considered, the tale of his literary labors appears immense. They include a "Life of John Angell James," a volume of "Week Day Sermons," "The Atonement," which ran through seven editions in four years, "Lectures on Preaching," "Discourses on Special Occasions," "The Ten Commandments," "Lectures on the Epistle to the Hebrews," an "Essay on Lacordaire," "A Reply to Mr. Matthew Arnold's Attack on Puritanism," &c. Besides contributing to the British quarterly, the Fortnightly, the Contemporary, and the Nineteenth Century, he has acted as joint editor of the Eclectic Review, and for several years as editor of the Congregationalist, an organ of his denomination. Tolerance, ability, honesty, and earnestness characterize all his productions. He is an ardent politician, and is one of the most effective platform speakers in Great Britain. In 1869 he was honored by his brethren in being chosen to the highest office in their gift—the Chairmanship of the Congregational Union.

Dr. Dale has travelled extensively. He has visited Egypt, the Sinaitic Peninsula, and Palestine, has made long journeys in this country, sojourning in most of our chief cities, and this spring he returned from a long visit to Australia. The chief daily journal of Birmingham, the town to which he has given all his ministerial life in spite of repeated attempts to attract him to other places, remarked on his return from Australia: "The whole town will be glad that Dr. Dale is at home again. Birmingham is never quite Birmingham without him. The strenuous vigor of his intellect, the tenacity of his grasp of great principles, his fiery thoroughness in every labor to which he sets his hand, and his sturdy and inflexible morality are, we are happy to think, typical of the highest and best life of the town he loves and has served so well. All will read of his success with delight. He has returned with the sense that the high desires which animated his journey to Australia have been achieved beyond his utmost hopes."

THE REV. HENRY ALLON, D. D.

THE veteran minister, whose influence among his brethren in London has been steadily growing for over forty years, is a Yorkshireman by birth. He is now seventy years of age, having been born at Welton, near Hull, in 1828. His father was a godly merchant, under whose influence the son was early brought to Christ, and to consecrate his life to the Christian ministry. After graduating from Cheshunt College in 1850 he accepted an invitation to become co-pastor of a church in Islington, the northern district of London. His sermons soon attracted public attention, and drew visitors from all parts of the metropolis. Sermons were seldom published in those days, but those of the young preacher ington were too powerful and valuable to be t, and when a publisher secured the privilege printing them, they had a wide circulation.

n 1852 Mr. Lewis, the senior pastor of the urch, died, and Dr. Allon assumed the entire storate at the unanimous request of the church.
attracted around him a band of earnest rkers, who made the church the centre of a le-reaching circle of Christian influence. Pos-sing in a rare degree the quality known among rselves as magnetism, he inspires his young n with his own spirit of devotion to the cause Christ, and is perpetually finding new chan-s for their labors. The problem of reaching masses of non-churchgoers has been the one preme subject of consideration, both of pastor people, of late years, and the Islington urch has organized and operated a most effint means of dealing with it.
Dr. Allon was elected chairman of the Congational Union in 1864, and devoted his ad-sses on the occasion to an attempt to refute teachings of Ernest Renan and Bishop Co-
so. He has travelled in Palestine and Egypt, has paid one visit to America. Like Dr.
le, he derives his degree of Doctor of Divinity
m Yale College. Among his published works, most widely known is a volume entitled,
he Vision of God, and Other Sermons."

THE TOWN OF NOTTINGHAM.

(See picture on first page.)

HE town of Nottingham, in which the Congational Council has just been held, has, with suburbs and neighboring industrial villages, opulation of a hundred and twenty thousand, is one of the most important towns in the glish Midlands. It is a place of much note English history. It is in possession of agree-suburban places of recreation. The public den, styled the Arboretum, on the north side, stefully laid out; beyond it lie the Church metery, portions of forest-land called "Robin od's Chace," and "the Coppices," with St. ne's Well. In the rock that overhangs the n, not far from the Castle, are the hewncaverns which have got the name of "The ists' Holes," from having been occupied as mits' cells in the Middle Ages, but which are eved to be of much more ancient origin.
he town has produced a far more than aver-proportion of notable persons, who have incted and delighted mankind, and done good heir day and generation. Among a crowd names more or less familiar, are the poet ry Kirk White, Thomas and Paul Sandby, ert Wakefield, Samuel Ayscough, Dr. Marl Hall, Rev. Joseph Gilbert, and T. Peet, produced "Poor Robin's Almanack" for y years. Among other celebrities are Wil-and Mary Howitt; Bailey, the author of stus"; J. C. Wright, the translator of the an poet, Dante; and Spencer T. Hall.
avid, King of Scotland, was imprisoned e in 1346; and the place of confinement ad-ed a Speaker of the House of Commons, a Lord Mayor and Sheriffs of London, who punished for denying the absoluteness of al prerogative in the fourteenth century. It at Nottingham, in 1485, that Richard III.
tered his army for the Battle of Bosworth; ottingham, in 1642, that Charles I. raised tandard in the Civil War against the Eng-Parliament. The modern Nottingham le in 1831 was burnt down by a mob of reck-rioters during the Reform Bill Agitation, as since been rebuilt, and is now a Fine Museum. The great market-place, shown e picture on the first page, is a triangular of nearly six acres, with wooden colon-s in front of some of the shops, and has a ledly old-fashioned air; at one end is the ange Hall, a handsome building, and near e three old parish churches, St. Mary's St.
r's, and St. Nicholas', which claim preceover a dozen or twenty others of more t date. Nottingham is considered to be of the most religious towns in the United dom, and excellent work is done in it for t by all the churches.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Turning the World Upside Down. The Rev. Newman Hall said at a recent meeting: "There was an old story of a preacher in Yorkshire who, when preaching on the text, 'They that turned the world upside down have come hither also,' said, in the Yorkshire dialect, 'Ma friends, I shall treat this subject in four divisions. First, the world at first was made right up'rds. Second, devil coom and turn he upsie doon. Third, the world ha' got to be set right agin. Fourth, we are the chaps to set it right.' They should all believe that the world would be set right, and that God in His condescension and mercy had given them the privilege and duty of doing it."

Sixpence for Whiskey.—"This Last Winter a poor workingman noticed a woman singing in the street on a very cold day; he took compassion on her, and stepping over to her, he put an ill-spared sixpence into her hand, and passed on. As he walked down the street his heart was sore for the poor woman, and he looked back to see if she were still there, but what was his surprise to see her entering the nearest saloon. He had not many sixpences to spare, even in charity, and certainly none for drink. He turned, and went right into the saloon after her. The whiskey was being handed to her, and the sixpence lay on the counter to pay for it. Reaching forward his hand, he picked up the money, saying, 'This is mine; I did not give it to you for that purpose,' and putting it into his pocket, he walked out of the shop."

Rev. Edward Irving's Message.—Mr. Arthur remarked: "It is told of that great, good man, Edward Irving, that on one occasion when visiting a hospital, he was brought to the bed of a man who was dying. They knew that soon he must go, and that he was not prepared to meet his God. Irving spoke to him, but he was not heard, the patient was too weak. As a last effort, the Gospel messenger put his mouth close to the ear of the dying man and said, loudly and distinctly three times, these three words, 'God loves you.' Irving then left, but when he next visited that hospital he received the glad tidings that not only was his message heard and understood, but it had found its way into the heart of the dying man and enabled him, at the eleventh hour, to see Christ's great love for him in dying for his sins, and to accept Jesus as his Saviour. He died three days after Irving's visit, trusting in Christ."

"Eureka! Eureka!"—Mr. Climie Relates: "There was a young man once in one of Dr. Moxey's meetings who was very anxious about his soul. The good doctor heard of it, and sitting down by the young fellow, said, 'Do you want to come to Christ?' 'Yes, I do,' was the earnest reply. 'Have you prayed?' 'Yes, I have been praying for the last half hour,' was the sad reply. 'And have you not got saved?' the doctor inquired, tenderly. The young man shook his head. 'Well, look at this text,' said Dr. Moxey, "Him that cometh unto Me I will in no wise cast out." Now, have you come?' 'I have.' 'Then that is all. He says He will not cast you out; and I advise you to stay in Him.' That is all that any sinner has to do—to come to Christ and stay there, keeping close to Him and confessing Him. In a moment, the young man leaped to his feet and laughed aloud, and with tears streaming down his face, exclaimed, 'I have got it! I see it, sir. Oh, how wonderful, how glorious, it is! Praise the Lord!' From that hour to this he has gone on his way rejoicing."

The Danger of Procrastination.—Mr. Linnell said: "A short time ago I knew a young man, the finest and strongest young fellow in the whole village. One night he felt drawn to our meeting in the school-house. He came to the place, and even pressed his face to the outside of the window and looked in, but he would not enter, and did not see the need of being converted when he was young and strong; when the days of sickness and old age came, he would seek Christ. On the Thursday following I was visiting an old woman, and on the road I heard a number of people talking together very excitedly. 'What is wrong?' I asked, and I was told that this young man had died suddenly. I hastened to the place where they said he was lying, and there he lay with his head pillowed on a bundle of rushes. He had died of heart disease without two seconds' warning. He who had put off seeking Christ, until he should be sick, or aged, had in the hey-day of his strength been cut off without the least warning, and ushered before God the Judge to answer for the deeds done in the body. One young man, as he looked at his dead companion, said, 'Oh, if it had been I who was thus unexpectedly called away, where should I now have been?' He knew too well where. God used that thought as the lever to turn his heart towards Him. That young man never rested until he had found Christ, and was able to say that for him sudden death would be sudden glory."

An Artist's Model.—Mr. John Climie Observed: "An artist, who was engaged on a great work, required for a model a very ragged and forsaken-looking boy. After searching for some time in vain, he at length met the very thing in a poor little waif on the street. Going up to him, he gave him his address, and said, 'If you come to me to-morrow, at such an hour, just as you are in all your rags, your face unwashed, and your hair uncombed, I will give you so much money.' The boy thought this a rare opportunity, and promised to come. Next day some one knocked at the gentleman's door; he opened it himself, and there stood what could scarcely be recognized as the boy of yesterday. The face washed, the hair combed, and the rags sewn up a bit. 'Who are you?' demanded the gentleman. 'I am the boy you spoke to yesterday.' 'No, you are not; the boy I spoke to was to come just as he was, poor, ragged, and miserable-looking, not like you. If you are, indeed, the same boy, you have not obeyed me. I can have nothing to do with you.' So it is with the sinner. God says, 'Come just as you are, with all your sins and imperfections upon you;' but the sinner thinks he will wait until he is better, and he draws the rags of his own righteousness closer about him. It is no use. Off they must come. God will not recognize you unless you come as a sinner, trusting in Christ only."

An Unforgiving Spirit Hindering Salvation.—At the Christian Institute Mr. Campbell said: "One evening, when I was addressing a meeting I noticed an old lady, who seemed to be very much impressed with the address. I spoke to her, and at once she told me she was extremely anxious to come to Christ. She was a Sunday-school teacher, and attended church, yet she knew she was not saved. I wondered what it could be that was standing between this woman and Christ, for she was plainly very anxious. Could it be a sin? With a quick, short prayer for help, I turned to the lady and asked, 'Is it that there is one whom you will not forgive?' At once her head sunk on her bosom. Though she made no reply, it was plain that that was the obstacle. 'No,' I continued, 'there can be no salvation for you until you give up hating your neighbor, and God will give you strength to do so if you ask for it. He says, "If ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Heavenly Father forgive those who trespass against Him."' She left that night without coming to Christ, but a few nights afterwards I saw her, her face radiant; she had forgiven her enemy, and God had forgiven her. There are many people who would be very glad to come to Christ, if they could only do so and retain their sins, but there must be an unconditional surrender. All must be given up."

An Invaluable Work on Prophecy by G. H. Pember, M. A., entitled "The Great Prophecies concerning the Jews the Gentiles, and the Church of God," is for sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York. It is written in a most popular and eloquent style, and describes the impending fulfilment of Revelation and Daniel, and is illustrated by a colored chart. 458 pages. Price, including postage, $1.

DANGER FOR THE BALLOT-BOX.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday Morning, November 4, 1888.

"Two cubits and a half was the length of it, and a cubit and a half the breadth of it, and a cubit and a half the height of it." Ex. 37 : 1.

The Ark of the Covenant—The Ballot - Box the American Ark—Its Power and Its Protection—The Foes of the Ballot-Box—I. Ignorance—An Anomaly—Compulsory Education a Necessity—Make Ignorance Criminal—II. Spurious Voting—Modern Uzzas—III. Intimidation—An Indignant Judge—IV. Bribery—Bribes of Money and Office—A National Disgrace—V. Defamation of Character—Illustrious Victims—VI. The Rowdy and Drunken Caucus—Property Qualification no Remedy—A Soldier and a Hair-Dresser—The Prayer Mightier than the Vote—The Manifest Destiny of the Union.

LOOK at it—the sacred chest of the ancients. It was about five feet long, three feet wide, and three feet high. It was within and out of pure gold. On the top of it stood two angels facing each other with outspread wings. In that sacred box was the law, and there were in it a great many precious stones. With that box went the fate of the nation. Carried in front of the host, the waters of the Jordan parted. Divinely charged, costly, Precious, Momentous Box!

No unholy hands might lay hold of it. It was called the ark of the covenant. But you will understand it was a box, the most precious box of the ages. Where is it now? Gone forever. Not a crypt of church or museum of the world has a fragment of it. But is not this nation God's chosen people? Have we not passed through the Red Sea? Have we not been led with a pillar of fire by night? Has this nation no ark of the covenant? Yes, the ballot-box, the sacred chest of the nation, the Ark of the American covenant. In it is the law, in it is the divine and the human will, in it is the fate of the nation. Carried in front of our host again and again, the waters of national trouble have parted. Mighty ark of the covenant, the American ballot-box! It is

A Very Old Box.

In Athens, long before the art of printing, the people dropped pebbles into it to give expression to their sentiments. After that, beans were dropped into it—a white bean for the affirmative, a black bean for the negative. After that, when they wished to vote a man out of citizenship they would write his name upon a shell and drop that into the box. O'Connell and Grote and Cobden and Macaulay and Gladstone fought great battles in the introduction of the ballot-boxes in England, and to-day it is one of the fastnesses of that nation. It is of our government. It is older than the Constitution. In it is our national safety. Tell me what will be the fate of the American ballot-box, the ark of the American covenant, and I will tell you what will be the fate of this nation. Give the people once a year, or once in four years, an opportunity to express their political sentiments, and you practically avoid insurrection and revolution. Either give them the ballot, or they will take the sword. Without the ballot-box there can be no free republican institutions. Milton visiting in Italy noticed that on the sides of Vesuvius gardeners and farmers were at work while the volcano was in eruption, and he asked them if they were safe. "Yes," said the farmers and the gardeners, "it is safe: all the danger is before the eruption; then comes earthquake and terror, but just as soon as the volcano begins to pour forth lava we all feel at rest." It is the suppression of political sentiment, the suppression of public opinion, that makes moral earthquake and national earthquake. Let public opinion pour forth, and that gives satisfaction, and that gives peace, and that gives permanency to good government. And yet, though the ballot-box is the sacred chest and the ark of the American covenant, you know as well as I know it has its sworn antagonists, and I purpose this morning, in God's name and as a Christian patriot, to set before you the names of some of the sworn enemies of this sacred chest, the ark of the American covenant, the ballot-box.

One of the Corner-Stones

The Foes of the Ballot-Box.

First, I remark, ignorance is a mighty foe. Other things being equal, the more intelligence a man has the better he is qualified to exercise the right of suffrage. You have been ten, fifteen, twenty, thirty years studying American institutions, you have canvassed all the great questions about tariff and home rule, and all the educational questions, and everything in American politics you are well acquainted with. You consider yourself competent to cast a vote in November, and you are competent. You will take your position in the line of electors, you will wait for your turn to come, the judge of election will announce your name, you will cast your vote and pass out. Well done.

But right behind you there will come a man who cannot spell the name of comptroller or attorney or mayor. He cannot write, or if he can write he uses a small "I" for the personal pronoun. He could not tell on which side of the Alleghany Mountains Ohio is. Educated canary birds know more than he. He will cast his vote, and it will balance your vote. His as your intelligence. That is not right. All men of fair mind will acknowledge that that is not right. Until a man can read the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States, and calculate the interest on the American debt, and know the difference between a republican form of government and a monarchy or a despotism, he is unfit to exercise the right of suffrage at any ballot-box between Key West and Alaska.

Ignorance is Mighty

In 1872, in England, there were 2,600,000 children who ought to have been in school. There were only 1,333,000, in other words about fifty per cent., and of the fifty per cent. not more than five per cent. got anything worthy the name of an education. Now, take that foreign ignorance and add it to our American ignorance, and there will be in November thousands and thousands of people who are no more qualified to exercise the right of suffrage than to lecture on astronomy. How are these things to be corrected? By laws of well executed. I go in for a law which, after giving fair warning for a few years, shall make ignorance a crime. There is no excuse for ignorance on these subjects in this land, where the common schools make knowledge as free as the fresh air of heaven. I would have a board of examination seated beside the officers of registration, and let them decide whether the men who come up to vote have any capacity to be monarchs in a land where we are all monarchs. One of the most awful foes of the American ballot-box to-day is popular ignorance. Educate the people, give them an opportunity to know and understand what they do. If they will not take the education, deny them the vote.

Compulsory Education

Another powerful enemy of the ark of the American covenant, the ballot-box, is Spurious Voting.

In 1880, in Brooklyn, there were a thousand names recorded of persons who had no residence here, and if there were a thousand attempted fraudulent votes in the best city on the continent, what may we expect in cities not so fortunate? What a grand thing is the law of registration! Without it elections in this country would be a farce. There must be a scrutiny on this subject. The law must have keenest twist for the neck of repeaters. Something more than slight fine and short imprisonment. It is an attempt at the assassination of the republic, when a man attempts to put in a spurious vote. In olden times, when men laid unholy hands on the ark of the covenant they dropped down dead. Witness Uzzah. And when men attempt to put unholy hands on the American ballot-box, the ark of the American covenant, they deserve extermination.

Another powerful foe of this sacred chest is Intimidation.

Corporations sometimes demand that the employees vote in this and that way. It is skilfully done. It is not positively in so many words demanded, but the employee understands he will be frozen out of the establishment unless he votes as the firm do. So you can go in villages where there are establishments with hundreds and thousands of employees, and having found out the politics of the head men in the factory, you can tell which way the election is going. Now, that is damnable! If in a precinct in the United States a man cannot vote as he pleases, there is something awfully wrong.

How do you treat that employee who votes differently from what you do? Oh, you say you do not interfere with his right of suffrage. But you call him into your private office, and you find fault with his work, and after a while you tell him there is an uncle, or an aunt, or a niece or a nephew that must have that position. You do not say it is because he voted this or that way, but he knows and God knows it is. If the man has given to you in hard work an equivalent for the wages you pay him, you have no right to ask anything else of him. He sold you his work; he did not sell you his political or religious principles. But you know as well as I do there is sometimes on that sacred chest, the ark of the American covenant, a shadow of corporate or monopolistic.

I do not wonder at the vehemence of Lord Chief-Justice Holt, of England, when he said, "Let the people vote fairly. Interference with a man's vote is in behalf of this or that party. I give you notice that if an offender against the law comes before me, I will charge the jury to make him pay well for it." No shadow, plutocratic or mobocratic or capitalistic. Every man voting in his own way—God and his own conscience the only dictator.

Another powerful foe of that sacred chest, the ark of the American covenant, is Bribery.

You know something of the hundreds of thousands of dollars that were expended to carry Indiana in 1880. You know something of the vast sums of money expended in Brooklyn and New York in other years to carry elections. And there will be more money used in bribery this autumn's election than in any previous election. It is often the case that a man is nominated for office with reference to his capacity to provide money for the elections, or with reference to his capacity to command money from others. You know the names of men who have at different times gone into the Gubernatorial chair or Congressional office, buying their way all through. I tell you no news. Your patriotic heart has been pained again and again with this.

Very often it is not money that bribes, but it is office. "You make me President, and I'll make you a Cabinet officer; you make me Governor, and I'll make you Surveyor-General; you make me Mayor, and I'll put you on the Water Board; you give me position, and I'll give you position." That is the form of bribe often and often in these great cities. I do not say that in our city, but you know again and again throughout the land these have been the forms of bribe offered. So it is often the case that from the time a man comes to an office to when he has been elected, he is from the crown of head to the sole of foot mortgaged with pledges, and the man who goes to Albany or Washington to get an office is applying for some position which was given away two months before the election. Two long lines of worm fence, one worm fence reaching to Albany and the other to Washington, and there are a great many citizens astride the fence, and they are equally poised, and they are waiting to see on which side there is most emolument, and on this side they get down. But bribery kicks both ways. It kicks the man that offers it, and the man that takes it. Bribery to-day you will admit to be one of the mightiest foes of the American ballot-box.

Another great enemy of that sacred chest is in you find out from the newspapers, when o men are running for office, which is the st? How often in the autumnal elections the od man is denounced and the bad man ap-auded, so that you can come sometimes to just opinion as to who is the best man, and ere are hundreds and thousands of electors o go up to vote so utterly befogged they ow not what they do. Is not that a fearful fluence to be brought upon the ballot-box of is country? It has been so ever since the undation of this government.

Defamation of Character.

Thomas Paine writes Washington a letter, and blishes it, saying: "Treacherous in all private endship and a hypocrite in public morals, the rld will be puzzled to know whether we had tter call you an apostate or an impostor, and ether you abandoned good morals, or never d any." That is Thomas Paine's opinion of eorge Washington. John Quincy Adams de-ared that he was solaced in regard to the andals and the anathemas inflicted upon him the fact that his father, John Adams, had to go rough the same process, and John Quincy dams declared he really thought in that esent election there were men who gave their tire time to regard to him. Martin Van Buren was always ctorialized as a rat. Thomas H. Benton and nos Kendall were always pictorialized as rob-rs with battering-rams breaking in the door the United States Bank. On the day on ich Thomas Jefferson was inaugurated Presi-nt of the United States, March 4, 1801, the lowing appeared in the Sentinel, of Boston: Monumental inscription. Yesterday expired, eply regretted by millions of grateful Ameri-ns, and by all good men, the Federal Admin-ration of the Government of the United States, imated by Washington, Adams, Hamilton, ox, Pickering, McHenry, Marshall, and Stod-rd; aged twelve years. Its death was occa-ned by the secret arts and open violence of reign and domestic demagogues. As one bute of gratitude in these times this monu-nt to the talents and services of the deceased raised by the Sentinel." Under such defama-n as that Thomas Jefferson went into office. father told me that when Andrew Jackson s running for President of the United States, whole land was flooded with coffin hand-ls—pictures of six dead men, in allusion to six deserters whom Andrew Jackson had d shot, and all the pictorials of those times presented Jackson as taking his office from hand of the devil. I saw at Put-in-Bay, io, in a museum,

Manufacturing Falsehood

A Prominent Paper of 1844, ich spoke of Henry Clay as a gambler, a liber-e, and a murderer; and the manner in which was defamed, and the outrages which were aped upon him, may be well guessed from Mr. y's eulogy of his native State, Kentucky. He d: "When I seemed to be assailed by all the t of the world, she interposed her broad and penetrable shield, repelled the poisoned shafts t were aimed for my destruction, and vindi-ed my good name from every malignant and ounded aspersion." Defamation! It is the se of the American ballot-box. Just as soon n the great cities a man is put up for office is made the target. The fact that he is up is ma facie evidence that he must be brought vn. His public life and his private life are atinized, and all the electric lights are turned

How often it is that men have gone down ler such things. In every autumnal election air is filled with carrion crows scenting car-ea. Caw! Caw! Caw! There are news-ers in the United States that in the great umnal elections take wild license for liberty. ey are filled with calumny. The editorial col-ns of such papers reek with it; their columns stuffed with it. There are newspapers in United States which in the great popular ctions breakfast and dine and sup on inde-cency. They wallow in it. Swine like the mire. They give more for one quill full of it than a whole hogshead of decent product. There are in these great autumnal elections men sitting in editorial chairs who write with a quill, not plucked from the stupid goose or the sublime eagle, but from a turkey buzzard! Ghouls! Ghouls! They tip the city sewer into their editorial inkstands. Defamation of character is one of the curses of the American ballot-box to-day. In your great Presidential elections who can tell from what he reads who is the man he ought to vote for? Bad men sometimes applauded, good men denounced.

Another powerful foe of the sacred chest, the ark of the American covenant, the ballot-box, is

The Rowdy and Drunken Caucus.

The ballot-box does not give any choice to a man when the nominations are made in the back part of a groggery. When the elector comes up he has to choose between two evils. In some of the cities men have come to the ballot-box to vote, and have found the nominees such a scaly, greasy, and stenchful crew they had no choice. You say, vote for somebody outside. Then they throw away their vote. Christian men of New York and Brooklyn, honorable men, patriotic men, go and take possession of the caucuses. First having saturated your pocket-handkerchief with cologne or some other disinfectant, go down to the caucus and take possession of it in the name of the Lord God Almighty and the American people, though after you come back you should have to hang your hat and coat in the back yard for ventilation.

In some of the States politics have got so low that the nominees no more need good morals than they do a bath-tub. Snatch the ballot-box from such men. Where is the David who will go forth and bring the ark of the covenant back from Kirjath-jearim? Do you not think politics have got to a pretty low ebb in our day when a Tweed could be sent to the Legislature of New York, and a John Morrissey, the prince of gamblers, could be sent to Congress?

How are These Things to be Remedied?

Some say by a property qualification. They say that after a man gets a certain amount of property—a certain amount of real estate—he is financially interested in good government, and he becomes cautious and conservative. I reply, a property qualification would shut off from the ballot-box a great many of the best men in this land. Literary men are almost always poor. A pen is a good implement to make the world better, but it is a very poor implement to get a livelihood ordinarily. I have known scores of literary men who never owned a foot of ground, and never will own a foot of ground until they get under it. Professors of colleges, teachers of schools, editors of newspapers, ministers of religion, qualified in every possible way to vote, yet no worldly success. There has been many a man who has not had a house on earth who will have a mansion in heaven.

There are many who through accidents of fortune have come to great success while they are profound in their stupidity, as profound in their stupidity as a man of large fortune with whom I was crossing the ocean, who told me he was going to see the dykes of Scotland! When a member of my family asked a lady on her return from Europe if she had seen Mont Blanc, she replied: "Well, really, I don't know; is that in Europe?" Ignorance by the square foot. Property qualification will not do. The only way these evils will be eradicated will be by more thorough legal defence of the ballot-box, and a more thorough moralization and Christianization of the people. That ark of the covenant was carried into captivity to Kirjath-jearim, but one day the people hooked oxen to a cart, and they put this ark on the cart, and the cart was taken to Jerusalem—the ark of the covenant coming with the shouting and thanksgiving of the people. And though the American ballot-box, the ark of the American covenant, our sacred chest, has been carried again and again into captivity by fraud and iniquity, and spurious voting, I believe it will be brought back yet by prayer and by Christian consecration, and will be set down in the midst of the temple of Christian patriotism. Whose responsibility? Yours and mine.

A Poor Soldier

went to a hairdresser in London. He wanted to get back to the army. He had overrun his furlough, and he wanted some help to get back in quick transit. The money was given to the poor soldier, who said to the man who had offered the kindness: "I have nothing to give you in return but this little worn-out recipe for making blacking." He gave it, not thinking there was any value in it especially, and the man who took it did not suppose there was any special value in it; but it yielded the man who took it $2,500,000, and was the foundation of one of the greatest estates in England. And that little vote, that insignificant vote which you take out of your pocket—insignificant in your sight and insignificant in the sight of others—may start an influence that will last all through the progress of this Government.

I charge you, then, as American citizens, to Remember Your Responsibility

on the first Tuesday of November. It will begin early, the snow-storm of suffrages. It will snow all day—snow on until noon, snow on until night. The flakes will fall in every town and village and neighborhood, the white flakes. The octogenarian will come up, his hand trembling, and with spectacled eye he will scrutinize the vote and drop it and pass on. The young man who has been waiting for his time will come up, and proudly and blushingly deposit his first vote and pass on. The capitalist will come up with bediamonded finger, and the laborer with hard fist, and the one vote will be as good as the other. Snow-storm of suffrages, and then these white flakes will be gathered together and compacted into an avalanche that will slide down in expression of the will of the people. Stand out of the way of it! In the awful sweep of this white avalanche let political fraud go down a thousand feet under.

You have not only a vote, you have a prayer. The prayer may be mightier than the vote. Oh, as citizens of this beautiful city, and of this State, and of this nation, let us do our whole duty. We cannot live under any other form of government than that which God has given.

The Stars On Our Flag

are not the stars of a thickening night, but the stars sprinkled amid the bars of morning cloud. We are going to have one government on this entire continent. Let the despotisms of Aisa keep their feet off the Pacific coast, and let the tyrannies of Europe keep their feet off the Atlantic coast. We are going to have one government. Mexico will follow Texas into the Union, and Christianity and civilization will stand side by side in the halls of the Montezumas. And if not in our day, then in the day of our children, Yucatan and Central America will come in dominion, while on the north Canada will be ours, not by conquest—oh, no, American and English swords may never clash blades—but we will woo our fair neighbor of the North, and then England will say to Canada: "You are old enough for the marriage day," and then, turning, will say: "Giant of the West, go take your bride." And then from Baffin's Bay to the Caribbean there will be one government under one flag, with one destiny—a free, undisputed, Christianized American continent. God save the city of Brooklyn! God save the commonwealth of New York!

GOD SAVE THE UNION!

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman (London), edited by the Rev. M. Baxter, may be had from the office of this journal, 63 Bible House, New York; price six cents, including postage. Annual subscription, seventy cents. The following articles, among others, are contained in the number for October:

The Nineteenth Century in the Light of Prophecy.
The Kingdom of Christ as Predicted by Daniel.
The literal Return of the Jews. By Dr. Kellogg.
The Scarlet Woman or the Church of Rome.
The Seven Trumpets Explained.
Passing Events Viewed from a Prophetic Standpoint..

TRANSFORMED TEMPLES IN JAPAN.

INTERESTING news of buildings erected for idolatry being used for the worship of God is sent to the Church by Rev. H. Loomis, who is laboring at Yokohama, in Japan. He states that at a recent prayer-meeting in that city, an intelligent looking man named Okabe, about thirty years old, presented himself and asked permission to give an account of a work he had himself initiated in his own town in the distant province of Shinshin. Consent was given, and Okabe told his story with much modesty. He said that he was a member of the Liberal party, and first heard the gospel at Uyeda and Komore, which are about twelve miles distant from his home. As soon as he became acquainted with the teachings of Christ he felt their truth and tried to follow in the right way, and began to teach this religion to the children and people of the village. He had some skill as a teacher, and became popular in the village. Soon he was cheered by the conversion of eight persons, and a missionary was sent for to baptize them.

Without any regular preaching the work grew, and after some time an elder of one of the churches went to assist in teaching and preaching as best he could. More were soon gathered in until in the spring of last year a church was organized, and Okabe was chosen the elder. Such was the confidence in him and in his work that when a place was required for Sunday and other services it was suggested that the village temple was unoccupied and not used, and that could be taken for that purpose. So it was cleared out, and has been converted into a Christian place of worship.

Hearing of what had been done at Kasugawa, some people in a neighboring town asked to have the same preacher come and use their temple in like manner. And so without a word of opposition these buildings, erected for the worship of idols, have become the means of spreading the knowledge of the true God and Christ the Saviour of the world.

Okabe is full of love for the Master and the Master's work, and reports that twenty-four have been baptized, and ten more are applicants.

THE CONVERSION OF A TOUGH.

THE police and prison wardens of New York have given the name of "tough" to men so debased and brutalized that punishment seems to have no effect upon them. That even men of this class may be moved by divine influence is proved by the following incident, which is related by Rev. A. T. Pierson in his work, "Evangelistic Work in Principle and Practice."

"No man was so vile or so vicious that Jerry McAuley despaired of him. 'Rowdy Brown' was one of the toughs—a large, strong, bold fellow, who united the brutality of a savage with the ferocity of a wild beast. Passing a man who was seated on the forecastle of a Liverpool packet quietly reading his Bible, Brown, in pure malice, kicked him so violently in the mouth as to knock out his teeth; and this ruffian had killed men while in California. Hearing of the conversion of one of his sailor-mates at the Water Street Mission, New York, he swore that he would go down there, and if that fellow should get up to talk, he would force open his jaws and empty a bottle of whiskey down his throat. He went with his bottle. But there was a Power there on whose resistance to his devilish plot he had not counted. While waiting for his time to come, he became strangely moved himself; a new sensation, a violent trembling, overmastered him. He could not even flee; the crowd was too dense, and his strength was gone. By the time his old chum was giving his testimony, 'Rowdy Brown' was ready to faint; and when, at the close of the testimonies, inquirers were invited to come forward, he startled the whole company by dropping on his knees and crying, 'Pray for me!' The excitement was intense. He yelled and groaned for mercy, while his awakened conscience rocked and racked even his huge frame. Two nights of tempest passed before he heard the voice that speaks the soul into calm. But when he did get peace, he leaped from bed at midnight, and roused the whole house with his shouts of praise. 'Rowdy Brown' no sooner found Christ than he found work for Christ. In his intense passion to save men he would actually pick up bodily and carry some sailor to the Mission, and set down the astonished man on the anxious-seat, and then plead and pray with him till the heat of his own ardor and fervor melted him into submission to Christ."

THE ANTI-SLAVERY CRUSADE.

MENTION was made in a recent number of this journal of the attempt made by Cardinal Lavigerie to arouse public opinion throughout Europe to the atrocities of the slave raids in Africa. It appears that practical measures are now being devised to suppress the awful traffic. Mr. Allen, secretary to the Anti-Slavery Society, has had an interview with Cardinal Lavigerie, and heard the latest details from his lips as to the progress of the new Crusade. The Cardinal observed that it was with much pain that he found a certain clique of French and Belgian journals were systematically misrepresenting his mission, and calling it merely a blind to oppose Mahomedanism; and he considered that such attacks might be traced to the existence of a party whom he must designate the ligue des negriers, or persons interested in the continuance of the slave trade. In answer to the question as to whether the Cardinal had drawn up any plan of action for the suppression of the traffic in human beings, provided that men and money were forthcoming, he replied that, both in France and Belgium, the enlistment of volunteers and a subscription-list have commenced, but that nothing will definitely be decided upon for a few weeks. Meantime he wished to state, very emphatically, that he had no intention of instituting a war against the Arabs. By placing a steamer, and that not necessarily a large one, on each of the great lakes, the transit of slaves across those inland seas might be, if not entirely stopped, greatly retarded. He would also plant a few European stations in the country between the lakes, for the observation of the trade, and its possible prevention. The disarmment of the Arabs, and of the natives whom they employ to assist them in their raids, might become practicable if steps were taken to restrict the importation of arms and ammunition into central and eastern Africa. Mr. Allen assured the Cardinal of the warmest support upon this last suggestion of the English Anti-Slavery Society, and undertook to urge upon the British Government to endeavor to obtain a concensus of the European Powers, not only to devise some measure to limit the importation of murderous weapons into Africa, but also of the appalling quantities of cheap and pernicious alcohol which is now pouring in, in such enormous volumes, and is working disastrous effects upon the native races.

AN INTERVIEW WITH KING MWANGA.

MR. GORDON, who is a nephew of Bishop Hannington, the Christian martyr, who was murdered in October, 1885, by Mwanga, King of Uganda, is now in the territory of the murderer of his uncle, laboring for Christ. An assistant has been sent to him in the person of Mr. Walker who sends an interesting account of his first reception by the bloodthirsty King. He says: "Before Bishop Parker [Bishop Hannington's successor, whose portrait and life appeared in this journal on June 7] died, it had been arranged that I should come on here to keep Gordon company, and to show the King that we were quite ready to come and to believe in his good feeling toward us; also to show him that he had nothing to fear from white men. He had sent a messenger, saying that he wanted another white man to come, and mentioned my name, inviting me. On the following Tuesday we arrived. The King's messenger went on to tell of my arrival, and the next morning, early, I set off. On the way I met the King's messenger, who took me to a native house and asked me to wait till he had fetched my things. The King had given a chief the order to carry up all my goods. While waiting, we put the chair together that I had brought as a present for the King. It was a 'chairman's chair,' high back, stuffed, and covered with crimson leather. The water had rather spoilt the seat, discoloring the leather in places: we also brought a good-sized piece of carpet as a present for the King. At 7.30 A. M. we set off for the Court.

"At last, after passing through several doors in high reed fences, we came to the Court-house itself. A bodyguard was drawn up in front of it. Gordon made me go first. As I stepped over the raised door-step all in the Court stood up—the Arabs, the chiefs, and the King himself. I walked up the centre aisle towards the King, and in my ignorance went up far too near to him. Gordon hurried after me and touched me on the shoulder; I stopped. The King placed his hand on his breast and bowed towards us; we acknowledged the salute in the same way. Then the King and the chiefs sat down. and we, passing behind the first row, walked up to the wall against which the throne was placed, and took our seats on camp stools some ten feet to the King's right hand. The Court was full of people, and all along the walls were ranged soldiers with guns pointed towards the door. The King spoke kindly to us, made several remarks upon my personal appearance, and decreed that I was not such a good-looking man as Gordon. He asked if I had come in the place of the Bishop. Of course, Gordon, who did all the talking, and told me what was being said, assured him that I had not come in any sense as the Bishop's representative. He then asked if I was a smith or carpenter. Gordon assured him I was neither, but like himself simply a teacher. He seemed pleased and satisfied.

"From the description others have given of King Mwanga, you may know that he looks twenty-three or so, has a weak-looking mouth, and rather a silly sort of laugh and smile; he raises his eyebrows very high, and twitches them in surprise, or in giving assent to a statement. He looked a young, frivolous sort of man, very weak and easily led; passionate, and, if provoked, petulant. He looks as if he would be easily frightened, and possessed of very little courage or self-control.

"Such a reception Gordon thinks has never been given to any one before. The Arabs, who came to see us to-day, say they never saw the King of Buganda stand up to receive a guest on any former occasion. They think we are in great favor now, but we do not hang on prince's favor or put any confidence in man."

AMONG CHINESE IMMIGRANTS.

AT a missionary meeting held two weeks ago in Chicago, Mrs. J. M. Condit, who has labored for sixteen years as a missionary among the Chinese in Los Angeles, Cal., told the history of a cup which she brought as a gift to the Presbyterian Board. She said that the night before leaving Los Angeles the little Chinese church held a communion service and not only the twenty-seven church-members living in the city, but the eighteen who came from the country and cannot attend regularly were present. Afterwards one of the members brought to her their two large cups, which, as they have no communion-set, had been used by them in celebrating the Lord's Supper, and begged her to accept them as a gift. She finally agreed to do so on condition that she might present them to the board at 1334 Chestnut Street, and to the presbyterian society with which she has been so long connected. The second cup was shattered, however, before she could deliver it. Replying to one who asked if the Chinese in this country seemed much devoted to their heathen worship, she said that they do not go much to their temples, and the fact that life here so soon destroys their faith in idolatry, makes the duty of giving them the true religion the more imperative. One of her hearers was reminded of her own experience in a joss-house, when in response to r question whether or not he would sell her ne of the incense sticks, the priest replied,

Jo, our god would be angry if we should sell
:m to you," adding in a stage whisper, "but u may steal some." She told him her God bade that.

THE MESSAGE OF THE PROPHETS.

BY REV. ALBERT ERDMAN, D. D.* e Subject Pre-eminent—The Millenial Period

f Blessing—What it Comprehends—Must Sure-y be After the Second Advent—The Sixteen Ac-
:ording Voices—Joel's Key-note—The Evangelcal Declarations of Isaiah—A Significant Fact n Amos—The Fall of Silence—The Silence Broken by John—The Message Summarized.

THE Old Testament, especially the prophecies,
:ak of a glorious period of blessedness and iversal peace under the dominion of Messiah
: King, and if that is not the personal and pre-llennial coming of the Lord Jesus Christ, then rds fail to express the idea. Israel's expectan of that blessed period began in the reign of lomon, when the kingdom of Israel was at its ghest earthly glory. It was then that the ophets began to speak of a more glorious time come, and of one greater than Solomon, him-f a son of David, who should sit upon the rone of David for ever and ever. That is

The Wonder of the Old Testament.

Then, when you come to the New Testament, d find you are standing in the light of much the glory prophesied for Jesus as coming to leem sinners from the power of sin and San, you learn something more glorious yet to me, even Jesus as King of kings and Lord of ds in His eternal glory.

But what is comprehended in

This Millennial Period,

: "times of restitution" which holy men of d spake of from the foundation of the world?
comprehends the appearing and the glory of r great God and Saviour Jesus Christ to acmplish the restoration of all things, the resur:tion by Him of His departed saints, and the oture of His living saints to take part in His minion over the living nations; the overthrow d expulsion of all forms of evil from the earth;
: binding of him who was the source of evil;
: repentance and restoration of Israel in honor
d holiness to their own land; the outpouring the Spirit on all flesh that should be spared m God's judgments sent upon the earth; the newal of the earth to more than its original auty as the blessed home of the race; and, ally, at the close of this millennial period, the urrection, judgment, and condemnation of : wicked dead, the casting of Satan into his n place of punishment, the abolition, last of of death, and then the eternal years of God
r all, blessed for ever. That is comprehend-in the phrase, the times of restitution, the illennial period, the coming of Messiah. Such he uniform testimony of the prophets who tified beforehand the sufferings of Christ and : glories to follow.

From Isaiah to Malachi there were sixteen y men from God who spake as they were ved by the Holy Ghost concerning these ngs. They sometimes appeared together, at ier times at intervals, during a period of near-500 years. Of

These Sixteen Prophets

re is a three-fold classification. First, the ophets down to the seventy years exile, viz.:
iah, Jeremiah, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, ah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, and Zepha-
h. Second, those who prophesied during : Babylonish captivity, viz.: Jeremiah, who ntinued his ministry a few years into the cap-ty, Ezekiel and Daniel. Third, the prophets er the restoration, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. Some of these prophets belonged to the Northern Kingdom, some to the Southern.

The turning-point in the history of Judah and Israel came when the prophets of Jehovah were rejected and ignored, and the prophets and priests of Baal were honored instead, and it was then that a change occurred from spoken to written prophecy. As soon as the days began to degenerate, then began the writing down of the utterances of Jehovah, through the mouth and pen of those writers inspired of God, indicating, as has been pointed out by another, two things: first, the withdrawal of Jehovah's presence from His people; second, a delay, longer or shorter, in the fulfilment of the Divine purposes concerning Messiah and His Kingdom. Joel and Jonah were acknowledged to be the oldest of the written prophecies, Jonah probably the oldest as to his public ministry, but as his written prophecy was not given until later in his life, Joel probably came first.

In the book of Jonah, if it was the earliest of the prophetic books, you find this significant fact, that the Lord makes known the underlying truth in all revelation, and the whole purposes of God, viz.: that God is not the God of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles, and that grace and mercy are to be proclaimed to the Gentile nations as well, and in the name of Him of whom Jonah himself was but a type.

Then Joel came and struck

The Key-Note

for all who followed him. His prophetic vision embraced the future down to the establishment of the millennial kingdom, when Jehovah shall have returned to Israel again in Mount Zion. Joel 3:9–21. There you have the substance of all Old Testament prophecy, and it is that glorious declaration that appears again in the eschatological discourses of Jesus and in the Apocalypse of John. It is in Joel you meet for the first time the phrase, "to bring again the captivity," etc.

Turning to Isaiah the evangelical prophet, his prophecy is a vision concerning Judah and Jerusalem.

The Main Subjects

of his prophecy are these: Israel's future in the millennial glory, with Jerusalem as the metropolitan city of the redeemed earth, the judgment of the nations and their blessings afterward in subordination to Judah and Jerusalem, and all in connection with the coming and kingdom of Messiah the Christ, and it is to be observed that Christ and the apostles quoted this prophet more frequently than any other. The first twelve chapters have to do with the destruction of the Assyrian, the great northern power and political enemy of Israel, followed by the deliverance of earth from the curse, with the full redemption of Israel, and Christ the Messiah standing as an ensign to the people, to whom, as the centre of rest and of glory, all should gather. (Isa. 11:10.) In this section occurred that magnificent promise of the coming King and kingdom, "Unto us a Son is born, etc." There was no possibility of denying the literalness of part of this prophecy and it follows that there could be no reason for denying the literalness of the other part. (Isa. 24:21-23; 25:7-9.)

Three things certainly are proven by these two prophets, viz., first, that Jehovah Jesus will come again in glory as He once came in weakness and suffering, personally and visibly. Second, There is no hope for Israel, and no fullest blessing for the nations until this Jehovah Jesus shall come. Third. There will be in person to bring it in. Meanwhile, the church, like the forerunner of the Messiah, of whom Isaiah spoke so definitely, is to proclaim the glad tidings, and make ready the way for the coming of the Lord. That gives us the distinction again between Israel and the church, between the past dispensation, the present, and the coming dispensation, The church is the antitype of John the Baptist, proclaiming the glad tidings of the coming One in glory, making ready the way of the Lord, and when He comes He will take up the line of prophecy, and fulfil that which was written.

No Millennium Before Christ Comes

Jeremiah, like John the Baptist, was ordained a prophet unto the Lord before His birth. Two of his prophecies (23:5 6, and 33:14-17) were exceedingly definite and distinct concerning the personal coming of the Lord Jesus Christ. Hosea, whose name meant salvation, or deliverance, prophesied in the long and brilliant reign of Jeroboam the second, in the northern kingdom. It was true he bewailed the apostacy, and in most tender and affectionate terms rebuked the people for their sins, but all through his prophecy of lament and rebuke there runs the blessed promise of hope and glory to come, of spiritual and of national recovery, of the time when Jehovah should return to his own again. (Take specially ch. 3:4, 5.)

Amos, contemporary with Isaiah and Hosea, spoke of Judah and Jerusalem, and of the Gentile nations. His great Messianic prophecy had connected with it; it is the one which James at the first council in Jerusalem quoted as giving the Divine order of events. (Amos 9:8-15, compared with Acts 15:14-17.) If we had no other comment in the New Testament on prophecy than that, it would be sufficient. Amos tells us of the dispersion of Israel, sifted among the nations as corn is sifted, and yet not a grain is to be lost, and then of a glorious time of recovery, a planting of them again in their own land. Amos knew only of the dispersion of Israel, and then of the gathering again, but when they turned over to the New Testament then came in this present dispensation, as James tells us. He said, first it was God's purpose to gather out a people for His name from all the nations, Jew and Gentile, and after this—after the gathering of the church out from among the nations—after this He would return (quoting from Amos) and build the tabernacle of David.

A Significant Fact

The other prophets filled out and confirmed these things. I have not touched the great prophets, Ezekiel and Daniel, and those after the restoration, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. You are perhaps more familiar with them than with some of the smaller ones, but you see how constantly and increasingly, and with more definiteness, came out this line of revelation, of suffering and glory. There was an unfolding in Malachi's day. For 400 years the heavens were brass over the earth, no voice broke the stillness, no words came to comfort the hearts of men. Then suddenly the stillness was broken, the brazen heavens parted and filled with light, and there came the words, "peace on earth, good-will to men," and the revelation of a Saviour, Jesus the Son of David, according to the promise made to the virgin mother, "He shall be great, and the Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of His father David, and He shall rule over the house of Jacob forever, and of His kingdom there shall be no end."

Until the Silence Fell

In conclusion, you find in these prophets, who is to come, when He is to come, why He is to come, how He is to come. You find these characteristics of the kingdom: it is to be universal over all nations, in righteousness; in it Israel is to have the first place among the nations; it is to be administered by one of the seed of Abraham, and of the family of David: and it is to be the kingdom of Messias the Christ, the ideal Prophet, Priest and King. Your hearts must therefore certainly yield to the blessed influence and teaching of the prophetic Word if you believe that God is a God who has a purpose to accomplish, and who will assuredly accomplish that which He has spoken. All lines run forward and gather together, and are consummated in glory in the person and the coming and the kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

*An address delivered at the Believers' Meeting for Bible ly, at Niagara, Ont. Published, with other addresses by nent preachers, in a pamphlet of 131 pages, under the of "Conference Hill Studies," by The Willard Tract ository, Toronto, Canada. For sale, price 50 cents, by J. E. Jewett, 77 Bible House, New York.

The Antichrist Babylon and the Coming of the Kingdom, by G. H. Pember, M. A. A new work of remarkable originality and power, written in a popular and simple style, yet showing much scholarly research, 171 pages; Price in cloth covers, 50 cents. For sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

TERMS AND INSTRUCTIONS.

Published Weekly. Subscription price in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, $1.50 a year; $1 eight months; 75 cents six months; sent two months on trial for 25 cents, postage free; in Europe and in all countries in the Postal Union, 50 cents extra postage; subscriptions always payable in advance. Single copies, price 3 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

New Subscriptions can commence at any time. When no date is mentioned, we begin it with the issue of the week in which the subscription is received.

Remittances by Mail should be by Post-office money order, bank cheque, draft, or express money order, whenever possible, and should always be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Letters containing money sent in this way need not be registered, as when lost, duplicates can always be obtained.

If a Postal Note or currency is sent, it should always be in a registered letter. Letters can be registered at any office. Subscribers sending money of this kind, and not registering, do it at their own risk.

Change of Address. Name of Post-office and State, of both old and new address, should always be given in case of removal, as without the previous address it is impossible to find the name on our list.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President's Proclamation Appointing Thanksgiving Day for November 29 was issued last Thursday. In the course of it the President says: "On that day let all our people suspend their ordinary work and occupations, and in their accustomed places of worship, with prayer and songs of praise, render thanks to God for all His mercies, for the abundant harvests which have rewarded the toil of the husbandman during the year that has passed, and for the rich rewards that have followed the labors of our people in their shops and their marts of trade and traffic. Let us give thanks for peace, and for social order and contentment within our borders, and for our advancement in all that adds to national greatness. And, mindful of the afflictive dispensation with which a portion of our land has been visited, let us, while we humble ourselves before the power of God, acknowledge His mercy in setting bounds to the deadly march of pestilence, and let our hearts be chastened by sympathy with our fellow-countrymen who have suffered and who mourn."

The Statement Issued by the Treasury Department on November 1 showed a reduction of debt, less cash in the Treasury, of only $4,585,619, which is only a little over one-half of the average monthly decrease from the opening of the fiscal year to October 1. The ordinary expenses during the month have, however, owing to the completion of the appropriation bills by Congress, been unusually large, passing $17,000,000; over $3,000,000 more than in October of last year has been paid out in pensions, and there has been expended $4,518,457 in premiums on lands purchased.

The Blunder of the British Minister at Washington, mentioned in these columns last week, has involved his dismissal from his post. A brief note from Mr. Secretary Bayard was sent to him on October 30, informing him that, for reasons which had been fully stated to his home Government, his continuance in his present official position was no longer acceptable to this Government, and would consequently be detrimental to the relations between the two countries. Further recognition of him as the accredited representative of Great Britain was therefore declined. The next day a statement of the case, which had been drawn up by Mr. Bayard for submission to the President, was given to the press. It contained the further information that our Minister in London had formally requested the recall of Lord Sackville. As the British Government did not recall him with the promptitude expected by our Administration, his dismissal by the President followed. There are precedents for Mr. Cleveland's action, but it is generally felt that a more dignified and honorable course would have been to wait a longer time for the British Government to take action. The abrupt dismissal has the appearance of haste and impatience too puerile to befit the head of a great nation. This is the more to be regretted because the results of Lord Sackville's blunder—if any result could come from it—would be damaging to Mr. Cleveland's personal interests, rather than to those of the Government of the United States. His dismissal is doubtless good politics, but it is poor statesmanship.

The Remarkable Origin of the Yellow Fever epidemic in Jacksonville, Fla., was described in an address recently given by Surgeon-General Hamilton, at Norfolk, Va., before the Virginia State Medical Society. He stated that the epidemic had been traced back to the Key West epidemic of last year, the germs having been carried to Tampa in some blankets purchased by Italians in the infected city. The Key West scourge was introduced from Havana by a family who kept a restaurant there, and when they emigrated to Key West brought their effects over in a tramp ship, as regular steamers would not carry bedding and clothes from that city, where the yellow fever was known to be prevalent. There was neither government nor local quarantine at Key West at that time, and the goods were landed without opposition. The whole of the restaurant keeper's family died of the fever, and the disease became epidemic, and this year has been carried with such melancholy results to Jacksonville. Dr. Hamilton strongly urged a change in the laws which should give the Washington government power to control quarantine in all our ports and along the entire coast.

The Startling Discovery That the Murderous Italian society of the Mafia has an organization in New York has been made. An Italian was slaughtered with a knife recently, while standing at the doors of Cooper Union, and as the body had upon it, when found, a quantity of valuable property, it was clear that the object of the murder was not robbery. The police, in investigating the case, found that the deceased was a member of the Mafia, and the mystery was at once explained. When the two Sicilies were united with Italy a determined effort was made to break up the Mafia, which at that time had its agents in every public office, in every business, and even in the palace itself, and which terrorized the community by its audacious murders. Many of its members fled to this country, and it appears, that they have organized the society here. There are 40,000 Italians in New York, and it therefore becomes a serious question how many of them are controlled by the order. The character of the Mafia in Italy leads to the apprehension that not only may Italians be assassinated in obedience to its mandates, but a judge or a policeman or any official who made himself obnoxious to the society might be doomed to death.

The Proceedings of the Parnell Commission have been the prominent topic of interest in Great Britain during the past week. The chief witness was Captain O'Shea, who up to 1886 was an intimate friend of Mr. Parnell, but in that year quarrelled with him on private grounds, and is now evidently strongly hostile to him. His evidence went far to substantiate the charges that the Times has made against Mr. Parnell, of his associating with murderers and conniving at outrages. O'Shea said that he heard Parnell promise that if the Government would settle the arrears-of-rent question satisfactorily he would advise tenants to pay their rents, and would denounce outrages, resistance to the law, and all kinds of intimidation. O'Shea asked Mr. Parnell if he was sure he was able to carry out his guarantee to suppress outrages, and Mr. Parnell gave him assurance that he had the power. In a subsequent interview with Mr. Parnell he had warned that gentleman that Sheridan was a murderer and a concocter of murders, and the police could not allow him to remain in the country. Mr. Parnell replied that he did not communicate with Sheridan personally, but knew some one who did. Another important item of evidence was given by the witness. It is alleged that the letters purporting to be written by Mr. Parnell, which the Times has published, are forgeries. They were submitted to O'Shea, and he said, emphatically, "That is Parnell's writing." He added that he had received numerous letters from Mr. Parnell, of about the same date as the letter referred to, and could not mistake the writing. The evidence caused a sensation in court, which was not diminished by the witness's known hostility to Mr. Parnell.

The Coming Changes in the Constitution of the French Republic promise to give rise to a fierce struggle. The Paris correspondent of the New York Herald, who has made a canvass of the leaders of all sections of the political parties, declares that the outcome of it all is the conviction that what the advanced republicans want is to revert to a sort of Directory, a government by committees, without either President or Cabinet or Senate; everything else to be left to the chapter of accidents, while the Constitution will be thrown into the melting-pot, thus to prepare the way for another Napoleon, a new man of December. It is now conceded by all parties that there is a certain amount of political logic underlying Boulanger's formless, incoherent imagination, and that his revision scheme, vague and featureless as it is, exactly reflects the tendencies of the hour, and points out a path for France; meanwhile the Government is bidding for the support of the lowest class of the community by its change in the system of taxation. The proposed income-tax creates quite a fever of excitement among foreigners and all who have an income of over $400 a year, but the great masses of the people, peasantry and workmen, are all in favor of it. It is to win popularity among these classes, who are very important in case of a plébiscite or a general election, that the Premier proposes the bill. There is an uneasy feeling prevalent that France is on the eve of momentous changes, which may issue in an Empire or a Red Republic.

A Sharp Reproof to the German Press Was administered last week by the young Emperor in addressing a municipal deputation in Berlin. Referring to his journeys, on the success of which the deputation had congratulated him, the Emperor said: "I cannot but give expression to a very painful reminiscence of my journey. While I have devoted health and strength to securing the peace and welfare of the Fatherland, and thus of the capital also, by creating ties of friendship, the daily press of the capital has given publicity to and spoken about the affairs of my family in a manner which a private individual would never tolerate. I am not only painfully impressed by this, but my displeasure has been aroused. I wish, above all, that the continuous citing of the name of my departed father shall cease. It most deeply injures my feelings as his son, and it is in the highest degree unbecoming." None of the members ventured to make any remark upon the Emperor's unexpected reproaches. Even if etiquette had allowed it, they were too much amazed to respond. The Emperor spoke in a quiet tone, which was utterly devoid of anger, but his words and manner left the impression that he felt acutely the attacks that had been made.

Direct News of Mr. H. M. Stanley Arrived at Zanzibar on Friday last. A party of Arabs stated that they came upon the explorers' rear-guard in November, 1887, at a point west of Albert Nyanza. They did not see Stanley himself. He was two days' march ahead. He had been ill, but was then in good health. He had changed his course from northeast to north, in the hope of avoiding marshes, and intended, when sufficiently far north, to travel due east to Wadelai, and expected to arrive there in January, 1888. The expedition had been obliged to cut its way through forests, in which they could not advance faster than one mile a day. There had been fighting with hostile tribes, but the expedition still numbered 250 men.

Notice to Missionaries in Africa Has Been sent by the British Government of intended hostilities, and they have been advised to quit the eastern coast. The London Times announces that the Universities Mission to Central Africa has been officially informed that, in view of the active operations projected by the Government against the slave-traders on the Zanzibar coast, it is desirable that all Europeans be immediately withdrawn from stations on the mainland. The Universities Mission, which was started in 1859 by a society formed in the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, Dublin, and Durham, has a larger number of stations on the mainland back of the Zanzibar coast than any other missionary society. Besides its stations at Mombasa, Mogila, Uruba, Newala, Mkwera, Numange, and Matakai, from fifty to three hundred miles distant from Zanzibar, it has several stations on the east coast of Lake Nyassa, at one of which a fight with Arab slavers recently occurred. When active operations are begun against slave-traders, the country will very likely be untenable, for a while, for one hundred and fifty white men engaged at about thirty missionary stations. How hostilities would affect the twelve or fifteen mission stations supported by the London and Church Missionary Societies, and the Algerian Fathers in the Victoria Nyanza and Tanganyika regions, cannot yet be foretold.

The Imminent Peril of Six Hundred Seamen was described to President Cleveland on October 30, and an appeal made to him for government assistance. It appears that early in September last the whalers in the Arctic were having a very poor time. None of them had any catch, and they became desperate. Thirteen vessels pushed farther north and became caught in the pack ice. News of their distress was brought to San Francisco by a whaler which escaped, and an earnest appeal for assistance was made. The captain states that unless prompt relief is sent scarcely one man of the six hundred on board the thirteen ships can be saved. The only opportunity that the frozen vessels have to get away is the possibility of wind springing up, that they may push off and beat the ice on its drift to the west. It will take a good strong breeze to do this, but usually the first wind of winter comes in the shape of a howling arctic storm, and this makes the chances still worse. The crews have neither food nor clothing enough to stand a prolonged stay in the arctic regions, so that if they escape being crushed they may starve to death. The President has directed the Navy Department to send a relief vessel if possible without delay. The helpless condition of the poor imperilled men is a type of what our whole world was when sin entered it. There was no hope of self deliverance, but God in His infinite love and compassion took pity upon it and Christ came for its rescue. Sad is it that so few of the lost avail themselves of love so great! (Rom. 5: 12, 18.)

The Value of a Husband was Assessed by a Boston court, on October 27, at thirty thousand dollars. It appears that, some years ago, a wealthy doctor became impressed with the talents of a girl, who, he believed possessed a remarkable voice and talents, which under careful training would make her a brilliant star of the operatic stage. He caused her to be well educated at his own expense, and subsequently sent her to Europe for training under the most famous masters of music and the histrionic art. He expended very large sums in perfecting her education for her career, and the girl, who was exceedingly ambitious, appeared likely to justify the hopes entertained of her success. Just as she was about to appear in a play expressly written for her, at the expense of the doctor who had befriended her, and who also provided further sums for her equipment, she accepted an offer of marriage and renounced the stage. The doctor's disappointment and chagrin were intense. He declared that he would have his revenge. Accordingly by a series of letters to the husband he succeeded in prejudicing him against his wife to so serious an extent that, before the honeymoon was over, the husband separated from her and eventually obtained a divorce. The lady sued the doctor for compensation for the loss of her husband and the Superior Court has awarded her $30,000. As the husband was affluent, the damages are not considered excessive, especially as the lady claims that in exposing the secrets of her past life, the doctor maliciously designed to alienate the affections of her husband, to whom she was deeply attached. Happily for the church, the bride of Christ, no attempt to deprive her of His love can succeed. Though "the accuser of the saints" can point to her faults and imperfections and unfaithfulness, Christ's love for her can never be alienated. (Rom. 8: 38, 39.)

A Life Was Saved by a Present of Flowers in Jacksonville, Fla., on October 11. A local journal says that on that day a beautiful girl drove out to the fever camp at Sand Hills, and gave to a physician a magnificent bouquet of flowers, requesting him to give it to one of his patients, a young man then in a critical stage of the disease. The doctor asked if he should say who it was that brought them. The young lady, blushing deeply, replied, "Never mind the name; just give them to him." "It's strange how some things will help along a sick man," said the doctor. "There was this fellow in a bad fix with the fever, and as soon as I told him that a young lady, who refused to give her name, had sent him these flowers, which she had brought out herself to the Sand Hills, the patient smiled, and began to mend from that very minute, and now is out of danger." Doubtless the young patient recognized in the flowers a message of reconciliation and love, and was not the first man who has felt new physical life and recuperating energy spring out of reciprocated love. Something like this has often been the means of restoring a lost soul. When a man, degraded and outcast, realizes, for the first time, that God loves him, he takes new hope and enters into newness of life. (Rom. 5: 8.)

A Lady Made Blind Through Vanity is Bemoaning her sad condition in her home in Evansville, Ind. A journal of that city says that about a year ago a girl of rare beauty became the acknowledged belle of the city. "A pair of large, liquid blue eyes set off a face that would put any picture to shame, and her form was simply perfect. The young lady was highly educated, and possessed all the qualities that go to make up a society belle. Her parents are well-to-do, and she has wanted for nothing since she was old enough to prattle. But she had one fault, and that fault has proved her undoing. It is called vanity. She fairly worshipped her own eyes, and did everything in her power to make them more beautiful than they were. She used numerous drugs before she found what she wanted. This last drug made her eyes sparkle like diamonds, and she used it to such an extent that her right eye began to shrivel. This brought her to her senses, and the family physician was called in. But he came too late, and informed the poor girl that she must lose one of her eyes sure, and probably both. The right eye was taken out some time ago, and she has lost all sight in the left, and will be blind for life." Though it is rare that vanity leads to so direct and manifest a calamity as this, it has often led to spiritual blindness, which has more disastrous results. (Rom. 1: 21.)

A Claim by a Supposed Dead Man Was presented in the Surrogate's Court, New York, on October 29. Twenty years ago a wealthy merchant died, leaving his estate in equal shares to his three children. Four years previously his second son had left home to travel in Africa and India, and nothing had been heard of him since. His share of his father's estate was carefully invested, and the proceeds were added yearly to the principal. Thirteen years passed, and still no tidings came. As there was then a strong presumption that the man was dead, application was made to the court for permission to divide his estate. The judge, concluding that seventeen years' silence was satisfactory evidence of death, made the required order granting letters of administration on his estate, as in the case of a dead man. A few weeks ago the lost brother returned after twenty-four years of wandering and sojourn in unfrequented regions of Asia and Africa. Learning what had been done with his share of his father's property, he took meaures to establish his identity, and last week applied to have set aside the decree of the Surrogate adjudicating him a dead man, and to recover his share of the estate. As his presence in court was an incontestable proof of his being alive, he had no difficulty in getting his claim as heir acknowledged. With the heirs of God the claim rests on exactly opposite grounds. It is to those who are dead to the world, in Christ, that the heritage is awarded. (II Tim. 2: 11, 12.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Dr. Pentecost's visit to Scotland is being owned of God to the quickening of the churches.

Rev. H. W. Brown has closed his services at Plainwell, amid tokens of blessing. He went to Allegan, Mich.

The various Woman's Boards of Missions connected with the American Board brought into the treasury the past year, $152,510.

Rev. W. Humpstone and Mr. Paquett have been conducting revival work at Meredeth, N. Y., and there has been a very hopeful result.

At Evangelist Taft's services at New Salem, Mass., twenty-five persons made public confession of Christ, eight of them being heads of families.

The statistics of Moravian missions, for last year, show that there are 127 stations and out-stations, 288 missionary agents, and 29,707 communicants.

Messrs. E. C. Avis and W. H. Clagell will continue to labor in California during the winter. Their meetings at Casadena, Cal., were much blessed.

The twenty-third annual season of prayer for Young Men and Young Men's Christian Associations will begin as usual, on November 11, and continue one week.

The Presbyterian Church at Elkhart, Ind., has undertaken the entire support of a missionary to the heathen. One half the sum required is given by one member.

Rev. E. P. Hammond will attend the Christian Workers' Convention in Detroit, November 15 to 20, and it is expected arrangements will be made for a children's meeting each day.

The annual convention of the Inter-Seminary Missionary Alliance recently held at Boston resulted in the consecration of seven volunteers for the foreign field and nine others for the home work.

Mr. John Guy Vassar died on Friday, October 26, at Poughkeepsie, after a year's sickness, in his seventy-eighth year. He was the brother of Matthew Vassar, and nephew of the founder of the college.

Rev. Dr. John A. Broadus has been invited to deliver the sermon at Princeton on the Day of Prayer for colleges in January. He also delivers, this year, the Lyman Beecher course of lectures to the Yale Seminary.

Philip Phillips, "the singing pilgrim," as he is familiarly called, is once more making a visit to England, and purposes spending the remainder of 1888 in the north of England and Scotland. Early in 1889 he will hold services in and about London.

The Hoffman chapel in connection with the General Theological Seminary, New York, was consecrated by Bishops Potter and Williams on November 1. Its total cost was over $200,000. The chapel is a memorial of Mrs. Samuel V. Hoffman, the mother of the Dean.

The annual report of the McAll Mission shows the receipts for the past year from all sources to have been $77,000. Great Britain contributed $34,000; the United States, $25,000; France and Switzerland, $15,000; Canada, $1,000; and Australia, $200. Fourteen new stations were opened, making a total of 113.

Dr. Munhall and Prof. Towner expect to begin a series of meetings next week in Davenport, Iowa. Dr. Munhall's meetings at Clifton Springs, N. Y., were very successful. Prof. Towner has been assisting Mr. S. M. Sayford, in the college at Hamilton, N. Y., where many of the young people were led to the Saviour.

The gift of a million dollars to the American Missionary Association has been made by Mr. Daniel Hand, of Clinton, Conn. It is to be used in the States in which slavery was recognized in 1861. The money is to be invested, and the income used in educating colored students, no one student to receive more than $100 a year. It seems that a scholarship in Hampton Institute, Va., for $70 a year.

Very Liberal Terms are Offered to any Person canvassing for subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Sample copies will be sent, postage paid, on application from any one desiring to undertake the work. Ministers and others will find it easy to obtain subscriptions. Send postal card for terms, and state number of sample copies required. Address The Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

A LIFE-LONG OCCUPATION.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"By Him, therefore, let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually; that is, the fruit of our lips giving thanks to His name." Heb. 13:15.

Priestly Functions Under the New Dispensation—I. The Believer's Sacrifice—Presented Through Jesus—Offered Continually—The Sacrifice of Praise—Living Praise—Spoken Praise—Should be Real and Spontaneous—II. The Substance of the Sacrifice—Faith—Gratitude—III. The Exercise Commended—Helps in Other Duties—A Means of Usefulness—IV. To be Immediately Commenced—The Altar to be Used.

It is instructive to notice where this verse stands. The connection is a golden setting to the gem of the text. Here we have a description of the believer's position before God. He has done with all carnal ordinances, and has no interest in the ceremonies of the Mosaic law. Brethren, as believers in Jesus, who is the substance of the outward types, we have, henceforth, nothing to do with altars of gold or of stone: our worship is spiritual, and our altar spiritual.

"We rear no altar, Christ has died;
We deck no priestly shrine."

What then? Are we to offer no sacrifice? Very far from it. We are called upon to offer to God a continual sacrifice. Instead of presenting in the morning and the evening a sacrifice of lambs, and on certain holy days bringing bullocks and sheep to be slain, we are to present to God continually the sacrifice of praise. Having done with the outward, we now give ourselves entirely to the inward and to the spiritual. Do you see your calling, brethren?

Moreover, the believer is now, if he is where he ought to be, like his Master,

"Without The Camp."

"Let us go forth, therefore, unto Him without the camp, bearing His reproach." What then? If we are without the camp, have we nothing to do? Are we cut off from God as well as from men? Shall we fume and fret because we are not of the world? On the contrary, let us the more ardently pursue higher objects, and yield up our disentangled spirits to the praise and glory of God.

Do we come under contempt, as the Master did? Is it so that we are "bearing His reproach"? Shall we sit down in despair? Shall we be crushed beneath this burden? Nay, verily; while we lose honor ourselves, we will ascribe honor to our God. We will count it all joy that we are counted worthy to be reproached for Christ's sake. Let us now praise God continually. Let the fruit of our lips be a still bolder confession of His name. Let us more and more earnestly make known His glory and His grace.

You see, then, brethren, that the text is rather an unexpected one in its connection; but when properly viewed it is the fittest that could be. The more we are made to feel that we are strangers in a strange land, the more should we addict ourselves to the praises of God, with whom we sojourn. Crucified to the world, and the world crucified to us, let us spend and be spent in the praises of Him who is our joy.

I. First, concerning a believer, let me describe

The Believer's Sacrifice.

"By Him therefore." See, at the very threshold of all offering of sacrifice to God we begin with Christ. We cannot go a step without Jesus. Without a Mediator we can make no advance to God. Apart from Christ there is no acceptable prayer, no pleasing sacrifice of any sort. "By Him therefore"—we cannot move a lip acceptably without Him who suffered without the gate. The great High Priest of our profession meets us at the sanctuary door, and we place all our sacrifices into His hands, that He may present them for us. You do not wish it to be otherwise, I am quite sure. If you could do anything without Him, you would feel afraid to do it. Be thankful that at the beginning of your holy service your eyes are turned towards your Lord. You are to offer continual sacrifice, looking unto Jesus.

Next, observe that this sacrifice is to be presented continually. "By Him, therefore, let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually." Attentively treasure up that word. It will not do for you to say, "We have been exhorted to praise God on the Sabbath-day." No, I have not exhorted you to such occasional duty; "continually," says the text, and that means seven days in a week. I would not have you say, "He means that we are to praise God in the morning when we awake, and in the evening before we fall asleep." Do that, my brethren, unfailingly; but that is not what I have to set before you. "Let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually"—"continually," that is to say, without ceasing. Bless the Lord at all times. Not alone in your secret chamber, which is redolent with the perfume of your communion with God; but yonder in the field, and there in the street, ay, and in the hurry and noise of the Exchange, offer the sacrifice of praise to God. You cannot always be speaking His praise, but you can always be living His praise.

The apostle tells us what the sacrifice is—

The Sacrifice of Praise.

Praise, that is, heart-worship, or adoration. Adoration is the grandest form of earthly service. We ascribe unto Jehovah, the one living and true God, all honor and glory. When we see His works, when we hear His Word, when we taste His grace, when we mark His providence, when we think upon His name, our spirit bows in the lowliest reverence before Him, and magnifies Him as the all-glorious Lord. Let us abide continually in the spirit of adoration, for this is praise in its purest form.

Praise is heart-trust and heart-content with God. Trust is adoration applied to practical purposes. Let us go into the world trusting God, believing that He orders all things well, resolving to do everything as He commands, for neither His character, nor His decrees, nor His commandments are grievous to us. Let us praise Him by being perfectly and everything He does or appoints. Let us take a hallowed delight in Him, and in all that concerns Him. Let Him be to us "God, our exceeding joy." Do you know what it is to delight yourselves in God? Then, in that continual satisfaction, offer Him continual praise.

Satisfied With Anything

Praise is heart-enjoyment; the indulgence of gratitude and wonder. The Lord has done so much for me that I must praise Him, or feel as if I had a fire shut up within me. I may speak for many of you, for you also are saying, "He has done great things for us." Your obligations rise above you as high as the heavens above the earth. The vessel of your soul has foundered in this sea of love, and gone down fifty fathoms deep in it. High over its masthead the main ocean of eternal mercy is rolling with its immeasurable billows of grace. You are swallowed up in the fathomless abyss of infinite love. You are absorbed in adoring wonder and affection.

The text evidently deals with spoken praise—"Let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually; that is, the fruit of our lips giving thanks to His name"; or, as the Revised Version has it, "the fruit of lips which make confession to His name." So, then, we are to utter the praises of God, and it is adoring emotions. The priesthood of believers requires them to praise God with their lips. Should we not sing a great deal more than we do? Psalms and hymns and spiritual songs should abound in our homes. Some few godly men whom I have known have gone about the fields and along the roads humming sacred songs continually. These are the troubadours and minstrels of our King. Hear how the ungodly world pours out its mirth! Ofttimes their song is so silly as to be utterly devoid of meaning. Are they not ashamed? Then let us not be ashamed. Children of God, sing the songs of Zion, and be joyful before your King.

Not Sufficient to Feel

But if we cannot sing so well or so constantly as we would desire, let us talk. We cannot say that we cannot talk. Perhaps some might be better if they could not talk quite so much. As we can certainly talk continually, let us continually offer to God the sacrifice of praise, by speaking well of His name. Many whom you judge to be irreligious would be greatly interested if you were to

Relate to Them the Story

of God's love to you. But if they are not interested, you are not responsible for that; only tell it as often as you have opportunity. We charge you, as Jesus did the healed man, "Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee."

"Well," saith one, "I cannot force myself to praise." I do not want you to force yourself to it: this praise is to be natural. It is called the fruit of the lips. These lips of ours must produce fruit. Our words are leaves: how soon they wither! The praise of God is the fruit which can be stored up and presented to the Lord. Fruit is a natural product: it grows without force, the free outcome of the plant. So let praise grow out of your lips at its own sweet will. Let it be as natural to you, as regenerated men and women, to praise God as it seems to be natural to profane men to blaspheme the sacred name.

Consecrated Wealth.

This praise is to be sincere and real. The next verse tells us we are to do good and communicate, and joins this with praise to God. Many will give God a cataract of words, but scarce a drop of true gratitude in the form of substance consecrated. When I am pressed with many cares about the Lord's work, I often wish that some of my brethren would be a little more mindful of its pecuniary needs. I should be much relieved if those who can spare it would help different portions of our home service. It should be the joy of a Christian to use his substance in his Master's service. When we are in a right state of heart we do not want anybody to call upon us to extract a subscription from us, but we go and ask, "Is there anything that wants help?" Is any part of the Lord's business in need just now? The great works, such as the Orphanage and College, are provided for; but I often sigh as I see lesser agencies left without help, not because friends would not aid if they were pressed to do so, but because there is not a ready mind to look out for opportunities. This practical praising of the Lord is the life-office of the believer. See ye to it.

II. We will, for a few minutes, examine

The Substance of this Sacrifice.

To praise God continually will need a child-like faith in Him. You must believe His word, or you will not praise His name. Doubt snaps the harp-strings. Question mars all melody. Trust Him, lean on Him, enjoy Him—you will never praise Him else. Unbelief is the deadly enemy of praise. Faith must lead you into personal communion with the Lord. It is to Him that the praise is offered, and not to our fellowmen. You must have, also, an overflowing content, a real joy in Him. Dear brothers and sisters, be sure that you do not lose your joy. If you ever lose the joy of religion, you will lose the power of religion. Do not be satisfied to be a miserable believer.

To praise God continually, you need to cultivate perpetual gratitude, and surely it cannot be hard to do that! Remember, every misery averted is a mercy bestowed; every sin forgiven is a favor granted; every duty performed is also a grace received. The people of God have an inexhaustible treasury of for them by the infinite God, and for all this they should praise Him. I pray you, be not only a little grateful, but overflow with it. Let your praises be like the waters of fountains which are abundantly supplied. Let the stream leap up to heaven in bursts of enthusiasm; let it fall to earth again in showers of beneficence; let it fill the basin of your daily life, and run over into the lives of others, and thence again in a cataract of glittering joy let it still descend.

Good Things Provided

In order to this praise you will need a deep and ardent admiration of the Lord God. Admire he Father—think much of His love; acquaint ourself with His perfections. Admire the Son of God, the altogether lovely One; and as you mark His gentleness, self-denial, love, and grace, suffer your heart to be wholly enamoured of Him. Admire the patience and condescension of the Holy Ghost that he should visit you, and dwell in you, and bear with you. It cannot be difficult to the sanctified and instructed heart to be filled with a great admiration of the Lord God. This is the raw material of praise.

III. I have been very brief upon that point because I want, in the third place, to commend his blessed exercise. "Offer the sacrifice of praise," because in so doing you will answer

The End of Your Being.

Every creature is happiest when it is doing what it is made for. Christians are made to glorify God; and we are never in our element till we are praising Him. The happiest moments you have ever spent were those in which you lost sight of everything inferior, and bowed before Jehovah's throne with reverent joy and praise.

Praise God again, because it is His due. Should Jehovah be left unpraised? Praise is the quit-rent which He asks of us for the enjoyment of all things; shall we be slow to pay? Will a man rob God? When it is such a happy work to give Him His due, shall we deny it? It blesses us to bless the Lord. Shall we stint God in the measure of His glory? He does not stint us in His goodness. Come, my brother, my sister, if you have become sorrowful of late, shake off your gloom, and awake all your instruments of music to praise the Lord! Let not murmuring and complaining be so much as mentioned among saints.

Praise Him, dear brethren, continually, for it will help you in everything else. A man full of praise is ready for all Other Holy Exercises.

Whenever you go forth to any service, even though it be nothing better than taking down the shutters, and waiting behind the counter, you will do it all the better for being in the spirit of praise and gratitude. If you are a domestic servant, and can praise God continually, you will be a comfort in the house; and if you are a master, and are surrounded with the troubles of life, if your heart is always blessing the Lord, you will keep up your spirits, and you will not be sharp and ill-tempered with those around you. Come, brethren, this is both meat and medicine—this praising the Lord.

Brethren, let us praise God because it will be a means of usefulness. I believe that a life spent in God's praise would in itself be a missionary life. That matronly sister who never delivered a sermon, nor even a lecture, in all her days, has lived a quiet, happy, useful, loving life, and her family have learned from her to trust the Lord. Even when she shall have passed away, they will feel her influence, for she was being dead, she yet will speak to them. A praiseful heart is eloquent for God. Mere verbiage, what is it but as autumn leaves, which will be consumed in smothering smoke? But praise is golden fruit, to be presented in baskets of silver unto the dresser of the vineyard.

The Angel of the House.

To close this commendation, remember that this will fit you for heaven. Our hymn expresses a frequent aspiration—

"I would begin the music here,
And so my soul should rise."

You can begin the music here—begin the hallelujahs of glory by praising God here below. Think of how you will praise Him when you see His face, and never, never sin. Exceedingly magnify the Lord even now, and rehearse the music of the skies. In glory you may rise to a higher key, but let the song be the same even here. Praise Him! Praise Him! Praise Him more and more! Rise on rounds of praise up the ladder of His glory, till you reach the top, and are with Him to praise Him better than ever before. Oh that our lives may not be broken, but may be all of a piece: one psalm for ever rising into the eternal hallelujahs!

IV. I have brought you thus far, and so I come to the closing point, which is, let us

Commence at Once.

What does the text say? It says, "Let us offer the sacrifice of praise continually." The apostle does not say, "By-and-by get to this work, when you are able to give up business, and have retired to the country, or when you are near to die"; but now, at once, he says, "Let us offer the sacrifice of praise."

Listen! Who is speaking? Whose voice do I hear? Ah! I know; it is the apostle Paul. He says, "Let us offer the sacrifice of praise!" Where are you, Paul? His voice sounds from within a low place. I believe he is shut up in a dungeon. Lift up your hand, O venerable Paul! I can hear the clanking of a fetter. Yes; Paul cries, "Let us offer the sacrifice of praise. I, Paul the aged, in prison in Rome, wish you to join with me in a sacrifice of praise to God." Amen. We will do so. O Paul, we are not in prison, and we are not all aged, and none of us are galled with fetters on our wrists; but we can join heartily with you in praising God this morning; and we do so.

The apostle has put us rather in a fix: he compels us to offer sacrifice. Did you notice what he said in the tenth verse? He says, "We have an altar." It is but a spiritual one; yet "we have an altar." May the priests of the old law offer sacrifice on it? Answer, "Whereof they have no right to eat that serve the tabernacle." They ate of the sacrifices laid on the altars of the old law, but they have no right here. Those who keep to ritualistic performances and outward ceremonials have no right here. Yet we have an altar. Brothers and sisters, can we imagine that this altar is given us of the Lord to be never used? Is no sacrifice to be presented on the best of altars? "We have an altar." What then? "Let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually." Do you not see the force of the argument? Practically obey it.

Not a Material Altar,

Beside the altar we have a High Priest. There is the Lord Jesus Christ, dressed in His robes of glory and beauty, standing within the veil at this moment, ready to present our offerings. Shall He stand there, and have nothing to do? What would you think of our great High Priest waiting at the altar, with nothing to present which His redeemed had brought to God? No, "by Him therefore let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continnally." Bring hither abundantly, ye people of God, your praises, your prayers, your thank-offerings, and present them to the Ever-blessed!

Yonder in the distance, seen dimly, perhaps, but yet not doubtfully, behold "a city that hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God." White-robed, the purified are singing to their golden harps, and you will soon be there. When a few more days or years are passed, you will be among the glorified. A crown and a harp are reserved for you. Will you not begin to praise God, and glorify Him for the heaven which is in store for you? With these two sights so wonderfully contrasted—

The Passion and the Paradise—

Jesus in His humiliation and Jesus in His glory; and yourself a sharer in both these wondrous scenes—surely if you do not begin to offer the perpetual sacrifice of thanksgivings and praise unto God, you must be something harder than a stone. God grant us to commence this day those praises which shall never be suspended throughout eternity!

Oh, that you who have never praised God before would begin now! Alas! some of you have no Christ to praise, and no Saviour to bless. Yet you need not so abide. By faith you may lay hold upon Jesus, and He then becomes yours. Trust Him and He will justify your trust. Rest in the Lord, and the Lord is your rest. When you have trusted, then waste no time, but at once commence the business for which you were created, and redeemed, and called. Fill the censer with the sweet spices of gratitude and love, and lay on the burning coals of earnestness and fervency. Then, when praise begins to rise from you like pillars of smoke, swing the censer to and fro in the presence of the Most High, and more and more laud, bless, and magnify the Lord that liveth forever. Let your heart dance at the sound of His name, and let your lips show forth His salvation. The Lord anoint you this day to the priesthood of praise, for Christ's sake! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

THE BOYHOOD OF AGASSIZ.*

AGASSIZ was born at Motier, in Switzerland, in 1807, exactly one hundred years after the birth of Linnæus, and his early life very closely resembled that of the illustrious child of the North. Like Linnæus, his childhood was passed in a quiet country parsonage situated on the borders of a lake, and embracing a view of a region of such picturesque beauty that it could not fail to impress itself on the mind of the child.

The home-life of the parsonage was very simple, and the children of the family were early taught to regard only those things as valuable which were independent of wealth, and their childish pleasures were all such as could be found in any of the unpretentious little homes that surrounded them.

Unlike many of the great naturalists, who only took up their special work late in life, Agassiz may be said to have begun his life-work in his early childhood, though he himself was unconscious of it. For, like Linnæus and Cuvier, his first impressions of nature were received from the games and employments of his country home; and in his boyish taste for collecting nests, eggs, birds, and pet animals, and in the little aquarium, supplied with specimens from the lake, could be traced the small beginnings of his scientific career. Thus the love of nature and the finding out of her secrets began with the boy's first consciousness; and in all of his out-of-door sports he was laying up stores of valuable information. To him, as to all country children, the different seasons of the year brought each its offering of gifts and laid them at his feet; and from the first spring blossom to the fall of the snow all nature seemed a harmonious whole, and the wide earth but a treasure-house where one might gather largess at his will. As the years passed, Agassiz learned more and more of the great forces which linked him with the world of nature around him, and began to understand the sympathy which the genuine naturalist feels for all forms of life.

Besides these lessons, learned in the fields and woods and by the shores of the lake, where nature herself was the teacher, Agassiz had a few simple tasks out of books, his father and mother being his teachers, and up to his tenth year he received no instruction outside of his home. But a boy so intelligent and observing as Agassiz could not fail to learn many things not included in his daily hours of study; and the home-life of Motier, which was in many respects very primitive, furnished the boy many a self-imposed but not the less instructive task. From the shoemaker, who came twice a year to fit the family out with shoes, the boy learned how to make a tiny pair of shoes for his sister's doll; from the tailor who was a guest in the house while making the spring and winter outfits, he learned to fashion a suit of clothes, and when the cooper arrived to put the barrels and hogsheads in order for the vintage, he found an apt pupil in the boy, to whom nothing seemed uninteresting and who gained in these childish amusements much of that training of the eye and hand which were invaluable to him later on, when dexterity and delicacy of touch were so necessary to his scientific pursuits.

Franklin's First Compositions.

The news of the capture of a notorious pirate, known as Blackbeard, set the imagination of Franklin aflame, and he at once set about the composition of a poem of which Blackbeard was the hero, and in which he gave his fancy great freedom, and mixed up bold metaphors and bad rhymes to an appalling degree. This production, together with another one celebrating a shipwreck, which had just occurred, was printed and sold about the streets of Boston by the young author, who was immensely flattered at seeing his verses so eagerly seized by the public, and conceived the idea of leaving the printing-office and turning poet. But on being assured by his father that "poets were generally beggars," he gave up the idea of distinguishing himself in poetry and turned his attention to prose. As was his habit, he set himself to the matter with all the seriousness of his nature. Although this work seemed at the time, to his family, but the pastime of a restless boy, yet it bore fruit long afterward, when the force and purity of Franklin's style, both in speaking and writing, were of incalculable value not only to himself but to his country.

* From "Children's Stories of the Great Scientists." By Henrietta Christian Wright. 350 pages, with Portraits and Illustrations. Price $1.25. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, 745 Broadway, New York.

The Rev. Alfred C. White.

The Convalescent Street-Waif.

This course of study, together with the advantage he received from the conversations carried on in his brother's shop, in which all the important questions of the day were discussed, led in time to another attempt at authorship, but this time Franklin acted in secret, from fear of ridicule, and slipped his manuscript under the office-door, where it was found the next morning by his brother, who read it aloud to his friends, all unconscious that the author stood by, trembling with suspense lest the verdict should be unfavorable. But the paper was well received, and printed in the newspaper which was published at the office, and from this time Franklin made several contributions to the same paper before the author was found out.

REV. ALFRED C. WHITE,

The Ex-Drummer-Boy.

FEW pastors have so novel an experience to look back upon as the Rev. Alfred Corydon White, of Amesbury, Mass. He was born at Newark, O., on November 15, 1852, and is, therefore, now thirty-six years of age. He comes of a family with an illustrious record in Congregationalism. Its pedigree is traced back to John White, a stalwart Puritan settler, who was one of the first body of selectmen of Cambridge, Mass. Since John White's time the family has furnished no less than fifty ministers to the Congregational denomination, and more than thirty of them were alumni of Yale College.

The boy, Alfred, was under nine years of age when the war broke out; but he had learned to play the drum with a skill beyond his years, and when his father enlisted in the Union army, Alfred pleaded hard, and at last successfully, to go with him as a drummer-boy. He took his turn in beating calls and standing on guard at outpost, and would have taken part in still more active duty had not affection for him interfered for his protection, much to the boy's disgust. He was especially anxious to witness the battle of Shiloh, but his father, the lieutenant, who knew of his desire, had so little confidence in mild measures that he actually had the boy tied up in an ambulance and sent to the rear. He fell ill at last of a sickness brought on by exposure, and in 1865 he was discharged.

His education was then resumed, and after passing through school and college he determined to consecrate his life to the ministry. He graduated in Divinity in 1880, and settled at Amesbury. He has occupied several pulpits since then, but has now returned to his first sphere, much to the delight of his people. Mr. White is still a member of the G. A. R.

AN UNPROMISING GUEST.

(See Illustration on this page.)

"WHAT are you doing there? What is it you want?" The questions were addressed to a miserable lad crouching in the corner of a gateway by Mr. Milner, a merchant, who, after a late political meeting, was returning home, and proceeding to open the gate which admitted him to the garden surrounding his mansion, noticed the boy shrinking in the darkness.

"I'm a-going," said the lad, hoarsely; "I ain't doing no harm. I only wanted to rest a bit. I'm kinder dizzy."

"Where do you live?" asked Mr. Milner, kindly, laying his hand on the boy's head, which he noticed was burning hot. "You ought not to be out this time of night."

The boy rose, but was scarcely able to keep his feet, and leaned his shoulder against the pillar of the gateway, while a hollow cough convulsed his frame. "I haven't any home," the lad said when he had recovered his breath. "Father and mother both dead. I've been selling papers, but I got awful wet last week, and I ain't been able to do anything; I'm coughing all the time, and I can't jump on the cars. The money's all gone, so I can't go to the Home to-night. I'll have to sleep out somewhere. But I wa'n't doing any harm. I'm going."

The merchant looked at the poor, shaking boy in deep pity. A boy of his own, rather younger than this, had been in that feverish condition two years ago, and Mr. Milner had surrounded him with every care, and had secured the best medical skill for him, but the boy drooped and died, and the father felt as if his own heart had died too when he laid him in the grave. "Inasmuch as ye have done it to one of the least of these"—said Mr. Milner to himself. Then to the boy, who was shuffling away with feeble and uncertain steps, "Here, I'll give you a night's lodging; come in with me." He had at first thought of putting a quarter in the boy's hand so that he might go to the Home he had spoken of, and a year ago that is what he would have done; but latterly new ideas of his duties as a follower of Jesus of Nazareth had entered his mind. They had found expression at first in sympathetic treatment of his employees, but the circle had widened, as such circles must, under the laws of our nature, and now he recognized his neighbors in men and women outside his immediate neighborhood. Here was a sad case of suffering, appealing to a conscience that told him that the gift of a quarter did not meet his duty in the case. He put his hand on the boy's shoulder, and guided him through the garden to the door of his house.

Happily for the boy, and for Mr. Milner, too, for that matter, there was no need of any of the diplomacy which some husbands would have had to exercise in bringing into the household after midnight so undesirable a guest. He could count on the ready sympathy of his wife. "In His name," was all he said in presenting the miserable object. Mrs. Milner understood. It might have been difficult to see Christ in the boy who was, to them, His representative, but by their welcome Christ could be seen in them.

Simple remedies were administered for the night, and the boy was taken to a room which, after his hardships, seemed the height of luxury. He was too sick and weary to feel or express gratitude, and was too ignorant to conjecture the motive that influenced his kind entertainers. Nor could he say much when in the morning Mr. Milner went to his bedside.. The boy was evidently very sick.

"You have saved the boy's life, Mr. Milner," said the physician who was called in, after he had seen the boy and prescribed. "I do not know whether you have done him or the country much kindness. These street-waifs are not a very hopeful lot; but we'll hope you have not saved this one to be a prey for the hangman."

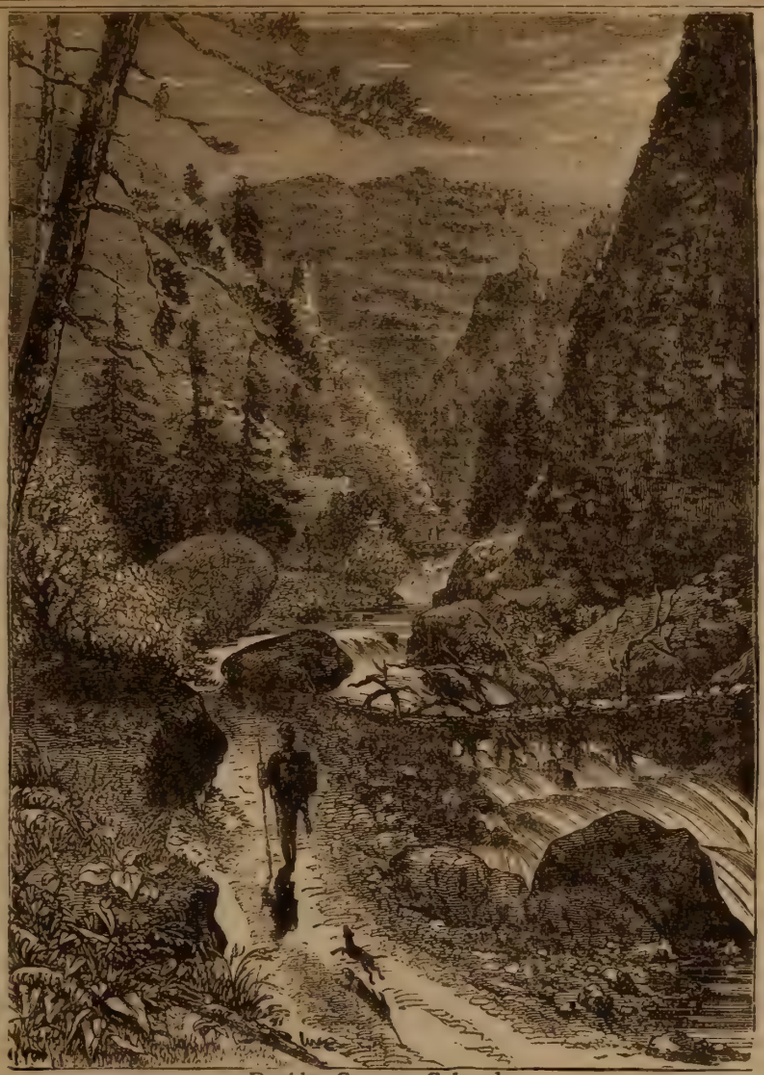
"Oh, no, I hope not, but I suppose there is a measure of responsibility even in saving life."

"Strange, sentimental kind of people, those Milners," said the doctor, speaking to his wife, of the case. "A touch of fanaticism about them, but I do not know if a little more of the same kind of fanaticism would not be a good thing for the world."

The doctor would have been still more surprised if he had looked in at the Milner home later in the day. He would have seen his patient, carefully wrapped up, sitting in a cosy arm-chair, while Mrs. Milner waited upon him, brought him delicious cooling drinks, and spoke to him so kindly that he had looked at her in amazement.

"Let us do something for him," she said to her husband, when he returned in the evening. "He has told me his story, and I am sorry for him. He has not a relative in the world, so far as he knows, and as he says, 'it isn't easy to be good in that kind of life.' I believe there is good in the boy; shall we try to develop it?"

Mr. Milner was similarly impressed on talking with the boy, and as recovery from his sickness came, he asked him if he would not like to have an education. The eagerness of the answer convinced the merchant that the project would be successful. It was put in execution, and the rapidity with which he acquired knowledge, and the intelligence he displayed, won the increased regard of his benefactors. Mrs. Milner was right in believing that there was good in him, and the sense of her kindness was a potent factor in developing that good. A mutual love sprang up between them, and as the years passed, and their adopted son became the pride and joy of their home, the Milners almost felt that in taking the poor, miserable waif into their house that dark night they had been entertaining an angel unawares.



Boulder Canyon, Colorado.

BOULDER CANYON, COLORADO.

(See Illustration.)

AMONG the most beautiful of the canyons of Colorado, Boulder Canyon bears the palm. It is near the little mining town of Boulder, and is the pride of all that locality. It is seventeen miles in length, and the mountain walls rise precipitously along its sides, in some places to the height of three thousand feet. A stream rushes down its centre, which is crossed in several places by the wagon road. Its chief point of difference from other canyons is, that while preserving almost unrivalled features of rugged grandeur there is an entire absence of gloom. The roadside is decked with flowers in the summer season, and the eye is refreshed by an almost infinite variety of rock and dell and verdant foliage. The canyon is a favorite health resort for the people of Denver, and those who have benefited by its salubrious air stoutly maintain that it surpasses in life-giving properties the atmosphere of all other resorts, and that for grandeur of scenery it is better worth visiting than any European mountain country, or even than our own Niagara Falls and the Yosemite valley.

Colorado is peculiarly rich in these scenes of imposing natural beauty. Besides Grand Canyon, and Clear Creek Canyon, in the former of which the river runs for miles through walls of granite in some places seven thousand feet high, it possesses the wonderful little park known as "The Garden of the Gods," a level place about five hundred acres in extent, shut in by huge mountains on the north, east, and west. The entrance to the garden is through a narrow defile, called the Beautiful Gate, at which are the famous high rocks of red and white sandstone, said to be the most beautiful in the world. The Gate and the Garden together constitute one of the most lovely scenes on the continent.

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. L. S. Keyser.

(Continued from page 703.)

New Light.

THE compact between Mr. Hanson and his friend was faithfully kept on both sides. Hadley met Madeline Winters several times, and found her each time more genial and friendly. His hopes rose, and when she invited him to call upon her, he gladly accepted the invitation. He was received by her parents with marked cordiality, and he conceived a sincere respect for their sterling Christian character. Though Madeline always took care to avoid being alone with him, and he had therefore no opportunity of renewing his suit, he could not but realize that he was growing in her favor, and began to entertain sanguine hopes of yet making her his wife. True, he frequently met his old rival Duneman on the street, and was aware that he often visited the Winters; but it was not the rivalry of Duneman that he feared. He had a strong conviction that the really formidable obstacle to be dreaded was the love that Mr. Hanson felt for the girl. Still, he had a free field, and he was pleased to see that Madeline and her parents treated him as a welcome guest and a respected friend. Suddenly, however, the manner of all changed toward him. A marked coldness was perceptible, and while no definite act of unhospitality or estrangement could be named, the sensitive young man became disagreeably aware that his visits were no longer desired. He pondered in much disquietude over the change, but was unable to fathom the mystery.

The fact was, that a detrimental revelation had come, both to Madeline and her parents. To the latter, Duneman, becoming aware of Hadley's relations with the family, imparted the information that young Madelling was a blatant infidel, and had made himself notorious at college by his antipathy to Christianity.

With Madeline, herself a different influence was working. Observing that Hadley was making no preparations for marriage, and that in his conversation there was no hint of any love engagement, but rather every indication that regard for herself was the one and only sentimental feeling in his heart, she began to question in her own mind the fact of his engagement to the Mabel R. Richerson, which had been the cause of her rejection of him. Finally, as she found her love for the young man increasing with his renewed acquaintance, she determined to write to the lady again and ascertain the present situation of affairs. A courteous note was written and sent. But Belle Havelock had taken care to maintain her acquaintance with the Banesville neighborhood, and therefore Madeline's letter was forwarded to her. She answered it in the name of Mabel R. Richerson, suggesting with some asperity that Madeline was taking rather too strong an interest in her affairs, but unequivocally stating that her engagement with Mr. Madelling continued, and a marriage would not be long delayed. She also sent a hint to Duneman, which was promptly acted upon. He incidentally mentioned to Madeline that he had heard that Madelling wasto be married in the spring. The information, so clearly corroborating the letter, revived all the painful repugnance to the duplicity of her suitor, and she could not refrain from manifesting a coldness toward him, which, being shown at the same time as that of her parents, constituted a double mystery to Hadley.

The key to one half of the mystery was, however, supplied through the kindness of Mr. Hanson, to whom Hadley had poured out the story of his sorrow. The good clergyman, true to his exalted idea of his friendship for his rival, made it his business to discover the cause of the alienation of Madeline's parents from young Madelling. Incidentally introducing his name in a conversation with them, he saw the start of repugnance which followed in both. A few words of esteem for the young man unlocked their reserve. Mr. Winters said that he knew Madelling, but did not esteem him. Information had reached his ears that he was a blasphemous infidel of the most dangerous character, unfit as an acquaintance for Christian men and unfit to be received in a Christian home. "Had I known his character earlier," Mr. Winters added, "he certainly would not have been received here."

"I think," replied Mr. Hanson, "that it is only just to form our estimate of character on our own knowledge. Personally I have seen a great deal of Mr. Madelling, and I am convinced that he is an earnest and sincere seeker after truth. Believing that, I would rather cultivate his acquaintance than avoid him, I may be able to help him to the right side of the slough. In fact, I think I have been enabled to do him some good. We may do injustice and much wrong, Mr. Winters, by giving too ready a credence to persons who may be misinformed."

"Oh, there is no doubt in this case," said Mr. Winters; "my informant was a college mate of his. Mr. Duneman, in fact. A very worthy young man. He told me of Madelling's violent speeches against the Bible in college, which he had heard himself. He answered them, and in doing so made himself the butt of ridicule and scorn in the college. We must range ourselves on the right side in such a conflict, Mr. Hanson. The enemies of my Lord are no friends of mine."

"That is right, Mr. Winters," said Mr. Hanson, "but if a man is fighting my Lord under a mistake, as Saul the persecutor thought he was doing God service in persecuting the church, and the man is open to conviction, I conceive that the best service I can render to my Lord, will be to convince him of his mistake and disarm his hostility. I firmly believe that Madelling, once convinced, would become a valuable advocate of the truth."

"I wish you success," said Mr. Winters, "but I have little hope, and should have no hope of my succeeding in such an effort."

It was impossible for Mr. Hanson to conceal from Hadley the information he had gained. He thought it best to tell him frankly, and to advise him to absent himself for a time from the Winters' home. The fact of Duneman's officious meddling raised a storm in Hadley's nature so violent as to alarm Mr. Hanson. He was amazed that a young man, apparently so well balanced, should be so agitated. Never had he seen written on any face, passion so intense, rage so uncontrollable. A volley of invective poured from his lips, mingled with threats of violence, and then he turned and abruptly quitted his friend's study, where their interview had taken place,

"He will recover his equanimity better in solitude," said the minister to himself, as he restrained his impulse to follow. "He will have too much sense to carry out his threats." And the minister settled down to his desk for work. But somehow he could not keep his thoughts on his task; they would revert to Madelling with a pertinacity in which Mr. Hanson at last recognized a call for action. Rising, he took his hat and made his way to his friend's home. There he learned that the young man had returned, but had gone out again almost immediately. "I think he had some bad news," said his informant; "he seemed mighty queer. Looked dazed like and savage."

With an instinct which, afterward, seemed to the minister providential, he took the path which led to an unfrequented district that was one of Hadley's favorite haunts. It should have been a moonlight night, but storm-clouds now and again obscured the luminary for a quarter of an hour or more at a time. He had walked some distance, when in one of the dark intervals he heard voices. One was hoarse with passion, and the other seemed pleading for mercy. He hurried on, and just then the moon, emerging from behind the cloud, showed him the two figures in a lonely path a little way ahead. Madelling had his enemy grasped by the throat and his clenched right hand was raised menacingly. A few steps more and Mr. Hanson had grasped the upraised arm and compelled his friend to let go that deadly grip on his antagonist's throat.

"Madelling, for shame!" Hanson exclaimed. "A man of your calibre and standing to stoop to violence! Let him alone, I insist. Tell the man what you demand of him and let him go. It is not for such as you to play the part of the savage barbarian."

But Duneman had not waited to be told what Hadley required of him. No sooner was his throat released from that fierce grip than he took to his heels and was soon out of sight.

"Come with me," said Hanson, quietly laying his hand on his friend's arm and leading him back toward home. His very touch had a tranquillizing influence, and as Hadley's arm ceased to throb with the passion that had overpowered him, Hanson continued: "A wrong was never set right by violence yet. You lower, you degrade yourself by resorting to such measures. Be a man and keep the brute in your nature in subjection."

When they reached Hadley's home the young man put his arms about the minister's neck, and in tones that quavered in unison with the trembling of his body, he said:

"Hanson, how shall I ever thank you for the service you have done me this evening? I believe that you have saved me from committing a terrible crime and from disgrace. Oh, I was so crazed with anger that I had lost all control of myself. Oh Heaven! I did not know that I had such a ferocious demon in me."

"Ah! we should never act under an impulse of passion," said Hanson. "We are sure to have reason to rue it if we do."

"What if I had—I believe I should have killed him if you had not interfered. Hanson, you are my good genius. What a wicked, despicable wretch I am! I do not believe that there is any hope for me."

"Come, Madelling, don't give up to despair."

"I never felt that I needed God's mercy as much as I do now. Oh, my—my sins! my wicked, depraved nature! I feel a mountain of guilt, like an Alp, weighing me down."

"I assure you that there is mercy for you if you repent."

"No, no, there is none!"

"'He that asketh receiveth.' 'The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin,'" quoted Hanson, feelingly.

The desperate man looked up at his companion in a bewildered way, as these words of Scripture fell from his lips, and presently, as a gleam of light came into his face, he said: "Hanson, you prayed the other evening for me. Do you think you—could—pray—now?"

"With all my heart, sir," and they fell upon their knees, while the clergyman wove into his supplication all the rich promises of God's Word for the penitent. It was a solemn scene, and the words were devout and earnest.

When they arose from their knees the cloud had been partially dissipated from Hadley's face, and taking his friend's hand, he said, with deep emotion: "Hanson, I feel that the forces of evil within me are too strong for me to cope with alone. I must have help from some source, or I am lost. It is the evil principle in my nature that overcomes me. If there is help, as you say, to be had from a supernatural source, I want it."

"Thank God!" said the minister, in fervent tones. "If you feel your need of God, He will help and save you. Go to Christ. In Him you will find strength for your weakness. I leave you with Him. Good-night."

It was far into the night when the clergyman reached his room. He flung himself on his knees and prayed earnestly. The soul he so anxiously sought to win for his Master was passing through its ordeal, and he pleaded, with the whole force of his nature, that God would bring it into the light. It was strange how the clergyman, who had dealt with so many anxious souls in his time, yearned for this one as he had never done for one before. Oh that in that storm-tossed spirit the words of the Master might ring, compelling peace and trust! Long did the good man plead, and gradually an assurance of acceptance came into his mind. He felt that already God had answered his prayer. Almost instantly a sense of what such a change might involve for himself crossed his mind. Hadley converted, a brilliant soldier of the Cross, would not his own love for Madeline be doomed to desolation? It was a suggestion of the evil one, though Hanson knew it was only too true. For a few moments he struggled with the thought. Then he came forth a conqueror through Christ's power. Self-sacrifice, self-immolation—that had been his law for so many years. It triumphed now. Perish all his hopes of the love he had hoped to win, if that were to be the price of his friend's felicity. It was a fierce crisis, but as the man emerged from it victorious in the strength of God, he was a greater man than he had ever been. Unscathed by the flames of the furnace, he could tell those who looked to him for help and guidance that God was sufficient for these things.

He had need of this strength during the next few days. In a large church there are many calls on a minister for sympathy and help in moments of dire affliction. One especially distressing case called, the next day, for Hanson's help. It was that of a Christian family overwhelmed with sorrow over the sudden death of the eldest daughter, a young lady of twenty years, singularly beautiful in person and remarkably noble and lovable of character. Her father and mother, though of ripe Christian character, were utterly prostrated by the unexpected blow, and were wrapped in that dense darkness in which God sometimes permits His children to be enveloped. Mr. Hanson knew how severe would be their affliction. He knew, too, that light would surely penetrate the darkness, and there would be a rare manifestation of the Divine power to assuage the crushing anguish of bereavement. He was anxious that Madelling should witness it, feeling that such a scene must convince him of the reality of God's love and power. On his way to the afflicted household he called for Hadley, and persuaded him to accompany him.

The scene was even more harrowing than the clergyman had anticipated. Even Hadley felt tears of sympathy rise to his eyes as he saw the bereaved parents weeping over the beautiful, lifeless body of their beloved daughter. What power could pour balm into hearts so crushed? What hope could restore peace to souls so riven? He listened as Mr. Hanson spoke, and knelt with him as he prayed. He saw the cloud lift! He saw the light come into the tear-stained faces! He heard the father's trembling lips pronounce the words, "Thy will be done. The burden is gone! My daughter is with God." He heard the mother stifle her sobs and say, "It is the Lord; let Him do what seemeth Him good!" And as they left the bereaved home they heard the father and mother joining in words of love and praise to God for His promises of reunion which would be fulfilled.

Hanson took his companion's arm as they walked up the street from the mysterious scene. For a time each was busy with his own reflections. Presently Hadley said: "What was it, Hanson?"

"It was God," answered Hanson, devoutly.

They walked on in silence for half a block, and then Hanson, feeling that it was now time to send a pointed shaft to the joint in his sceptical friend's armor, said: "Madelling, what would your agnosticism have done for those afflicted parents?"

A shiver passed through Hadley's frame as he responded: "It would have been tested—and found wanting. I frankly acknowledge it. Oh, what a helpless, inane, and inadequate philosophy it is!"

"I am glad that you see it in its true light. Renounce it, my friend," urged Hanson. "It will always leave you in the lurch."

"I can't throw it off myself; it enthralls me."

"I know that; but who gave relief to the poor woman whom we have just left?"

Hadley did not answer, and his comrade, pointing upward toward heaven, added: "Your help must come from the same Source. Good-night."

At the funeral services, which Hadley attended, he listened with irrepressible tears to the impassioned eloquence of the minister as he spoke of the comforts of the Gospel in the crucial exigencies of life, and of the glory of the life to come. Hadley walked away from the house of mourning wrapped in deep thought. "What can mollify the griefs of life like the Christian religion!" he acknowledged to himself. All the petty objections which he had so often raised against the Bible—its apparent discrepancies, its verbal errors, its seeming disagreements with scientific teaching—melted away like morning mist before the sun, when compared with its beneficent, comforting, invigorating influence upon the susceptible heart and life. There must be, he reasoned, some rational explanation of these ostensible errors, for so salutary an influence could not emanate from a medley of blunders and impostures. Once he had heard a preacher, whose enthusiasm ran riot with his reason, aver: "If Christianity is a delusion, it is a blessed, a glorious delusion!" But Hadley felt that if it blessed and regenerated humanity, it could not be an hallucination, for only the truth could operate so beneficently. Thus, it will be seen that his "thoughts were set to a higher key" than ever before in his quest for the truth.

(To be Continued.)

HELPING ONE ANOTHER.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for November 18, Josh. 21: 43-45, and Josh. 23. Golden Text, Gal 6: 2.

The Promise Fulfilled After Four Centuries—The Blessing Delayed by Unbelief—The Faithfulness of the Two and a Half Tribes—Their Engagements Fulfilled—Helpfulness Enjoined Under Moses—The Poverty of the Present Day—Might be Relieved out of the Superabundance of the Rich—Jealousy Among Christian Workers—Tale-bearing Especially Prohibited—Christ's Own Rule—What Unity has Done in Revival Work—A Misunderstanding.

"AND the Lord gave unto Israel all the land which He swear to give unto their fathers." Thus was fulfilled His promises to Abraham. (Gen. 12:7; 13:15; 15:13-21); to Isaac (Gen. 26:3, 4); and to Jacob (Gen. 28:4; 13, 14.) "And they possessed it and dwelt therein." Four hundred years and more had passed away since God's first promise to Abraham, yet sure as Himself, the word of the Lord came to pass. Why was it thus delayed? No doubt the unbelief of Jacob was one great hindrance, and also the want of consecration in him and in his sons; then, also, the idolatry of the children of Israel in Egypt of which Joshua speaks, "The gods which your fathers served on the other side of the flood, in Egypt" (Josh. 24:14); and finally, their unbelief, when the spies brought up an evil report of the land. The hindrance and the fulfilment of God's promises never come from Him, but always from us. He does not tantalize His children, and hold out hopes only to disappoint them, but He seeks to bring us into such a relation to Him that shall fit us to have the blessings He provides, without being injured by them.

"And the Lord gave them rest round about, according to all that He swear unto their fathers: and there stood not a man of all their enemies before them; the Lord delivered all their enemies into their hand." Thus He fulfilled His word. (Ex. 23:27-31; Deut. 7:24; 28:7; Josh. 1:5.) "There failed not aught of any good thing which the Lord had spoken unto the house of Israel;

All Came to Pass."

What an encouragement to trust our God and the word which He has spoken! About four hundred and fifty years had passed by, but God remembered every promise, and proved Himself the Faithful and the True.

"Then Joshua called the Reubenites and the Gadites and the half tribe of Manasseh," who had chosen their portion on the wilderness side of the Jordan, and who had left there their tents and families, their herds and flocks, while they had gone forward to help their brethren take possession of their inheritance (Num. 32:1-33), and he gave them an official release from their service. He said: "Ye have kept all that Moses, the servant of the Lord, commanded you, and have obeyed my voice in all that I commanded you; ye have not left your brethren these many days unto this day, but have kept the charge of the commandments of the Lord your God. And now the Lord your God hath given rest unto your brethren, as He promised them; therefore, now return ye, and get you unto your tents, and unto the land of your possession, which Moses, the servant of the Lord, gave you on the other side Jordan." God loves brotherly love; "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" is His own summing up of the second table of the commandments. Provision was made again and again under the Old Testament for the exercise of brotherly love. God's people were to open the hand wide to their brother, their poor and needy, in their land. (Deut. 15:11.) Again, with regard to property, "Thou shalt not see thy brother's ox or his sheep go astray, and hide thyself from them; thou shalt in any case bring them again unto thy brother. And if thy brother be not nigh unto thee, or if thou know him not, then thou shalt bring it unto thine own house; and it shall be with thee until thy brother seek after it, and thou shall restore it to him again." God would have us without considering whether any personal benefit shall accrue to us. (Deut. 22:1-3.) They were not to reap the corners of their fields, nor gather the gleanings of the harvest or of their vineyards. God commanded, "Thou shalt leave them for the poor and stranger; I am the Lord." (Lev. 19:9, 10.) But oh, how unlike to these commands is the spirit of business in the present day! The grasping spirit of the age says, "Every man for himself; I must look after my own interest, although hundreds suffer." The problem of how to find work for the unemployed, and how to feed those who have no work, becomes daily more terrible. And yet the waste in the houses in the West End of London would go far, if economized, to provide capital which would enable bands of men to reclaim and cultivate the waste lands on our moors, etc. But selfishness governs the rich, and selfishness governs the poor, and the spirit of mutual help is wanting. The saddest thing of all is, to see among professing Christians so much of the spirit of jealousy rather than of love and mutual helpfulness. How often in a mission, when one evangelist succeeds another, the one who is going away makes everything as difficult as he can for the one who is coming, that it may not be said that he succeeded better than he. What a denial to the whole spirit of Christ this is! We have this morning received a letter from an evangelist of experience, who is about to be succeeded by two young men, of far less experience and much younger than he, but the letter breathes the most earnest spirit of prayer that God may help them far more than he has been blest, and he has asked that he may introduce them, and make their way easy.

Take Pains to Help One Another

God Multiply Men Like Him!

God says, "Thou shalt not go up and down as a talebearer among thy people; neither shalt thou stand against the blood of thy neighbor: I am the Lord." Thus in the Old Testament, as well as in the New, where malice and evil speaking are so often condemned (Prov. 6:19; 10:32; 12:18; Eph. 4:31; 1 Pet. 4:4; James 4:11), we see how God abhors unkind, gossipping words. He adds, "Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thine heart: thou shalt in any wise rebuke thy brother, and not suffer sin upon him." Alas! it is far more common to hear a man speak of one who has done wrong behind his back; but God shows that brotherly love rebukes him to his face, because a loving heart is as jealous of sin on his brother's soul as on his own. "Thou shalt not avenge nor bear any grudge against the children of thy people, but thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself; I am the Lord." (Lev. 19:16, 17.) Let us add to this, as the summing up of all the teaching of our blessed Lord, and his peerless example, these, His own words, "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another that ye also love one another." (John 13:34.) He would have us bear one another's burdens, make life easy to one another, consider one another, that we may represent our God, and shed light and joy around us. A believer who increases the burden of another by his selfish desire for sympathy, is doing the work of the enemy on earth. God is unselfish, and He calls us to be like Him.

As I Have Loved You,

God has so ordered it that we should be members one of another (Num. 12:5), necessary to one another, "that there should be no action in the body; but that the members should have the same care one for another" (1 Cor. 12:20-26). The whole body is "fitly joined together and compacted by that which every joint supplieth according to the effectual working in the measure of every part" (Eph. 4; 16); just in the measure in which we work together and help one another, the cause of Christ makes progress: just in the measure in which we are selfish, the cause of Christ is hindered. When Mr. Moody first came to England, very little good was done. At the beginning of his second visit, when God so marvellously used him, there was no great promise; but when a few ministers and others met together in Sunderland to pray for blessing and to work with him, God began to manifest Himself. In Newcastle the spirit of unity grew and the blessing grew; in Edinburgh it was still more marked; and in Glasgow it became almost the exception for a minister to hold aloof from the blessed work of God which was done when Messrs. Moody and Sankey were there. God set His seal on the spirit of unity which prevailed. It was this which gave power to the work in the wonderful meetings held in the Agricultural Hall, the Haymarket Theatre, and other places in London. It has been the spirit of unity which God has owned at Mildmay, and which shone out so prominently in the Centenary of Missions.

When Joshua sent away the Reubenites, Gadites, and half tribe of Manasseh, he blessed them. They are blessed who are helpers one of another; there is a joy in doing anything for another which we never get in serving ourselves.

A Misunderstanding.

Their first act when they came into their inheritance was to build "an altar by Jordan," a great altar to see to. "This aroused the suspicion of their brethren, and their first hasty judgment was to go to war with them as traitors to the cause of God. But they first sent Eleazar the high priest and an elder from each tribe to remonstrate with them. They did not say hard things against them behind their backs, but said, "Thus saith the whole congregation of the Lord, What trespass is this that ye have committed against the God of Israel, to turn away this day from following the Lord, in that ye have builded you an altar, that ye might rebel this day against the Lord?" And then, with force and eloquence, they urged upon their brethren that what they did affected the whole congregation, and cited the sin of Achan as a case in point. Then the Reubenites, Gadites, and half tribe of Manasseh replied, not in anger, that they were misjudged, but they called on God, the God of gods, to witness that their altar was not built in rebellion, or in transgression against the Lord; that it was not as an altar for offerings, but as a memorial to the trans-Jordan tribes, that they had as much part in God as their brethren had; also to be a memorial to their children in time to come. The explanation was accepted, and instead of war there was mutual love established and confirmed between the tribes. Oh that every misunderstanding ended thus without bitterness, without enmity! If men would be open and straightforward with one another, and patient enough to consider the other side of a question, how often a dispute might be healed and God glorified in His children!

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION—1888.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled, "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting 75 cents. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God.

"MY HAND, DEAR LORD, IN THINE."

My hand, dear Lord, in Thine!
However dark the way,
A light within will ever shine,
A beam of day.
While on in faith I press,
My soul Thou dost illume,
And I am full of happiness,
Nor mind the gloom.

My hand, dear Lord, in Thine!
What though the way seem rough?
If I may feel the touch divine,
It is enough,
Onward, o'er hill and dale,
My journey I'll pursue,
Until Thou dost remove the veil,
And heaven I view.

My hand, dear Lord, in Thine!
What though the way seem long?
My weary soul will not repine,
But sing a song,
My rest I'll find in Thee,
In holy work my joy,
And prayer and praise shall ever be
My sweet employ.

My hand, dear Lord, in Thine!
I'll never let Thee go;
Nor wilt Thou e'er my soul resign
To endless woe.
Thy hold will be on me,
Amid the din and strife,
Until I wake to share with Thee
Immortal life,

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike), will be sent post-paid, for 10 cts., or 100 for 20 cts. Postage stamps taken.

Horsford's Acid Phosphate
Relieves Mental and Physical Exhaustion.

"I want to thank you," writes a young man to B. F. Johnson & Co., Publishers, Richmond, Va., "for placing me in a position by which I am enabled to make money faster than I ever did before." This is but a sample extract of the many hundreds of letters received by the above firm.

Canon Farrar's New Book,

Everyday Christian Life;

Or, Sermons by the Way.

BY FREDERICK W. FARRAR, D. D.

12mo, cloth. Price $1.25.

In this volume the distinguished author has collected twenty of his best sermons, all of which treat of themes in the Christian daily life. They are free from controversy and touch only subjects which have wide and deep interest to every reader. The charming eloquence and searching thought of Canon Farrar pervades every page of the book and makes it one above many to read and own.

Copies sent, post-paid, on receipt of price, $1.25.

THOMAS WHITTAKER,
2 and 3 Bible House, New York.

ILLUSTRATIVE GATHERINGS
reachers and Teachers. A Manual of Anecdotes s, Figures, Proverbs, Quotations, &c., &c., adapted Christian teaching. By Rev. G. S. Bowes. Two es, 12mo. muslin, each $1.25. "For variety, pertiy and availability it is decidedly superior to anyng we have seen."—Evangelical Repository. Sent to ; adress free on receipt of above price.
REINPINE & HIGGINS, 914 Arch St., Philadelphia, Pa.

BAGSTER Comprehensive Teachers' Bibles.
With New Helps, New Concordance Index & Atlas and Polyglot References. Photolity Treaties. The Revised Bible published since the Revised tions. Four editions. Perfect dings. "Perfect Help to Bible Study."—S. Times. London. Sold by all booksellers, or, JAMES PORT & CO. 14 & 16 Astor Place, New York, Agents.

$75.00 to $250.00 A MONTH can be made working for us. Agents preferred who can furnish a horse and give their whole time to the business. Spare moments may be profitably employed also. A few vacancies in towns and cities. B. F. Johnson & Co., Pub's, 1009 Main St., Richmond, Va.

AGENTS WANTED to sell "The Child's Bible." Introduction by Bishop J. H. Vincent, D.D. The best selling book handled by agents. Recommended by all clergymen. Address Cassell & Co., B.B.S.D., 104 and 108 Fourth Ave., New York; 40 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

MORE MEN WANTED for local and traveling Salesmen. Good Pay. Address
E. B. RICHARDSON & CO.,
Nurserymen, Geneva, N. Y.

"The Gladstone" LAMP

is the finest lamp in the world. It gives a pure, soft, brilliant white light of 85 candle power,—a marvelous light from ordinary oil! Nobody ever supposed such a light was possible from kerosene oil; yet it is there, and

Seeing Is Believing

A "wonderful lamp" it is in all respects. It never needs trimming, never smokes nor breaks chimneys, never "smells of the oil;" no gumming up, no leaks, no sputtering, no climbing of the flame, no annoyance of any kind, and cannot explode. And then, beside all there advantages, think of a lamp giving a clear, white light, 10 to 20 times the size and brilliancy of any ordinary house lamp!

"The Gladstone" is made of high-grade, hard rolled metal (all parts interchangeable), and in elegant designs for Dining or Parlor Table, the Study, Drawing-room, Hall or Chamber. Finished in either Gold bronze, Nickel or Antique bronze. Every home should have it.

Illustrated price list will be sent you on receipt of a postal card. Single lamps at wholesale price, with or without porcelain shade, carefully boxed and sent by express to any part of the country.

☞ See our prices and then order. "Seeing is believing." Address Gladstone Lamp Co., 10 East (D 2) 14th St., New York City. A live Agent wanted in every town to sell these lamps.

85 Candle Power

MEXICO

Contributions in aid of Christian work in Mexico are most pressingly needed, and can be mailed to the address of

BISHOP H. C. RILEY,
Care of J. P. HEATH,
43 Bible House, New York.

TO OUR CHRISTIAN FRIENDS:

As there is a regular monthly expense in connection with the work a regular monthly income is needed to meet that expense. We, therefore, specially ask for regular monthly contributions in its behalf. If many will each send a little every month, or quarter, or whenever they can, it will do great good. Remember, every little helps.

H. CHAUNCEY RILEY.

FEATHERS. The finest live white geese feathers in the country, 75 cts. per lb. Hair Mattresses made over for $2.50. Feathers steamed and renovated. H. Pickford. 11 Nassau St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

THE LIFE OF ST. PAUL. Rev. James Stalker, M. A., with map. 12mo. 183 pp. Cl., 60c.
A new and admirable work on this exhaustless theme. The author presents the gist of the best previous writings and his own fresh thoughts clearly and concisely. Highly commended for S. S. Teachers.

NEWLY ENLISTED. By Rev. Th. L. Cuyler, D.D., LL. D. Square. 16mo. Paper, 25c. Cloth, 50c. Cloth, gilt, 75c.
Counsels for young converts from this prince among pastors. Dedicated to Mr. Moody a companion of "Heart Life."

FROM THE FORECASTLE TO THE PULPIT. C. J. Jones, D.D. 12mo. 340 pp. $1.25.
A truly wonderful story—the life of a sailor before the mast, its rough and strange experiences, his transformation into a faithful Christian minister, and some wonders of grace God wrought through his labors.

JUDGE HAVISHAM'S WILL I. T. Hopkins author of "Good-Times Girls," etc. 12mo. 4 cuts. 311 pp. $1.25.
A story that boys will enjoy, illustrating the power of firm faith under trial. The young hero will be admired for his sterling manly qualities.

CHANGING PLACES; or How One Boy Climbed Up and Another Slipped Down. Miss C. M. Trowbridge, author of "Victory at Last." 12mo. 4 cuts. 217 pp. Cl., 90c.
Full of incidents suggested in the title; more than hinting to boys how they may succeed in life.

BERNIE'S LIGHT. Minnie E. Kenney, author of "Mrs. Morse's Girls." 12mo. 4 cuts. 272 pp. Cloth, $1.10.
The charming story of a young girl whose light was kindled at a Mission Sabbath-School and brought cheer to many in dark places.

THE GARMENT OF PRAISE. Helen P. Strong, author of "His Abiding Presence," Monotint booklet. Daintily illustrated. Cover in colors and gold. Large 16mo. 36 pp. $1.
An elegant gift and devotional volume, full of exquisite designs in harmony with the inspired words with which the church in all ages praises God.

THE SEA IS HIS; or, Words of Comfort for Sea and Shore. Susan A. Brown. 24mo. 48 pp. 50c.
In ten colors and gold. Elegant sea and shore views and sea mosses, on alternate pages with choice gems form God's Word and our best poets.

STORIES TOLD BY A DOLL. Miss E. A. Hunter. 4to. 6½x8½ in. 89 pp. 50c. Numerous illustrations. Handsome chromo cover. A fascinating book for the nursery, with much quiet humor; sure to be a universal favorite and home classic.
Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller,
77 Bible House, New York.

BAILEY'S COMPOUND Night-spreading Silver-Plated CORRUGATED GLASS REFLECTORS
A wonderful invention for Lighting Churches, Halls, etc. Handsome designs. Satisfaction guaranteed. Catalogue and price list free.
Bailey Reflector Co.
113 Wood st. Pittsburgh, Pa.

ALL BOOKS at Wholesale to members of the Book Buyer's Bureau Membership free. AGENTS WANTED to solicit members. Send 2c. stamp for catalogue and information to R. H. Woodward & Co., Baltimore, Md.

UNIVERSITY ORGANS.—They Lead the World.—$35 to $500. Sold Direct to Families. No Middlemen. Solid Walnut 5 Octaves-Double Couplers. Guaranteed for Six Years and sent, with Stool and Book, for TRIAL IN YOUR OWN HOME BEFORE YOU BUY. ESTABLISHED 1859. MARCHAL & SMITH, 255 East 21st Street, New York.

Estey Organ Co.
BRATTLEBORO VT.
ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE SENT FREE

GOLD WATCHES.
100 GIVEN AWAY.

To introduce our new goods and Catalogues at once we make this grand offer. We will give the person telling us the longest verse in the Bible (book and chapter) before January 1st, 1889, a solid gold watch Hunting Case Stem Winder, worth $75. If there is more than one correct answer we will give the second a solid gold watch worth $60, the third a solid gold watch worth $50, the fourth a solid gold watch worth $40, the fifth a solid gold watch worth $30. Each of the next 20 if there are that many correct answers a very handsome hunting case new style shell pattern gold finished Watch valued at $20 each, each of the next 75 persons will receive a beautiful gold plated watch worth $10 each. With your answer send 30 cents for which we shall send you a sample lot of our new holiday goods, as follows: 10 pieces full size sheet music, 100 new designs in fancy work, 250 new mottoes and verses for albums, cards and valentines, 75 new tricks in magic, 25 choice home games, 60 Puzzles and rebuses, the great $500 prize Chinese Block, 200 funny pictures, 26 artistic letters for fancy work, 25 life like pictures of Presidents, Poets, Statesmen, etc. The great game of Fortune. The seventh book of Moses. The seven wonders of the world. All the different flirtations. The game of Fox and Geese, the game of Nine Penny Morris, the Deaf and Dumb alphabet, the fortune telling tablet. Remember, we send you securely packed and post-paid all the above goods. Money refunded if not more than satisfactory. Mention this paper. Enclose 30 cents. Address KIRTLAND BROS. & CO., P. O. Box 3340. No. 79 Nassau St., N. Y.

Pertaining to Persons, Places, and Things, with Key to Bible Studies, Concert Exercises, Prayer-Meeting Topics, Outlines, etc. Introduction by J. H. Vincent, D.D. 600 pages. By mail, $2. Immensely popular. Also, from new book, HOW IN THE CLOUD, or, Words of Comfort, etc., by 200 Best Authors, $1.75, and WOMEN'S HAND-BOOK. $2. JUST ISSUED. A lady wanted in every town to introduce it. Quick Sales. Big Pay. Address, E. B. TREAT, Publisher, 771 Broadway, N. Y.

PRINTING PRESSES. Book of Type, 5c. Amateur Printers' Guide Book, 15c. CIRCULAR FREE. JOSEPH WATSON, 19 Murray St., N. Y. Samples of Scrap Pictures and Cards, 10 cents.

EVERY LADY HER OWN DRESS MAKER.

WOMEN enjoy, above all other things, neat-fitting garments. By the use of WORTH'S FRENCH TAYLOR SYSTEM ON DRESS CUTTING, a person of ordinary intelligence can cut and fit any article of dress perfectly WITHOUT TRYING THE GARMENT ON. This system is so plain, and the book of instructions so complete and clear, that a child may cut and fit as perfectly as the most experienced Dress Maker. With the Diagrams and Book of Instructions you know exactly the amount of goods you need. How to fit stout or lean people; how to fit round or hollow shoulders, how to fashion waists, and all the secrets of Dress Making. The extra sleeve pattern is well worth $5 to any woman. WORTH'S is the only simple and correct system by which a person can measure, cut and fit garments without first learning the trade. Instruction Book Special Sleeve Pattern and System. $10.00.

$10.50 FOR $1.00

OUR BIG OFFER On receipt of $1.00, we will send the Worth System of Dress Cutting, Complete Book of Instructions, Sleeve Pattern, and one year's subscription to American Housekeeping. To each of the first 1000 ANSWERS to this advertisement, we will send The Every Day Cook Book, 225 pages, FREE. (Price, $1.00) Agents Wanted. American Housekeeping.
143 La Salle St., Chicago, Ill.
We know that the above offer is just as represented, and recommend it to our subscribers.

American Housekeeping.
A Ladies' Home Journal.
Full 20 pages with a handsome colored cover each month. Complete on all home subjects. COOKING RECEIPTS, KITCHEN and DINING ROOM, HOUSEHOLD DECORATION, ART and FASHION, FANCY WORK, BRIC-A-BRAC, ETC. WELL ILLUSTRATED. New Serials by our best authors. WOMEN'S RECOLLECTIONS of the [illegible] War is a New, Novel [illegible] Original feature for [illegible] Magazine. Entertain[illegible] all, young and old. Our [illegible]on Notes prepared specially for us, give the latest [illegible]s, hints and suggestions [illegible] amateurs. Worth to [illegible] several times the subscription price. Yearly Subscription, 50 cents.

The New American ROLLER ORGAN is operated similar to the finest French Music Boxes and PLAYS 260 TUNES, from a waltz to a hymn, with perfect tune and time. Gives better satisfaction than a $100 PARLOR ORGAN and ten times more pleasure. This Organ is the perfection of musical instruments and the grandest and most marvellous instrument ever presented to the public. It plays SACRED MUSIC, MARCHES, WALTZES, POLKAS, JIGS, Reels, Operatic Selections, Popular Songs, Church music, as well as any organ. Nothing grander or combining so many features can be found in French or Swiss Music Boxes, costing $100. Price Only $6, in BEAUTIFULLY CARVED CASES with music. Send for one. It will fill you with astonishment and delight. If sent C.O.D. send $2.50 when you order, pay balance when you get organ. Send P.O. order, Registered Letter or by Express. Send all orders for this organ to WORLD MANUF'G CO., 122 Nassau Street, New York.

"THE OLD, OLD STORY."
A Responsive Christmas Service for Sunday Schools. New Carols by FANNY J. CROSBY, and Music by P. B. SPARKS Competent judges say, "The best ever published." 5c. each 12 for 36 cents; 100 for $2.50. Send stamp for sample copy WILBUR B. KETCHAM, PUBLISHER, 75 Bible House, N. Y.

The New England Medical Monthly says:
—"WALES' INVISIBLE SOUND DISC for deafness, by practical demonstration outranks all other devices of our age! Concentrating the sound waves on the drum head, its possibilities are indeed very great." For sale only by the Inventor
H. A. WALES, Bridgeport, Conn.

THE DEAF HEAR

In all the world there is but one OPIUM Habit. The Dr. J. L. Stephens Remedy never fails, and no other treatment ever cures. We have cured more than 10,000 cases. Another treatment ever cured one case. NO PAY TILL CURED. Remember this, and write to the Dr. J. L. Stephens Co., Lebanon, Ohio.

TEAS LADIES Send at once for our new terms.
THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO., 31 and 33 Vesey St., New York, N. Y.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

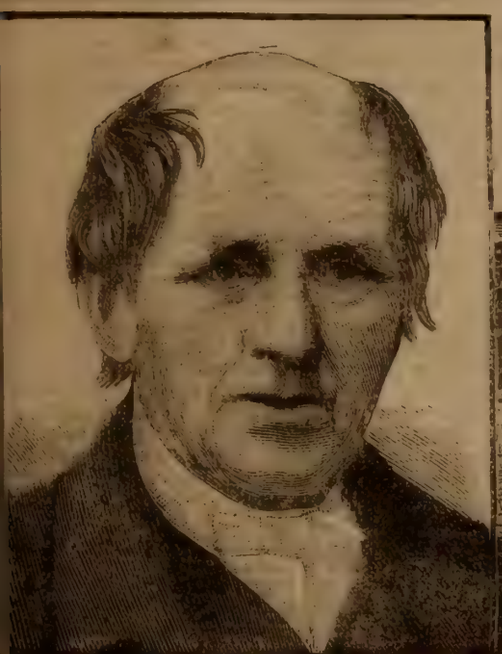
Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1888, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.

This Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. TALMAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events as well as Stories, Anecdotes etc.

Vol. XI., No. 46. Office, 63 Bible House. N. Y. THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1888. Price, 3 Cents. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

PORTRAIT AND LIFE OF "BILLY" BRAY.
SATAN ON HIS TRAVELS. Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning.
THE RESURRECTION; THE FIRST.
A Romish Festival in New Mexico—Progress in Japan—A Demented Christian Comforted—A Turk's Faith—Saved through a Dream, etc.
IRON CHARIOTS. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
PORTRAIT OF MRS. HARRISON, WIFE OF THE PRESIDENT-ELECT.
PICTURE OF A STREET IN SAN FRANCISCO.
BERTIE HOPE'S FRIEND. (With Illustration.)
THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE. (Continued.)
THE COVENANT RENEWED. By Mrs. Baxter.



"BILLY" BRAY, THE MINER WHO BECAME AN EVANGELIST—SCENES IN HIS LIFE

"BILLY" BRAY.

The Miner and "the King's Son."

Born in 1794—Parentage and Early Life—Narrow Escapes—The Crisis—Prays for Mercy—Conversion—Begins to Work for Christ—Visit to a Dying Saint—Chapel Building—A Horse that "Wouldn't Draw Anything"—Taking a Tithe of Fish—Clothed from the Lord's Wardrobe—The Eccentricity of Bray's Genius—Last Days, Illness, and Death on May 22, 1868.

THE frequent references in the sermons by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, published in this journal from week to week, to "Billy" Bray will render some account of his remarkable life welcome to our readers.

The same grace which transformed a persecuting Saul of Tarsus into the renowned Apostle of the Gentiles, and John Bunyan, the blasphemous tinker of Bedford, into one of the Saviour's most famous preachers and confessors, changed also "Billy" Bray, whose portrait is given on the preceding page, formerly a drunken and lascivious miner, into a loving and consistent disciple of the Son of God. He was born at Twelveheads, near Truro, Cornwall, England, on June 1, 1794, and died on May 25, 1868, at the age of seventy-four. The house in which he was born and died (shown in panel No. 1) stood in a village which then consisted of only a few thatched cottages, inhabited by "tinners," but which had its humble Methodist chapel, where his paternal grandfather worshipped, and which he had helped to build. "Billy's" father was also a most pious man, but he died while his children were very young. They then went to live with their grandfather; and with him "Billy" remained until he was seventeen years old, when he went to Devonshire, where, far removed from pious example and instruction, he lived a bad life. His were many, which he could not recall without deep shame and sorrow; but his soul was stained with viler sins than any that have been mentioned. His gratitude was ever most enthusiastic, because, as he oftentimes said, the Lord had saved him from "the lowest hell." "The Lord was good to me," he frequently remarked, "when I was the servant of the devil, or I should have been utterly lost"; and he felt he must praise the Lord for His goodness. His hair-breadth escapes from danger, though he was such a wicked man, made an impression on his heart at the time, and a deeper impression afterwards. "Once," he tells us, "I was working underground, and I heard a rent overhead; I ran out, and, I think, forty tons fell down where I had been working but a few minutes before."

Drunken Frolics

Turned Away From the Mine

at which he worked for being insolent to the "captain," he removed to another part of Devonshire, and, as if to seal his own ruin for ever, went to live at a beer shop. We may hear his own narrative again: "There, with other drunkards, I drank all night long. But I had a sore head and a sick stomach, and, worse than all, horrors of mind that no tongue can tell. I used to dread to go to sleep for fear of waking up in hell; and though I had made many promises to the Lord to be better, I was soon as bad, or worse, than ever. After being absent from my native county seven years, I returned a drunkard." His conscience tormented him by day, and dreams terrified him by night.

The Crisis of His Life,

however, was near at hand. Bunyan's "Visions of Heaven and Hell," came into his hands, and he began to read it. From that time, November, 1823, he had a strong desire to be a better man.

He had married some time before; his wife had been converted when young, but had gone back from the right way before marriage. The remembrance of what she had enjoyed was very sweet, and yet very bitter. She told her husband that "no tongue could tell what they enjoy who serve the Lord." "Why don't you begin again," was his pertinent retort; adding, "for then I may begin, too." He was ashamed to fall on his knees before his wife, "for the devil had such a hold on him," but he knew it was his duty to pray for mercy. He went to bed as usual, one night, without bending his knees in prayer; but about three o'clock he awoke, and thinking that if he waited until his wife was converted he might never be saved, he jumped out of bed and got and forty years afterwards he could joyfully declare that he had never once since been ashamed to pray. His decision, once formed, was unalterable, "and I found," he said, "that the more I prayed the more I wanted to pray." The whole forenoon was spent in supplication.

On His Knees for the First Time,

On the first pay-day that he came home sober for many years, his wife, he says, "was greatly surprised, and asked, 'How is it you are come home so early to-night?' and she had for answer, 'You will never see me drunk again by the help of the Lord.' And she has never since. Praise the Lord He can cure drunkards. That same night I went up-stairs, and prayed till we went to bed. The next day I did not go to work; I took the Bible and Wesley's Hymn-book, went up-stairs, and read and prayed all day. Sometimes I read the Bible, sometimes the hymn-book, and then I cried to the Lord for mercy. When Sunday morning came it was very wet; the 'Bible Christians' had a class-meeting a mile from our house; I went to the place, but because it was wet none came." This had an unfavorable effect on his mind. Billy returned home, and alone with God, with the Bible and the hymn-book as his companions, he spent all the day in reading and prayer. (See panel No. 2 on first page.)

Prayer in the Mine.

Monday forenoon was spent in the same manner. In the afternoon he had to go to the mine, but "all the while I was working I was crying to the Lord for mercy." His state moved his fellow-workmen to pity. He "was not like Billy Bray," they said. No relief came, and he went home, "asking for mercy all the way." It was then eleven o'clock at night, but the first thing he did was to go up-stairs and fall upon his knees, and entreat God to have mercy upon him. After awhile he went to bed, but not to sleep. All the forenoon of the next day he spent in crying for mercy. That day passed, and nearly the whole night he spent upon his knees. On the next day he had "almost laid hold of the blessing"; but the time came for him when he must go to the mine. The devil

Strongly Tempted

him while at his work that he would never find mercy: "but I said to him, 'Thou art a liar, devil,' and as soon as I said so I felt the weight gone from my mind, and I could praise the Lord, but not with that liberty I could afterwards. So I called to my comrades, 'I am not so happy as some, but sooner than I would go back to sin again, I would be burned to death.'" That night he again repaired to his chamber. Beautifully simple and touching are his own words: "I said to the Lord, 'Thou hast said, They that ask shall receive, they that seek shall find, and to them that knock the door shall be opened, and I have faith to believe it.' In an instant the Lord made me so happy that I cannot express what I felt. I shouted for joy. I praised God with my whole heart for what He had done for a poor sinner like me; for I could say, The Lord hath pardoned all my sins. I was a new man altogether! I told all I met what the Lord had done for my soul. Some of my companions said I was mad; and others that they should get me back next pay-day. They said I was a mad-man, but they meant I was a glad-man, and, glory be to God! I have been glad ever since."

He Began to Preach

about a year after his conversion, while continuing his work in the mine. Towards the end of 1824 his name was put on the Local Preacher's Plan, and his labors were much blessed in the conversion of souls. The worldly as much as the pious, the rich and the poor, aged and young, flocked to hear him, and he retained his popularity to the last. As the Rev. Mark Guy Pearse says: "From one end of Cornwall to another no name is more familiar than that of Billy Bray. On Sundays, when one met crowds of strangers making for the little white-washed chapel that was perched up amongst the granite boulders, or when one found the quiet 'church town' thronged by the well-dressed people, the usual explanation was that Billy Bray was going to preach. (See Illustration No 4.) If you had overtaken Billy on the way, you could not have been long in doubt as to who he was—a little, spare, wiry man, whose dress of orthodox black, and the white tie, indicated the preacher—and with the first suspicion that this was Billy Bray there would quickly come enough to confirm it. If you gave him half a chance, there would certainly be a straightforward question about your soul, in pointed, pithy words. And if the answer was what it should be, the lanes would ring with his shout of happy thanksgiving."

In the neighborhood of Billy's home there were "many wicked people, and chapels were few." His mother gave him a small piece of land, and on this he which was to be called Bethel. He himself took away the hedge, and dug out the foundation. The Lord helped Billy to go on with the work he had begun, though he was often confronted by difficulty and had to face opposition. By-and-bye timber was wanted for the door and windows. A mine had lately stopped work; and the timber was being sold off. A sufficient quantity was purchased, but a horse and cart were wanted to bring it "home to the dear Lord's house." "One of our neighbors had a horse," says Bray, "but he said it would not draw anything. I asked him to lend it to me. I put it into the cart and brought the timber home. (See Illustration No. 3.) I never saw a better horse in my life; I did not touch it with whip or stick, though we had steep hills to come over. When I took back the mare and told my neighbor, 'I never saw a better mare,' he said. 'I never saw such a thing; she will not draw with anyone else.' At length the chapel was finished, and many souls were converted in it. Several other houses of worship were erected through Bray's devotion to the work of extending the knowledge of Christ.

Resolved to Build a Chapel,

He Went on a Begging Tour

to obtain money to build a chapel at Gwennap. He went to St. Ives, and tried to find out a good man named Bryant. "St Ives," says Bray, "was a small place about the year 1838. Friend Bryant told me that I had come at a very poor time, for there was but little fish caught that year; and some of the people were almost wanting bread. 'It was poor time,' I said, 'with Peter when the Lord told him to let down the net on the other side of the ship.' We went up to the Wesleyan chapel, and we had a good meeting. We prayed to the dear Lord to send some fish, and He did. After the meeting was over, we went into a coffee-house to get a little refreshment; then we began our meeting, and continued it till midnight, praying to the Lord to send in the fish. As we came out of the meeting to go to our lodging, there were the poor women with the pilchards on their plates, and the fish were shining in the moonlight. The women were smiling, the moon was smiling, and we were smiling; and no wonder, for the dear Lord put bread on many shelves that night, and blessed many families. We asked the women what fish was taken, and they told us that many boats had taken 10,000, and some 20,000. Again the next day there were, if I mistake not, 8,000 casks taken. Some of the fishermen said to me, 'Now, you shall have some money for your chapel; and if you will get a boat and come out we will give you some fish.' A friend with me, a carpenter, a bit used to the sea, got a boat and rowed me to the place where the fish were. They looked 'pretty,' for they were shining and leaping about, and the fishermen dipped up the fish, and threw them into our boat See Illustration No. 5). I thought of the hurch-ministers, who took their tithe of the orn: but I took mine of the fish. When we ame to land, the carpenter 'told' up the fish to he people that bought them, and I took the noney, which amounted to the grand sum of hirty-four dollars."

Bray was Very Poor

vhen he was converted (a workingman who is drunkard must be very poor); a low-priced ustian jacket was his best, and he said that was etter than he deserved; but false shame did ot stop him from going out on the Sunday to varn his fellow-men to "flee from the wrath to ome." At the request of a servant girl, an unnown Quaker friend gave him a coat and waistoat, "which suited me," he said, "as if they vere made for me; and they served me for years."

In 1867, being then in his seventy-fourth year, ie continued to be in "labors more abundant." His eye had a merry twinkle, his countenance n open and benevolent expression, his voice a heerful and pleasant ring even unto the last. Ie took long journeys, held frequent services, ad regular times for fasting and prayer—praise ather than prayer, especially at the last—and witnessed glorious victories even unto the end. His visits to the sick seemed more numerous ven than before. The ad come upon him, but his ruling passion had ndergone no change, his spiritual ardor sufered no abatement. One of his last entries in ne diary which forms the basis of his biography, ade as late as February 10, 1868, was, "In the orning, after I had breakfast, bad as I was, I ought I would go to see some friends; and fter calling on some of them, I went home. ut I had hard work to get home, I was so ill; nd my breath was short."

Infirmities of Age

Only a little time before he had been at New- n and Crantock, laboring among the Wesleyns. There was a revival in progress in the tter place, and in a revival Bray was always home. He returned home pale and exhausted. e left it but once afterwards, when he went to iskeard to see his children. He got much orse, and appeared like a man in the last stage f consumption. On one occasion he sent for medical man, and when he arrived he said: Now, doctor, I have sent for you because they ll me you are an honest man, and will tell the eople the truth about their state." After the octor had examined him, Bray said: "Well, octor, how is it?" "You are going to die." illy shouted, "Glory! glory be to God!

I Shall Soon be in Heaven."

e then added in a low tone, and in his own eculiar way, "When I get up there, shall I give em your compliments, doctor, and tell them u will be coming, too?" "This," the doctor ys, "made a wonderful and permanent impreson upon me." (See Illustration No. 6.) In his dictions he was visited by persons of all deominations, who liberally contributed to his pport. On Friday, May 22, 1868, he came wn-stairs for the last time. To one of his old ends, a few hours before his death, who asked he had any fear of death, or of being lost, he d, "What, me fear death! me lost! Why, r Saviour conquered death! If I were to go wn to hell, I would shout glory! glory! to my essed Jesus, until I made the bottomless pit g again, and the miserable old Satan would , 'Billy, Billy, this is no place for thee: t thee back!' Then up to heaven I should go, outing glory! glory! praise the Lord!" A little er he said, "Glory!" which was his last word, d in a little time he died. He was blessing d praising the Lord all the day, so that heavwas not to him very different to earth. Glory his experience had begun below; he enjoyed nderful foretastes of the fullness and fruition confidently expected to enjoy in heaven ve. He took his departure on Monday, May 1868, having reached the age of seventy-four rs within a few days. His remains were erred at Baldhu Church, where they await joyous resurrection to eternal life.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

"Lord, Save That Big Drunkard!"—A worker at the St. Giles' Mission testifies: "Although I turned a deaf ear to a wife's petitions, I could not help hearing her sing hymns upon her sick-bed. Many a time have I threatened to throw the Bible into the fire, telling her I would have none of that in my house. But one night I came in here, sneaking and creeping behind the door thinking to escape observation. Now I am very tall, and after I had been in a short time I heard our sister in prayer say, 'Oh, Lord, save that big drunkard!' Now drunkenness was my besetting sin, and there being no other big man in the room I could not but think she was referring to me. The Spirit of God seemed to come into my heart and subdue it. I cried unto the Lord and asked Him, for Jesus Christ's sake, to take away from me the craving for drink. Bless God, He has done it for me."

The Pool of Blood.—"An Evangelist, in speaking of the Passover, told his hearers that none but those who were sprinkled with the blood of Christ were saved. A few days afterwards a woman came to him and said, 'When I was a girl I had a most vivid dream. I thought I was alone with my father and mother, yet separated from them by a pool of blood. I tried to get over to them, but was unable. Then my father said, solemnly, "No, you can never be with us unless you are sprinkled with the blood." That dream had faded from my memory, but when you spoke of the blood of Christ, and how none could be saved without it, the remembrance of that dream came upon me. I saw how I could never hope to join my dear parents, unless I came to Christ and was washed in His blood.' The servant of God spoke earnestly to the anxious one, with the result that she left his presence rejoicing in Christ."

"An Uncommonly Curious Thing."—An avowedly unbelieving officer confessed: "When the bullets have been whizzing past my ears, and the shells bursting on every hand, and my comrades have been falling on my right hand and on my left hand, it is an uncommonly curious thing, but at such times I always begin to pray. I am not a praying man—I do not profess to pray—but always when I have been in danger of that sort, and think that I might possibly die very soon, I instinctively begin to pray." Multitudes of infidels have been converted to God, and with hardly an exception have testified that their infidelity was a sham and that along with it all there were secret misgivings and doubts, and fears that all was not well. As one infidel said, after having run the round of doubt and unbelief, until at last he confessed his faith in Christ, "I never found anything before to rest upon that would not shake when the wind blew."

Prayer Instead of the "Highland Fling."—A Christian worker remarks: "On one occasion William Burns was preaching in the north of Scotland, and the scene of his effort for Christ was a graveyard. There was a young man in the neighborhood who thought he would like to hear Burns preach. He told his companions that he proposed going. 'Oh,' said one friend, 'if you go to hear him preach, you are sure to be converted.' 'I do not think that is at all likely,' was the reply. They bantered each other for awhile, and at length the one bet the other that he would go and hear Burns preach, and then dance the Highland fling and play the pipes on the village green upon his return. He set out to hear the preacher, but as he got nearer the place of meeting he began to be more and more afraid that, perhaps, after all he might be converted. So to make sure he resolved not to go to the meeting, but to remain at a short distance from it. He stationed himself on the outside of the graveyard, where he could see but not hear. He stood thinking how strange it was to see a man stand up before a crowd and wave his hand, and gesticulate, and yet hear no sound. But once the speaker suddenly raised his voice to a higher pitch than usual, and the young man heard these words, 'Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ will give you life.' These words went into the unwilling listener's ears, and then into his heart. He saw himself asleep and dead in sin. He hastened home, not to dance the Highland fling on the green, but to shut himself in his own room, and there seek and obtain mercy."

A Word in Season.—A Retired Naval Officer was travelling by rail in Lancashire. When the train stopped at some station, a number of cattle dealers and drovers entered the carriage. They were all excited, and it was soon evident that one of the company was being made a laughing-stock by the rest, and at last he was irritated, and uttered some oaths. The officer put his hand on his shoulder, and said, "Sir, you must not swear." The man looked at him, and said, "And pray, who made you, sir, conductor over this carriage?" "No one," replied the officer; "but I am your friend, and you will say so before night." "Indeed I won't," retorted the angry man; "there's many a bad one that goes to meetings." "Too true," replied the officer, "but there's never a swearer that goes to heaven." This caused a deep thought, and little more was said; but when the train stopped, the man, much softened, took the officer by the hand, and with real feeling said, "I don't like ye the less for what ye said to me."

Zeal Misunderstood.—An Evangelist Quoted the following from Mr. Moody: "A man who declared he thought I was doing more harm than good by speaking to everybody about Christ, told me I had seriously offended one of his friends by speaking to him in the street about his soul. Well, it happened in this way. I had not spoken to anyone that day, and on my way home I was on the look-out, and saw a man leaning against a lamp-post, looking very lonesome. Thinking he might be a stranger, I just stepped up to him and said, 'My friend, are you a Christian?' on which he turned round, and looking on me with a scowl, he cursed me, and said it was not my business. And that was why his friend told me he thought I was doing more harm than good, and setting men against religion instead of making them converts. My answer was that I was sorry if it was so; but the fault was from the head and not from the heart. 'Well,' said my friend, 'I believe you are in earnest; but you have too much zeal. What is zeal without knowledge?' 'Well,' I replied, 'I would rather have zeal without knowledge than knowledge without zeal.' Well, months rolled away, and one Sunday morning, about daybreak—a bitter, cold, winter's morning—I heard a rap at my door. 'Who's there?' I said. 'It's a stranger,' answered a voice which I did not recognize. 'What do you want?' 'I want you to talk to me about my soul.' I got up and let in the stranger, wan and pale. 'Do you remember, sir,' he said, 'meeting a man under a lamp-post, three months ago, about ten o'clock at night?' 'Yes,' said I, 'I do.' 'Well,' said he, 'I am that man. I have had no peace since that night. I could not sleep at all, and I thought I would come to you and ask you what I must do;' and so I talked to him and showed him the way to Jesus, and before he left the Son of Righteousness shone into his dark heart, and he went away rejoicing in Christ as his Saviour."

NEW EDITION OF REV. M. BAXTER'S PAMPHLETS.

THREE PAMPHLETS IN ONE.

1. Coming Wars from 1888 to 1891, and Translation of 144,000 living Christians on March 5, 1896, before the 3½ years' persecution by Napoleon, etc.

2. Twenty Predictions about Coming Wars, by Twenty Learned Expositors.

3. End of this Age by the Descent of Christ in Passover Week, April, 1901, being 45 years from the Crimean War Treaty of Peace in Passover Week, April, 1856, and 2,345 years from Passover Week, April, B. C. 444-5, as shown by Daniel's Dates.

The Three Pamphlets in an Illuminated Cover, 144 Pages, postage included,

Price Twenty Cents.

For sale at this office, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

SATAN ON HIS TRAVELS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached last Sunday Morning, November 11, 1888.

"And the Lord said unto Satan: Whence comest thou? Then Satan answered the Lord and said: From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it." Job 1:7.

Satan Among the Angels—A Monster of Many Names—Demonology Certain—Special Demons for Nations and Individuals—Satan a Supervisor-General—His Attack on the World—The Garden and the Talking Serpent—Satan's Travels Still in Progress—Routes he is Apt to Take—In the Atmosphere—Through Domestic Life—The Marriage Ring Played With—Satan in the Factories—A Talk with the Boss—His Suggestions to Workmen—In Mercantile Houses—Despoiling Souls—His Doom Predicted—The Army of Growing Christians—What Every One Needs.

IN 1672 was printed the largest book ever published, namely, two huge volumes of near five thousand pages in small type, the author Joseph Caryl. It was a commentary on this Book of Job. When it took a year for the journey from England to India, the son of the author of this commentary started for India, leaving his father writing on his book, and was gone for years, and when he came back to England, still found his father writing on it. I never saw the commentary, but I do not wonder at its size, because there is no end to

The Interest of the Book of Job.

I am not surprised that Goethe, the unbeliever, took from this wonderful book the opening of his drama "Faust," and the Mephistopheles of the great German was only the Satan of Job. It seems that one day in heaven God was on His throne, and angels and messengers came to report on their missions. But while these good spirits were making their reports, a ghastly, grizzly, hideous monster from some miry, sulphurous, filthy world, came into the palace without wiping his feet, and God asked him where and how he had been occupying himself, and this made reply with blazing effrontery, and instead of acknowledging any of the mischief he had been doing, said he had been an earthly pedestrian, and had lived a sort of circumambulatory, peripatetic life. "And the Lord said unto Satan: Whence comest thou? Then Satan answered the Lord, and said: From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it."

Greatest Scoundrel of the Universe

This monster of my text has a great variety of names. You know that notorious villains are apt to take a variety of names. Arraigned in Paris for burglary, a man will give one name; arrested in San Francisco for arson, he will give another name; imprisoned at Montreal for murder, he will give another. So this creature

Has Many Names.

He is called in sacred and profane literature Abaddon, Apollyon, Ahrimanes, Zaniel, Asmodeus the revenging devil, Beelzebub the sovereign of devils, Lucifer the brilliant devil, Diabolus the despairing devil, Mammon the money devil, Pluto the fiery devil, Baal the military devil, Meresin the plaguing devil. He is called the father of lies, and has for his children and grandchildren and great-grandchildren all falsehoods, deceptions, frauds, swindles, slanders, back-bitings, and subterfuges. All men of good sense, whether enlightened by the Bible or in heathendom, have noticed that there are baleful and maleficent influences abroad, that have not their origin in the human race, and

Demonology is Certain as angelology. The sword of Paracelsus was thought to have had a demon in the hilt, and there is now a demon in every sword hilt. The ancients supposed the air was filled with sylphs and satyrs and sirens and gnomes and vampires. Two or three hundred years ago a demonographer gave the names of ambassadors of evil which he thought Satan sent to different countries: Mammon, ambassador to England; Belphegor, ambassador to France; Martinet, ambassador to Switzerland; Rimmon, ambassador to Russia; Thannia, ambassador to Spain; Hutgin, ambassador to Italy, and that there was a princess of devils by the name of Proserpine. But that that was mere guesswork of mythology or superstition has been made clear by divine revelation. We find that there is somewhere a monarch of all wickedness. He is

The Supervisor of all Mischief, and what he cannot do himself he delegates others to do, and as each one of our race is supposed to have a guardian good angel, I have no doubt that every human being has a besieging, malignant spirit nagging his footsteps, and trying to make him think wrong and act wrong, an especial devil, a devil of fraud, or a devil of avarice, or a devil of uncleanness, or a devil of poor health, and as in my text the spirits are represented as reporting to the Lord, so I have no doubt the evil spirits report to Satan. "And the Lord said unto Satan, Whence comest thou? Then Satan answered the Lord and said: From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it." Satan began

His Attack on this World

long before Adam and Eve were created. While I believe the Bible record that the world was fitted up for man's residence in one week, I believe also the geological record that the world was previously for hundreds of thousands of years going through great changes. The lumber for the house that was to be built in a week for our first parents may have been hauled to the spot a million years before. This Prince of the Power of the Air has been trying for all that million years to demolish and use up this world. The record is on the rocks. He tried to drown it with universal waters. He tried to burn it up with universal fires. Then he tried to freeze it into ruin, and covered it with universal glacier. And for ages he kept this world, before our first parents occupied it, in paroxysms. Yea, after the famous Bible week, the world had been fitted into a Paradise for the home of our sinless ancestors, Satan comes into the Garden of Eden, and through the gate of foliage, not upright in posture, but crawls in under the bushes a snake, and having despoiled our first parents, goes to work to ruin Paradise, and does the work so thoroughly that one who recently visited the site of

The Ancient Garden,

between the rivers Tigris and Euphrates, says the place is a desert; not a flower, and the ground so poor that nothing but some date-trees grow there, and the miserable villagers from near by are not so well covered up with their rags as Adam and Eve were covered up with their innocence. So you see the Father of lies for once told the truth when the Lord said unto him: Whence comest thou? and Satan answered and said: "From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it."

In my text we have Satan on his travels, and I am going to tell you some of the Routes He is Apt to Take.

On his way down from the palace where he reported himself in answer to the question: Whence comest thou? the first range of mischief he may be expected to take is the air. It was not a witticism or a slip of the pen when Paul, in his letter to the Ephesians, called Satan the "Prince of the Power of the Air." I think it means that Satan works through conditions of the atmosphere. The west wind is full of angels, the east wind is full of devils. Satan has power in the upper air where highest clouds float, and power over the lower air which we breathe; and as we breathe nineteen times a minute, and take in three hundred and fifty cubic feet of air in every twenty-four hours, and much of this air affects the arterial circulation, you see what opportunities the Prince of the Air has of contaminating and despoiling and demoralizing a man. Through atmospheric influence he clouds the disposition, and rasps the nerves, and covers the best of people with religious despondency, as in the case of Edward Payson and William Cowper, and that beloved apostle of Evangelism, James W. Alexander. His great delight is to have the air of churches vitiated, and in that way dulls the preacher and stupefies the people, and sees to it that the atmosphere of not more than one out of a hundred churches is fit to breathe, and whole congregations, Sabbath by Sabbath, are asphyxiated. Yes, he is worthy of the title St. Paul gave him: "Prince of the Power of the Air."

Another route he is apt to take is Through Domestic Life.

There is no greater sport for him than conjugal quarrel. It does not make any difference how long the marriage ring has been on the finger of the left hand, he will try to pull off the signet. He says to the husband: "What a plain wife you have compared with what she once was! Don't you see that the color has gone out of her cheek, and there are several wrinkles about her temples, and a sprinkling of frost on her locks? Besides that, you have advanced in intelligence, while she has stood still or gone back. How hard it is that you should be chained to such dullness and imbecility!" Then he turns and says to the wife: "That man neglects you; you have a right to be jealous. He likes his cigar and his club, and anything and everything better than you. Why not get a divorce? Marriage is only a civil contract anyhow, and not a divine alliance. Let me have that ring. It means nothing, and you might as well give it to me." The ring is handed over to Satan, and he tosses it up and down, like a plaything, over the mouth of perdition, and says: "I will hand it back, only let me have it a little while." And he keeps tossing that ring, with all its sacred memories, higher up and further out, tossing and catching, tossing and catching it until one day you clutch for it, crying: "Give me back my ring!" but lo, it has dropped into the yawning gulf, and you suddenly find who has been pitching and catching the ring, and you cry out "Whence comest thou?" and he answers: "From going to and fro in the domestic life of the city, and from walking up and down in it; that is all."

There are thousands of marriage relations strained almost to the breaking, and I commend to all men and women who are restless in the present marriage state that they resume the old-time courtship, and take as much pains to make themselves agreeable as they did five or ten or twenty years ago, before the wedding march announced to the flushed and fluttering crowd that the bride and groom were coming. According to the statistics of Professor Dikes, in one year in moral New Hampshire there were 24 divorces; in temperate Maine, 478 divorces; in good old Massachusetts, 600 divorces, and in the New England of "steady habits," 2,113. In one county of Illinois 830 divorce suits were begun in one year, and in many places it seems as if a new arrangement had been made of the commandments, and instead of ten there were only nine, the seventh commandment having been left out. When you see how many husbands and wives are parted by law, and know of the many who would like to dissolve conjugal partnership, do you not come to the conclusion that Satan is engaged in mighty industries?

Another route that Satan is apt to take in his active travels, is

The Factories

and other establishments where capital sits in the office or counting-room and a good many hands of laborers are busy among wheels and spindles and fabrics. On this visit he will first step into the manufacturer's office, and find the owner and proprietor of the great establishment all alone with his correspondence and his account-books, says to him: "You are not making as much money as you ought. You furnish all the brains. Were it not for your enterprise this establishment would not be in existence. These men and women in your employ are of a very common mould. Their appetite is coarse, and they do not need the luxuries you require. Their comfort and happiness are of very little importance. Put them down on the very verge of starvation and take all the profits into your own possession, and if they do not like it turn them to go where they can do better." Having one his work in the counting-room, Satan teps right out

Among the Workmen.

le says: "You work too many hours and you o your work better than it needs to be done. 'ou are serving a bloated bondholder anyhow. le has no right to have any more than you ave. Why should he ride and you walk? Why hould he have tenderloin steak and you salt ork? Capital is the enemy of labor. Let labor e the sworn foe of capital. Why don't you trike and bring him to terms? Wait until he as a large order to fill by contract, and then he annot help himself. Go altogether, without a ioment's warning, and tell him you are going o stop. If he has more resources than you know f, and persists in going on and getting new ien, give them a volley of brickbats or put a ttle dynamite in his office and blow him and is factory all up with the same explosion." ook out there on the night sky! Great fire omewhere. What is it? The night is cold and atan has made a big bonfire of that factory to arm himself by. The capitalist has lost heavily, nd the workmen and their families are without read and clothing. "Whence comest thou, atan?" "From going to and fro among em- loyers and employees, and from walking up and own among them. Ha! Ha! I was the only ne who made anything out of that strike. What fire and smoke! Ha! Ha! I like smoke."

Another route Satan is apt to take in his ctive travels is through the Mercantile Establishments.

e steps in and says to the clerks: "How much .lary do you get? Is that all? Why, you can't ve on that! You have a right to enough for livelihood. A few quarters out of the money- awer will never be missed, or here and there a remnant of goods you could take home with- it being found out. Or you could change those :count-books a little, and you could make that gure eight a nought and that figure five a tree, and if you do not feel exactly right about oing that you can some day pay it back, which ou can do perfectly easy. Don't feel like run- ng the risk? Well, then you can't go to the eatre, and you can't go on that round with the oys, and you will have to wear that plain coat, hereas you could have your overcoat fur lined, id take board at a tip-top place, and walk amid ush and tapestries positively Oriental. While ou are making up your mind I will just go rough the different parts of this great com- ercial establishment and try every one from the ealthy firm down to the errand boys."

The Result of That Satanic Visit that one of the partners has drawn so much it of the concern that the whole business is ippled, and a bright and promising boy is sent me to his mother in disgrace, and a young an is in jail for embezzlement. Three lives ined and three eternities. Whence comest ou, Satan? "From going to and fro among ercantile houses, and from walking up and wn among them. I like to ruin splendid fel- ws and blast parental hopes, and of all the uors that I ever tasted, fill my glass with a ewing of agonizing tears. Come! let us click gether the rims of our glasses and drink to e overthrow of the fifty thousand young men uined last year! Huzzah!" Satan would ther have one young man than twenty old ones. he would win the septuagenarians and the ogenarians, he could do but little harm with m. But he says: "Give me a young man, ecially if he be bright and generous and ial." He sees that young men have, for good bad, been the mightiest influence in this rld. Hernando Cortes conquered Mexico at rty-two. Gustavus Adolphus became im- rtal in history so early that he died at thirty- ht. Raphael, the most famous of painters, d at thirty-seven. William Pitt was Prime ister of England at twenty-four. Jesus rist completed His earthly life at thirty-three. e years in a young man's life are of more wer for good or evil than the last fifteen of old man's life. So Satan is especial greedy for young men, and in going to and fro in the earth he has especial temptation for them.

Another route that Satan on his active travels is apt to take is for the Despoiling of Souls.

It does not pay him merely to destroy the bodies of men and women. Those bodies would soon be gone anyhow; but great treasures are involved in this Satanic excursion. On this route he meets a man who is aroused by something he has seen in the Bible, and Satan says: "Now I can settle all that; the Bible is an imposition; it has been deluding the world for centuries; do not let it delude you. It has no more authority than the Koran of the Mohammedan, or the Shaster of the Hindoo, or the Zenda-Vesta of the Persian." He meets another man who is hastening towards the kingdom of God, and says: "Why all this precipitation? Religion is right, but any time within the next ten years will be soon enough for you. A man with a stout chest like yours, and such muscular development, need not be bothering himself about the next world." But Satan says nothing to him about the fact that the professor who gave his whole life to the study of health, and could lift more pounds than any American, died at about forty, and that another learned man, who proved conclusively that if we observed all the laws of health we need never die, expired before he got his book on that subject published. Satan meets another man who has gone through a long course of profligacy and is beginning to pray for forgiveness, and Satan says to the man:

"You Are Too Late;

the Lord will not help such a wretch as you; you might as well brace up and fight your own way through." And so with a spite and an acuteness and a velocity that have been gaining for six thousand years, he ranges up and down, baffling, disappointing, defeating, afflicting, destroying the human race. Through his own hand or delegated infernalism he has pursued and hurt us all, and cursed every heart, and cursed every home, and cursed every nation, and cursed every continent. He has instigated every war. He has rejoiced in every pestilence. He has started every groan. He has pressed out every sigh. He has hurled every shipwreck. Lazarettoes, insane asylums, commercial panics, plagues, destroying angels, continental earthquakes, and world-wide disasters are to him a perfect glee. Can you look upon the Communism and the Mormonism and the Mohammedanism and the wide sweep of drunkenness and fraud and libertinism, the Franco-German War and Crimean War, the North and South United States war, and rivers of blood flowing across continents of misery into oceans of wretchedness, without realizing the power of the Evil One, who reported to the Lord Almighty, and when asked, Whence comest thou? answered, "From going to and fro in the earth, and from going up and down in it."

But, blessed be God! I may substitute anthem for requiem, and Hallelujah Chorus for the Dead March in Saul. The New Testament says: "The Son of God was manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil." It prophesied that an angel would come down from heaven with key and chain and incarcerate and shut up the old dragon. It says that Christ came to "destroy him that had the power of death—that is, the devil." And from the way Christ drove the devil out of those possessed by him until he was glad to hide under the bristles of the swine of Gadara, and from other violent ejectments, we know that there is in existence a power a million-fold

Mightier Than the Diabolic.

The old lion of death shall go down under the stroke and roar of the "Lion of Judah's tribe." Yea, my text shows that Satan was compelled to report to the Almighty and give account of himself. When God said to him: "Whence comest thou?" he was forced to answer. What means that Scripture which says that Christ shall bruise the serpent's head? If you have ever killed a snake, the passage ought to be plain to you. You see, this old serpent, the devil, has crawled across the nations, poisoning whole generations and leaving its trail on everything; but after a while it will be cornered, and hissing and writhing in rage, and with crest lifted and forked tongue shot out, it will make final attack on Christ, and Christ will advance upon it, and lifting His omnipotent foot, that foot strong enough to crush a world, lifting that foot right over the head of the reptile, will put down His heel with a crushing power that shall leave the monster bleeding and mashed, never to hiss again, or bite again, or shake his old rattle again. Thank God, he has already Received a Stunning Blow.

Hear you not the rumbling of the Christian printing-presses and the whirling of the Gospel chariot wheel? As many souls have been added to the Christian church in the last eighty years as in the previous eighteen centuries, and that is a ratio of increase acclamatory with gladness. The kingdom is coming, and I am so sure of it that I do not propose to fret and worry. The sharp attacks of infidelity and sin are a good sign that especial blessing is coming in showers over the earth. Flies bite sharp just before rain.

If we do not see the full consummation, our children will see it. In the time of the French Revolution a great procession of boys carried through the street a banner with the inscription: "Tremble, tyrants; we shall grow up!" Though we may fail to do our duty, there is a rising generation being gospelized, and coming by the hundreds of thousands from our Sabbath-schools and Christian homes, who might properly have on their banners: "Tremble, ye powers of darkness and sin; for we are growing up!" We may not amount to much in ourselves, but if we put ourselves in the right place we can do great exploits. Two put under two make only four; but placed beside two make twenty-two.

What You and I Most Need is power to drive back this Apollyon, this Asmodeus, this Ahrimanes, from our heart and lives. And we can do it, not by our own strength, but by divine power afforded, for here is a passage emblazoned with encouragement which says: "Resist the devil and he will flee from you." Remember it is no sin at all to be tempted. The best and the mightiest have been tempted. Milton describes a toad squat at the ear of Eve. The sin is in surrendering. Do not feel so secure in yourself as to think you cannot be overthrown. How do you account for the fact that there are so many old men in Sing Sing and Auburn and the other penitentiaries, serving out their protracted sentences for frauds. The clock in the steeple of old Trinity Church striking the hours did not remind the recreant Wall-streeter of the passage of time that would soon bring exposure and doom to him. The explanation is that Mephistopheles, Apollyon, Satan, got in his work at that time. The man was not naturally bad. He was as good as any of you are, but Satan, with whole battalions of infernals, swooped upon him unawares.

Look out for the wiles of the devil, not only those of you who are young, but the middle-aged and the old. Outside of God a moment. But yield not to disheartenment. If we put our trust in God, our best days are yet to come—days of victory, days of song, days of heaven—and the best days of the cause of righteousness in all the earth are yet to come. As the ten thousand men of Xenophon's army, when they came to the top of Mount Theches and saw the waters on which they were to sail to their homes, the soldiers with clapping hands and waving banners all together shouted: "The sea, the sea!" So we to-day in our march toward our heavenly home come up to the top of the mountain of holy anticipation, and look off upon oceans of light, and oceans of glory, and oceans of joy; and thrilled as we have never been thrilled before, we clap our hands and wave our gospel ensigns, and cry one to another, and shout up to the responding and re-echoing heavens: "The sea, the sea!"

You Are Not Safe

A ROMISH FESTIVAL IN NEW MEXICO.

A STRIKING illustration of the fact of the near affinity between Romanism and heathenism, which Mr. G. H. Pember has repeatedly mentioned in the columns of this journal, is given in a letter which is sent to the Spirit of Missions by Rev. James Fraser, a missionary in New Mexico. He says: "As we were journeying through the Mora region we came to a small country church, which was surrounded by small heaps of split pine wood. This was the preparation for a feast to be held in that village in honor of the guardian saint of that town and locality. Within a quarter of a mile of the church we met the parish priest making his way to the village, who is always the leader in these scenes, kept in honor of these wooden saints.

"At dusk the heaps of pine wood (about fifty to eighty in number, for we counted fully twenty on each side of the church, omitting the ends) are lighted, and when they are blazing in good form the priest, dressed in his robes, sallies forth from the church, with the patron saint of the place in his arms, to lead the people in procession round the church by the light of these fires. The priest now sings and hugs the saint, thanking it for the blessings it bestowed on the village during the year, while the people in crowds follow the priest, whooping and shouting and firing guns at a most boisterous rate; indicating, one would think, the orgies of pure heathenism rather than anything that could pass under the name of a Christian feast. And heathenism doubtless it is. Those of us who have seen the dances of the Indians of Arizona and New Mexico are fully persuaded that these wild scenes (the so-called feasts of the Romanists of this land) have been borrowed, in great part, from the heathenism of the Indians."

PROGRESS IN JAPAN.

IN a recent letter from Dr. H. Loomis, who is laboring in Japan, he gives the following summary of Christian progress in that land: In the town of Fugioka there lives a man, sixty-four years of age, named Machida Totaro. He has long been afflicted with a weakness in his eyes. He went from place to place, and to various doctors and priests, for some remedy, but his efforts were of no avail, and he became almost totally blind. Then he heard that there was a skilful foreign physician living in Tokyo, by the name of Whitney, and he went to him for relief. After careful treatment for a while, his sight was partially restored, and he was greatly rejoiced and thankful for the services that had been rendered. He was very ready to hear the Gospel; and, after some instruction from the doctor and others, he made confession of his faith in Christ.

On the Island of Yesso is a large portion of country that was formerly uninhabited. It having been proposed to occupy the land by means of colonization, a Daimio at Nagoya sent about twenty men each year to a spot called Yakumomura. In this way the village has grown to consist of about one hundred houses. The people in general were much attached to their old ways, and have little thought or desire to make any special change either in their temporal or spiritual condition. But one of their number favored Christianity, and invited Rev. Mr. Nakasu, of Sapporo, to come and teach them. The invitation was accepted; and so great was the encouragement that a second series of meetings was held. In December last four men were baptized. Fifteen more have applied for baptism, and have been taken on trial.

The pastor of the church at Shidzuoka has been visiting the prison and holding services for the benefit of the inmates. The result has been a most marked change in the minds and conduct of many of the prisoners. Several have united with the church upon their release from confinement. A Christian has been employed for some time as a teacher of morals in the Kobe prison. He reports the conversion of some of the most hardened criminals. These men have been released, and are now living honest and industrious lives. The Governor of Nagasaki has applied to the missionaries in that city to conduct services in the prison for the benefit of the inmates. It seems to be more and more understood by all, and especially the officials, that Christianity is one of the best and most important factors in the reformation of the criminal class.

A TURK'S FAITH.

MR. DEWEY, a missionary of the American Board in Eastern Turkey, sends to the Missionary Herald a translation of an interesting letter which he recently received from a native pastor at Midyat. In the course of it is the following passage: "One who was accustomed to drink arrak and play cards in the coffee-houses, a man reckoned not upright. Twelve days ago there was religious talk between him and Melki, son of Shemas Jurjis. The brother Melki spoke to him of faith in Christ, that it is free, and was repeating to him the saying that to him that worketh not, but believeth on Him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness. On this very saying he reflected a little, and then in a loud voice said: 'I believe! I am saved, and have full hope in the salvation of Jesus.' And so he clung to this word with a strong hand, and to whomever would talk with him he would say, 'I believe in Jesus, and am saved.' And for this there rose upon him persecution from the priests, and his own family, and all the Syrian community, but he grows strong in his thought, and says to them, 'If ye believe not thus, ye have not salvation.' And according to what we have seen in this person, our opinion is that God has wrought in him a wonderful work, and now he is joyful in what he has gained, and ceases not from attendance at church. There is from him a great impression upon the Syrians, as they see a marvellous thing found in him, and so another has become persuaded with him, and now they both continue in attendance at church."

SAVED THROUGH A DREAM.

NEAR Elderfeldt, in Germany, there lived two Christian men, very intimate, one of whom led a very worldly life. The husband was taken ill, and on his death-bed drew a promise from his friend that he would visit his wife, pray for her, and lose no opportunity of recommending to her the grace of God as revealed in the person and work of Jesus Christ. This the friend readily engaged to do; and, upon the husband's death, which happened shortly after, he visited the widow, and as long as her grief lasted, his visits were well received. Time passed on, but as the wound began to heal, his visits became more and more irksome to the lady, until at last she told him that unless he would speak of something more pleasant, he might as well stay away altogether. Hurt, but not offended, he discontinued his visits, but not his prayers. After a while, however, he forgot her entirely.

Two years had rolled by, when awakening suddenly in the night, he felt unhappy and depressed; and, among other things, he thought of his friend, and then of the wife, and with much sorrow of heart he prayed the Lord that his sin of negligence in forgetting to pray for her, and allowing himself to be hindered from carrying out his promise, might not be the cause of a precious soul being lost. He rose early in the morning, and though he had eight miles to walk, by six o'clock he was at the chateau where the widow resided. He rang the bell. "Can I see madam?"

The servant looked strangely at him, and went away. In a few moments she returned. "You can see madam; she has been longing to see you; she is dying!" He went up, and to his surprise and happiness, found her full of joy and peace in believing. She stretched out her hand to him, and said: "Ah, sir! I have found a Saviour just such as I need."

He begged her to repeat the circumstances of her conversion. She said she felt able. The night before, when she fell asleep, she was much disturbed, and had the following dream: a carriage, she thought, drove up to the house; the footman jumped down, threw open the door, and told her that she was invited to the wedding of the king's son; but she must be very quick in dressing as he could not wait. She ran to her wardrobe to find her best dress, but when she put it over her head, it fell around her in dust and ashes. A second and a third met the same fate. The footman cried out: "Make haste, or we must go." Her servant jumped into the carriage, the door slammed, and as she heard the wheels roll away, she sank on her bed in an agony of mortified shame. How long she lay she knew not, but she was roused by a voice whispering in her ear: "There is no robe that will cover you but the robe of the righteousness of Jesus Christ."

She awoke and found it a dream; but though the vision was gone, the reality of her solemn position, as having to do with the living God, was fully before her. She cried to Him, and before the day dawned had found salvation through the blood of a crucified Saviour. A few hours after she fell asleep in Christ.

A DEMENTED CHRISTIAN COMFORTED.

A BEAUTIFUL incident, which a contemporary vouches for as within the editor's knowledge, is an illustration of the fact that the divine message shall not fall to the ground void, but is mighty beyond our comprehension through His power. A lady was summoned to the bedside of a friend, the mother of a family, and whose mental faculties had become deranged. "What could I say or do?" she said. "All was wild excitement. My heart wept over her, yet I had no power to calm her or do her good. But I felt for her so deeply that I could not leave her without one whisper of comfort. I bent above her and said softly, 'Underneath are the everlasting Arms!' It seemed as though she glanced up at the words—hers was a Christian life—but she showed no sign of comprehension and I left her, believing my whisper unheard." But hours after that delirium there came a lucid interval, and in that period of quiet what were the words that the invalid spoke? "Underneath are the everlasting Arms!" Amid all the strange fancies of the restless brain, that one text of heavenly calm had been victorious and reached to heart and memory.

A LADY HEALED OF STRICTURE.

AMONG the remarkable records of the Berachah Home, published by the Rev. A. B. Simpson in his Cloud of Witnesses, is the testimony of Mrs. Langley. She says: It was thirteen years ago last April since I had the first operation performed on me for stricture. Since then I have had nine others, and the torture I endured no one knows but God. I was treated by some of the best doctors in Boston and New York and pronounced incurable by all. I never knew one moment's relief from pain. In the summer of 1885 I had an abscess in my head, and the suffering was so terrible I would have taken my life if I could. After trying everything, one night I threw down a poultice just brought me, and began to pray. I spent the greater part of the night in prayer, and gradually the pain left me and I was well. It left me deaf; but I took that to the Lord; and my hearing was restored.

In telling a friend of this, she said: "Don't you think if you had faith, God would cure the stricture?" and told me of a case at Berachah. I thought about it for some time, and then wrote to Mr. Simpson. One of the deaconesses answered, telling me to be sure it was God's will, then I would have a sure foundation, and gave me passages of Scripture to convince me that it was taught in the Word.

I went to see Mr. Simpson. He talked with me perhaps ten minutes, and gave me The Gospel of Healing to read. While I sat there I felt a strange, sweet, quiet spirit steal over me. I cannot describe it, but, praise God, it has never left me. I was in a hurry now to get home to read the book. I had read perhaps an hour, when I took my pencil and wrote: "Tuesday, December 8.—I accept the dear Lord as my physician." I went to my room and gave myself entirely to the Lord, as well as I knew how, and I had the evidence that I was accepted and healed. Praise the Lord! I knew it for a fact. In all the past year I have not once had to lie down from pain. I never knew it was possible to enjoy such peace and rest this side of heaven.

THE RESURRECTION: THE FIRST.

By Rev. A. C. Tris, of Howard, Kan.

The Links of a Golden Chain—Erroneous Ideas of Resurrection—It is Not Regeneration—Nor a Succession of Human Types—A Literal Rising Again—The First Drama—The Doctrine it Teaches—Consistent with Other Biblical Teaching—1. The Personality of Satan—2. To Rule the World Through His Vicegerent, Antichrist—3. To be Invincible to Human Opposition—4. To be Overthrown by Christ—The Second Drama—The Resurrection Scene—Reasons for a Literal Interpretation—An Essential Resurrection—The Dominion of the Risen Saints.

THE book of the Revelation stands in close connection with redeeming love, and with the whole history of redeeming love, shown and accomplished on earth; and is a part of that golden chain, beautifully linked together as a perfect unit, not only as a whole, but even perfect in every part, commencing with the First Adam in the Paradise, and ending its closing link with the Second Adam reigning on the restored earth. The great theme of the whole Bible is the fall and the restitution of a fallen race, and the restoration of a sin-cursed earth, to a place of glory, of which it shall be said, "Thy God reigneth."

But, lest the old Scotchwoman's criticism of her minister's discourse should apply, "He was so long laying the cloth, that I feared the dinner would never be served," it is time to consider our subject in question, and to contemplate in a few remarks the first six verses of the twentieth chapter of the Revelations.

"And I saw . . . . and I saw . . . . This is the first resurrection. Blessed and holy is He that hath part in the first resurrection, . . . ; and they shall reign with Him a thousand years."

The great question about these verses is:

What is Meant

with the word resurrection? Some say it means regeneration; others say it means a succession of men who shall have the spirit and the virtues of the martyrs of former ages; and yet others say it means a literal "rising again," an "upstanding" (Greek) of the bodies of martyrs and saints who did live in former times.

A cursive examination of those three different explanations may be very profitable, and direct our thoughts to a closer study of this grand subject under consideration, Regeneration. That the above quoted verses do not mean a regeneration, or a spiritual resurrection (as some would have it), is evident to every one who, with an unbiassed mind, considers the whole scope of those mentioned verses. Regeneration, or spiritual resurrection belongs especially to the spiritual part of a human being, and not to his material or corporeal part. The text speaks of actions, and of a state to which not every converted or generated person can come, or may come, namely: "To be beheaded, and to reign as kings." It cannot be called fair and just to spiritualize the word in the same verses and not the following words: and, indeed, we are at a loss to spiritualize the words: "And I saw the souls of them that were of Jesus, and for the word of God," and to apply them to Regeneration, or spiritual resurrection. The very word in the text "pelekizo," translated "beheaded," means in the original language, "To cut away with an axe," and is found only once in the Bible, signifying the very instrument by which the martyrs were beheaded, when the corporeal execution took place; there is not one precedent in the whole word of God which gives us the slightest direction to take that word for Regeneration.

'Beheaded' for the Witness

Another obstacle in the time and the extent of the period of which here is spoken, Regeneration has existed longer than a thousand years. It commenced with Adam, and will not end until the last elect shall be gathered into the fold of God.

It is also a fact that Scripture never uses the word "upstanding, rising again," for regeneration, or spiritual resurrection; it always is used for resurrection of the body, the whole man.

It is not a succession of men. We maintain also that the above mentioned verses cannot mean, and do not mean, "a succession of men who will exhibit the spirit and the virtues of the martyrs of former ages." To spiritualize or allegorize those verses must lead us to a labyrinth from which not one can extricate himself. A succession of men and of living generations can never constitute a body of men who were beheaded in former times, and can never represent a multitude

Who Shall Live and Reign

with Christ a thousand years, a period not allowable to any man in this Dispensation. The Hierarchy of Rome, and the Popes, as representatives of Christ, do not claim to reign and to rule with Christ; they only pretend to govern the Church for Christ.

The Greek preposition "meta," used in the text in a genitive case, is very strong, and signifies that the object or objects spoken of are in the midst of them (Liddell and Scotts); thus to live and to reign as kings with Christ must mean that Christ is there, and the theory of spiritualizing the text cannot be sustained.

Then, it would not be fair to say that the first verses of the chapter speak of a personal Satan, and that they ought to be understood literally, and to claim that the following verses should be spiritualized. We advocate fair dealing. If the first verses are literal, then the following verses must be literal; and if the last verses must be spiritualized, the consequence must follow that the whole chapter must be spiritualized, and the first verses must mean, also, a succession of evil men, who are incarcerated; and a personal Devil, and a resurrection, or any resurrection, must become a myth—a fictitious or fanciful narrative.

To argue that this vision means: "a succession of men who will exhibit the spirit and the virtues of the martyrs of the former ages" is of the Millennial age. In that period not any person shall be able to exhibit the spirit and the virtues of martyrs whose heads were severed with an axe, and who had suffered an ignominious death when Antichrist did reign, for the very reason that "persecution" never more will raise its head in the Millennial period. "The beast and its image, and the false prophet, were already cast alive into the lake of fire burning with brimstone" (Rev. 19:20), and "Satan was already bound for a thousand years" (Rev. 20:2); also Antichrist shall have no more existence in the Millennial period (II Thes. 2:8): "And then shall that lawless one be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of His mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of His coming."

Inconsistent With The Period

In conclusion, on this head, we say: that it makes the Scripture of none effect—yea, ridiculous—to assign to a body or generation of men called the successors of martyrs, and to place them on thrones, such an honor as to make them the kings of the Millennium, and that without having experienced any of the sufferings of those former saints. It is to give a reward inconsistent with the very peculiar character of the word of the Bible. (Matt. 19:28; Acts. 14:22; 2 Thes. 1:5; Rom. 8:17; 2 Tim. 2:12; Rev. 7:14, and Rev. 17:6.)

Literal Rising Again.

Others say, How readest thou? and in accordance with the words of the text, they believe and advocate a literal rising again, a corporeal Resurrection, an upstanding of the martyrs and of the witnesses of Christ, called in the Greek: "The upstanding, the First."

The first of these wondrous dramas is set before us in the first three verses of the eleventh vision of the Revelation, commencing with: "And I saw" . . . . and ending with: "and after that he must be loosed a little season." Teach every lover of truth the following doctrine, found in almost every part of the Bible:

1. That there is a personal devil, the great adversary to Christ and His kingdom, the old serpent known to Eve, called the prince of darkness and the god of this world.

2. That this personal devil is also called: "The great red dragon, who not only deceiveth the whole world" (Rev. 12:1–9), but who with his deputy, "Antichrist," shall be the ruler of

The Roman Earth,

"having seven heads, and ten horns, and seven crowns upon his head, and his tail drew the third part of the stars."

3. That the combined force of Satan, and of the nations, and of the kings of the nations (Ps. 2:1) shall be so great that not any human power or authority (neither all the churches combined, shall have any power to resist and to check the encroachments of Satan and of the Antichrist. No person on earth shall be found able and willing to make war with Satan. Only One shall undertake that stupendous work, namely, the Lord Jesus Christ, who is the Lion of the tribe of Judah; the Root of David (Rev. 5:1–10); He shall accomplish that work. (II Thess. 2:8–10; Rom. 16:20.)

4. That it pictures out the manner of Christ's action in subduing the power of the Dragon—not gradually, not by gentle means and persuasion, not by education or reformatory enactments, but with the arm of Omnipotence, as Jehovah Jesus. It is mentioned in the text: That the key of the abyss is in His hand or (in the hand of the Angel), that a great chain "alusis" is over his hand, signifying in the Greek language "a power which cannot be unloosed" (except by proper authority), and also the place of confinement is pointed out as a locality—namely, "the abyss," the bottomless pit—a place at all times feared as a punishment by the fallen spirits (Luke 8:31); and that place will be safely kept, as we read of the grave of Jesus (Matt. 27:66), a seal was put upon it. The New Verson has it: "and sealed it over Him," so the Dutch translation (1636) and Dr. R. Young; and not, that a seal was put upon Satan: "and set a seal upon him," as it is in the Authorized Version. That abyss shall be guarded in such a way that Satan and his angels shall have no opportunity "to deceive the nations till the thousand years shall be ended. Mark, also, that the abyss and the lake of fire are two different places, both mentioned in this chapter, verses 3 and 10. By this act of Christ

The Earth Will be Restored to her first primitive state of being, freed from the rule of Satan, and of evil spirits, and this will be the first step in the great "restitution of all things." (Acts 3:21.) The first Paradise lost is here united with Paradise regained and restored; "The seed of the woman will bruise the head of the old serpent" (Gen. 3:15), and shut his prison's door (Rev. 20:3) upon that deceiver of the nations, and thereby a reign of peace shall be inaugurated, which was only known in the garden of Eden before man transgressed against His Maker. (Gen. 1:28; Gen. 49:10; Ps. 72:2; Isa. 11:6–8.)

(To be Concluded next week.)

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION—1888.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled, "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting 75 cents. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

TERMS AND INSTRUCTIONS.

Published Weekly. Subscription price in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, $1.50 a year; $1 eight months; 75 cents six months; sent two months on trial for 25 cents, postage free; in Europe and in all countries in the Postal Union, 50 cents extra postage; subscriptions always payable in advance. Single copies, price 3 cents. Any newsdealer will furnish the paper weekly when ordered.

New Subscriptions can commence at any time. When no date is mentioned, we begin it with the issue of the week in which the subscription is received.

Remittances by Mail should be by Post-office money order, bank cheque, draft, or express money order, whenever possible, and should always be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Letters containing money sent in this way need not be registered, as when lost, duplicates can always be obtained.

If a Postal Note or currency is sent, it should always be in a registered letter. Letters can be registered at any office. Subscribers sending money of this kind, and not registering, do it at their own risk.

Change of Address. Name of Post-office and State, of both old and new address, should always be given in case of removal, as without the previous address it is impossible to find the name on our list.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Result of the Presidential Election has been the all-absorbing topic of discussion during the week throughout the land. The decisive Republican victory has not occasioned much surprise to those who watched the campaign in the doubtful States, especially in New York. There the Republicans were united and enthusiastic, while the Democrats were quarrelling among themselves over local issues, and were discouraged by the apprehensions of manufacturers and merchants as to the effect of the reductions in the tariff which might be expected to result from Democratic success. It is a significant fact, which justifies the opinion expressed in these columns on October 25, that New York State gave a plurality of about 18,000 to the Democratic candidate for Governor, and a plurality of about 13,000 to the Republican candidate for President. This may not have been the result of "deals," as the tariff would affect one vote and not the other, but the difference is so enormous that it is impossible altogether to avoid suspicion. The corrected returns from all the States have not been issued at the time of writing, but it would appear that General Harrison carried the following States: California, Colorado, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, New York, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Vermont, West Virginia, and Wisconsin. If later returns confirm these figures General Harrison will have 239 votes in the Electoral College against 162 for Mr. Cleveland. Democrats naturally feel sore over this defeat, but are generally taking it in good part, acquiescing in an unequivocal verdict which cannot be disputed. New York, though a Democratic city, has her peculiar consolation in the change, which the election has effected, in the City Hall. Mayor Hewitt, who accepted a renomination although he was aware that his candidacy would divide his party and might imperil the National ticket, was, like Samson, himself overwhelmed in the ruin he probably helped to bring about. New York has therefore the prospect of wishing him, in a few weeks, a long and glad good-bye.

The Change in the Balance of Parties in the House of the Fifty-first Congress, which, according to present returns, the election has effected, will have results as momentous to the country as the change in the Presidency. Various estimates have been made of the relative strength of the parties in the House, but the most moderate concedes a working majority to the Republicans, which the Committee on Elections will probably increase. According to this report, which may be accepted as the least sanguine, the Republicans have gained 23 Congressmen, and lost 11, and there will therefore be 166 Republicans in the House, and 159 Democrats. Local influences may have had something to do with the result in a few cases, but substantially it must be accepted as the answer of the people to the tariff question. The Republican principle of a protective tariff for protection's sake is evidently approved, with all it involves. The Republican majority in the Senate will also be increased by two if not three. In Ohio and West Virginia the party is now strong enough in the Legislature to elect a Republican Senator in place of the Democrat, whose term expires next March, and there is a possibility of Delaware doing so too. Thus, if the relations of General Harrison with his party are harmonious, his nominations, and any treaties he may negotiate will receive favorable consideration.

The Prohibition Vote, Though Largely a matter of estimate at present, was undoubtedly a large increase on that of 1884. The Voice claims that more than double the number of votes were cast for Fisk and Brooks than were cast for St. John and Daniel. The only losses it admits are in Massachusetts and Vermont. It says: "The gains are heavy, almost without exception, and in some cases are unexpectedly heavy. Thus California increases her St. John vote from 2,960 to 12,000 or 15,000; Minnesota, from 4,684 to 18,000 or 20,000; Indiana, from 3,028 to an aggregate variously estimated at from 12,000 to 18,000; New York increased her vote from 24,000 to about 30,000. The total vote of all the States for the Prohibition candidates is expected to aggregate nearly 350,000." The vote for St. John in 1884 was 150,626. Doubtless the gains would have been far larger had there been any prospect of victory, but in so close a contest between the old parties, many voters, whose sympathies are with Prohibition, were reluctant to throw away their votes.

An Interesting Ceremony Took Place at Augusta, Ga., on November 8. The great national exposition which has been arranged with so much labor and energy was opened by Governor Gordon. The exposition building has a floor space of seven acres, and is 900 feet long by 100 feet wide, with three cross sections respectively 200, 300, and 400 feet deep. Besides space for exhibits it accommodates 15,000 visitors, and has over two miles of frontage in aisles. The Hon. James C. Black, of Augusta, delivered the inaugural oration. In the course of it he called attention to the rapid progress the State has made during recent years. He said the property of Georgia had increased in the last ten years $103,000,000, exclusive of railroad property, while railroad property had increased $20,000,000, or 212 per cent. The property owned by colored people, he said, was in round numbers $10,000,000, an increase in ten years of eighty-five per cent. In the factories the aggregate of wages paid annually now amounted to $1,000,000. At the conclusion of the inaugural ceremonies the wife of the Governor pressed an electric button, which set all the machinery in the building in motion.

Several Important Political Speeches were made in Birmingham, England, by Mr. Gladstone last week. His reception in that town was remarkable for its enthusiasm. Its political leaders are John Bright and Joseph Chamberlain, who, from being Mr. Gladstone's warmest friends, have become his most relentless foes. The people of the town, however, appear still true to him. In the course of one of his speeches Mr. Gladstone said that all efforts to solve the fisheries question with the United States had been egregious failures. The Liberals did not wish to increase the difficulty of settling the matter in dispute, but they were desirous that, by a judicious choice of persons [evidently referring to the blunder made by the English Government in sending Mr. Chamberlain here to negotiate], and the suggestion of measures, the question should be settled in a manner tending to draw both countries into closer relations. The Sackville incident, he said, was extremely unfortunate. It had resulted in the infliction of a serious slight and disparagement upon England. He hoped the matter was susceptible of satisfactory explanation. The incident ought to serve to moderate a little the spirit of vaunting and bragging which is in vogue among Tories.

The Czar of Russia Has Had a Narrow escape from death by a railroad accident. While travelling in southern Russia, his chief-of-staff ordered the engineer of the Czar's train to increase speed. The man protested, and pointed out the danger of high speed on a track so faulty. The chief insisted, and shortly afterward the whole train left the track and was cast in ruins. The Czar and Czarina were much shaken and slightly bruised. The flooring of the saloon carriage occupied by the Czar and Czarina collapsed, and the occupants were thrown upon the track. The Grand Duchess Olga and the Grand Duke Michael were in the next car, and were thrown upon the track and covered with débris. They were rescued unhurt. As the disaster occurred, a servant was handing the Czar a cup of coffee. The Czar's dog, which was standing near his master, was killed. Nearly every member of the imperial suite received contusions. Twenty-one attendants were killed and thirty-seven were seriously injured.

United European Action Against the African slave trade has been arranged. On November 6 Lord Saulsbury informed the House of Lords that Germany had invited England to co-operate with her in the work of preventing more effectively the exportation of slaves from and the importation of arms to East Africa. England had promised to aid in the work, as it was in accordance with her traditional policy. The proposed measures would be effected by a naval and not a military force. France had also agreed to render assistance, and would send a man-of-war to co-operate with the German and English vessels in a blockade against slave and arm-bearing vessels. The vessels forming the blockade would have the right to search vessels under any flag.

The Evidence in the Parnell Investigation last week, was directed to proving that outrages and lawless acts uniformly followed the organization in any part of Ireland of a branch of the League. Several witnesses testified that Land League hare hunts were organized over lands belonging to persons who offended the League for the purpose of damaging their crops. Police testimony from Loughrea, Athenry, and other places in Ireland showed that prior to the founding of League branches in those districts they were comparatively free from crime, and that after League meetings there was much turbulence, often culminating in outrages. It was testified that five murders quickly followed the founding of the Loughrea branch, including the killing of Sergeant Linton, who, witnesses averred, was shot for giving evidence.

General Boulanger's Power and Popularity in France is beginning to seriously disturb the equanimity of both journalists and statesmen. A few extracts from the daily journals, all published on the same day, were cabled here last week, which show how general is the apprehension aroused as to his influence on the future of France. The Débats says: "We are sorry for it, but we are obliged to record that Boulanger is now the man of the future"; while the Temps adds, "Boulanger now completely overshadows the Comte de Paris and Prince Victor." The Figaro says Boulangism is the new epidemic which will eventually kill the Republic. M. Ranc, in the Matin, says "Boulanger day by day steadily gains power. Everything turns to his advantage." Other remarks of similar tenor were made by other journals, all of which implied that the General is recognized by all parties as the enemy of the Republic, and the one man likely to overthrow it.

Very Liberal Terms are Offered to any Person canvassing for subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Sample copies will be sent, postage paid, on application from any one desiring to undertake the work. Ministers and others will find it easy to obtain subscriptions. Send postal card for terms, and state number of sample copies required. Address The Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

The Serial Story by the Rev. L. S. Keyser, of Elkhart, Ind., published in this journal two years ago, is being published in book form by Messrs. Anson D. F. Randolph & Company, of New York. Its title will be, "The Only Way Out," and its price one dollar. During its publication in this journal in serial form, it was greatly blessed. We have learned with sincere thankfulness that several students in colleges, who were either pronounced sceptics, or were drifting into scepticism, were brought, by the blessing of God on that story, to the feet of Christ, and we earnestly pray that a still greater blessing may attend its publication in book form. Mr. Keyser has had much experience in dealing with scepticism, and in his story he portrayed the difficulties of sceptics with rare skill, and pointed the doubter to the sure way out of the slough with Christian fidelity. The story, as it appeared in these columns, has been carefully revised, and, we understand, has been improved in many respects. Any reader having friends afflicted with doubt, may do them service by placing a copy in their hands.

The Death of the Rev. Dr. Van Meter, in Rome, Italy, is announced. Dr. Van Meter was well known in New York. During his recent visit to this city, he called several times at the office of this journal and described to the editor his plans for an extension of his work in Italy. He was then looking well and strong, and seemed likely to spend many more years in the Master's service. Dr. Van Meter was a native of Kentucky and was sixty-eight years of age. He was one of the organizers of the Howard Mission in New York for the care of destitute children, and superintended it for twenty-five years. He then commenced evangelistic work in Italy, making Rome his headquarters. He set up a printing-press in an old building once used by the Inquisition for torturing Christians, and printed the first copies of the New Testament in Italian. In recent years, he has been doing evangelistic work, and has been largely engaged in the distribution of Bibles through Italy.

A Novel Investigation Brought a Young man from Montana to New York last week. He presented himself on November 5 at Police Headquarters, and said he wanted help to discover his own identity, and was prepared to pay for it. He said that from the best he knew he was found a waif, in the streets of New York, twenty-three years ago, and was cared for on Randall's Island for two years. Then, at the age of five, or thereabouts, he was sent West. He arrived in his new home labelled Dexter Roosevelt. He prospered as he grew up, and is now a boss truckman, well off, and with a home of his own. But he is not happy unless he finds out who he is, or at least how he came by the name of Roosevelt. He suspects that somehow he is connected with the old Knickerbocker family of that name. The police records gave him no information. He went to the Department of Charities and Correction to continue his search. His desire is very natural, but a still more momentous question concerns him. His success in his present investigation can but promote his temporal interests, while his condition for all eternity depends upon the question whether his name is inscribed in the Book of Life. (Rev. 20 : 15.)

Every Port Closed Against Storm-Beaten voyagers is a melancholy report that comes from Jacksonville, Fla. It states that eight persons, among whom were two small children, decided, during the height of the yellow fever epidemic, to fly from the city rather than any longer to risk seizure by the dread scourge. One of the number owned property on Lake Worth, and that place was fixed upon as the destination. Together they built two boats, launched and loaded them in Hogan's Creek, at the Adams Street bridge, and started, against the advice of their friends, willing to face the unknown dangers of an ocean voyage in two small boats, whose seaworthiness had never been tried. After their departure from Jacksonville, they were first heard of as trying to land at Mayport. This they were not permitted to do, so they crossed the bar and went safely to Lake Worth; but by the time they had reached that place a rigid quarantine had been established, and they turned back after trying in vain to make a landing. They were compelled to return, and again made the perilous voyage in safety back to St. Augustine. From there, after being driven away, they sailed for Fernandina, where they tried to land, but with no better success. That night a terrific storm arose, and about midnight it was blowing almost a hurricane. The whole party was beyond a doubt drowned, as they have not been heard from since. Sometimes sinners awakened to the danger of continuing in sin meet with an analogous experience in trying to save themselves. Those only find safety who abandon all hope of self-deliverance and accept the refuge provided in Christ. (Hos. 13 : 4.)

A Young Lady's Repudiation of Hypocritical pretense is described in some recently published reminiscences of President Lincoln. The lady, a beautiful daughter of Virginia, was anxious to visit her brother, a Confederate soldier, then a prisoner in the North. She had some influence with a powerful official near the President, and through him was promised an interview with Mr. Lincoln. "But you must be very careful," said her friend, who knew her impulsive disposition, "not to let a word escape you which can betray your Southern sympathies." They were ushered into the presence of Mr. Lincoln, and the object for which they had come was stated. The tall, grave man bent down to the little maiden, and, looking searchingly into her face, said: "You are loyal, of course?" Her bright eyes flashed. She hesitated a moment, and then, with a face eloquent with emotion and honest as his own, she replied: "Yes, loyal to the heart's core—to Virginia!" Mr. Lincoln kept his intent gaze upon her for a moment longer, and then went to his desk, wrote a line or two, and handed her the paper. With a bow, the interview terminated. Once outside, the extreme vexation of her friend found vent in reproachful words. "Now you have done it!" he said. "Didn't I warn you to be very careful? You have only yourself to blame." Miss N. made no reply, but opened the paper. It contained these words: "Pass Miss N.; she is an honest girl and can be trusted." Unhappily, the followers of Christ are not always so brave in acknowledging their allegiance when some worldly advantage is to be gained by concealing it. They too often forget the consequence of cowardice. (Mark 8 : 38.)

A Marriage at a Funeral Took Place in Brooklyn, N. Y., last week. The friends of a well-known business man, recently deceased, were present in large numbers at his house on the day of his funeral to testify their respect for their dead friend. The officiating clergyman was called out of the room before the commencement of the funeral service and remained some time in consultation with the family. When he returned he was accompanied by the youngest daughter of the dead merchant and her lover. They took their places beside the coffin, and the minister joined them in marriage. "This," he said, "is done in compliance with the wishes of the deceased." Inquiry of the family elicited the explanation of the strange ceremony. It appears that the father had set his heart on the marriage, but his daughter continually deferred it. This was not because she did not love her suitor, but from reluctance to enter the marriage state until she was older. Her father, however extracted from her a solemn promise that she would marry the young man, and that the marriage should surely take place in his presence. With the promise he contented himself, reminding his daughter from time to time that if he should be taken ill the wedding must be hurried on, that she might fulfil her promise. But he was seized with apoplexy and died in a few minutes. Then the daughter reproached herself for her procrastination, and could keep her promise, only in the letter, by being married in the room where her father's dead body lay. She grieved that her father had missed the joy the fulfilment of his wish would have afforded him. How often is it that the children of godly parents mourn, in entering into union with Christ, that they have postponed the union too long to gladden the hearts of those who had so long prayed and labored for it! (Prov. 23 : 24, 25.)

The Detection of a Murderer in Colorado furnishes clear proof that punishment alone has no reformatory influence on some natures. A convict was recently released from the penitentiary under a law passed by the Colorado legislature, making twenty-five years the maximum limit of imprisonment. The convict had been sentenced to a life term for murder and robbery. No sooner did he regain his liberty under the new law than he went to Pueblo and induced a well-to-do citizen to start with him in a wagon for a mining camp in the mountains. The convict was found a day or two later without his companion, and the police, suspecting that he had stolen the team, arrested him. On examining the wagon, blood stains were found upon it, and the same stains were upon an axe which was found under the seat. Search was made along the road, and the mutilated body of the convict's companion was found in Beaver Creek. In the convict's pocket was the dead man's pocket-book with $238 in it. The crime was almost the exact counterpart of the one for which the convict had suffered his long term of imprisonment. It is so with all forms of sin. Punishment does not eradicate evil from the heart. The only hope for the sinner and for the sinful world is in the remedy God offers through Christ in a new heart changed by the Holy Spirit. (Ezek. 11 : 19, 20.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Mrs. Mary Lowe Dickenson, the founder of the order of "The King's Daughters," has been elected to a chair in the University at Denver, and will accept it.

Mr. George Dorsey, of Frankfort, Ky., has been conducting evangelistic services at Stanford, Ky., which have been followed by a widespread awakening.

Cedar Rapids is the first city in Iowa to erect a Y. M. C. A. building. Its corner-stone was laid recently with appropriate ceremonies by Rev. James Marshall, D. D.

The donations to the yellow fever sufferers in Florida to November 1 amount to $309,577.99, and there is a net balance of $101,721.82. About $20,000 is needed.

Nine lady missionaries sailed from New York for India on November 4. They went out under the auspices of the Women's Missionary Society of the M. E. Church.

Dr. Robert Young, author of the Analytical Bible Concordance, and numerous other Biblical and Oriental works, died October 4, at his residence in Edinburgh, Scotland, after a protracted and painful illness.

Rev. Wesley Smith, of Sharpsburg, died on October 28, at Pittsburg, at the age of eighty-three years. He was born in Ireland, and was the son of a Methodist minister who was licensed to preach by John Wesley.

The seventh annual Convention of the Woman's Home Missionary Society has just been held in Boston, with a large attendance of delegates from all parts of the country. Mrs. R. B. Hayes, of Fremont, Ohio, presided.

Major Whittle's evangelistic tour in Ireland is being much blessed. He is holding services in churches, factories, and in the Y. M. C. A. halls. Calls are being pressed upon him from the North and South of Ireland.

The number of students in Princeton Theological Seminary is one hundred and seventy-five, a decided increase on last year. Of these, fifty-five are in the senior class. Forty-three Princeton students attended the Inter-Seminary Missionary Alliance in Boston, and many will give themselves to Foreign Mission work.

Dr. G. W. Smith, President of Trinity College, Hartford, was unanimously elected Assistant-Bishop of the Protestant-Episcopal Diocese of Ohio on November 1, at a special convention held in St. Paul's Church, Cleveland. The election was rendered necessary by the continued illness of Bishop Bedell, who is in Europe.

A remarkable revival work in Wisconsin has grown out of the labors of Mr. Weiss, a student of Yale College, who began holding services at Jackson, Davis Corners, and Big Spring. The continued interest has been so strongly manifested that Mr. Weiss has been constrained to remain, and will not resume his studies for a year.

By the will of the late John Guy Vassar, Vassar College will receive $130,000; the Vassar Brothers' Hospital, $25,000 and a maintenance-fund of $200,000; the Home for Aged Men, $70,000 and valuable real estate; a fund is established for the building of an orphan asylum in Poughkeepsie, and many bequests are made to churches and benevolent and religious institutions.

IRON CHARIOTS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"For thou shalt drive out the Canaanites, though they have iron chariots, and though they be strong." Joshua 17 ; 18.

Canaan Not a Perfect Type of Heaven—The Canaanites of Sin—I. Enemies to be Rooted Out—Sin Always to be Treated as an Enemy—The Difference Between Sheep and Swine—Christ Cannot be Had While Sin is Retained—Even One Sin Enslaves—The Power of the Chariots Exaggerated—Some Sins Hard to Kill—Constitutional Proclivities—II. Sin Can be Driven Out—Proved by Past Conquests—By the Success of Others—III. The Royal Word.

WHEN the children of Israel had come to Canaan, and by God's good care had entered into the land that flowed with milk and honey, they were not immediately at rest, for the Canaanites were there—there in possession, there in strong cities, which seemed to be walled up to heaven; and they had to drive out these Canaanites before they could possibly possess the country. In fact, this was the reason why they were sent there. The Canaanites had been outlawed of God. They had been guilty of such horrible offences that He had adjudged their race to destruction. It was necessary for the purity of the world that ancient races which had become so horribly depraved should be removed from it, and the Israelites were brought to the land, as the Lord's executioners, to smite the Canaanites and exterminate them.

You will see, then, dear friends, that Canaan is hardly a full type of heaven. It may be used so in a modified sense; but it is a far better emblem of that state and condition of soul in which a man is found when he has become a believer, and, by believing, has entered into rest, but not into an absolutely perfect deliverance from sin. He has come to take possession of the covenant heritage, but finds and evil still in the land, both in the form of original sin within, and of temptation from without. Before he can fully enjoy his privileges he must drive out his sins. No doubt many young Christians think that when they are converted the warfare is all over. No, the battle has just begun. You have not come to the winning-post: you have only come to the starting-point. You have entered upon the land in which you will have to fight and wrestle and weep and pray until you get the victory. That victory will be yours, but you will have to agonize to obtain it. He that has brought you into this condition will not fail you nor forsake you; but, at the same time, not without strong contentions and earnest strivings will you be able to win your inheritance. Be not deluded with the idea that you may sit down at your ease, for the very reverse will happen to the true heir of heaven.

The Canaanites of Sin

Our text is a war-speech to the tribes of Manasseh and Ephraim. Joshua said to them, "Thou art a great people, and hast great power: thou shalt not have one lot only." But he told them that, while he gave them two lots, they would have to drive out those who were then in possession: "Thou shalt drive out the Canaanites, though they have iron chariots, and though they be strong." May the Holy Spirit inspirit us for our life struggles by the meditation!

I. Our first reflection shall be—

We Must Drive Them Out.

It is a command from God—"Thou shalt drive out the Canaanites." Every sin has to be slaughtered. Not a single sin is to be tolerated. Off with their heads! Drive the sword into their hearts! They are all to die. Not one of them may be spared. The whole race is to be exterminated, and so buried that not a bone of them can be found. Here is a labor worthy of all the valor of faith and the power of love.

They must all be driven out, for every sin is our enemy. I hope we have no enemies in this world among our fellow-men. It takes two to make a quarrel; and if we will not contend, there can be no contention. We are neither to give nor to take offence; but if it be possible, as much as lieth in us we are to live peaceably with all men. I trust that we have forgiven everybody who has ever harmed us, and would desire to be forgiven by all against whom we have done anything wrong. But every sin, every evil, of every shape is our true enemy, against which we are to wrestle to the bitter end. You cannot say to any sin, "You may dwell in my heart and be my friend." It cannot be your friend: evil is our natural and necessary enemy, and we must treat it as such. One of

The Marks of a Child of God

is that, although he sins, he does not love sin. He may fall into sin, but he is like a sheep which, if it tumbles into the mud, is quickly up again, for it hates the mire. The sow wallows where the sheep is distressed. Now, we are not the swine that love the slough, though we are as sheep that sometimes slip with their feet. Would to God that we never did slip! While you hate sin, sin hates you. It will do you all the hurt it can; it will never be satisfied with the mischief that it has wrought you. It will try to lead you farther and farther into danger, so as to bring you down to hell. Sin would utterly destroy you if it could, and it certainly could and would if the grace of God did not prevent. Proclaim, then, against all sin. So long as there remains sin in our heart, or in our life, or in the world, it is to be fought against to death.

A Ceaseless Warfare

Again, we should contend against all these Canaanites, and drive them out, for sin is our Lord's most cruel enemy. Jesus abhors all evil, and evil in every shape persecuted Him. All sorts of sins He bore in His own body on the tree. From our sins, all of which were laid upon Him, came the lashings of His back. From our sins came the bloody sweat that covered Him from head to foot. From our sins came the crown of thorns, the nails, the spear, the vinegar and gall, and the dread death of agony. Sin—oh, how our Lord loathes it! In putting it away from us He drank of that cup from which, for a moment, He started, saying, "If it be possible, let this cup pass from me!"

Remember, brethren, we cannot have Christ and have any one sin reigning in our hearts. We come to Christ as sinners, but when we receive Christ we hear Him say, "Sin shall not have dominion over you." Sin may look into our nature, as it does, with Its Tempting Witcheries.

Sin may ride through our nature, as it does, trampling down all that is good. Sin may lurk in our nature, as it does, ready to plot against the King of kings; but it cannot reign in our nature, for it has come under another sovereignty: Christ is on the throne. Thou mayest have Christ and quit thy sin; but thou canst not not have Christ and hug thy sin. Christ shall help thee to slay thy sin; but if thou sayest, "No, but I will indulge this evil," even though thou addest, "Is it not a little one?" thou wilt perish in thine iniquity.

Suppose that one of our missionaries were to come back from India, and say, "I have achieved a great marvel among the natives. All through one of the districts I went and preached, and wrought wonders. I found them worshipping gods made of the mud of the Ganges. I showed them the folly of it, and they broke their mud-gods to pieces. And some of them had wooden gods, and I induced them to burn them all. But there were some beautiful gods—gods of marble, and of gold, and of silver, and I had not the heart to meddle with them, for they were so artistic, so valuable, and so venerable. Why, one of them had eyes of diamond; and another had about his wrist a bracelet of rubies." Alas, Mr. Missionary! we see no reason for congratulation. So you left the people did you? What good have you done? None whatever. It is evidently as evil an idolatry to worship a god of gold as it is to worship a god of mud. Now, if we come among you, and so deal with vice and improve the education and morals of the masses that we elevate the people, what have we done if we end there? We have taken away one set of sins, but have left others. Sins of all sorts must go when grace takes possession of the soul. Bring out the golden calf! This costly idol must be ground to powder, and strewed upon the water. The golden calf is as detestable before the Lord as the most beggarly gods of wood. One form of enmity to God is as obnoxious to His law as another.

Worshipping Precious Gods,

Sin in Satin

is as great a rebel as sin in rags. You may wash sin in eau-de-cologne, but it smells no sweeter.

Remember, also, dear friends, that a man cannot be free from sin if he is the servant of even one sin. Here is a man who has a long chain on his leg—a chain of fifty links. Now, suppose that I come in as a liberator, and take away forty-nine links, but still leave the iron fastened to the pillar, and his leg in the one link which is within the iron ring, what benefit have I brought him? How much good have I done? The man is still a captive. As long as a man is held a captive by a single vice, no matter how small it is, he is still in bondage to iniquity. If any one sin binds him, masters him, he is not the Lord's free man. He is still a slave in the worst form of slavery: he is under the dominion of evil. Hence, you see, I spoke not too largely when I said, "Down with all!"

There are certain sins that, when we begin to war with them, we very soon overcome. These Israelites, when they were up in the mountains, and in the woods, soon got at the hill-country Canaanites and destroyed them; but down in the plain, where there was plenty of room for horses and chariots, the Israelites were puzzled what to do; for some of these Canaanites had chariots of iron, which had scythes fixed to the axles, and when they drove into the ranks of an army they mowed down the people as a reaping machine cuts down the standing corn. For a while this seems to have staggered the Israelites altogether; it was a terrible business to think about, and fear exaggerated

The Power of the Chariots.

Dread made them powerless till they plucked up courage; and when they once plucked up courage, they found that these chariots were not nearly so terrible as they were supposed to be. There were ways of managing and mastering them, if Israel would but trust in God and play the man. When a man is converted by divine grace, certain sins are readily overcome: they fly away at once, never to return. I hardly recollect, after talking with thousands of converts, hearing any brother say that he found it difficult to give up swearing. I have often heard people express their wonder that though they had never for years used a single sentence without an oath, yet from the moment of their conversion no profane word ever escaped their lips. Swearing is a kind of Canaanite that is soon settled off—driven out and slain. So it is with many other forms of evil. We get our sword at their throats quickly, and by God's grace we are clean rid of all temptation to return to them. Such sins, though once powerful, are left dead on the field of battle.

Hard to Overcome.

But certain other sins are much tougher to deal with. They mean fight, and some of them seem to have as many lives as a cat. There is no killing them. When you think that you have slain them, they are up and at you again. They may be said to have chariots of iron. These sins are sometimes those which have gained their power—their chariots of iron—through long habit. Did you never catch yourselves with a snatch of an old song coming to your memory when you have been in prayer? When you have drawn very near to God, have you not been suddenly startled with the recollection of a filthy thing into which you once plunged? Terrible is the power of habit which has long held sway. It is not easy to uproot the oak of many years' growth. These habits make chariots of iron, into which your sins mount, and they become terrible enemies to our holy desires and fervent resolves.

Some sins get their chariots of iron from being Congenial to Our Constitution.

Certain brethren and sisters are sadly quick-empered; and as long as ever they live, they vill have to be on their guard against growing uddenly angry, and speaking unadvisedly with heir lips. They are quick and sensitive, and his might not in itself be a serious evil; but hen sin wields that quickness and sensitive-ess, evil comes of it. How many a sincere hild of God has had to go for years groaning, s with broken bones, because of the quickness f his temper! As for these constitutional sins, ou must not excuse them. I beseech you, nark what I say about this; for many are ruin-d by supposing that their constitutional faults re hardly faults at all, but unavoidable acci-lents. You must not say of any sin, "I cannot elp it." You have to help it. You must not ay, "Oh, but it is natural to me!" I know that t is natural—that is the very reason why you ave to be doubly on your guard against it. Everything that is of nature—ay, and of your allen nature when it is at its best—has to be ut under the feet of Christ, that grace may eign over every form of evil.

Perhaps one of the things that is worst of all o a Christian is that certain sins are Supposed to be Irresistible.

t is a pernicious error. "These chariots of iron," he Israelites said, "it is of no use to try to con-end with them." So they gave up the plains o the Canaanites. It is a sad calamity when a Christian person says, "I can keep straight in everything except that. Do not touch me there. You must allow me a great deal of latitude in hat direction. Please make large allowances or my peculiar constitution." All such plead-ng is mischievous. Listen to me, my sister. I will make allowances for you; but, I beseech ou, do not make any allowance for yourself. My brother, I implore you, do not take out a icense to sin. If I make a kind excuse for you n sympathy with your weakness, being a man ike yourself, it is one thing; but for you to nake an allowance for yourself will be most in-urious to your soul. You have to overcome nd destroy the sin for which you claim tolera-ion. Mark that! You must not—you dare ot—allow any sin to master you; and if you now that it does overpower you, do not there-ore claim that you may indulge it, but draw an nference of the opposite sort: because it has nastered you, concentrate your entire strength pon its utter destruction.

II. I now turn to the second head. I have aid that we must drive them out. Secondly, do not say that we can drive them out, but I ay that they can be driven out. It will be a reat miracle, but let us believe in it; for other reat wonders have been wrought. Note first hat you and I have been raised from the dead. s it not so? "You hath he quickened, who vere dead in trespasses and sins." If a dead nan has been raised, then anything can be lone with the man who is now made alive.

They Can be Driven Out.

He that could raise Lazarus from the dead, an cause his grave-clothes to be unbound, can aise him beyond his imperfections and infirmi-ies, can make him perfect in every good work o do His will. It can be done. The raising rom the dead is the evidence that it can be done.

In the next place, you have already conquered nany sins. Look at the heaps of Canaanites hat you have killed. Begin at the beginning, where God began with you in the work of grace n your soul; is there not a wonderful difference etween what you were then and what you are ow? Were there not sins entrenched in your ature like the Canaanites in their walled cities? But Jericho fell flat to the ground. Hosts upon osts of unbeliefs and iniquities dwelt within our daily life, but you have driven them out. By God's grace you have resisted temptation, nd escaped from lusts, and risen above doubts. You have hitherto overcome through the blood f the Lamb. Be strong and very courageous, or the Lord of Hosts Himself is at your side.

Have you not seen other Christians conquer? Oh, let your memory charge you now with brethren and sisters in whom you saw great infirmities and sins at the commencement of their spiritual career: but how they have grown! How they have vanquished inbred sin! The tears come into my eyes when I think of certain members of this church—some in heaven and some still among us. I remember what they used to be, and what they are now, and I can hardly believe that they are the same persons. Fierce temper has been tamed, strong passions have been bound, black melancholy has been chased away. What God has done for them He can do for you.

Beloved, we have been talking about what can be done and what can not be done. Have we thought about it? We are and with Him we know all things are possible. I think I see the battle now going on: the enemy seems to prevail, and the timid hearts of the soldiers of the Cross sink within them. Listen! You have not yet drawn upon your reserves. Do you not know that within call there is eternal power and Godhead waiting to help you in your struggle against all evil? Call up your reserves! Intreat your great ally to send reinforcements in this hour of need. Beseech the Lord to give you more grace; and as you have received life at His hands, pray that you may receive it yet more abundantly.

Dealing with the Almighty;

III. And then we close with our third head:

They Shall be Driven Out.

They must be driven out; they can be driven out; they shall be driven out. That is a speech for a monarch. "Must" is for the king, and "shall" is for the King of kings. Well, well, we venture to say it, because we only give the echo of His sovereign tones. This is what Christ died for. He loved the church, and gave Himself for it, that He might sanctify and cleanse it by the washing of water by the Word, that He might present it unto Himself a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy, and without blemish. Christ died to save His people, not from some of their sins, but from all their sins. His precious blood cleanseth from all sin.

Brethren, this is what Christ lives for. Up in heaven He pleads for us, and "He is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them." The desire of His heart is that we may be kept from sin. "Holy Father, keep them through thy Word." He pleads that, though Satan may desire to have them and sift them as wheat, they still may be preserved. This is what the Holy Spirit is given for. He is not given to come into our hearts and comfort us in our sins, but to deliver us from all evil, and to comfort us in Christ Jesus. He quickens, He directs, He helps, He illuminates; He does a thousand things; but, chiefly, He sanctifies us. O brothers and sisters, let us never from this time forth write out a pass for any sin to come and go in our hearts. We will have no licensed sin, no place in which evil may find a lodging. We will not have a spare bed for iniquity, nor give it house-room, even in the barn or the outhouse.

This is the very object of the gospel which we preach to you; and we have preached in vain unless you are striving against sin. Ours is and if it does not make you and me holy it has done nothing for you. If you and I are unholy, we stab religion in its vital parts and murder our profession. When we make up our minds that we will allow any sin within us, we do to that extent deny to Christ the travail of His soul. Nothing grieves the Spirit of God like unholiness; and nothing pleases Christ like seeing His disciples walking in His footsteps.

A Holy Gospel,

May the mighty grace of God, without which you can do nothing, help you to keep your sword out of its sheath, driving at the very heart of sin with your utmost strength, until the last sin shall lie dead at the feet of Christ, and you shall be perfectly happy because He has made you perfectly holy. There is no fear of your stopping here upon this sin-defiled earth if you have once reached the point of perfectness. This is a poor world for the completely sanctified. God does not leave His ripe wheat out in the fields too long; He takes the sheaves home to His barn when they are quite ready. We shall soon be with Him where He is when we are made like Him. The Lord grant it, for Jesus' sake!

[The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors, and those whose sermons, articles or labors for Christ are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Dr. Talmage and Mr. Spurgeon especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

HEREDITY IN DRUNKENNESS.*

THE most startling problem connected with intemperance is that not only does it affect the health, morals, and intelligence of the offspring of its votaries, but they also inherit the fatal tendency, and feel a craving for the very beverages which have acted as poison on their system from the commencement of their being. Some instances may be given. Mr. J—— was an habitual drunkard; his wife also had a stomach complaint for which she took spirits: her medicine was never neglected. Both died confirmed drunkards, and all the children did so likewise. They said, "We can't help it; we inherit a strong love for rum or gin." One bound himself by a heavy penalty, but after some months' abstinence, broke out, saying that the craving was actual torture and he could not help himself.

Mr. B—— and his wife were scarcely ever sober: the lady died early of delirium-tremens, but the husband lived long in spite of his tendencies. Out of a large family of children only one escaped the taint: the eldest son, an inveterate drunkard, committed suicide; and all the others came to an untimely end. The only daughter was on one occasion brought home by the police in a state of intoxication: the shock was too great for the old man, and he did not long survive it.

Four Generations.

The history of four generations of a family, sketched by M. Morel, is instructive. It includes father, son, grandson, and greatgrandson.

1st generation: The father was an habitual drunkard, and was killed in a rum-shop brawl.

2d generation: The son inherited his father's habits, which gave rise to attacks of mania, terminating in paralysis and death.

3d generation: The grandson was strictly sober, but was full of hypochondriacal and imaginary fears of persecutions, &c., and had homicidal tendencies.

4th generation: The fourth in descent had very limited intelligence, and had an attack of madness when sixteen years old, terminating in stupidity nearly amounting to idiocy. With him, probably, the race becomes extinct. And thus we perceive the persistence of the taint, in the fact that a generation of absolute temperance will not avert the fatal issue.

All moral qualities are transmissible from parent to child, with this important addition: that in the case of vicious tendencies or habits the simple practice of the parent becomes the passion, the mania, the all but irresistible impulse, of the child. Even when the very identical vice is not inherited, a morbid organization is the result, which shows itself in some allied morbid tendency or some serious physical lesion. These inheritances, normal or abnormal, are not always immediate from the parents, or even in a direct line, but they miss one or more generations, and sometimes have appeared only in

---

* From "The Physician's Problems," by Charles Elam, M.D., a work dealing with physiological questions from a moral standpoint, showing how sinful habits affect families and the whole community. 400 pages; price 50 cents; Published by Lee & Shepard, Boston, Mass., and 718 Broadway, New York.

Mrs. Benjamin Harrison, of Indiana.

Bertie Hope Hears Distressing News.

collateral branches, as an uncle or grand-uncle, &c. The reason for this is that a man does not inherit all the qualities of his father or mother: and of those which he does inherit, only some are developed, while others remain latent and are probably developed in a brother or sister. But his son may in turn inherit the same faculties, with this difference; that those which were but latent or potential in the father are fully manifested in him; and so he comes to resemble not his own father or mother so much as his uncle or aunt or some more distant relative still descended from one common stock.

The Two Coleridges,

father and son, exemplify the fact that a diminution of the power of the will is the most constant phenomenon attendant both upon drinking and opium-eating. The elder was an opium-eater, and writes of himself that not only in reference to this sensual indulgence, but in all the relations of life, his will was utterly powerless. Hartley Coleridge inherited his father's necessity for the stimulant, and with it his weakness of volition. Even when young his brother thus writes of him: "A certain infirmity of will had already shown itself. His sensibility was intense, and he had not wherewithal to control it. He could not open a letter without trembling. He shrank from mental pain; he was beyond measure impatient of constraint."

MRS. BENJAMIN HARRISON.

THE future mistress of the White House, whose portrait appears on this page, is the same age as her husband, the President-elect, having been born in 1833. She is the daughter of the Rev. William H. Scott, who was formerly a Professor at Miami University, where he had as students under him Benjamin Harrison and many other men who have since risen to distinction. Her father has ceased preaching, and now holds a position in the Pension Office.

She was married to Mr. Harrison in her teens. The couple have a son, Russell, who is a leading citizen and ranchman, residing at Bismarck, Dakota. While a notable housekeeper, Mrs. Harrison moves in the most refined society, and is a woman of attainments. She reads much, and is devoted to decorative art. For an amateur she is unusually skilled as a painter of flowers in water-colors, while her china painting would not discredit a professional artist. Her conversation is brilliant, and her hospitalities celebrated, Mrs. Harrison has regular features, bright, dark eyes, and abundant dark hair. Her figure is short and somewhat stout. She dresses well, which means becomingly, and, of course, without being a slave to the caprices of fashion.

BERTIE HOPE'S FRIEND.

(See Illustration.)

ARE there demoniacs in our day, as there were in the days of Jesus? The question has often been asked, and many have answered without hesitation in the negative. On others, however, a painful experience has forced the opposite conclusion. Such a man was Bertie Hope, a man whose appearance was old beyond his years, his hair whitened, and his brow furrowed before middle life, with mental anguish.

At the age of nineteen, he had become infatuated with a girl of remarkable personal beauty, whom he married. Before the honeymoon was over, he discovered that he had made a fatal mistake. His wife was vain and frivolous, and, worse than all, with gigantic evil propensities. In spite of all his efforts for her good she had grown worse year by year, became a confirmed drunkard, and at last gave him cause that would justify him, under Christ's law, in obtaining a divorce. He had not availed himself of it, because, being a man singularly free from selfish impulses, he pitied his wife, and saw in the influence which his uniform kindness and tenderness had gained, even over her degraded nature, a power that alone stood between her and utter ruin. That knowledge decided him, and he went on living a life of sacrifice, arguing, entreating, controlling her. But what a death in life it was! The life of an eagle chained to a putrefying corpse.

Thirteen long, weary years of sorrowful burden-bearing passed. He removed to a strange city, where none of his friends could discover the misery of his lot, and lived alone with his burden, working hard for a livelihood, having abandoned the country in which he might have won money easily. The moral strength of the man was unabated, for he was supported by a strong faith in God, and by the consciousness that he was doing his duty in a manly, conscientious spirit. But how he yearned for sympathy! One word of gentle pity would have been like water on a parched land.

It was at the end of those thirteen years of withering blight that a great change came in Bertie Hope's heart. One day riding in a horse-car he was strangely impressed with a pair of singularly deep, soft, brown eyes opposite to him. Not unnaturally his experience had produced in him a dislike of feminine society. He had shunned it. But those eyes magnetized him, drew him as none had ever done before. He wondered at their strange influence, but could not explain it. After he had quitted the car they haunted him with a weird attraction, as if calling him to mutual helpfulness.

Strangely enough, a few days later, in a different part of the city, he saw those eyes again. The lady to whom they belonged was plainly but tastefully dressed, and there was about her an air of refinement perceptible to Hope's cultured taste. Accidentally he was able to render her some slight service, and she thanked him in a voice so soft and melodious that it seemed the echo of some angelic harp. In a conversation which followed, he found that her name was Helen Frost, and that she was a daily governess in a family living not far from his own home. The strange natural attraction which we feel without being able to understand, drew the two together, and they found in each other's conversation a singular charm.

One day Miss Frost, whom Hope met hurrying homeward through a pitiless rain without an umbrella, accepted the shelter he offered her. He found her much agitated. The sufferings of the yellow fever patients had touched her gentle heart, and she was trying to get permission to go South and be a nurse to them. "Ah, the brave girl!" said Hope to himself; "she is just the woman to lay down her life for others." To her he said, "There are opportunities for all of us near at hand of doing work as noble and perhaps more beneficent than in a fever hospital." A few more words were spoken between them on the help men and women might render in daily life; and then, for the first time since his burden fell upon his shoulders, Hope broke silence and told his story. He saw tears of pity rise in those wondrous eyes, and he heard her say, in that clear, soft voice of hers, "You have acted bravely, nobly; go on, the burden may be heavy, but God, who has given you strength so far, will help you to the end. Keep up a brave heart."

His voice was broken as he answered, "Thank you; I think I can now." As Hope returned to his desolate home that night—it was one of those terrible nights when his wife's outbreak defied even his power of control—he said, as he thought of Helen's tender words, "God in heaven bless her for her sweet compassion!" New heart, new light, had come into his life with her sympathy, and he was a stronger, more valiant nan under his heavy burden.

The family in which Helen Frost was employed soon afterward removed to their summer home, a few miles away, and during their absence, by her permission, Hope rode out and spent an hour with her. Poor fellow! having drunk once of the delicious draught of sympathy, his lips craved more of it with passionate desire. It relieved his despair, it gave him just the support he needed to keep him true and faithful in his weary duty.

His visits had been few and brief, and he was just thinking, one day of especial woe, that he would ride down to see her, when a letter, the first he had ever received from her, came to him through the mails, begging him to come at once. He mounted his horse without delay, and as he approached the house in which Helen's employer lived, he saw Helen and her young charges setting out for their usual walk. Hope at once dismounted and walked by her side.

"I sent for you," said Helen, in a voice of deep emotion, "because I have to tell you painful news. My employer has spoken to me of your visits. He knows you by reputation, and he insists that, as you are married, your visits compromise my character, and, in short, that they must be discontinued, or I must leave his service. I cannot see that it is just, or that there is wrong in our friendship, but I know little of the world, and I presume that he judges according to the rules of society. I suppose it must be wrong, though I cannot see it. At any rate, I must obey."

Argument, entreaty, were useless. Hope spent an hour in trying to move her resolution, but failed. It was the consciousness of her own distress at being compromised which conquered him. How could he be such an ingrate, he asked himself, as to repay her kindness by causing her a moment's uneasiness? The precious light which had cheered his solitude must be extinguished at the behest of the conventionalism of society, and the pure, inspiriting, elevating influence which had blessed and helped him for a few months must be given up. He made her good-bye, and turned back to plod his weary way through the arid desert of his life, a doubly discouraged man, his new-found joy torn from his soul by the mandate of a society which knew nothing of his sorrow nor of his need.

Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

MONTGOMERY ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

(See Illustration.)

THE sketch on this page represents the street which has been called the Broadway of San Francisco. It has not the width nor the imposing buildings of New York's famous thoroughfare, but when the visitor passing through it remembers that in 1840 the whole city had not a population of more than five hundred, and was in fact a mere fishing village, he is surprised to find it has become so fine a place as it is. The city is situated on the northern end of a peninsula thirty miles long and about six wide. It slopes toward the east, facing the bay, which is from thirty to forty miles long, and from seven to twelve miles wide. The bay is entered from the Pacific by the Golden Gate, a strait five miles long and a mile wide. Lofty hills line the northern shore of the strait, and when a vessel emerges from this gate she enters one of the most beautiful bays in the world, affording safe anchorage for ships of any size.

The present population of the city is about a quarter of a million, and Oakland, its suburb, itself a beautiful city on the other side of the bay, has a population of 35,000 more.

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. L. S. Keyser.

(Continued from page 719.)

The Dawn.

ONE day Hadley received a note from Hanson inviting him to accompany him in several pastoral calls on the following Saturday afternoon. "I believe" the letter said, "that you, as a sincere inquirer after truth, may on these visits receive help in your quest, of a practical kind that you could not get in any other way."

Hadley willingly accepted, and on the appointed day actually found himself in the position which but a few months ago would have seemed to him impossibly grotesque, of going from house to house with a Christian minister.

When Hadley found that Mr. Hanson was directing his steps toward the poorest district of the city, he opined that their visits would be largely of a charitable nature, as he was aware that the season was an exceptionally trying one, and they were going to the localities where the inhabitants were of the class who were most liable to suffer by the prevalent distress.

"I should think," he said, "that the company of a millionaire would be useful to you in such a district as this. The families here must be more in need of physical than spiritual help."

"I do not know that," said Hanson; "my vocation is the spiritual. I have faith in the efficacy of the remedies I administer in all cases. Of course I am aware of the good that money can do, but I never give it. I take note of cases of genuine distress, and I bring them to the notice of certain persons who trust me, and are liberal givers. But they give personally to those I recommend. The money never passes through my hands. People know the remedy I dispense, and they look for no other. I do not deny that a part of my income goes in charity, but others apply it for me, and they are careful not to disclose me as the giver."

Their first visit was to an uncarpeted rear room, in an upper story of a crowded tenement house. The scarcity of furniture and the presence of a bed in the room showed that it was the sole domicile of the whole family, of mother and father and two children. A boy of tender years lay dangerously ill on the bed, and Hadley, looking at the wan face, was convinced that there was little if any hope of his recovery. The bright welcome his companion received showed him that Hanson was no stranger there. His words of gentle sympathy and earnest prayer had a manifest effect on the little sufferer and the anxious family; and as the two visitors quitted the room Hadley saw that, badly as money might be needed there, no sum could have given the comfort and joy that Hanson's visit had imparted.

From house to house they went, Hanson leaving everywhere behind him a higher realization of God's love, a more cheerful patience under affliction, and a stronger faith in God's providential care. The teaching he gave—if such words of friendly, delicate sympathy and direction as he spoke could be called teaching—was varied according to the nature of the person whom he visited, and to the peculiar circumstances of the trial. He gave close attention to the story imparted to him, and then, in a few earnest words, or by a brief prayer, turned the attention of the troubled one to God as the Source of genuine help and guidance. The end was always the same, though the paths to it varied.

At last Mr. Hanson said: "We will make only one more call, and that will be an agreeable change, for there is no trouble there. It will do you good. You can hear for yourself what religion can effect as a moral power. He turned Hadley into a store, and made his way to a desk where a middle-aged man was busily engaged. A warm greeting took place between the business man and the minister, and then Hanson said: "Mr. Gains, this friend of mine has some intellectual difficulties about religion. You know by experience how hard it is to surmount them, and others that grow out of them. You have had over a year's trial of religion; I wish you would tell him how you find it work."

"Certainly, sir; mine is a case that ought to have weight, thank God! It is a very strong one. I was first a sceptic, then an infidel, then a blasphemer, then a drunkard and a libertine. Circumstances I need not fully describe made me desirous of reforming. The most urgent was that I was ruining myself as a business man, and there was a very strong probability, if I did not reform quickly, that I and my family would have to seek shelter in an almshouse. Well, sir, I tried; and I prided myself on my strength of character, so I thought that, though the struggle might be hard, it must end in victory. But the chains were too strong. I failed so miserably and so often that finally I gave up in despair, and regarded myself as irretrievably lost. Well sir, your friend, Mr. Hanson, got hold of me. He put new hope into me, persuaded me at last to make one more effort for emancipation, and promised me invincible Power. I went by his directions; I sought the Power he spoke of, and, sir, I became a new man. I put aside my doubts in my extremity, and took the thing for granted.

"I soon knew that my doubts were baseless. Why, I knew, I felt, that God is. A man don't question his own sensations. All the arguments in the world are powerless to a man who can say, I know. And I did know. The change was inexplicable on any ground but one. Here was I, with all my pride of moral power, a beaten and defeated man, the slave of sensual appetites, which held me bound in spite of my desperate struggles; and now I was victor! I was free! I was sober, chaste, and decorous of speech, and have been so ever since. What did it? It was the power of God! If all the world should tell me otherwise, it would make no difference. It was not in the power of man to deliver me. Neither this man (touching his own breast) nor any other. It was God! Now, sir, if you have any doubts and difficulties about God; if you do not think there is a God; or, if you think there is a God, but that He don't trouble Himself about His creatures, just you do as I did. Just try for yourself. Get hold of His love and His help, and no man on earth, no fiend from under the earth, will ever be able to shake your faith again. That is my advice to you, sir; and it comes from a man that knows."

"Is not this an isolated and very exceptional case, Hanson?" inquired Hadley, when they were again upon the street.

"No, sir; I know of many such instances of reformation through the power of the Gospel in this city," returned Hanson.

"Well, let us say no more about it now," said Hadley. "I want to go to my room and think."

And he walked away, lost in a deep reverie. He had now reached that juncture in his spiritual experience when nearly all his quasi-scientific and philosophical objections to the Bible were overcome or forgotten. It was the comforting, hope-inspiring, and especially the morally elevating character of Christianity, that made so strong a case in its favor with Hadley. "The appeal to life" made an impression upon him that deepened the more he reflected upon it.

While these events were transpiring, Hadley had frequently met his uncle, the Rev. Mr. Bidder, and had attended services at his church at least once every Sabbath. The old man had occasionally broached the subject of religion to him, but had as yet received very little encouragement. However, on the night after his last interview with Hanson, the sceptic's thoughts turned to his uncle, to whom he resolved to go for further light on the momentous questions that were agitating him. He was particularly desirous of learning whether Mr. Bidder's advice would comport with that of his younger contemporary, Mr. Hanson.

The next evening found Hadley in his uncle's parlor. The conversation had become a little desultory, when Mr. Bidder said, with a tentative purpose: "I have just witnessed a scene that was very distressing indeed."

"What was it?" asked Hadley.

"In the eastern part of the city there was a young man who, through the influence of a number of scoffers at religion, had imbibed anti-Christian sentiments, and had become quite bitter against the Bible, speaking derisively of it whenever an opportunity afforded. Having come from a consumptive family, it was soon apparent that he had inherited that fatal disease. His health gradually failed. Soon it became evident that the disease was approaching its last stages, and he knew that death was staring him in the face. Then he became alarmed as to his spiritual condition. He felt that he was not prepared to die, and his mental agony was very great. For whom do you suppose he sent to give him help and direction at that trying time? His infidel friends?" asked Mr. Bidder, bending earnestly toward his nephew.

"I—I suppose not," replied Hadley, his temples throbbing.

"You are correct. He despatched a messenger for a Christian clergyman—"

"That is, yourself," suggested Hadley.

"Yes, he sent for me, and also requested several of his Christian friends to come to his bedside and pray with him. I went, and—I will not describe the scene in detail—he prayed to God to forgive all his opposition to His Word, and save his soul from death. After a violent struggle—for he seemed to think for a time that there was no hope for him—a change was wrought and he received an assurance of salvation. Now, Hadley, the significant and startling fact is that he renounced his infidelity, and could not tolerate the thought of going into eternity with it. To-day we buried him."

"Tell me, uncle," said Hadley, with some agitation, "whether you ministers have many such experiences?"

"They are of quite frequent occurrence. I have known, in my own pastoral experience, of many unbelievers who repented of their infidelity before they died. Sometimes, however, their utterances were only cries of despair, and they died without hope."

"Are not their minds usually delirious, or very much weakened by disease?"

"My dear Hadley, that is where you make a mistake. My experience is this: as a rule, when infidels or impenitent sinners lose possession of their rational faculties through disease, they die without giving evidence of repentance or fear; but if the nature of the malady is such as to leave the mind clear and rational, they almost invariably want to be reconciled to God before they die, and are often filled with the most awful apprehensions."

For a brief interval Hadley was silent. Then he thought of the object of his visit—to learn what panacea his uncle would prescribe for unbelief.

"Well, uncle," he said, at length, "suppose a man is troubled with scepticism, and feels dissatisfied with it, and wants to get rid of it if he can, what specific would you recommend?"

"I should tell him to go right to God in the name of Christ with his perplexities and ask for light. 'If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God,'" replied his uncle, without a moment's hesitation.

"Are all Christians moulded after the same Procrustean model? or are they all in complicity for the purpose of duping the world? That is precisely what Mr. Mardont, Miss Winters, and Mr. Hanson have prescribed as the remedy for doubt. This ceaseless iteration would become monotonous if the question were not so grave."

Hadley did not say this aloud, but the thoughts passed rapidly through his mind. It was true that all his Christian advisers, instead of counselling him to read, investigate, philosophize, counselled him to pray. Of course, they did not disparage intellectual research, but they made it of secondary importance.

"Is that the only solvent for doubt? Why is there not some other antidote?" asked Hadley, with an intonation of mingled solicitude and impatience in his voice.

"One reason is this: we are all sinners—and the unbeliever must also be put into the same category—and we cannot receive forgiveness or help without confessing our transgressions to the One against whom they were committed. Another is, we are alienated from the life of God, and in order to get back to Him we must turn about in our course. And still another is, salvation is a moral revolution of character, and not merely a change of intellectual conviction, and therefore it can only take place when the sinner renounces his sins, and turns to the true source of help."

A few days later Mr. Bidder came to Hadley's room, and conversed with him for an hour in a friendly manner, but for some reason he avoided the subject of religion. The fact is, he had so often spoken to Hadley on the subject that he was afraid of creating revulsion in the young man's mind. As he stepped to the door at the close of their interview, the old man turned and said, with feeling:

"Hadley, I want you."

The young man understood the meaning of the remark, but replied, rather lightly: "Well, I do not know how you will be able to accomplish what you wish."

"I shall ask the Lord Himself to bring you," returned Mr. Bidder, with a smile of love and tenderness. "I am doing so—day and night"; and the old veteran of the Cross, leaving the arrow to find a vulnerable point in the young man's heart, kindly bade him good-night.

And the shaft was well directed. The old minister aimed better than he knew, for his last remark found a joint in the young sceptic's armor that had not been penetrated before.

"Is it possible that the dear old man is so concerned for my welfare that he is praying for me both night and day? What does it mean? And Hanson is praying for me too. What can induce them to be so solicitous? There is something in the religion of Christ that I cannot fathom. The results of my intellectual investigations have been few and unsatisfactory, and it is only right and reasonable that I should try the plan recommended by my best friends. But—not to-night, not to-night."

The disposition to procrastinate this important step was strong with Hadley, as it is with human kind in general. The concatenation of providential events, however, was leading him nearer and nearer the supreme crisis of his life, when his destiny was to be decided. A few days later the report reached his ears through a member of Mr. Bidder's congregation that a prayer-meeting had recently developed so much in interest that the old minister was encouraged to continue the services for several successive evenings. As soon as Hadley heard of it a thrill passed through him.

"I am going to the meetings," was his firm resolution. My agnosticism has left me in inky darkness; it has dried up every fountain in my soul and has robbed me of all comfort; it has been proven insufficient to solve the problems of existence; and I should be imbecile if I did not endeavor to find light elsewhere, especially when a sure door to the truth is pointed out by men like my uncle and Mr. Hanson."

When evening came—it was Friday—he made his way to the church. The audience was not large, as the meetings had not yet attracted general attention. Hadley was glad of this fact, for he disliked ostentation in matters that were so sacred and perplexing to him.

The young man had formed another resolution, which was that he would seek the truth in Christ in the manner that had been recommended to him. There was no excitement about it. It was his all-consuming desire for the truth and for rest to his tossed soul that brought this decision. Although his doubts were not dispelled, he felt less antipathy toward religion and its professors than he had formerly felt; and, moreover, his friends had persistently told him, until the oft recurring statement had become almost monotonous, that none but God could administer the solvent for doubt.

When he had taken his seat in a pew near the pulpit, he noticed that Mr. Bidder looked toward him with a bright smile of welcome, and Hadley fancied that a tear was glittering in the old man's eye. It sent a thrill to his own heart.

"What an interest the hoary saint takes in my welfare!" he thought. "Why should any one care what becomes of my soul? I am utterly worthless and miserable." He really felt so, and was all the more vulnerable as the garment of intellectual conceit and arrogance dropped from him.

(To be Continued.)

An Invaluable Work on Prophecy by G. H. Pember, M. A., entitled "The Great Prophecies concerning the Jews the Gentiles, and the Church of God," is for sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York. It is written in a most popular and eloquent style, and describes the impending fulfilment of Revelation and Daniel, and is illustrated by a colored chart. 458 pages. Price, including postage, $1.

THE COVENANT RENEWED.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for November 25., Josh. 24 : 14-28; Golden Text, Josh. 24 : 24.

Joshua's Approaching Departure—His Address to the Re resentatives of the People—The Recognition of God in Politics Still Needed—The Condition of Full Inheritance—Courage Shown in Obedience—Enemies Expelled Only on Observanc of the Conditions—Joshua's Testimony to God's Faithfulness—Reminds the People of their Calling and Leading—Consecration Required Prompt Decision Demanded—Negative Consecration Insufficient—How to be Kept Faithful.

MOSES had served his own generation, and now Joshua, too, had completed his mission. A long time after God had given rest unto Israel from all their enemies round about them, Joshua waxed old and "came into days" (margin). Joshua, like the patriarchs who were before him, did not struggle against the intimations which God gave him that his course was nearly run, but, with all the quiet dignity of one who understood and entered into the mind and will of God, he made preparations for his departure. He called for all Israel, as represented by their elders, their heads, their judges, and their officers, and reminded them of what the Lord had done to the nations of Canaan because of them, adding, "For the Lord your God is He that hath fought for you." Imagine in our day the ruler of a nation recognizing God in politics as Joshua did on this occasion! Oh, it would be a grand day for any country if God were once more put in His true place by the governments and rulers of the earth. In Joshua's speech he shows how, although he has divided the land to them by lot, yet there are nations which remain in their inheritance, that God, on His part, will surely drive them out, but they, on their part, must fulfil certain conditions. First, they must be courageous, not in fighting against their foes, but in observing to do the commandments of God in the law of Moses.

It Takes More Courage

to obey God in the midst of an unbelieving world than to fight a battle! Then they were not to mingle with the Canaanitish nations, not so much as to name their gods; still less to swear by them, serve them, or bow down to them. Oh how this teaches us that even conversation about that which is wrong in God's sight is, in itself, offensive to Him! Then they were not to intermarry with these nations. He showed them that it was only on condition that they obeyed the Lord their God that He would continue to drive out those nations. If the people of God did mingle with them, then these inhabitants of the land should be snares and traps to them, and scourges in their sides, and thorns in their eyes, until they should perish from off the good land which the Lord had given them. God's promise to us is, "Sin shall not have dominion over you, for ye are not under the law, but under grace." Thank God, the promise is ours, the land is our possession, yet, from time to time, we come across inhabitants of the land, of the existence of many of whom we knew nothing. We cannot drive them out, but God can and will if we come into His terms. These are, not to mention their names, not to serve,

Never to Excuse a Sin, or what some are pleased to call an infirmity, but to count on God's most sure promise to drive it out from before us.

Then Joshua added, "Behold, this day I am going the way of all the earth"—probably this was his last day on earth—"and ye know in all your hearts and in all your souls that not one thing hath failed of all the good things which the Lord your God spake concerning you; all are come to pass unto you, and not one thing hath failed thereof." And he took occasion to show them that, as all good things promised by God had come to pass, just as surely all evil things which He had threatened should also come to pass. In the religion of the present day there is an attempt to make God a God of love, utterly without righteousness or justice. Numbers of professedly Christian people believe that God will do all the good things He had said, while they hold that He is incapable of carrying out His word in just judgment to the sinner. If God ignores sin, He becomes a party to it. If God breaks His word of solemn threatening, how can we be sure of His promises of "an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation"? (1 Pet. 1 : 4, 5.) God, who cannot lie, has said, "As all good things are come upon you which the Lord your God promised you, so shall the Lord bring upon you all evil things . . . when ye have transgressed the covenant of the Lord your God."

And Joshua gathered all the tribes of Israel to Shechem, and there the representatives of the people "presented themselves before God." Oh, when a nation bows before God, then God blesses that nation! In

The State of Israel

at that time no political question could be settled without a direct reference to God. Joshua then brought before them, as a message from God, a summary of their national history, not going into the same detail as Moses did in the book of Deuteronomy, but going much farther back—even to the time of Abraham's call from idolatry—showing how he had called him and had overruled in the subsequent history of his family, how He brought their fathers out of Egypt, how He drove out the Amorites from before them, and how He had turned Balaam's intended curse into a blessing, how He had driven out the nations which possessed the land, and also the two kings of the Amorites. He reminds them "it was not with thy sword, nor with thy bow." And then he adds, "And I have given you a land for which ye did not labor, and cities which ye built not, and ye dwell in them; of the vineyards, olive-yards, which ye planted not, do ye eat." And on this message from God Joshua grounded his exhortation. "Now, therefore, fear the Lord, and serve Him." There are many people

In a Great Trouble About Sanctification, and they do not know quite how to begin to consecrate themselves. Here we have a sample: begin with the joyful, thankful remembrance of all God's mercies in the past, and then consider what is a becoming return to make to such a God. Old Testament consecration was to love God with all the heart and soul and mind and strength; New Testament consecration is to present our bodies "a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is our reasonable service" (Rom. 12:1); anything less would be utterly unreasonable and unbecoming. Part of the consecration which God called for by Joshua was, "Put away the gods which your fathers served on the other side of the flood, and in Egypt, and serve the Lord." It is a terrible revelation of the perversity and wickedness of the human heart that annoyed this people—miraculously delivered from Egypt, miraculously brought through the sea, miraculously led, brought through the Jordan, and by the power of God alone made masters of the land—that even now idols were found amongst them, and that after all He had done their hearts were Not Fully Satisfied With God.

Consecration, i. e., yielding all to God, comes spontaneously from those who appreciate Him, and where hearts are won over to Him by the consideration of His loving kindness. Joshua then put the matter very strongly before the people, "If it seem evil to you to serve the Lord, choose ye this day whom ye will serve"—let there be no mistake about it; take your choice and do it openly—"but as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." Some people are content to serve the Lord themselves, but have no concern as to whether their children, servants, work men or women, &c., serve the Lord. Joshua would have all his household with him. "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." The people answered, "God forbid that we should forsake the Lord to serve other gods." Perhaps up to this time some of them had attempted to serve the Lord, but at the same time to serve some of the gods of the nations, that they might have an easier time of it with the heathen, and might not seem so peculiar, and might not have anything to suffer for their adherence to God. Oh how many there are who try to live with one foot in the kingdom of God and one foot in the world, leading unsaved people to believe that Christ cannot satisfy a heart, and thus misrepresenting the God who has done so much for them! The people recognized their obligations to God in all which He had done for them, and said, "Therefore will we also serve the Lord;"

Joshua then represented to the people how powerless they were to serve the Lord: "Ye cannot serve the Lord; for He is an holy God; He is a jealous God; He will not forgive your transgressions nor your sins." Joshua was speaking as the representative of the law; under the law there is no mercy, but, thank God, "Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to everyone that believeth." (Rom. 10:4.) We have no more power in ourselves to fulfil the law or serve our God than had His people of old, "but unto them which are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ (is) the Power of God and the wisdom of God." (1 Cor. 1:24.) And the people said unto Joshua, Nay; but we will serve the Lord. And Joshua said unto the people "Ye are witnesses against yourselves that ye have chosen you the Lord, to serve Him." And they said, "We are witnesses." But God wants more than words. There must be earnest deeds as well as words; "Now, therefore, put away, said he, the strange gods which are among you, and or yield your heart unto the Lord God of Israel." Here are two things to do—first, to put away all which is enmity against God; and, secondly, to cultivate a listening heart for His mind and will. Some are satisfied with renouncing novels, and other modern idols. But, after all, this is only negative, only clearing the ground of weeds. The great work is that which follows—unhindered communion with God. No amount of giving up or of consecration on our part can produce communion with God. This must always come from the Holy Ghost. But He always teaches a listening heart, a heart inclined or bent down to attend to the will of God. The people, led on, no doubt, by some who really took in the import of what they said, declared, "The Lord our God will we serve, and His voice will we obey." Oh how soon did many of them fall away!

Incline Your Heart

"So Joshua made a covenant with the people that day, and set them a statute and an ordinance in Shechem." His manner of doing this was to put the decision of the people in writing. But all possible solemnity, and all the contrivances of man put together, cannot keep either ourselves or others

Faithful to the Lord.

None but the Spirit of God can avail. "So Joshua let the people depart every man unto his inheritance." His work was now done, and it was time for him to go home. "And it came to pass after these things, that Joshua the son of Nun, the servant of the Lord, died, being an hundred and ten years old." He had lived for his vocation; there is no record all through his life of self-seeking: he had led the children of Israel on to victory, but always reminded them that the Lord had fought for them, and that the credit of no victory belonged to him or to them. To the last he kept the place God gave him under the captain of the host of the Lord. No mention of sickness is made in connection with his death, and if this renewal of the covenant was on his dying day, it manifests some little resemblance to the last day of Moses. Joshua was buried in the border of his inheritance. Was the covenant kept? "Israel served the Lord all the days of Joshua, and all the days of the elders that outlived Joshua, and which had known all the works of the Lord, that He had done for Israel." And then? Alas! the historical and prophetical books of the Bible are full of the history of their declension, and of the breaking of their covenant.

I AM HIS AND HE IS MINE.

"I am my Beloved's and my Beloved is mine."—Cant. vi. 3.

"Loved with everlasting love,
Led by grace that love to know!
Spirit, breathing from above,
Thou hast taught me it is so.
Oh, this full and perfect peace!
Oh, this transport all divine!
In a love which cannot cease,
I am His and He is mine.

"Heaven above is softer blue,
Earth around is sweeter green;
Something lives in every hue
Christless eyes have never seen;
Birds with gladder songs o'erflow,
Flowers with deeper beauty shine,
Since I know, as now I know,
I am His and He is mine.

"Things that once caused wild alarm
Cannot now disturb my rest,
Closed in everlasting arms,
Pillowed on His loving breast.
Oh, to lie forever here,
Care, and doubt, and self resign!
While He whispers in my ear,
I am His and He is mine.

"His forever, only His!
Who the Lord and me can part?
Ah, with what a rest of bliss
Christ can fill the loving heart!
Heaven and earth may fade and flee,
First-born light in gloom decline;
But while God and I shall be,
I am His and He is mine."

—Selected.

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher, 77 Bible House, New York, will furnish the above poem in leaflet form at twenty cents per hundred. A Sample Packet of 50 leaflets assorted (no two alike), will be sent post-paid, for 10 cts., or 100 for 20 cts. Postage stamps taken.

For Dyspepsia

Use Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

Dr. LORENZO WAITE, Pittsfield, Mass., says: "From its use for a period of about eight weeks, to the exclusion of all other remedies, I attribute the restoration to health of a patient who was emaciated to the last degree, in consequence of nervous prostration and dyspepsia. This patient's stomach was in such an irritable condition that he could not bear either liquid or solid food. An accomplished physician of many years experience, whom I called in consultation, pronounced his case an incurable one. At this stage I decided to use Horsford's Acid Phosphate, which resulted as above mentioned."

In this, as in every community, there are those who are out of work, or who are employed at very unsatisfactory wages. To any and all such we would say, write to B. F. Johnson & Co., Pubs., 1,009 Main St., Richmond, Va. They can show you "a better way." Capital not necessary.

WORKS OF REV. E. DAVIES.

Life of Wm. Taylor, BISHOP OF AFRICA, with fine steel portrait and other illustrations. Price 75c. "Many will be glad to know that the life of BISHOP TAYLOR can be obtained in so compendious a form as it is here presented."—S. S. Times.
"It is an interesting and soul-inspiring volume."—Times of Refreshing.

Life of Frances Ridley Havergal, with Choice Selections from her Prose and Poetical Writings. Price 50 cts.; gilt 75 cts.
"It will prove an evangelist of peace and faith wherever it goes."—Zion's Herald.

The Gift of the Holy Ghost, and Select Sermons. Price enamel paper covers, 50 cts.; cloth 80 cts.
"It is just the book for the masses, and cannot fail to do good."—Bishop R. S. Foster.

The Believer's Handbook, on HOLINESS. Containing eight Lectures. 12mo. Price, enamel paper, 25 cts.; cloth, 40 cts.
"This is truly an excellent work. Most heartily do we commend it to all."—Mrs. Phebe Palmer.

The Gift of The Holy Ghost and Believer's Handbook. In ONE volume. Cloth, $1.

The Boy Preacher, or THE LIFE AND LABORS OF REV. THOMAS HARRISON. Fine steel portrait. Price, $1.00. Enlarged edition, gilt top, $1.25.
Mr. Harrison is one of the most successful evangelists of the present day.

Daily Food for Christian Workers. Price 15 cents; gilt edges, 20 cents.
It is adapted to the highest experiences of Christian life.

Contrast Between Christianity and Infidelity. A Book of Reference for Ministers and Christian Workers. Price, paper, 20 cents; cloth, 40 cents.
"This book is worthy of a place in any library."—Lutheran Observer.

Selections From Harris' Mammon. An invaluable book. Price, paper, 10 cents.

Memoirs and Journal of Mrs. Hester Ann Rogers. Condensed and combined. Price, cloth, 50 cents.

Either of the above books will be sent by mail, post-paid on receipt of price. Address

J. E. JEWETT, Publisher and Bookseller,
77 Bible House, New York.

AGENTS WANTED to sell "The Child's Bible." Introduction by Bishop J. H. Vincent, D.D. The best selling book handled by agents. Recommended by all clergymen. Address Cassell & Co., B.B.S.D., 104 and 108 Fourth Ave., New York; 40 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

To Our Fellow Christians

Who Are Forwarding Contributions in Aid of Christian Work in Mexico.

Bishop Riley requests me to inform the kind friends who are generously contributing in aid of Christian work in Mexico, that we have now over one hundred monthly subscribers who are forwarding contributions in its behalf. Bishop Riley sends to all who are contributing in aid of the work in Mexico his most sincere thanks for their timely gifts.

As there are, no doubt, many who would be glad to contribute something monthly in behalf of the cause of Christ in Mexico, but who feel that they cannot afford to give as much as one dollar a month, we venture the suggestion, that when possible the friends of the work should try and collect small contributions from such and forward the same with their own contributions to Bishop Riley, 43 Bible House, New York. For example, some friend of the work who is now forwarding one dollar a month, might induce ten others, to each give ten cents a month, and collect and forward the same with his own contribution. Another who now contributes one dollar a month, might induce four others to each give one cent a day, or thirty-one cents a month, and collect and forward the same with his own contribution monthly. Still a third who now contributes a dollar a month might induce two friends, to each give fifty cents a month, and collect and forward the same regularly with his own contribution.

If this plan could be adopted generally among the more than one hundred regular monthly subscribers to the work, we might soon be able to report to our friends that we had over two hundred dollars a month contributed regularly in behalf of the work in Mexico.

We remind our friends that to continue the work in Mexico effectively we most pressingly need a regular monthly income, as we have to meet a regular monthly expense.

A most precious Christian work has been commenced in Mexico, and we are doing what we can to continue it, by raising an income in its behalf. We earnestly appeal to our fellow Christians to aid us in this effort. There are one hundred and thirteen millions who speak the English language, and seventy-five millions who speak the Spanish or Portuguese languages. Among those who speak the English language, there are multitudes who know and love the pure gospel, and are doing what they can for the Master. Among those who speak the Spanish or the Portuguese languages, there are a few who know and love the pure gospel, and are faithfully working for our dear Master. Our Spanish-American society is working hard to raise an income to aid in building up a strong centre of Christian work in Mexico. The influence of that work has already extended into Spain and Cuba, and, we trust, will yet extend into South America. Fellow Christians, think of seventy-five millions who speak the Spanish or Portuguese languages, millions and millions, and millions of whom have never had a Bible in their hands!!! Help us! help us! to do Christian work in their midst.

Bishop Riley has been instrumental in having more than one hundred thousand copies of the Bible or New Testament circulated in Mexico. Many hundreds of children have been educated in Christian schools established by him. He has helped to prepare choice gospel hymns and an able evangelical literature in the Spanish language. More than forty congregations have been gathered in the Republic of Mexico through his efforts. He has secured two magnificent stone churches in the City of Mexico where the gospel has been preached for years. He has trained up a noble band of able preachers of the pure gospel. He has given nineteen years of his life to aid in building up this great work, and he appeals to his fellow Christians to contribute the monthly income needed to continue it effectively.

Dear friends, will you not only continue to contribute to this good work yourselves, but also encourage others to do the same. Some may not be able to contribute monthly but could do so occasionally. Occasional gifts are most thankfully received. Pray for this work, and that many may be moved to befriend it.

With best Christian wishes, I am, you brother in Christ,

A. D. MAINE.

WANTED Old U.S. & Confederate postage stamps used from 1842 to 1865. Many are very rare and command high prices when on the original letters or envelopes. Send stamp for price lists and circulars, explaining what is wanted. Semmes & Lambert, Alexandria, Va. P.O. Box 9.

BAGSTER Comprehensive Teachers' Bibles. With New Helps, New Concordance, Index-Alphabetical, Polyglot References, The Only Teachers' Bible published since the Revised Edition. Four editions, various bindings. "A Perfect Help to Bible Study."—S.S. Times. London. Sold by all booksellers; or, JAMES POTT & Co. 14 & 15 Astor Place, New York, Agents.

ILLUSTRATIVE GATHERINGS for Preachers and Teachers. A Manual of Anecdotes Facts, Figures, Proverbs, Quotations, &c., &c., adapted for Christian teaching. By Rev. G. S. Bowes. Two series, 12 mo. muslin, each $1.25. "For variety, pertinency and availability it is decidedly superior to anything we have seen."—Evangelical Repository. Sent to any address free on receipt of above price PERKINPINE & HIGGINS, 914 Arch St., Philadelphia, Pa.

$75.00 to $250.00 A MONTH can be made working for us. Agents preferred who can furnish a horse and give their whole time to the business. Spare moments may be profitably employed also. A few vacancies in towns and cities. B. F. Johnson & Co., Pub's, 1009 Main St., Richmond, Va.

"Demonology or Spiritualism, Ancient and Modern."—"An effective weapon."—"A sword of fire."—"Only unanswerable work on the subject."—Startling disclosures.—History facts and data.—Scores saved already. Whole communities rescued. Every family, preacher and christian worker needs one. 310 pp. 12mo, cloth. Price reduced to $1. Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price. Address J. E. JEWETT. 77 Bible House, New York.

TEAS LADIES Send at once for our new terms. THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO., 31 and 33 Vesey St., New York, N. Y.

James McCreery & Co.
Broadway, cor. Eleventh St.,
NEW YORK.
Importers and Manufacturers
Reliable
DRESS SILKS

BOOKS HELPFUL
IN CHRISTIAN WORK.

CHILDREN'S MEETINGS AND HOW TO CONDUCT THEM, by Lucy J. Rider and Nellie M. Carman, with contributions of plans, methods and outline talks to children by nearly forty others, including the best-known and most successful workers among children in this country. 208 pages, fine cloth, $1.00.

THE PRAYER MEETING AND ITS IMPROVEMENT, by Rev. L. O. Thompson. 12mo. 256 pages, cloth, $1.25.
"This is so good a book that we wish we could get a copy to every young minister."—C. H. Spurgeon
"A very suggestive book."—Sunday-School Times

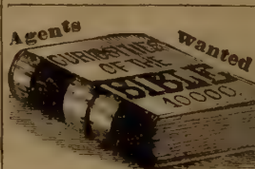
THUS SAITH THE LORD, by Major W. Whittle. A handbook for Christian workers. 131 pages, flexible cloth, 50 cts.
"A manual of Scripture texts arranged to present the leading subjects met with in dealing with inquirers.

SECRET POWER; or, the Secret of Success in Christian Life and Work, by D. L. Moody. 192 pages, 12mo, cloth, 60 cts.; paper, 30 cts.
"Every page is full of stimulating thought."—Christian Commonwealth.

* Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price*

J. E. JEWETT,
77 Bible House, - - New York



Pertaining to sons, Places, Things, with Bible Study, Concert Exercises, Prayer-Meeting Topics, Outlines, etc. Introduced by J. H. Vincent, D.D. 1,000 pages. By mail, $2. Immensely popular. Also, for new book, BOW IN THE CLOUD, or, Words of Comfort, etc., by 200 Best Authors, $1.75.

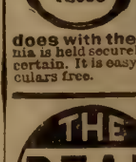
WOMEN'S HAND-BOOK. $2. Just Issued. A lady wanted in every town to introduce it. Quick Sales. Big Pay. Address E. B. TREAT, Publisher, 771 Broadway, N.

PRINTING Methods of Type, 5c. Amateur Printers' Guide Book, 15c.

PRESSES CIRCULAR F JOSEPH WATSON 19 Murray St., N.
Samples of Scrap Pictures and Cards, 10 cents.

UNIVERSITY PIANO FROM $180 TO $150 FINEST PIANOS IN THE WORLD SOLD DIRECT TO FAMILIES, saving the enormous expenses of agents. Sent with beautiful cover, stool and book, for trial in your own home before you buy. Guaranteed six years. Send for catalogue. Marchal & Smith Piano Co., 235 E. 21st St., N.

ON 30 DAYS' TRIAL



THIS NEW ELASTIC TRUSS Has a Pad different from others, is cup shape, with ball adjusting Ball in center, adapts itself to all positions of body while the ball in the presses back the intestines just as a person does with the finger. With light pressure the hernia is held securely day and night, and a radical cure certain. It is easy, durable and cheap. Sent by mail. Circulars free. IGGLESTON TRUSS CO., Chicago, Ill.

The New England Medical Monthly says
THE DEAF HEAR —"WALES' INVISIBLE SOUND DISC for deafness by practical demonstration ranks all other devices of the age! Concentrating the sound waves on the drum head, its possibilities are indeed very great. For sale only by the Inventor H. A. WALES, Bridgeport, Conn.

SEATTLE No blizzards, heavy snows or cyclones. Average winter temperature 48° above zero. Seattle, largest city in Washington Territory. Population 25,000. Commercial, educational and financial center of Puget Sound Country. Full information free. SE-AT-TLE. CHAS. H. KITTINGER, Seattle, Wash. Territory.

In all the world there is but one sure cure for the OPIUM Habit. The Dr. J. L. Stephens Remedy never fails, and no other treatment ever cured one case. We have cured more than 10,000 cases. NO PAY TILL CURED. Remember this, and write to the J. L. Stephens Co., Lebanon, Ohio.

FEATHERS. The finest live white geese feathers in the country, 75 cts. per lb. Mattresses made over for $2.50. Feathers steamed and renovated. H. Pickford, 11 Nassau St., Brooklyn, N.Y.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1888, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.

This Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. TALMAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events as well as Stories, Anecdotes etc.

Vol. XI., No. 47. Office, 63 Bible House. N. Y. THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1888. Price, 3 Cents. Annual Subscription, $1.50.

REV. J. BURNHAM.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

PORTRAITS OF REVS. J. BURNHAM AND J. J. KENDON, EVANGELISTS AMONG THE HOP-PICKERS.

REWARDS FOR THE DULL. Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning.

THE RESURRECTION: THE FIRST. By Rev. A. C. Tris. (Concluded.)

A Persian Robe of Honor—An Inebriate Under Treatment—A Wife Lent to a Dispensary—A Preacher Confused, etc.

THE LORD'S RETURN IMMINENT. By Dr. L. W. Munhall.

A PARADOX. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

Gems from New Books: A Futile Occupation—A Foreigner's Changed Opinion, etc.

PORTRAIT OF MRS. CHAMBERLAIN

A MOMENTOUS EXCURSION. (With Illustration.)

PICTURE OF THE PEAK OF INSPIRATION IN THE YOSEMITE VALLEY.

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE. (Continued.)

ISRAEL UNDER JUDGES. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

REV. J. J. KENDON.

EVANGELISTS AMONG THE HOP-PICKERS—SCENES IN THE HOP-GARDENS.

THE REV. J. BURNHAM:

Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Singing Evangelist.

Born in 1849—Early Devotion to Music—Leaves Home at the Age of Seventeen—Influence of His Mother's Love—Becomes Organist of a Priory—Removal to Devonshire, and Conversion—Arrives in London in 1871—Enters Mr. Spurgeon's College in 1873—Subsequent Work.

THE Rev. John Burnham, of the Pastors' College Society of Evangelists, whose Services of Song have become famous, was born at Cranbrook, England, in 1849, and is, therefore, thirty-nine years of age. When only a few months old, his father, who carried on the business of a clothier and outfitter, removed to Marden, in the same county, and there, amid pleasant rural surroundings, he spent his boyhood. He was sent to the local school for his education, but at the early age of thirteen he joined his father in the business. From his earliest days he was delighted and impressed by sweet music. While other boys were playing with tops and marbles, he was seldom without a music-book in his hand. "I had no instruction," he said; "I owe all I know of music to my own unaided efforts." At the age of eight he entered at twelve he played the organ during the absence of the organist for his summer holiday; and in the following year, the post falling vacant, it was offered to him, and accepted. Both his parents were members of the Protestant Episcopal Church, but he paid frequent visits to the Congregational church at Marden. This being contrary to his father's wishes, he ceased to attend the place, but went to the Congregational church in another village. As he was engaged at Marden Church morning and afternoon, of course it was only in the evening that he could gratify this wish. When he was seventeen, a disagreement with his father caused him to leave home and commence the battle of life on his own account. After two years' absence his father invited him to return home, and though he did not accept the invitation, he and his father were reconciled. "During my two years' absence," he says, "my father, I am sorry to say, forbade me to enter home or write; but

The Choir of the Parish Church;

I Was Very Fond of My Mother, and secretly kept up a monthly letter to her through a friend in the place. My struggles she knew little of. Indeed, on two occasions, when I knew she would be anxious at the non-appearance of the usual letter, it was my last penny that bought the postage-stamp which carried to her the intelligence, 'Doing very comfortably!' Cast thus early on the cold world, I believe I should have sunk in sin among godless companions, but for my mother's love and influence, which followed me, and was doubtless a salutary check upon me."

He now went to Godstone, in Surrey, and there it was for the first time that he began really to turn his musical knowledge to account in a monetary sense. He soon discovered that the High Church people were likely to be most remunerative to him, and therefore to them he looked for professional employment. Hence early in 1869 he accepted an engagement as

Organist at a Priory

—another name for monastery—at Cosham, near Portsmouth, presided over by Father Nugee, who is now the Superior of St. Albans's Priory, in London. However, his stay here was not long, owing to the severe restrictions imposed upon him. He removed to London, where, still working at his business as outfitter, he joined the voluntary surpliced choir at St. Mary-the-Less, Lambeth, where Canon Gregory was vicar. "At that time," he says, "I was High Church to the backbone." It was at this period that he removed to Modbury, South Devon. There, to his great disappointment and annoyance, he found himself in the employ of the senior deacon of the Baptist Chapel, of which the Rev. A. English was the minister. Referring to this experience, he says: "I shall never forget the first Sunday morning after my arrival. As we all sat at breakfast, my master's wife said, 'Of course, Mr. Burnham, you will go to chapel with us?' 'No,' I replied; 'I am a Churchman.' 'Just as you please, but we would rather, of course, that there should be no divisions, and that all the household should worship together.' 'Very well, then,' I said, 'I'll go.' I did go—and I never went to church afterwards. I was very much struck with the simplicity which characterized the service, after the ceremonial to which I had been for so long used. And the two passages of Scripture I heard appealed strongly to my judgment—'The poor have the gospel preached to them,' and 'The common people heard Him gladly.' At dinner-time some one asked me, 'How did you like the service?' 'Pretty middling,' was my reply; but I liked it well enough to go again without being asked. Three or four weeks after that I listened to a sermon from the text, 'What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his soul?' This sermon seemed to have special reference to me, for I had bartered away my talent for money." In fact, the Holy Spirit so applied the word of truth that young Burnham was filled with concern about his soul, and he knew not what to do. It was

The Crisis of His Life.

It afterwards transpired that a young lady in the same establishment, as well as six or seven other persons in the town, were similarly impressed by this sermon. A week or two later a party of the good deacon's business assistants went for an excursion to a seaside place near by, and here the young lady referred to had a narrow escape from a watery grave. In this the hand of God was so plainly seen, that Mr. Burnham, and others in the party, accepted Christ before they returned home. This was the commencement of a most gracious revival of religion in the church, and on October 9, 1869, the young man and eight others were immersed on a public profession of their faith in Christ.

Mr. Burnham at once commenced to work for Christ. The judicious counsels of Mr. English, his minister, and the prayerful perusal of "The Memoirs of Harlan Page," opened his eyes to the usefulness of

A Pen Consecrated to Christ, and he determined never to close a letter without "a word for Jesus," and many interesting cases of blessing have resulted from his correspondence for Christ. On his conversion he soon recognized as never before the evils of the common drinking customs, and the barrier they form to Christian service, and he at once espoused the cause of total abstinence. He has ever since taken a keen and active interest in the temperance movement. Soon after he joined the church, too, he started a psalmody class in a neighboring village. This very soon grew into a considerable Bible class. In 1871 he removed to London and united himself with the Baptist church, of which the pastor was the Rev. Philip Gast. He then commenced to preach in the open air; but before long he felt the strain was too great for him, and his physician insisted that either business or public religious work should be given up. He gave up business, and made successful application to be Admitted to the Pastors' College.

This was in January, 1873, and he remained under Mr. Spurgeon's tuition until November, 1874, when he became the minister of the Baptist church at Fivehead, Somerset. There he spent three happy, useful years, but through a complete breakdown in his health he was compelled to resign. "However," he says, "my naturally restless disposition constrained me to get to work, and I commenced visiting the brethren in isolated places, and holding services among them. This work was blessed beyond my most sanguine hopes, and, coming to the ears of Mr. Spurgeon, I was asked at the next College conference to continue in it. After a fortnight's consideration I decided to accept this work, and from that time I have gone on preaching and singing in all parts of the country."

For some years past Mr. Burnham has conducted annually missions among the hop pickers, in connection with the Rev. J. J. Kendon—whose portrait is also given on our front page—and his success in that sphere has been very encouraging. He has compiled and published no fewer than thirty-seven Services of Sacred Song, all of which have had a very large circulation. His solo singing is very attractive, and the bright, natural way in which he conducts his evangelistic missions wins the hearts of all, and is blessed by God to the conversion of many.

THE REV. J. J. KENDON,

The Hoppers' Evangelist.

Early Labors—How He Came to Visit Goudhurst—The Good Work Done There—Privations of a Life of Faith—Mr. Spurgeon's Estimate of It—Mr. Kendon's Boarding-Schools.

THE Rev. Joseph J. Kendon, whose portrait accompanies that of Mr. Burnham on the first page, is about sixty years of age. Emphatically a man of the people, he has through a long series of years lived and labored for the welfare of the people, first in a crowded district in the East of London, and then in a hop-growing district of Kent, of which Goudhurst is the centre. Mr. Kendon was brought to accept Christ in his boyhood, and he was at once deeply impressed with a yearning desire to bring souls to the Saviour. In June, 1861, he visited Goudhurst for the benefit of his health, which had become seriously impaired by exhaustive evangelistic labors and domestic sorrow, and there he has remained ever since, where God has made him

A Blessing to the Villages Around.

At the time when Mr. Kendon was led in the providence of God to commence his work in Kent, he found, he says, "the people very dark and very destitute in spiritual things." A farmer lent him an "oast-house," or hop-drying kiln, which became his mission house for the first three years, and he devoted himself in real earnest to a simple Gospel ministry and pastoral visitation and cottage meetings. The congregation was of the very poorest class. From the first there was a spirit of hearing amongst the people, and in course of time the chapel and school buildings were erected, which are now in use, and in 1864 a church of believers formed, and five or six mission stations in neighboring centres established. It was a work commenced and carried on in simple and absolute dependence on God. Mr. Kendon writes of these early years: "How often, when we have been brought to our last penny, and have not known how to provide for our little ones, have we been enabled to go to our heavenly Father and tell Him all our wants in confidence; and in His own time and way He has graciously sent the needed help." This is True Christian Heroism.

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon says: "The story of Mr. Kendon's labors at Goudhurst is exceedingly full of interest, and is an instance of how a determined, zealous man may, under the Divine blessing, surmount difficulties and make the influence of the Gospel to be felt in an agricultural district with few to help."

The hop-harvest in Kent has lent itself to the pencil of the artist, and perhaps no rural scene can rival it when "the leaves are turning yellow or kindling into red," and among the troops of hoppers Mr. Kendon and his colleagues have done a marvellous work. Every season it is his privilege to command quite a small army of Christian workers, who compass the whole hop-district around Goudhurst. What results have been accomplished only "the Day will declare." Each year some of the hoppers have gone home to tell what great things the Lord has done for them; souls have been saved, backsliders restored, and many a slave to drink rescued. The expenses of the work are considerable, but funds are sent by friends to whom the value of the mission is known. For some years Mr. Kendon has conducted boarding-schools for boys and girls, and the results have been of the most encouraging character. In his schools he has sought to realize the ideal of a Christian home, and this department of his many-sided ministry has also not been without spiritual results.

EVANGELISTS AMONG HOP-PICKERS.

EVERY year, when the hops in the gardens are ripe, there is a migration of thousands of East-end Londoners to the hop-gardens of Kent and Sussex, and trains full of men, women, and children, all anxious to exchange the crowded alleys and lanes of Spitfields, Whitechapel, and West Ham for the broad, open expanses in the beautiful districts of Orpington, Bromley, and Maidstone, are despatched from the city termini of the railways. Doctors who labor amongst the poor in the parts of London from which these hop-pickers are mainly drawn, say that the effect of this yearly trip is magical upon those who go, saving hundreds of lives.

There was a time when the picking of hops brought with it into the peaceful villages where the gardens are situated a terrible increase of crime. Those were the days when farmers could, without infringing the law, lodge in one common barn the laborers of both sexes who thus temporarily came into the district; when travelling vendors of drink were permitted to debauch the people with horrible liquor; and neither police nor philanthropist gave evidence of caring what became of the hop-picking throng. But, happily, all that is changed now; a sanitary inspector, policemen, and last, but by no means least, Christian Workers, who, by their have thrown a strong humanizing influence over the motley crowds in the hop-gardens, have so altered the state of affairs that crime is scarcely heard of, drunkenness is unfrequent, and the magistrates of the two counties find their work but little increased by the sudden influx of these immigrant thousands. They gain health and strength, money to help them through the winter months, and an acquaintance with Nature, which cannot fail to exercise a good effect upon at least a large proportion of them. About 50,000 hop-pickers are busily employed, and the Revs. J. Burnham and J. J. Kendon are enabled to do great service for Christ. The hop-gardens are visited during the day, words of gospel truth are spoken to the people from bin to bin, tracts are distributed, and short services are held in the camps during the dinner-hour. Open-air services are held every evening on the village green: and in this way many of the poor people hear more of the gospel, and feel more of its power during the hopping season, than they do all the rest of the year. There are also "Hop-pickers' Bible Readings," and "Hop-pickers' Sunday-schools," besides help in the shape of clothing, soup, medical aid, etc.

Kindly Sympathy,

Living accommodation for so large a number of persons is still a difficulty not completely solved, but great advances have been made on past times. Long low sheds are built, and in many instances provided with fire-places or ovens, and divided off into partitions. Plenty of straw is provided, and to many city laborers this is luxurious sleeping-quarters, after the cold stones of Trafalgar Square or the arches near the river. The comfort of others who are not thus favored depends on their own ingenuity. Straw, poles, and hurdles are furnished, and each builds his own house.

The Process of Hop-Gathering, which is illustrated on the first page, is very interesting. The vine is first cut near the ground, by an instrument which has a knife-blade on one side and a stout hook on the other; the pole, with the vine still on it, is then pulled up and laid across the bin, over a sheet of canvas placed on a frame so as to form a hollow receptacle, somewhat like the bed in a cradle, and there a dozen hands are quickly busied in plucking the hops, which fall into the bin, adding to the previous collection. The leaves and flowers are torn off by one or two parting strokes, and the pole is laid aside for future use. This process is repeated all day long, as fast as the pickers can deal with the plants cut down and laid before them, and, when the bin is filled with hops, containing perhaps twenty bushels, it is lifted and emptied, and they are carried away to the kiln, to be dried by a furnace-fire.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Most Welcome Discovery.—A Servant of Christ remarks: "A poor man came to me one day, and said, 'Minister, I want to be saved, I do.' 'Well, just tell that to the Master,' I replied. 'But I am such a poor, weak, sinful sinner, that I do not think He would have anything to do with me,' he replied. 'Just tell Jesus that, too,' I said. We went and sat down together. He prayed to God, telling Him just what He had told me, and as he did so, I whispered, 'Jesus says. "Him that cometh unto Me, I will in no wise cast out."' All at once his countenance brightened; he turned to me, and exclaimed: 'Bless the Lord! I am saved now, and I know it.' If we tell God our wants, and trust in Him who shed His blood for us, we may rest assured that He will hear our prayers."

Pinned to the Wall by Satan.—An Evange-list says: "Dr. Andrew Bonar tells that on one occasion he preached upon the unpardonable sin, and before the end of the week he had five of his congregation calling upon him, each saying, 'Oh, doctor, I am sure I have committed that unpardonable sin.' Once when preaching myself on the same subject, there came to me the next day a foreman from one of the large works in the vicinity, who said, 'Oh, sir, I have thought for some time that I was a Christian, but now I have great fear that I have committed that unpardonable sin. Did you ever know one who had the same idea?' 'That I did,' was the reply. 'The devil has often pinned me to the wall with the same thought, but I knew that if I could come to Christ I had not committed it, for, whosoever cometh to Him He will in no wise cast out.' But if we feel any anxiety to come to Christ it is by His Holy Spirit that we are thus invited, and God will not turn away His invited guests."

An Effectual Antidote to Misery.—The Rev. J. Linnell relates: "I was preaching in a tent, when one of the workers came to me and said there was a man outside who would not speak to any of them, but was particularly anxious to see me. I went out and invited him to come into the tent, and soon we entered into conversation. He told me that if it were not for the thought of what was to be in the hereafter, he would have done with this life at once, for he was utterly helpless, and had not any money to pay for food or lodging. I saw from the man's miserable appearance that he spoke the truth, and I put a coin into his hand. This little act of kindness seemed to raise his spirits. He talked more freely: then I noticed that he had a Scotch accent. 'Did you come from Scotland?' I asked. 'Yes, from Glasgow,' he replied. We then spoke of the city, and of James Morrison Street Hall, which he had often attended, and of the precious teaching he had got there. Before he left the tent he had come to Christ and received life, instead of seeking death at his own hand."

Saved from Gambling.—A Man Speaking of the goodness of the Lord towards him, says that so completely was he addicted to gambling, that from the 1st of October to the 13th of February in the following year, he never slept in a bed. He used to go to the club at night and play cards until five o'clock the next morning, then enter a saloon and spend some time there. On one occasion he was at a ball, and so intoxicated did he get that for two days he did not know what he was doing. His friends became so disgusted with his conduct that they discarded him, and to the present time, although he has been reformed for years, they will not even see him. One night he found himself not very far from the Earl Street Hall, and one of the friends spoke to him, and asked him to come in; they got into conversation, and on being asked to give his heart to the Lord, he answered, "No, I have gone so far I am never going to alter." One night going into Coventry Street he thought of the words of the friend who had spoken to him, and something made him think he would like to go round and see what sort of a place this Mission Hall was; he came in, thinking he would not be noticed, and was spoken to. So impressed was he at what was said to him, that the next night he felt impelled to walk round the same way, and although he got behind the door to keep out of sight, he was again found out, and so mightily did the words spoken seem to strike him that he received Christ, and went away rejoicing."

Photographing a Drunken Husband.—Mr. Cruickshank observes: "There was a woman whose husband was in the habit of drinking very heavily. One night he came home, as he too often did, helplessly drunk, and reeled into a chair and fell asleep. As his wife looked at him, and saw how miserable he appeared, she thought that if he could only see himself in that state he would never touch drink again. This thought took firm hold of her mind. She had a friend, a photographer. If she could get him to come and photograph her husband, just as he lay there, it might have a good effect. She slipped out of the house, and soon returned with her friend, who brought his camera with him, and in a short time the inebriated husband was photographed. A few days afterwards the carte came home. The woman first looked at it, and then handed it to her husband. 'Is that anyone I know?' he inquired. 'Yes,' was all his wife said. Another look, and then he asked, 'Is that myself?' 'Yes, that is you.' the woman quietly replied. He took a long look, and then exclaimed, as he turned away to hide his emotion, 'By the help of God I will never touch strong drink again!' He had been shown his true state while under the power of sin, and came to Jesus to be cleansed by Him."

Good Result of a Soldiers' Quarrel.—Mr. Hamilton remarks: "A friend of mine was, on a public holiday, visiting one of the famous historic castles of Scotland, and was shown over the place by a sergeant, one of the guardians. The soldier was a fine, hearty specimen of middle-aged manhood, and did not in the least object to speak of his travels and exploits, and, among other things, he told how he became a total abstainer. 'It was,' he said, 'when we were stationed at Malta. We had comparatively little to do, and, consequently, we passed much of our time at the canteen, and between the bad quality of the liquor and the heat of the sun, the liquor often flew to the drinker's head, and for the time completely maddened him, making the most peaceable man ready to fight with his friend on the slightest pretext. One afternoon I sat drinking with two Maltese; we got into an argument. They would not give in. I lost my temper, and insulted them most grossly. They leaped to their feet, and drawing their knives rushed upon me, and I would have fared badly if some of my comrades had not interfered. The excitement and danger completely sobered me; I saw that the Maltese had been right, and I entirely wrong; and all through that accursed drink. I determined to seek out those men and apologize, and never again while there to let a drop of liquor pass my lips. After my apology the men became very friendly. When we left Malta, I looked back and saw how much good total abstinence had done me, and resolved that I would never again touch strong drink.' Yes, no matter in what country we find it, strong drink is doing the same diabolical work, taking away all manhood, and implanting a fiendish passion that would destroy all with whom it comes in contact."

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION—1888.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled, "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting 75 cents. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God.

REWARDS FOR THE DULL.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached last Sunday Morning, November 18, 1888.

"Unto one he gave five talents, to another two, and to another one; to every man according to his several ability." Matt. 25 : 15.

The Capital Intrusted to the Servants—Faithfulness Expected—I. Becoming a Christian Implies Service—A Voluntary Service—No Drudgery in It—II. Different Qualifications Given to Different People—Ruinous Comparisons—How Solomon's Temple was Built—Every Man Marked for his Place—III. Grace Meant to be Accumulative—Children's Growing Fortunes—IV. Inferiority of Gifts No Excuse for Indolence—Work for Men of One Talent—V. A Day of Settlement Coming—The Awful Aggregate—VI. Degrees of Celestial Happiness to be Graduated.

MANY of the parables of Jesus Christ were more graphic in the times in which He lived than they are now, because circumstances have so much changed. In olden times, when a man wanted to wreak a grudge upon his neighbor, after the farmer had scattered the seed-wheat over the field, and was expecting the harvest, his enemy would go across the same field with a sack full of the seed of darnel-grass, scattering that seed all over the field, and, of course, it would sprout up and spoil the whole crop; and it was to that Christ referred in the parable when He spoke of the tares being sown among the wheat. In this land our farms are fenced off, and the wolves have been driven to the mountains, and we cannot fully understand the meaning of the parable in regard to the shepherd and the lost sheep. But the parable from which I speak to-day is founded on Something We All Understand.

It is built on money, and that means the same in Jerusalem as in New York. It means the same to the serf as to the czar, and to the Chinese coolie as to the emperor. Whether it is made out of bone or brass or iron or copper or gold or silver, it speaks all languages without a stammer. The parable of the text runs in this wise: The owner of a large estate was about to leave home, and he had some money that he wished properly invested; and so he called together his servants and said: "I am going away now, and I wish you would take this money and put it to the very best possible use; and when I come back return to me the interest." To one man he gave $9,400, to others he gave lesser sums of money; to the least he gave $1,880. He left home and was gone for years, and then returned. On his arrival he was anxious to know about his worldly affairs, and he called his servants together to report. "Let me know," said he

"What You Have Been Doing with my property since I have been gone." The man who had received the $9,400 came up and said: "I invested that money. I got good interest for it. I have in other ways rightly employed it; and here are $18,800. You see I have doubled what you gave me." "That's very good," said the owner of the estate; "that's grandly done. I admire your faithfulness and industry. I shall reward you. Well done—well done." Other servants came up with smaller accumulations. After a while, I see a man dragging himself along, with his head hanging. I know, from the way he comes in, that he is

A Lazy Fellow.

He comes up to the owner of the estate, and says: "Here are those $1,880." "What!" says the owner of the property, "haven't you made it accumulate anything?" "Nothing — nothing." "Why, what have you been about all these years?" "Oh, I was afraid that if I invested it I might somehow lose it. There are your $1,880." Many a man started out with only a crown in his pocket, and achieved a fortune; but this fellow of my text, with $1,880, has gained not a farthing. Instead of confessing his indolence, he goes to work to berate his master—for indolence is most always impudent and impertinent. Of course he loses his place, and is discharged from the service.

The owner who went out into a far country is Jesus Christ going from earth to heaven. The servants spoken of in the text are members of the Church. The talents are our different qualifications of usefulness given in different proportions to different people. The coming back of the owner is the Lord Jesus returning at the Judgment to make final settlement. The raising of some of these men to be rulers over five or two cities is the exaltation of the righteous at the last day, while the casting out of the idler is the expulsion of all those who have misimproved their privileges.

Learn first, from this subject, that becoming a Christian is merely Going Out to Service.

If you have any romantic idea about becoming a Christian, I want now to scatter the romance. If you enter into the kingdom of God, it will be going into plain, practical, honest, continuous, persistent Christian work. I know there are a great many people who have fantastic and romantic notions about this Christian life, but he who serves God with all the energies of body, mind, and soul is a worthy servant, and he who does not is an unworthy servant. When the war-trumpet sounds, all the Lord's soldiers must march, however deep the snow may be, or however fearful the odds against them. Under our Government we may have colonels and captains and generals in time of peace, but in the Church of God there is no peace until the last great victory shall have been achieved. But it is

A Voluntary Service.

People are not brought into it as slaves were dragged from Africa. A young man goes to an artisan, and says: "Sir, I want to learn your trade. I by this indenture yield myself to your care and service for the next four or five or seven years. I want you to be my master, and I want to be your servant." Just so, if we come into the kingdom of God at all, we must come, saying to Christ: "Be Thou my Master. I take Thy service for time and for eternity. I choose it." It is a voluntary service. There is no drudgery in it. In our worldly callings, sometimes our nerves get worn out, and our head aches, and our physical faculties break down; but in this service of the Lord Jesus, the harder a man works the better he likes it, and a man in this audience who has been for forty years serving God enjoys the employment better than when he first entered it. The grandest honor that can ever be bestowed upon you is to have Christ say to you on the last day: "Well done, good and faithful servant!"

Learn also from this parable that

Different Qualifications

are given to different people. The teacher lifts a blackboard, and he draws a diagram, in order that by that diagram he may impress the mind of the pupil with the truth that he has been uttering. And all the truths of this Bible are drawn out in the natural world as in a great diagram. Here is an acre of ground that has ten talents. Under a little culture, it yields twenty bushels of wheat to the acre. Here is another piece of ground that has only one talent. You may plow it, and harrow it, and culture it year after year, but it yields a mere pittance. So here is a man with ten talents in the way of getting good and doing good. He soon, under Christian culture, yields great harvests of faith and good work. Here is another man who seems to have only one talent, and you may put upon him the greatest spiritual culture, but he yields but little of the fruits of righteousness. You are to understand that there are different qualifications for different individuals. There is a great deal of

Ruinous Comparison

when a man says: "Oh, if I only had that man's faith, or that man's money, or that man's eloquence, how I would serve God!" Better take the faculty that God has given you and employ it in the right way. The rabbis used to say, that before the stone and timber were brought to Jerusalem for the Temple, every stone and piece of timber was marked; so that before they started for Jerusalem the architects knew in what place that particular piece of timber or stone should fit. And so I have to tell you we are all marked for some one place in the great temple of the Lord, and do not let us complain saying: "I would like to be the foundation stone, or the cap-stone." Let us go into the very place where God intends us to be, and be satisfied with the position. Your talent may be in personal appearance; your talent may be in large worldly estate; your talent may be in high social position; your talent may be in a swift pen or eloquent tongue; but whatever be the talent, it has been given only for one purpose—practical use.

You sometimes find a man in the community of whom you say: "He has no talent at all" and yet that man may have a hundred talents. His one hundred talents may be shown in the item of endurance. Poverty comes, and he endures it; persecution comes, and he endures it; sickness comes, and he endures it. Before men and angels he is a specimen of Christian patience, and he is really illustrating the power of Christ's Gospel, and is doing as much for the Church and more for the Church, than many more positively active. If you have one talent, use that; if you have ten talents, use them, satisfied with the fact that we all have different qualifications, and that the Lord decides whether we shall have one or whether we shall have ten.

I learn also from this parable that the grace of God was Intended to be Accumulative.

When God plants an acorn, He means an oak; and when He plants a small amount of grace in the heart, He intends it to be growthful, and enlarge until it overshadows the whole nature. There are parents who, at the birth of each child, lay aside a certain amount of money, investing it, expecting, by accumulation and by compound interest, that by the time the child shall come to mid-life this small amount of money will be a fortune, showing how a small amount of money will roll up into a vast accumulation. Well, God sets aside a certain amount of grace for each one of His spiritual children at his birth, and it is to go on, and, as by compound interest, accumulate, until it shall become an eternal fortune. Can it be possible that you have been acquainted with the Lord Jesus for ten, twenty, thirty years, and that you do not love Him more now than you ever did before? Can it be that you have been cultured in the Lord's vineyard, and that Christ finds on you nothing but sour grapes? You may depend upon it, if you do not use the talent that God gave you, it will dwindle. The rill that breaks from the hillside will either widen into a river or dry up. The brightest day started in the dim twilight. The strongest Christian man was once a weak Christian. Take the one talent, and make it two; take five, and make them ten; take ten and make them twenty. The grace of God was intended to be very accumulative.

Again: I learn that inferiority of gifts is No Excuse for Indolence.

This man, with the smallest amount of money, came growling into the presence of the owner of the estate, as much as to say: "If you had given me $9,400 I would have brought $18,800 as well as this other man. You gave me only $1,880, and I hardly thought it was worth while to use it at all. So I hid it in a napkin, and it produced no result. It's because you didn't give me enough." But inferiority of faculties is no excuse for indolence. Let me say to the man who has the least qualifications, by the grace of God he may be made almost omnipotent. The merchant whose cargoes come out from every island of the sea, and who, by one stroke of the pen, can change the whole face of American commerce, has not so much power as you may have before God in earnest, faithful, and continuous prayer. You say you have no faculty. Do you not understand that you might this afternoon go into your place of prayer and kneel before God, and bring down upon your soul, and the souls of others, a blessing so vast that it would take eternal ages to compute it? "Oh," you say, "I haven't fleetness of speech.

can't talk well, I can't utter what I want to ay." My brother, can you not quote one pas- ge of Scripture? Then, take that one passage f Scripture; carry it with you everywhere; uote it under all proper circumstances. With hat one passage of Scripture you may harvest thousand souls for God. I am glad that the nief work of the Church is being done by the Men of One Talent.

)nce in a while, when a great fortress is to be aken, God will bring out a great field-piece nd rake all with the fiery hail of destruction. lut common muskets do most of the hard fight- ng. It took only one Joshua, and the thousands f common troops under him, to drive down he walls o. cities, and, under wrathful strokes, o make nations fly like sparks from the anvil. t only took one Luther for Germany, one winglius for Switzerland, one John Knox for cotland, one Calvin for France, and one John Vesley for England. Dorcas as certainly has mission to serve as Paul has a mission to reach. The two mites dropped by the widow nto the poor-box will be as much applauded as he endowment of a college, which gets a man's ame into the newspapers. The man who indled the fire under the burnt-offering in the ncient temple had a duty as imperative as that f the high priest, in magnificent robes, walking nto the Holy of Holies under the cloud of Je- ovah's presence. Yes, the men with one talent re to save the world, or it will never be saved t all. The men with five or ten talents are empted to toil chiefly for themselves, to build p their own great name, and work for their own ggrandizement, and do nothing for the allevi- tion of the world's woes. The cedar of Lebanon tanding on the mountain seems to hand down he storms out of the heavens to the earth, but . bears no fruit, while some dwarf pear-tree has nore fruit on its branches than it can carry. Better to have one talent and put it to full use han five hundred wickedly neglected.

My subject teaches me that there is coming

A Day of Solemn Settlement.

When the old farmer of the text got home, he mmediately called all the servants about him, nd said: "Here is the little account I have een keeping. I want to see your account, nd we will first compare them; and I'll pay you hat I owe you, and you'll pay me what you we me. Let us have a settlement." The day ill come when the Lord Jesus Christ will ap- ear, and will say to you: "What have you been oing with my property? What have you been oing with my faculties? What have you been oing with what I gave you for accumulative urposes?" There will be no escape from that ettlement. Sometimes you cannot get a settle- ient with a man, especially if he owes you. He ostpones and procrastinates, and says: "I'll see ou next week," or "I'll see you next month.' he fact is he does not want to settle. But hen the great day comes of which I am speak- ng, there will be no escape. We will have to ace all the bills.

I have sometimes been amazed to see how an ccountant will run up or down a long line of gures. If I see ten or fifteen figures in a line, nd I attempt to add them up, and I add them wo or three times, I make them different each me. But I have admired the way an account- nt will take a long line of figures, and without single mistake, and with great celerity, an- ounce the aggregate. Now, in the last great ettlement, there will be a correct account pre- nted. God has kept a long line of sins, a long ne of broken Sabbaths, a long line of profane ords, a long line of discarded sacraments, a ng line of misimproved privileges. They will ll be added up, and before angels and devils nd men

The Aggregate Will be Announced.

h, that will be the great day of settlement! I ave to ask the question: "Am I ready for it?" is of more importance to me to answer that uestion in regard to myself than in regard to ou; and it is of more importance for you to nswer it in regard to yourself than in regard to me. Every man for himself in that day. Every woman for herself in that day. "If thou be wise, thou shalt be wise for thyself; if thou scornest, thou alone shalt bear it." We are apt to speak of the last day as an occasion of vociferation—a great demonstration of power and pomp; but there will be on that day, I think, a few moments of entire silence. I think a tremendous, an overwhelming silence; I think it will be such a silence as the earth never heard. It will be at the moment when all nations are listening for their doom.

I learn also from this parable of the text that in heaven our degrees of

Happiness Will be Graduated

according to our degrees of usefulness on earth. Several of the commentators agree in making this parable the same one as in Luke, where one man was made ruler over five cities, and another made ruler over two cities. Would it be fair and right that the professed Christian man who has lived very near the line between the world and the Church—the man who has often compromised his Christian character—the man who has never spoken out for God—the man who has never been known as a Christian only on communion-days—the man whose great struggle has been to see how much of the world he could get and yet win heaven—is it right to suppose that that man will have as grand and glorious a seat in heaven as the man who gave all his energies of body, mind, and soul to the service of God? The dying thief entered heaven, but not with the same startling acclaim as that which greeted Paul, who had gone under scorchings, and across dungeons, and through maltreatments into the kingdom of glory. One star differs from another star in glory, and they who toil mightily for Christ on earth shall have a far greater reward than those who have rendered only half a service.

Some of you are hastening on toward the reward of the righteous. I want to cheer you up at the thought that there will be some kind of a Reward Waiting for You.

There are Christian people in this house who are very near heaven. This week some of you may pass out into the light of the unsetting sun. I saw a blind man going along the road with his staff, and he kept pounding the earth and then stamping with his foot. I said to him: "What do you do that for?" "Oh," he said, "I can tell by the sound of the ground when I am near a dwelling." And some of you can tell by the sound of your earthly pathway that you are coming near to your father's house. I congratulate you. Oh, weather-beaten voyagers, the storms are driving you into the harbor! Just as when you were looking for a friend, you came up to the gate of his house, and you were talking with the servant, when your friend hoisted the window and shouted: "Come in! come in!" Just so, when you come to the gate of the future world, and you are talking with Death, the black porter at the gate, methinks Christ will hoist the window and say: "Come in! come in! I will make thee ruler over ten cities." In anticipation of that land I do not wonder that Augustus Toplady, the author of "Rock of Ages," declared in his last moment: "I have nothing more to pray for; God has given me everything. Surely no man can live on earth after the glories I have witnessed." Oh, my brothers and sisters, how sweet it will be, after the long wilderness march, to get home. That was a bright moment for the tired dove in the time of the Deluge, when it found its way into the window of the ark.

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman (London), edited by the Rev. M. Baxter, may be had from the office of this journal, 63 Bible House, New York; price six cents, including postage. Annual subscription, seventy cents. The following articles, among others, are contained in the number for November:

Things Coming on the Earth. By late P. H. Gosse, F.R.S.
Some of the Causes of the Coming Apostacy.
A Jewish View of the Restoration to Palestine.
Edinburgh Convention on the Second Advent of Christ.
Eccleston Hall Conference in London.
Crisis, Catastrophe, and Revolution. By Rev. H. Varley.
Railways and Prophecy. By W. Appleford.
Times and Seasons. By G. W. Houghton.
The Lord's Second Coming. By the late Dean Alford.
Passing Events Viewed from a Prophetic Standpoint.

MRS. CHAMBERLAIN.

(See Portrait on page 748.)

THE marriage in Washington, D. C., on Thursday last, of Miss Mary Endicott, daughter of the Secretary of War, to Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, the English politician, adds another name to the long list of those of American ladies who, during the past few years, have left our shores to occupy conspicuous positions on the other side of the Atlantic. Mr. Chamberlain deserves our congratulations. His mission to this country at the beginning of the year, as special commissioner to arrange the Fishery Dispute, was not a success, but his private and personal diplomacy appears to have prospered better. It seem that he met Miss Endicott at one of the Cabinet receptions, became acquainted with her, and persuaded her to become his wife.

